
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

The Academy

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE AND LIFE.

JANUARY—JUNE,
1901.

VOLUME LX.

WISCONSIN
HISTORICAL SOCIETY

PUBLISHING OFFICE: 43, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.

1901.

114.525

LONDON:

PRINTED BY ALEXANDER AND SHEPHEARD, LTD., NORWICH STREET, FETTER LANE, E.C.

W121008W
J101073H
Y131002

AP.
A1664 873770
JUL 12 1954
A543
60

CONTENTS OF VOLUME LX.

LITERATURE.

REVIEWS.

	PAGE
Abbey's (Henry) Phaethon	119
Adams's (John) French. "Self-Educator" Series.....	63
Ady's (Mrs.) The Painters of Florence	163
Alcock's (C. W.) Cricket Stories	513
Allen's (Alexander V. G.) Life and Letters of Phillips Brooks	123
Legations (Rev. Roland) The Siege of the Peking	441
(F.M.) Glimpses of English History	164
(Grant) In Nature's Workshop	283
Andrews's (Francis B.) The Benedictine Abbey of SS. Mary, Peter and Paul, at Perchore	552
Anglo-Saxon Review, The	124
Annual Register, The, 1900	444
Antiquary, The, for 1900	85
Arbuthnot's (Rev. George) edition of Shakespeare Sermons	13
Archer's (William) edition of Ibsen's The League of Youth, A Doll's House, and Pillars of Society	244
Aristocrats, The	403
Armstrong's (G. F. S.) Ballads of Down	283
Ashbee's (C. R.) The Surrey of London	359
Ashton's (Margaret Ethel) Wings	29
Asia and Africa. "Geography Readers"	62
Bach's (C.) Brother Musicians	512
Bacon's (Rev. John M.) By Land and Sky	142
Baldon-Powell's (Maj.-Gen. R. S. S.) The Mahabala Campaign	404
Baldley's (J. J.) The Aldermen of Cripple-gate	304
Balog's (Mrs.) Shadows of the War	8
Baldwin's (H. Bellows) Robert Louis Stevenson	283
Ball's (Sir Robert) Primer of Astronomy	85
Barclay's (Theresa) translation of De l'Isle Adam's Revolt and Escape	511
Baring-Gould's (S.) Virgin Saints and Martyrs	32
Barnard's (Lady Anne) South Africa a Century Ago	550
Bartram's (George) Ballads of Ghostly Shires	186
Bashall's (H. St. John Hick) The Oak Hamlet	344
Bates's (Katharine Lee) Spanish Highways and Byways	51
Batson's (Mary) edition of Records of the Borough of Leicester	404
Battersby's (C. J.) edition of Macaulay's Essay on Pitt	60
Box's (Ernest Belfort) Jean-Paul Marat	142
Brayn's (Arthur H.) Popular Royalty	229
Beeching's (Rev. H. C.) Two Lectures Introductory to the Study of Poetry	223
edition of Lyra Apostolica	340
Bea's (Robert) Dirge of the Year 1900	119
(C. F.) The Exhibited Works of Turner	464
Binger's (G.) Roumania in 1900	105
Benson's (A. C.) The Professor, and Other Poems	29
Besant's (Sir Walter) East London	213
Bigg's (Heather) Nell: a Tale of the Thames	313
Bigham's (Clive) A Year in China	441
Binyon's (Laurence) Odes	29
Bird's (George) Ronald's Farewell, and Other Verses	363
Bias's (Capt. Harold C. J.) The Relief of Kumassi	229
Blackley's (Horace) Tales of the Stumps	513
Blomfield's (Reginald) History of Renaissance Architecture in England	52

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Boers, Ten Months in the Field with the	145
Anon. Flag	33
Boothby's (Capt. Charles) Under England's Flag	63
Bonney's (Prof. T. G.) Geology	302
Borchgrevink's (C. E.) First on the Antarctic Continent	60
Bourinot's (Sir John G.) Canada	349
Bowen's (Edward E.) Harrow Songs, and Other Verses	145
Bowley's (Arthur L.) The Elements of Statistics	120
Bradley's (Henry) The New English Dictionary	222
British School at Athens, Annual of	484
Brooke-Hunt's (Violet) Woman's Memoirs of the War	62
Brown's (J.) Corsar: The Gallic War	226
Bryden's (H. A.) Animals of Africa	49
Buell's (Augustus C.) Paul Jones: Founder of the American Navy	208
Bullen's (Frank T.) A Sack of Shakings	304
Town With Christ in Sailor	13
Burgess's (W. V.) Hand in Hand with Dame Nature	84
Burlamacchi's (The Marchesa) Luca della Robbia	229
Butler's (Rev. D.) Scottish Cathedrals and Abbeys	143
Candler's (Edmund) A Vagabond in Asia	364
Canning's (Hon. A. S. G.) British Power and Thought	513
Cappon's (James) Britain's Title in South Africa	122
Carrington's (Henry) Anthology of French Poetry	32
Cavalier's (G. F.) The Preacher's Dictionary	84
Chaffers's (William) Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain	124
Chang Chih-Tung's China's Only Hope	31
Child-Pemberton's (William S.) The Baroness De Bode	8
Childers's (Erskine) In the Ranks of the C.I.V. (Lieut.-Col. Spencer) Life and Correspondence of Right Hon. Hugh Childers	216
Clark's (C. E.) More Mistakes We Make	449
Clarke's (Edward T.) Bermondsey	384
Clarke's Pocket Paris	194
Clay's (Philip S.) Ode to Lord Roberts	119
Clement's (Clara Erskine) Heroines of the Bible in Art	165
Cobban's (J. Maclaren) Life and Deeds of Earl Roberts	208
Collins's (J. Churton) Ephemera Critica: Plain Truths about Current Literature	203
Common's (Thomas) Selections from Nietzsche's Works	479
Cook's (Herbert) Giorgione	144
Cooke's (Arthur William) Palestine in Geography and in History	453
Country Life Illustrated	208
Courthope's (W. J.) Life in Poetry, Law and Taste	507
Craik's (Sir Henry) A Century of Scottish History	206
Cramb's (J. A.) Reflections on the Origins and Destiny of Imperial Britain	141
Crane's (Walter) Line and Form	52
Criticism, Colloquies of; or, Literature and Democratic Patronage	382
Crouch & Butler's The Apartments of the House	13
Crowley's (Alcister) The Soul of Oiris	508
Cumberbatch's (E. C.) Fourth-Form Latin Prose Book	63

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Cunningham's (Prof. W.) Western Civilisation	59
Daudet's (Alphonse) My First Voyage, My First Lie	103
Davidson's (John) Self's the Man: a Tragic Comedy	140
Testaments (No. I.)	548
Davies's (Denis) The Wisdom of Nathan Gray	119
Dawson's (Albert) Joseph Parker, D.D.	483
Deane's (Anthony C.) New Rhymes for 'Old'	12
De Champtasoin's (F. P.) French Lessons in French	63
De l'Isle Adam's The Revolt and the Escape	511
Dellenbaugh's (Frederick S.) The North Americans of Yesterday	284
De Satge's (Oscar) Pages from the Journal of a Queensland Squatter	227
Dickinson's (G. Lowe) The Meaning of Good	185
Dickson's (W. K. L.) The Biograph in Battle	85
Dictionary, The New English	120
Dixon's (H. Sydenham) From Gladiator to Persimmon	344
Dodd's (Anna Bowman) Falaise, the Town of the Conqueror	225
Doughty's (Charles) Under Arms	119
Dowden's (Edward) Puritan and Anglican: Studies in Literature	122
Downie's (John) edition of Carlyle's Essay on Burns	62
edition of Macaulay's Warren Hastings	62
Draper's (Warwick H.) Mirror of Princes	228
Dreyfus's (Alfred) Five Years of My Life	390
Driver's (Rev. S. R.) Daniel	62
Dutt's (W. A.) Highways and Byways in East Anglia	144
Easby-Smith's (J. S.) The Songs of Alcæus	508
Ecumenical Missionary Conference, New York, 1900	187
Edwards's (G. M.) The Anabasis of Xenophon. Book VI.	62
(Osman) Japanese Plays and Play-fellows	181
Egerton's (George) Rosa Amrosa	442
Ellis's (W. Ashton) translation of Glasenapp's Das Leben Richard Wagners	100
(Miriam Anne) The Human Ear	104
Enault's (Louis) Le Chien du Capitaine	63
Encyclopædia Biblica. Vol. II.	159
Evans's (W. S.) The Canadian Contingent and Canadian Imperialism	444
Fane's (Violet) Two Moods of a Man	483
Fenton, Mrs. The Journal of	421
Fitzmaurice's (Lord Edmund) Charles William Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick	282
Fletcher's (J. S.) Roberts of Pretoria	53
Foster (Sir M.) & Lankester's (Prof.) Scientific Memoirs of Thomas Henry Huxley	283
Foster's (Albert J.) Bunyan's Country	9
Fowler's (Ellen Thornycroft) Love's Argument, and Other Poems	29
(J. H.) edition of Essays from De Quincey	62
Frazer's (J. G.) The Golden Bough	47
Fraser's (Walter Howard) New History of the Book of Common Prayer	344
Fry's (Isabel) The Day of Small Things	323
Fuller's (F. W.) Egypt and the Hinterland	364
Gairdner's (James) edition of The Paston Letters	245
Gant's (Dr. F. J.) Modern Natural Theology	424
Gardiner's (G. B. & A.) Second Latin Reader	63
Geary's (Caroline) edition of Couper and Mary Unwin	423
Gentleman's Magazine, The	465
Gervais's (Francis P.) Shakespeare, not Bacon	283
Giles's (Herbert A.) History of Chinese Literature	99

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Gilman's (C. P. Stetson) Concerning Children	228
Gissing's (George) Our Friend the Charlatan	535
and By the Ionian Sea	535
Glaser's (C. F.) Life of Richard Wagner	100
Gooch's (G. P.) Annals of Politics and Culture	207
Goodchild's (J. G.) edition of Heddle's Mineralogy of Scotland	364
Granger's (Frank) The Soul of a Christian	31
Grant's (A. J.) The French Monarchy	59
Grant-Duff's (Sir M. E.) Notes from a Diary	422
Gregory's (Lady) edition of Ideals in Ireland	320
Grey's (J. Grattan) Australasia, Old and New	532
Griffith's (William) Excursions	119
Guggisberg's (Capt. F. G.) "The Shop"	12
Guillemard's (F. H. H.) edition of Stadling's Through Siberia	207
Gwynn's (Stephen) The Queen's Chronicle, and other Poems	420
Hales's (A. G.) Campaign Pictures of the War in South Africa	8
Hall's (J. R. Clark) translation of Beowulf and the Fight at Finnsburgh	342
Hallard's (James Henry) translation of The Idylls of Theocritus	182
Hamilton's (Sir R. Vesey) edition of Sir Thomas Byam Martin	484
Hannigan's (D. F.) The Love-Letters of Honoré de Balzac	443
Hardy's (Charles Frederic) edition of Ben- enden Letters	380
Hare's (Augustus J. C.) Venice, Rome, Florence	492
Harland's (Marion) Hannah More	213
John Knox	302
Hart's (Albert Bushnell) edition of American History told by Contemporaries: National Expansion	531
Harting's (J. E.) Handbook of British Birds	552
Hastings's (Charles) Le Théâtre Français et Anglais	303
Headley's (F. W.) Problems of Evolution	63
Headle's (Dr. M. Forster) The Mineralogy of Scotland	364
Heinemann's (William) War: a Play in Three Acts	161
Helm's (W. H.) Studies in Style	10
Henslow's (Rev. Prof. G.) Poisonous Plants in Field and Garden	513
Henty's (G. A.) The Sovereign Reader	62
Hoare's (B. G.) As the Wind Stirs	119
Hodgson's (Lady) The Siege of Kumassei	184
Holdich's (Col. Sir T. H.) The Indian Burderland	364
Holls's (Frederick W.) The Peace Conference at the Hague	33
Holme's (M. P. Milne) Stray Leaves from a Burder Garden	463
Holmes's (Richard R.) Queen Victoria	313
Honywill's (W. Keppel) Irene	119
Horsburgh's (E. L. S.) Girolamo Savonarola	528
Hosie's (Alexander) Manchuria	532
Hosier, Madame, Thoughts, Memories, and Meditations	165
Howells's (W. D.) Literary Friends and Ac- quaintances	339
Hudson's (William Henry) Sir Walter Scott Struggles for Catholic Supremacy	109
Hume's (Martin A. S.) Treason and Plot: Struggles for Catholic Supremacy	440
Huncker's (James) Chopin: The Man and His Music	83
Hutton's (Alfred) The Sword and the Centuries	343
Huyssmans' (J. K.) St. Lydvine de Schiedam	527
"Ilsen, Henrik" The Prose Dramas of	244
Ideas, Exploded, and other Essays. By the author of "Times and Days"	83
Indurick's (F. A.) edition of A Calendar of the Inner Temple Records	384
Inman's (A. H.) Domesday and Feudal Statistics	164
Irving's (H. B.) Studies of French Criminals in the Nineteenth Century	362
Jackson's (T. Sturges) edition of Logs of the Great Sea Fights	12
Jerome's (J. K.) The Observations of Henry	323
Jingom, Psychology of	314
Jones's (Edmund O.) Welsh Poets	186
Keane's (A. H.) Central and South America	532
Keary's (Beata Francis & Eliza) The Francis Letters	399
Kendall's (Elizabeth K.) edition of Source- Book of English History	59
Kennedy-Herbert's (Col. A. R.) Picnics and Suppers	33
Kennedy, Dr. John, The Reminiscences of: Old Highland Days	424
Kenyon's (Frederic G.) edition of Facsimiles of Biblical MSS. in the British Museum	53
King & Okey's Italy To-day	465
Kingston's (Alfred) The Romance of a Hun- dred Years	163
Klein's (Dr. Hermann J.) The Star Atlas	464
Knight's (William) Lord Monboddo and some of his Contemporaries	80
Knutsford's (Viscountess) Life and Letters of Zachary Macaulay	139
Lady Madeleine Wendenore, The, and other Poems	13
Lanciani's (Rodolfo) The Destruction of Ancient Rome	282
Landon's (A. H. Savage) China and the Allies	482
Lankester's (Prof. E. Ray) edition of A Treatise on Zoology	63
Lawless's (Emily) A Garden Diary	443

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Lawson's (Henry) On the Track and Over the Strips	51
morous Verses Popular and Eu-	432
Layard's (George Somes) Mrs. Lynn Linton: her Life, etc.	439
Le Gallienne's (Richard) The Life Romantic: Including the Love-Letters of the King	226
Lehmann's (C. R.) Anni Fugaces	482
Leiningen-Westerburg's (Count) German Book-Plates	363
Lennox's (Cuthbert) Henry Drummond	465
Lewis's (Agnes Smith) Studia Sinaitica Nos. IX. and X.	102
Lilford, Lord, By his Sister	163
Little's (Archibald John) Mount Omi and Beyond	205
Lloyd's (J. Barclay) One Thousand Miles with the C. I. V.	8
Loney's (S. L.) The Elements of Hydro- statics	84
Lucy's (Henry W.) Diary of the Unionist Parliament, 1895-1900	281
Lugard's (Gen. F. D.) The Story of Uganda	33
Lynch's (Hannah) French Life in Town and Country	185
(H. F. B.) Armenia	550
Lysaght's (Sidney Royle) Poems of the Un- known Way	463
Mabie's (Hamilton Wright) William Shake- speare	94
Macgregor's (D. H.) Lord Macaulay	405
MacKenzie's (Alexander) History of the Mathesons	284
Macmillan & Rankin's The Highland Tay from Tyndrum to Dunkeld	145
Maeterlinck's (Maurice) The Life of the Bee	459
Malet's (Sir Edward) Shifting Scenes; or, Memories of Many Men in Many Lands	204
Marinden's (G. E.) Our Naval Heroes	208
Marston's An Old Man's Holiday	424
(E.) Sketches of Booksellers of Other Days	510
Martin's (Sir T.) Helena Faucit (Lady Martin)	62
Masterman's (J. Howard B.) edition of Robinson Crusoe	84
Mathew's (E. J.) History of English Litera- ture	360
Matthews's (Brander) Notes on Speech- Making	247
the Short-story	287
McCabe's (Joseph) Peter Abtard	549
Meakin's (Budget) The Land of the Moors	324
Mempes' (Mortimer) War Impressions	530
Meredith's (George) A Reading of Life, with other Poems	547
Mérimée's Le Coup de Pistolet	63
Messenger's (A.) The Sacrifice: Redemption's Story	119
Miall & Fowler's edition of White's Natural History and Antiquities of Seiborne	491
Miller's (Fred.) Art Crafts for Amateurs	85
(Rev. George) Rambles Round the Edge Hills	187
Money-Coutts's edition of "Flowers of Parnassus "	33
Monroe's (W. S.) Comenius	60
Moore's (J. E. S.) To the Mountains of the Moon	552
Morgan's (C. Lloyd) Animal Behaviour	27
Morrah's (H.) edition of The Literary Year- Book, 1901	281
Morris's (Sir Lewis) Harvest-Tide	48
Morse's (Charles) A Jingle of Rhymes	119
Mowbray's (Sir John) Letters and Notes: Seventy Years of Westminster	82
Müller's (F. Max) My Autobiography	279
Last Essays	413
Nevinson's (Henry W.) The Plea of Pan	548
Newbigging's (Thomas) Lancashire Humour	165
Nineteenth Century, The: a Review of Pro- gress	423
Norway's (Arthur H.) Naples, Past and Present	492
Ogilvie's (Will H.) Fair Girls and Gray Horses	444
Ogilvie's (A. J.) The Elements of Darwinism	334
Oldfield's (Susan H.) Records of the Later Life of Harriet, Countess Granville	322
O'Rell's (Max) Her Royal Highness, Woman	441
Osborn & Low's Secondary Teaching	60
Owen's (Harold) The Staffordshire Potter	324
Pain's (Barry) Another Englishwoman's Love-Letters	246
Pake's (Dr. W. C. C.) The Science of Hygiene	64
Palmer's (F. H. E.) Russian Life in Town and Country	383
(J. W.) For Charlie's Sake	508
Parker's (E. H.) China	164
Paston's (George) Little Memoirs of the Eighteenth Century	299
Pateron's (William Romaine) The Eternal Conflict	419
Paul's (Herbert) Men and Letters	401
Payne's (Rev. G. A.) Mrs. Gaskell and Knut- sford	164
Peel's (Robert) Elementary Text-book of Coal- Mining	63
(Hon. Sidney) Trooper 8008, I.Y.	483
Pemberton's (T. Edgar) Bret Harle	144
Percy's (Earl) Highlands of Asiatic Turkey	423
Plumptre's (Dean) translation of Tragedies of Aeschylus	465

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Pollock's (Maj. A. W. A.) With Seven Generals in the Boer War	8
Pond's (Major) Eccentricities of Genius	107
Rait's (E. S.) selection of Poems of James, First Marquis of Montrose, and Andrew Marvell	531
Ralph's (Julian) At Pretoria	125
War's Brighter Side	443
Ramsay's (Prof. W.) Modern Chemistry	64
Randall-Maciver & Wilkin's Libyan Notes	228
Ransome's (Jessie) Story of the Siege Hospital in Peking	364
Ready's (A. W.) Précis and Précis-Writing	423
Reed's (Myrtle) Later Love-Letters of a Musicalian	11
Reynolds-Ball's (E. A.) Jerusalem: a Practi- cal Guide, &c.	493
Richards's (Grant) How to Write a Novel	317
Richardson's (Charles) The English Turf	344
Rider's (Cardanus) Rider's British Merlin	380
Ridgway's (William) The Early Age of Greece	529
Roberts's (R. D.) edition of Education in the Nineteenth Century	300
(W. Rhys) edition of Dionysius of Halicarnassus	301
Robertson's (J. Logie) English Drama	60
Rogers's (W. S.) A Book of the Poster	383
Round's (J. H.) Studies in Peerage and Family History	162
Roy's (Jules) St. Nicholas I.	124
Royle's (William) Dalmatia Illustrata	13
Russell's (Ernest) Lord Roberts of Kandahar and Waterford	53
(Lady) Swallowfield and its Owners	464
Sachs's (I. T.) edition of Trevor's The Lighter Side of Cricket	404
Sackville's (Lady Margaret) Poems	512
Sandford's (P.) The Aeneid of Virgil. Book III.	62
Sangster's (Margaret E.) Winsome Woman- hood	284
Schmeil's (Dr. Otto) Text-Book of Zoology	63
Schmidt & Miles's The Training of the Body	414
Schofield's (A. T.) The Springs of Character	59
Schuckburgh's (E. S.) Cæsar: Gallic War. Book VII.	62 translation of The Letters of Cicero	145
Schuyler's (Eugene) Selected Essays	314
Italian Influences	344
Scott's (Dr. D. H.) Studies in Fossil Botany	63
Scott-Moncrieff's (W. D.) Amor Amoris	104
Sharpe's (Reginald R.) Calendar of Letter- Books in the Archives of London	404
Sherard's (Robert H.) version of Daudet's My First Voyage, My First Lie	103
The Cry of the Poor	424
Sichel's (Walter) Bolingbroke and his Times	379
(Edith) Women and Men of the French Renaissance	481
Sikes's (E. E.) Homér: Odyssey. Book VI.	62
Skeat's (Prof. Walter) Concise Etymological Dictionary of the English Language	424
Smart's (Christopher) A Song to David	280
Smith's (Rev. F.) Introduction to Commercial Geography	62
Sommerville's (Maxwell) Sands of Sahara	228
Stadling's (J.) Through Siberia	207
Stainer's (Charles L.) edition of Speeches of Oliver Cromwell	225
Stevens's (G. W.) Glimpses of Three Nations	462
Stephen's (Leslie) The English Utilitarians	28
Stephens's (W. R. W.) The English Church	551
Stornberg's (Count) My Experiences of the Boer War	384
Stevenson's (Robert Louis) In the South Seas	30
Stewart's (Agnes Grainger) The Academic Gregories	405
Stillman's (W. J.) The Autobiography of a Journalist	400
Stocker's (Richard Dimsdale) The Language of Handwriting	33
Stodart-Walker's (Archibald) Robert Buchanan The Day-Book	341
of John Stuart Blackie	402
Stopes's (Mrs. C. C.) Shakespeare's Family	321
Stretton's (Clement E.) The History of the Midland Railway	381
Subaltern's, A. Letter to his Wife	319
Sutherland's (George) Twentieth Century Inventions	184
Sutro's (Alfred) translation of Maeterlinck's Life of the Bee	459
Sykes's (Ella C.) The Story-Book of the Shah Taunton's (Ethelred L.) History of the Jesuits in England	83
Taylor's (A. E.) The Problem of Conduct	361
Thirlmer's (Rowland) A Woman of Emotions	513
Thompson's Gardener's Assistant	508
(Sir Henry) Modern Cremation	324
Thomson & Speight's The Junior Temple Reader	445
Toller's (T. N.) Outlines of the History of the English Language	62
Tovey's (Duncan C.) edition of The Letters of Thomas Gray	60
Toynbee's (Paget) Cary's "Purgatorio"	79
Trench's (Herbert) Deirdre Wed, and Other Poems	512
Trevor's (Capt. Philip) The Lighter Side of Cricket	11
Trine's (Ralph Waldo) Every Living Creature	404
Trotter's (Capt. L. J.) A Leader of Light Horse: Hodson	53

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Turner's (Herbert Hall) Modern Astronomy	162
Tyrell's (Robert Yelverton) Anthology of Latin Poetry	384
Vachell's (Horace A.) Life and Sport on the Pacific Slope	12
Vanity Fair Album	13
Varley's (Telford) Progressive Course of Chemistry	64
Verity's (A. W.) edition of King Henry V.	60
Vernon's (W. W.) Readings in the Paradise of Dante	420
Vince's (J. H.) Ovid: Metamorphoses	62
Vivian's (Herbert) Abyssinia	124
Wall's (J. C.) Alfred the Great	324
Wallace's (Dr. Alfred Russel) Studies: Scientific and Social	7
War in South Africa, The "Times" History of the	8
Warner's (R. Townsend) Winchester	58
Warr's (G. C. W.) edition of The Athenian Drama	104
Warron's (Charles R.) edition of Sixty Years on the Turf: the Life and Times of George Hodyman	480
Waters's (Mrs. W. G.) The Cook's Decameron	484
Weekley's (Ernest) Le Songe d'Or, and Other Stories	63
Wendell's (Barrett) Literary History of America	103
Wetmore's (Helen Cody) The Last of the Great Scouts	511
White's (Arnold) Efficiency and Empire	404
White's (Rashleigh Holt) The Life of Gilbert White of Selborne	460
White's (Gilbert) The Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne	491
Whittuck's (Charles) The Good Man of the Eighteenth Century	227
Wiggin's (Kate Douglas) Penelope's Irish Experiences	493
Wilkinson's (Frank) Australia at the Front	144
Williams's (J. Fischer) Harrold	334
Williamson & Tait's Elementary Treatise on Dynamics	84
Williamson's (William) The British Gardener	404
Williamson's (George C.) The Cities of Northern Italy	491
Willson's (Beckles) The Truth About Newfoundland	284
Wilms's (Hon. A.) Manual of South African History	532
Wimbolt's (S. E.) Georgics of Virgil. Book I.	62
Witch's (W. H.) Problems in Education	60
Windle's (Bertram C. A.) The Matern Country	491
Woodroffe's (Paul) The Little Flowers of Saint Benedict	551
Wyde's (Augustus B.) Modern Abyssinia	186
Yeats's (W. B.) The Shadowy Waters	81
Yorkshire, Picturesque History of	13
Young's (Norwood) The Story of Rome	164

FICTION.

Ainsley's (Noel) The Salvation Seekers	230
Albert's (Mary) Lord Culmore's Error	486
Alexander's (Mrs.) A Missing Hero	34
Allen's (Ingis) A Varley Man	345
Ames's (Hugo) The Tragedy of a Pedigree	126
Antrobus's (C. L.) Quality Corner	126, 305
Ashton's (Mark) The Nana's Takeman	426
Astor's (William Waldorf) Pharaoh's Daughter, and Other Stories	14
Bacheller's (Irving) Eben Holden	106, 259
Bacot's (Richard) Casting of Nets	248
Bacot-Harte's (Mrs.) A Daring Spirit	366
Bailey's (H. C.) My Lady of Orange	406
Baring-Gould's (S.) The Frohishers	230, 285
Barr's (Amelia E.) The Maid of Maiden Lane	446
Barry's (William) The Wizard's Knot	248, 325
Bates's (Haverall) The Believing Bishop	126, 187
Becke & Jeffrey's The Tapu of Banderah	146
Begbie's (Harold) The Fall of the Curtain	486
Bill's (R. S. Warren) Love the Laggard	346
Benson's (E. F.) The Luck of the Vails	554
Bisset's (Nellie K.) The Sea Hath its Pearls	406
Boltwood's (Rolf) In Bad Company	366
Boothby's (Guy) A Cabinet Secret	14
Boothby's (Guy) My Indian Queen	210
Boothby's (Guy) The Mystery of the Clasp	326
Branton's (M.) The Banner of St. George	210
Bray's (Claude) A Cuirassier of Arrans	86
Burgin's (G. B.) A Son of Mammon	554
Burton's (John Blount) A Vanished Rival	426
Carson's (John) The Coming Waterloo	86, 105
Carr's (M. E.) Love and Honour	188, 230
Churchill's (Winston) The Crisis	466, 511
Cobb's (Thomas) The Bishop's Gambit	106, 145
Cobban's (J. Maclaren) The Golden Tooth	210
Cullins's (W. E. W.) A Scholar of his College	54
Cunder's (Arthur R.) The Seal of Silence	426
Conrad & Huffer's The Inheritors	554
Cooper's (E. H.) The Eternal Choice	366, 445
Corbett's (R. St. J.) The Burden of an Honour	366
Cornford's (L. Cope) Northborough Cross	316, 466
Corvo's (Frederick Baron) In His Own Image	210, 533
Crane's (Stephen) The Monster	146, 231

FICTION—continued.

	PAGE
Creed's (Sibyl) The Vicar of St. Luke's	426
Crockett's (S. R.) The Silver Skull	346
Crommelin's (May) A Woman as Derelict	446
Cross's (Victoria) Anna Lombard	306, 385
Crotti's (Julia M.) The Lost Land	126, 305
Crowninshield's (Mrs. S.) The Archbishop and the Lady	406
Dawe's (Carleton) The Emu's Head	188
Dawe's (Carleton) Claudia Pole	346
Dawlish's (Hope) A Secretary of Legation	248
De la Pasture's (Mrs. Henry) Catherine of Calais	534, 552
De Soissons' (Count S. C.) translation of Mme. Orzeszko's Modern Argonauts	466
Dickens's (Mary Angela) The Wastrel	34
Dickson's (Helen) Puffs of Wind	486
Dickson's (Harris) The Black Wolf's Breed	248
Dix's (Edwin Asa) Deacon Bradbury	126
Dix's (Beulah M.) The Making of Christopher Ferringham	366
Donovan's (Dick) Deacon Brodie	3-6
Dudney's (Mrs.) The Third Floor	248
Düring's (Stella M.) Malicious Fortune	534
Farjeon's (B. L.) The Pride of Race	54, 83
Fawcett's (Edgar) New York	386
Fenn's (George Manville) Running Amok	326
Findlater's (Mary) A Narrow Way	188, 325
Fletcher's (J. S.) The Three Days' Terror	325
Flowerdew's (Herbert) Retaliation	554
Forbes's (Edmund) Red Fate	534
Foster's (Catherine & Florence) The Goblin	34
Foulke's (W. Dudley) Maya: a Story of Zucatan	106
"Francis's (M. E.)" Pastorals of Dorset	366, 445
Fraser's (Mrs. Hugh) A Little Grey Sheep	554
French's (Henry Willard) Desmond, M.D.	534
Fry's (Isabel) The Day of Small Things	210
Gallon's (Tom) The Second Dandy Chapter	386
Gerard's (Dorothea) The Supreme Crime	316, 465
Gerard's (Dorothea) Saunders	386
Gerrard's (Morice) Queen's Mate	306
Gissing's (George) Our Friend the Charlatan	466
Glanville's (Ernest) Maz Thornton	166
Glanville's (Ernest) The Lost Regiment	3-6
Golsworthy's (Arnold) The New School Master	188, 229
Goss's (C. F.) The Redemption of David Corson	188, 286
Graham's (John W.) Harlaw of Saddle	231
Grand's (Sarah) Babs the Impossible	286
Gray's (Waldo) The Young Squire's Resolute	426
Grier's (Sydney C.) The Warden of the Marches	306, 385
Griffith's (George) A Honeymoon in Space	188
Haggard's (H. Rider) Lybeth	346
Hals's (A. G.) Driscoll, King of the Scouts	54, 105
Hamilton's (Lillias) A Frazier's Daughter	14
Hamilton's (Lillias) The Poor Elizabeth	534
Happenings Strange , By Sixteen Authors	210
Hardy's (Iza Duffus) The Lesser Evil	210
Har's (Christopher) The Life Story of Dinah Kellow	326
Harrod's (Frances) The Hidden Vessel	465
Harte's (Bret) Under the Redwoods	346
Hutton's (Beattie) The Master Passion	188
Heath's (Seyton) A Stolen Wooing	306
Henham's (Ernest G.) Bonanza	466
Henry's (Arthur) A Princess of Araby	34
Hervey's (Maurice H.) Dr. Somerville's Crime	306
Hewitt's (Edgar) The Pretentious of Kool	106
Hoppe's (Graham) A Cardinal and His Conscience	286, 345
Hough's (E.) The Girl at the Halfway House	210
Hovells's (W. D.) A Pair of Patient Lovers	554
Hume's (Fergus) Shylock of the River	54
Hume's (Fergus) The Golden Wang-Ho	166
Hutton's (Edward) Frederic Uredale	534
Hynes's (C. J. Cutcliffe) Prince Rupert the Buccaneer	426
Iddeleigh's (Earl) Belinda Fitzwarren	326
Inglesant's (Aleydis) The Romance of a Vocation	146
James's (Henry) The Sacred Point	165
Jane's (F. T.) Ever Mohun	554
Jones's (Dora M.) A Soldier of the King	286
Julie: a Study of a Girl, By a Man	125
Keating's (Joseph) Son of Judith	145
Kernahan's (Coulson) Scoundrel and Co.	210
Kinross's (Albert) The Early Stars	514
Kiser's (S. E.) Georgie	229
Lagerlöf's (Selma) From a Swedish Home	306, 365
Laidlay's (W. J.) Lena Laird	486, 553
Lambe's (J. L.) By Command of the Prince	326
Lanyon's (Mrs. Sarah Martin) Sarah, P.G.	86
Laur's (A. C.) Lords of the North	554
Lawson's (Henry) On the Track	14
Leighton's (M. C. and R.) In the Shadow of Guilt	366
Le Queux's (William) The Gamblers	326
Le Queux's (William) Her Majesty's Minister	406
Loy's (John K.) A Sore Temptation	406
Lindsay's (Mayne) The Whirligig	466
Linton's (Mrs. Lynn) The Second Youth of Theodora Desanges	426
Lizars's (R. & K. M.) Committed to his Charge	125
Lloyd's (John Uri) Stringtorn on the Pike	466
Lloyd's (John Uri) The Chronic Loner	466
Mackie's (John) The Man Who Forsook	146
Magnay's (Sir William) The Red Chancellor	466

FICTION—continued.

	PAGE
Mann's (Mary E.) Among the Syringas	286, 365
Marchmont's (A. W.) In the Name of a Woman	54, 85
Marnan's (Basil) A Daughter of the Yeldt	426
Marriott's (Charles) The Column	247
Marsh's (Richard) Amusement Only	86
Marsh's (Richard) Mrs. Musgrave and her Husband	416
Mason's (Caroline A.) A Woman of Yesterday	231
Master Sinner, The , By a Well-known Author	166
Mathers's (Helen) Cinders	406
Mathew's (Frank) The Royal Sisters	188, 395
McCarthy's (Justin) Monomia	326
McAulay's (Allan) Black Mary	386
Mellraith's (Jean N.) The Curious Career of Roderick Campbell	316
Meade's (L. T.) The Blue Diamond	188
Meade's (L. T.) The Secret of the Dead	326
Meyer's (Annie N.) Robert Anny, Poor Priest	406
Mitchell's (E.) The Lone Star Rush	248
Monro's (A. M.) A False Position	534
Montagu's (Lily H.) Naomi's Exodus	126
Moore's (F. Frankfort) According to Plato	146, 285
Muddock's (J. E.) Whose was the Hand?	554
Munro's (Neil) Doom Castle	466, 485
Murray's (D. C.) The Church of Humanity	230, 285
Nisbet's (Hume) Children of Hermes	248
Noel's (Lady Augusta) The Wise Man of Sterncross	326
Norris's (W. E.) His Own Father	466
Norway's (Arthur H.) Parson Peter: a Tale of the Dart	336
Orzeszko's (Eliza) The Modern Argonauts	406, 466
Oshbourne's (Lloyd) The Queen versus Billy, and other Stories	54
Ouida's Street Diet	166
Outhwaite & Chomley's The Wisdom of Esau	406
Pearl's (F. M.) Number One and Number Two	126
Pemberton's (Max) Pro Patria	286
Phillip's (Eden) The Good Red Earth	406, 425
Potter's (Margaret) The House of De Maill	554
Proscott's (E. Livingston) His Familiar Fox	286
Price's (Daisy Hugh) The Pusha	386, 485
Prichard's (K. and H.) Karadac	486
Primm's (Perrington) Duke Rodney's Secret	146, 285
Prior's (James) Forest Folk	146, 514
Prowse's (R. O.) Yonsey	366, 405
Pryce's (Gw. Odell) John Jones, Curate	534
Pugh & Burchett's The Heritage	306, 445
Randal's (John) Pacifico	406, 486
Raymond's (Walter) Good Souls of Cider Land	248
Reade's (Compton) The Aftertaste	106
Ridge's (W. Pett) London Only	446, 533
Ridley's (Lady) Anne Mainwaring	166, 209
Roberts's (C. G. D.) The Heart of the Ancient Wood	86, 486
Roberts's (C. G. D.) Taken by Assault	286
Rodziewicz's (Marya) Distaff	446
Ropes's (Arthur R. & Mary E.) On Peter's Island	316
Runkle's (Bertha) The Helmet of Navarre	406
Russell's (W. Clark) The Ship's Adventure	210
Ryud's (Evelyn Elyse) Mrs. Green	534
Sandeman's (Mina) Ironica Verdant	188
Savage's (Richard Henry) Captain London	534
Serao's (Matilde) The Land of Cockayne	486, 533
Sergeant's (Adeline) The Treasure of Captain Scarlett	366
Shiel's (M. P.) The Lord of the Sea	446, 553
Silver's (R. N.) A Daughter of Mystery	286
Slade's (A. F.) A Wayside Weed	209
Sladen's (Douglas) My Son Richard	406
Smale's (Fred. C.) The Mayor of Littlejoy	365
Smith's (Minna Caroline) translation of Valdes's The Joy of Captain Ribot	54
Smith's (F. C.) A Daughter of Patricians	248
Speight's (T. W.) The Strange Experiences of Mr. Vercholyne	326
Spender's (Emily) A Soldier for a Day	166
St. Aubyn's (Alan) The Maiden's Creed	534
Sterne's (Philip) Mr. Leopold Lugwell	406
Steuart's (John A.) The Eternal Quest	306
St. Laurence's (A.) My Heart and Lute	386
Stockton's (Frank R.) A Bicycle of Cathay	188, 229
Stockton's (Frank R.) Afield and Afloat	326
Story's (Alfred T.) Master and Slave	426
Swan's (Myra) Ballast	230
Taber's (Ralph Graham) Northern Lights and Shadows	14
Taylor's (Ellen) A Thousand Pities	514
Thomas's (R. M.) Treuren	166, 365
Thompson's (E. Simonet) An Old Woman's Tragedy	486
Threlfall's (T. R.) The Great Magician	286
Tracy's (Louis) The Invaders	86, 105
Trafford-Taunton's (Winefride) Marked with a Cipher	106
Treherne's (Philip) From Valet to Ambassador	34
Tynan's (Katherine) That Sweet Enemy	188
Valdes's (A. Palacio) The Joy of Captain Ribot	54
"Vartenes's" Yestere	514
Viller's (E.) The Black Tortoise	166
Vizelly's (Ernest A.) A Path of Thorns	126
Von Hutten's (Baroness) Marr'd in Making	534, 553
Vovnich's (E. L.) Jack Raymond	3-6, 105
Warden's (Florence) Morals and Millions	86
Wells's (D. D.) Parlous Times	346
Werner's (D. A.) Chapenza's White Man	346

FICTION—continued.

	PAGE
Wharton's (Edith) Crucial Instances	554
Whishaw's (Fred) A Forbidden Name	416
White's (Hester) Mountains of Necessity	306, 385
Wilkins's (Mary E.) Understudies	3-6, 425
Williams's (Neil Wynn) Lady Haifa	486
Williamson's (Mrs. C. N.) Twixt Devil and Deep Sea	210
The Adventures of Princess Sylcia	326
Winter's (John Strange) The Career of a Beauty	586
Woodroffe's (Daniel) Tangled Trinities	306, 325
Wylwynne's (Kythe) The Dream Woman	426
"Zack's" The White Cottage	386, 421

SUPPLEMENTS.

Educational	55-66
Spring Announcements	219-266
Tourist	487-491

ARTICLES.

Advertising, The New; or, The Dignity of Letters	290
Arnold, Jottings on	555
Atkins's (Mr.) National Anthem. ("Just Break the News to Mother")	329
B. B. B. (Lord Byron)	147
Baba the Impossible , The Author of: An Inquiry	347
Bible, The, and the Bishops	367
Biography, Concerning	167
Bismarck's Love-Letters	15
Brown, Dr. John. (Mora Subseciva)	69
Collector, A. (Mr. William Harris Arnold)	369
Conversations, Real: With William Harris the Sausage King	269
Doss-House Poet, A	169
Dreyfus. (Alfred Dreyfus's "Five Years of My Life")	390
Failure, The Literature of	427
Feuilleton, Halfpenny, The	170
Fiction in the Light of Travel. (Two Books by Mr. Gissing)	535
Flood, The. (Catalogue of English Books)	215
French Idioms	191
Garland, A Scholar's. (Dr. Furnivall's Work)	89
Grub-street. (Squalid Literature)	38
Hannah, The Saintly. (Miss Harland's "Hannah More")	213
How, The Ineffectual. (Grant Richards's "How to Write a Novel")	327
Humorist, A New American. (Major Pond)	107
James, Mr. Henry, and Matilde Serao v. The British Matron. ("Improper" Novels)	308
Job, Some Translators and	289
Keats, Poor. (The Ethics of Editing)	307
Languages, The Gate of, Thrown Wide	67
Love-Letters, An Englishwoman's. (Subsidiary Series)	68
Man in the Street, The Art of being the	469
Nietzsche's Letters	35
Novel, Domestic, The: An Inquiry. (Miss Broughton's "Foes in Law")	87
Novel, The Bad: An Inquiry	189
Pictures and Personality (Royal Academy Exhibition)	407
Places, Books About: a Retrospect	489
Poet, The, as Tinkerer (Mr. Yeats's Poems)	409
Poetic Famine, The	150
Poetry, Impossible. (Gay's Ballad of "Sweet William's Farewell to Black-Eyed Susan")	110
Remorse, Tit-Bits of. (Mr. C. E. Clark's "Mora Mistakes We Make")	449
R. M. B. (Ballantyne)	498
Self-Education. (List of Fifty Books)	57
Serial, Sensational, The: An Inquiry	387
Shakespeare, Some Questions in	17
Shaw, George Bernard: An Inquiry	127
Spring Publishing Season, The	251
Story, Short, The Philosophy of the	287
Style, Athletic, The. (Stevens and his Imitators)	231
Success, The Literature of	467
Swinburne, Mr.	267
Topography, "Man in the Street," A Plea for	495
Verse, Obscurity in. (Mr. Meredith)	211
Nursery, French. (Minkes's "Book of French Song for the Young")	233
Writers, Two. (Sir W. Besant, Mr. R. Buchanan)	515

SIGNED ARTICLES.

Artist, The Luck of the. H. D. Lowry	37
Bailey's Pestus . F. B. Money-Coutts	447
Chemistry Hour, The. (Frank Bow.) W. W.	70
Fiction, The Fallow Fields of. (Balzac as a Novelist.) E. A. B.	517, 537
Ford, John. E. H.	429

SIGNED ARTICLES—continued.

	PAGE
Friends that Fail Not: Henry Kingsley. C. K. B.	309
Gorki, Maxime. Edward Garnett	497
Harrow's Poet. (Bowen's "Harrow Songs.") H. L.	349
Hearn, Lafcadio-Koizumi Yakumo. N. C.	328
Midnight, 1900-1901. (Outside St. Paul's Cathedral.) W.	17
Myers, Frederic. W. M.	88
Paris Letters. H. L.
Lafont's Life of Garat; Marcel Prevost's L'Heureux Ménage	37
The Duke of Broglie, Henri de Bornier, and Mme. Caro	129
M. Bourget's Le Fantôme ; M. d'Haussonville's Duchesse de Bourgogne	235
M. Anatole France's Monsieur Bergeret à Paris	350
M. Zola's Travail	3-9
Eve Victorieuse , Mme. Duclaux, M. Rostand	538
Scott, An American on. (Hudson's "Sir Walter Scott.") P. Anderson Graham	109
Shakespeare, Les Femmes de. (Shakespeare's Heroines.) M. B. R.	537
Table Talk. F. V. V.	129, 191
Tupper, Martin, Playwright. A.	90
Who? (An Englishwoman's Love-Letters.) J. D.	149

THINGS SEEN.

"About the Best Thing —"	190
Action, Reflex	168
Almond Tree, The	309
Ambition	213
Anticipation	268
Authority	89
Bankrupt, The	288
Birds	429
Book-Buyer, The	496
Boots, Brown	89
Bottles, Little, The	469
Briton, The	537
Constancy	469
Courtesy	36
Diver, The	128
End, The	368
Equals	212
Fairy, Green, The	497
Flag, White, The	309
Gamblers, The. (Monte Carlo)	16
"Glory, Fields of"	449
Gloves, The	318
Greeting, A	408
Hats	148
Homesick	190
Innocent, The. (French Boy and Monte Carlo)	16
Khaki Clad	284
Lambs	348
Lecture, The End of the	108
Look, The	408
Man, The Free	449
Mandarins, The	108
Marquis, The	164
Morbidity	89
Mystery	388
Nonagenarian, The	428
Ornaments, The	348
Palingenesis	532
Passenger, The	536
Philosopher, The	429
Pianist, The	128
Poet, The	149
Profane	388
Rider, The	269
Sciologist, The	232
Sisters, The	328
Smiles	148
Southerners	36
Tower, The	556
Truant, The	557
Warrior, The Happy	517
Whence?	69
Whither?	69
Worker, The	368

CORRESPONDENCE.

"Adonis Gardens"	193, 236
Americanism, A Shakespearean. (The word "pred")	40, 91
Art, A Paradox on. (Mr. Arthur Symonds's Article)	19
Author and Critic. (Mr. Capes and "sedition")	40
Authors, The Society of	39
Boyd's List	111
Baedecker's Handbooks	451, 470
B. B. B. (Lord Byron)	171
Benson's (Mr.) Shakespearean Revivals	71
Besant's (Sir W.) East London	311
Bigg's (R. Heather) Nell: A Tale of the Thames	372

CORRESPONDENCE—continued.

	PAGE
Björnson	518
Blue-eyed Characters in Shakespeares	91
"Blue Boy, The"	91, 193
Branch	19
"Come Live with Me." (Titles from Shakespeare)	539
Criticism, Literary, and Private Judgment	451
Cromwell, The First Life of	110
Davidson's (John) Drama	171
Dilemma, The. (Review of "The Encyclopedia Britannica")	235
"E," The Elision of the	91
Ellegiacs, English Rhymed	91, 110, 130, 152
Eliot, George	430
"Failure, The Literature of"	451
"Festus" Bailey	411, 470
Fiction, The Fallow Fields of	539, 559
Fitzgerald's Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam	431, 451
Fortnightly Review, The. (Causes of its Failure)	71
Gainsborough's Portrait of the Duchess of Devonshire	351
"Gray" or "Grey"	370
"Gun," The Word	194
"Hannibal"	151
"Impulse to Feel and Know, The." (Mr. Cramb and Queen's College)	131
Linguistic Barbarisms, Recent	171
Love-Letter Story, The	151
Love-Letters, An Englishwoman's	18, 39
Lowell on Bryant	130
Marsh's (Mr. Richard) Stories	131
Masters, Old, Some Curiosities in the Works of the	311
Metaphors, Mixed	518
"Mistakes We Make"	539, 559
Müller, Prof. Max	450
Murray's Handbooks	451, 470
Music Hall, The Art of the	351
Novelist, A Much Neglected. (Butcher Lytton)	236
Novels, Titles of	370
Parsons's Portrait and Parsons's Ghost	431
Paterson's The Eternal Conflict	450
Peter Parley's Annual. (Sir George Samuel Meason)	215
Poems, Epic, Forgotten	194
Poetry, Impossible	132
Politician, The Perfect	131
Rossetti's "Blessed Damsel"	71
Scholars, Not for. (Best Books for a Working Man's Library)	40
Shakespeare and the Market	131, 194
Shakespeare's Knowledge	111
Shaw, George Bernard	192
Spelling, Simplification of	131, 330, 351
Switchback, The Father of the	539
Taunton's (E. L.) History of the Jesuits in England	390
Theocritus	215, 270
"Underpinned"	131
"Whitebait, Variations upon." (Mr. Le Gallienne)	71

POETRY.

Euthanasia	470
Hopper's (Miss Nora) "Rose o' the World"	200
Impressionist Pictures	497
Jester's Song, A	517
"Lallie, Who is Dead, To"	108
Nirvana	551
Splendid Mendax: The Dream of a Latter-day Mystic	503
Victoria, Queen, On the Death of	75

THE LITERARY WEEK.

Ainslie's Magazine	201
Alliteration, Ingenious Specimen of	201
America, Sonnet on, by Mr. C. H. Woodward	95
American Journalistic English	316
Anglians, East, The London Society of	277
Anglo-Russian, The	179
Anglo-Saxon Review, The	219, 277, 295, 545, 546
Archer, Mr. William, on Colloquialism	76
by "Real Conversations"	240, 436
Architectural Review, The	137
Argosy, The	180
Arnold, Sir Edward, A Letter by	136
Aspirants, Literary, Letters from	476
"Atkins," The British Soldier's Sobriquet	156
Atlantic Monthly Magazine, The	24, 241
Author, The	416
Authors', Society of, Pension Fund	295
English, in Vogue Abroad	456
Baedecker's Handbooks	431, 451
Bailey, Mr. Philip James	355, 411
Barrois Collection of MSS., The	456
Bashkirtseff, Marie, The Memoirs of	395
Bazin, M. René, The Novels of	117
Bauenden Letters, The	417
Besant, Sir Walter, The Career of	504
"Besant and Rice" Partnership, The	504, 524

THE LITERARY WEEK—continued.

"Between-Girl," The	357, 397
"Billion," The Meaning of	336, 378
Biographical Notes of Celebrities by American School Children	545
Black (William) Memorial Light, The	357
Blackmore (R. D.), Proposed Memorial to	385
Blackwood's Magazine	97, 157, 298
Blairgowrie, The "Reactor's Library" at	178
Book Announcements, Insinuating	317
Bookman, The	316, 438, 476
Book World, The	95
Books published in 1900, Analytical Table of	4
Neglected	156
Most Popular, in Quaker Schools	301
preferred by the English Girl	220
Boothby, Mr. Guy, An Interview with	116
Burrows (George) connection with East Anglia	297
Bosanquet, Mrs. Helen, on Penny and Two-penny Fiction	396
Boston Public Library, Novels banned at	275
Bradley's (Mr. A. C.) Lecture on "Poetry for Poetry's Sake"	543
Bridges (Mr. Robert) Poem, "A Prayer of Old Age"	24
British Weekly, The	219
Buchanan, Mr. Robert, The Career of	504
Burton, Mr. Richard, on "The Dark in Literature"	137
Byron, Demand for Editions of	221, 239
Caldron's (Mr. G. L.) Criticism of Tolstoy	376
Candid Friend, The	378
Canton, Miss Winifred Vida	335
Carlyle's Translation of the Inferno , Re-edition of	5
Cassell's Magazine	200
Celtia, The	24
Century, The Coming, Dangers of	4
Chambers's Journal	200
Child's Own Book, The	201, 297
"Children of the Hour"	135
Chinese Bookseller, Visit to a	417
Colinton, Home for Unfortunate Authors and Artists at	239
Collaboration in Fiction	545
Colliery Guardian, The	476
Collins, Mr. Churton, Criticism of	219, 270
on the Functions of	456
Poetry	456
Concervator, The	456
Contemporary Review, The	117, 476
Cornhill Magazine, The	377, 458, 544
"Count Tessa" at the Comedy Theatre	355
Courtenay's (Miss) Reminiscences	544
Cowper, Letter of, to Samuel Rose	76
Crabbe's Eclipse	76
Craigie, Mrs., on the Drama	296
on Dante and Botticelli	475
Crane's (Stephen) The Monster	177
Crichton, Dr., late Bishop of London	43
Critic, The (New York)	221, 417
Cut or Uncut Book-edges	116
Daily Chronicle, The	136
Daily Chronicle's "Chronicle Office" Paragraphs	5
Daily Mail, The	456
Daily News, The	23, 216
Dante Society's Meeting	475
Daudet, M. Alphonse, The Literary Life of	220
Davis, Mr. Richard Harding, An Interview with	116
Dial, The	136, 377
De Vere's (Aubrey) Poems, Landon's Marginal notes to	221
Dobson's (Mr. Austin) Lines on Angel Court	455
"Dream, A," by "S. P."	3
Dundee Advertiser, Facsimile of First Issue of the	24
East London Antiquities	200, 318
Edinburgh Review, The	335
Evan, Mr. Maurice F., on the New Historical Romancists	77
Eliot, George, Letter by, to Dr. Alexander Main	396
Empire Review, The	115
Era, Literary, The	437
"Everley" Series, The	199
Field's The Tribune Primer	457
Fiery Cross, The	97
Fortnightly Review	3
Forum, The	45, 137, 220, 317, 336, 378
Frazer's (Sir William Augustus) Library, Sale of	337
Friends' Quarterly Examiner	376
Friends', Society of, Address to the King	377
Fun	44
Gainsborough's Portrait of the Duchess of Devonshire	315, 351
Gardiner's (Prof.) History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate	155
Gilpin's (John) Edmonton	76
Glasgow University, 150th Anniversary of	336
Gosse, Mr. Edmund, on Biographies	277
Grant-Duff, Sir Mount Stuart, on "The Poetry of the Victorian Age"	386
Granatark, Publisher's Puff of	377
Great Thoughts	77, 220
Gribble, Mr. Francis, Work in Preparation by	515
Groves, Miss Agnes, on Mispronunciation and Middleclassdom	220
Gubbins's (Nathaniel) Buts of Turf	77
Hampstead Annual, The	25
Hardy, Mr. Thomas, on Pessimism and Signed Criticism	240

THE LITERARY WEEK—continued.

Harper's Weekly	157
Magazine	276
Harraden's (Miss Beatrice) Ships that Pass in the Night	316
Harrison, Mr. Frederic, on Mr. Hewlett	3
on the Writings of	476
King Alfred	503
in America	98
Haweis, Rev. H. R., The Writings of	96, 297
Havine, Translation of Poems of	221
"Henry V." at the Lyceum Theatre	525
Hertfordshire Workhouse, Proposal from a	457
Hogarth House, Chiswick	200
Hopper's (Miss Nora) Poem: "Rose of the World"	26
Howells's (Mr. W. D.) Poem, "Breakfast is My Best Meal"	436
Essay on "The New Poetic Drama"	178
Hugo's (Victor) "A une Femme," Translation of	395
Love Letters	25
Huxley and Tennyson, Stories of	177
Ibsen, The Real, Mr. Archer on	76
Ibsen's Colloquialisms	415
"Pillars of Society" at the Garrick Theatre	415
"Ghosts"	378
Irish Literary Society's Competitions	135
Italian Literature, Neglect of	44
Journalism, Twentieth Century, Startling Predictions about	201
"Yellow"	220
"Tabloid"	221
Kensington, The	45
Kew, The Testing of Watches at	525
Kia-Yi, Chinese Poet	97
Kilkerran, Lord, Alleged Libel on	177
Kingsley, Miss Mary, and West Africa	117
Kipling's Poetry, Prof. Dowden's Estimate of	136
"Recessional," An Attack on	200
Kim	417
"Just So" Stories	435
Suit for Breach of Copyright	475
Poem on the "Details" in South Africa	179
Krasovsky, Russian Press Censor	416, 417
Ladies' Home Journal	46, 503
Lady's Magazine, The	297
Lang's (Mr. Andrew) Literary "Double"	296, 456
Lawsuits, Literary	397
Lee, Mr. Sydney, and the Shakespeare First Folios	545
Leng, Sir John, The Career of	96
Leo's (Pope) Ode to the Nineteenth Century	157
Lett's (C. Hubert) Hundred Best Pictures	295
Library World, The	95
Life and Beauty	221
Life (New York)	221, 240
Lilly, Mr. W. S., on Landon	336
Literary Grievance, A	317
Literature, The Search after Novelty in	337, 544
The Teaching of	179
London, The late Bishop of, Mr. Andrew Lang on	179, 376, 544
Longman's Magazine	3, 24, 43, 135, 136, 276, 355
Love Letters, An Englishwoman's	546
Low, Mr. Sidney, on "The Poet of South Africa"	179
Lucas, Mr. E. V., on "Fighting against Odds"	178
Macaulay, Prof. Jebb on	200, 456
Macmillan's Magazine	335
Masterlinck as Moralist and Artist	455
The "Cardinal Doctrine" of	24
Manzoni on Writing about Love	337
Masterpiece Portfolio, No. 7	295
Maturce, Mr. H. Ogram	137
Maupassant's Description of Mont St. Michel	416, 455
May Book, The	136
Meredith's (Mr. George) Pronouncements on the Army	297
Poem, "The Hueless Love"	417
Obscurity	317
Metaphors, Mixed	376
Meynell, Mrs., on Sir F. S. Haden's Etchings	45, 201
Millard's (Miss) Advertisements of Laces and Curios	376
Monthly Review, The	523
Moore, Mr. George, and Ireland	4
Morning Post Nineteenth Century Paragraphs	239
Müller's (Mr. Max) Autobiography	336
Murray, Dr., Entertained by the Authors' Club	525
Mr. Henry, on Literature as a Profession	431, 431
Murray's Handbooks	240
Myers's (Gustavus) History of Tammany Hall	25
Nation, The	565
Net-Book Controversy, The	117, 179, 297
New Liberal Review, The	525
New York Journal, The	477
Times Saturday Review, The	524
Nicoll, Dr. Robertson, on Novelists	437
North-American Review, The	317
Notes and Queries	136, 241, 505
Novel, Historical, The	157
Novels, The Rapid Reading of	295
for Hard-workers, Invalids, and Others	437
Authors' Profits on

THE LITERARY WEEK—continued.

Ormerod's (Oliver) Works in the Rochdale District	158
Over-writing, The Sin of	436
Pall Mall Gazette, The	23, 336, 356, 357, 376, 396
Pall Mall Magazine, The	199, 240, 356, 436, 477, 523
Pear-Tree Press, The	437
Peck's (Gilead P.) Literary Banquet	504
Penny Dreadful, "G. K. C." on the	240
Phillips, Mr. Stephen, The Personality of	45
Photography, Panoramic	398
Pilgrim's Progress, A unique Copy of	505
Pilot, The	220, 240, 337, 545
Poetry, Modern, Proposed Society for the Cult of	241
Ridiculous	138
A "Honorary Purveyor" of	357
Poets, Occupations, etc., of	45
Power, The Literature of	377
Proctor's (Miss Zoe) Birthday Book	179
Publishers' Circular, The	116
Punch's Holiday Book	544
Quail, The	156
Rambler, The	275
Rose-tree, Lines on the Planting of a	355
Ross's (John D.) Henley and Burns, or the Critic Censured	25
Rossetti's The Blessed Damozel	23
Saturday Review, The, Experiences of an early Contributor to	298
Saturday Review of New York	45
Scribner's Magazine	24, 135
Shakespeare Examination Paper Questions	23, 44
on Patriotism	457
Book Titles from	97
Shaw, Mr., On Play-writing	25
Shorthouse, Mr. J. Henry, The Personality of	397
Skipping, The Philosophy of	457
Smart Set, The	115
Smart's (Christopher) A Song to David	315
Smith, Mr. George M., The Career of	455
A Character Sketch of	417
The Fortune of	437
Speaker, The	240, 395, 417, 418
Spectator, The	417, 437
Spelling Reform Movement, The	316
Sphere, The	98, 239, 335
St. Andrew	97
Stephen, Mr. Leslie, on "Romance and Science"	336
Stevenson, R. L., Letters by	44, 95, 116, 156
Stuart, Gilbert, and the Authors he Disliked	543
Stubbs, Dr., late Bishop of Oxford	356, 417
Tablet, The	96
Tanner, Dr., and Major Jones	356
Temperance Critic, The	241
Temple Bar	116, 317
Tennant's (Mrs. Pamela) Book of Peace	23
Tenniel, Sir John, Dinner to	503
Thrush, The	5, 96, 241
Tolstoy's (Count) Who is Right?	316
Reply to the Holy Synod	376
Twain, Mark, as a Social Ameliorator	117
Mr. Howells on the Method of	155
on Adam	276
Twentieth Century, The	25
Type-writer, The, Does it affect Literary Style?	25
Universities, Retention of Greek and Latin at the	157
Vaekchu, Queen of Cannibals in the Marquesas	220
Varsity, The	156
Verbs formed out of Proper Names	317
Verne, Jules, A Letter by	135
Victoria, Queen, and Lord Tennyson	75
Poetic Tributes to	96
Ward, Mr. Ebenezer, The Career of	435
Watson's (Mr. William) Poem "Lamentation"	335
Sonnet "Melancholia"	458
Wedmore, Mr. Frederick, on "The Needs of the New Century in Art"	77
Weisse, Mr. H. V., on the Reading of the Day	437
Wesley, John, The Journals of	376
Westminster Review, The	220
Wheeler, Miss Ethel, on "The Place of Architecture in Allegory"	137
White's (Mr. Robert) Action against Messrs. Constable	277
Whitmanism (Walt), The Organ of	456
Windsor Magazine, The	26, 116
"Word of Honour Free Loan Office," The	396
World, The New York	4
Wright, Dr., The Works of	96
Writing and Machine News, The	201
Wyllie, Dr., on the Use of Cocaine	219
Yeats, Mr. W. B., A Preface by	335
Stratford-on-Avon	418
Yonge, Miss, The Works of	276
Yorkshire, Picturesque History of	201
Zangwill's Hymn "translated from the Hebrew"	115

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

	PAGE
Alfred the Great, Works relating to	438
Alma-Tadema, Miss, The Works of	506
Bailey's (Mr. P. J.) Festus	338
Beaconsfield's (Lord) Letters	138
Memoirs	398
Benham's (Canon) editions of Cowper's Works	378
Besant, Sir Walter, The Works of	506
Bibliography, The Spread of	180
Björnson's Dramas, English Versions of... ..	418, 438
Blake, William, The Writings of	478
Boswell's Life of Johnson , Editions of	526
Bowen, Mr. E. E., The School Lyrics of	3 8
Brooks, Mr. Shirley, The Works of	438
Brown, Alice, The Works of	318
Mr. Vincent, The Works of	478
Buchanan, Mr. Robert, The Poetical Works of	398, 506
Bulwer's What Will He Do With It?	202
Callcott, Lady, The Works of	338
Canton, Miss Winifred Vida	334
Mr. William, The Poems of	526
Collins, Wilkie, Dramatic Stories of	26
Cork, Dr. Joseph, The Works of	546
Cornhill Magazine	292
Crabbe, Editions of the Works of	278
Croighton, Dr., The Publications of	46
Crosby's (Mr. George) Salathiel	478
Darley, Mr. George, The Lyrics of	378
Dobson, Mr. Austin, The Poems of	506
Donnelly, Ignatius, Books published by	26
Draper's (Warwick H.) Alfred the Great	242
Dutt, Mr. W. A., Books written by	98
Echegaray's Plays, Translations of	378
Elliot, George, The Works of	138, 202
Ellis, Mr. S. F., Literary Publications of	46
Ferguson's (Prof.) Some Aspects of Bibliography	222
Fiction, Sixpenny, The Big Library of	98
Froude and Kingsley, The well-known Epigram on	358
Gaborian's Stories	118
Grant-Duff's (Sir M. E.) Notes from a Diary	378
Graves, Mr. Alfred Percival, The Works of	180
"Great Writers" Series, The	526
Hannan, Mr. Charles, The Works of	138
Harte, Bret, The Works of	78
Hatton, Miss Bessie, The Works of	178
Hauptmann, Gerhardt, The Works of	298
Haweis, Mr., The Works of	118
Hazlitt, Editions of the Works of	438, 458
Henty, Mr. G. A., The Works of	322
Homer, Mr. A. N., The Works of	378
Hume, Mr. Fergus, The Works of	138
Innes, Mr. A. D., The Works of	26
Iwan-Müller, Mr. E. B., The Writings of	278
Jeaffreson, Mr. Cordy, The Works of	118

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES—continued.

	PAGE
Keary, Mr. C. F., The Works of	298
Kennedy, Mr. H. A., The Works of	358
Kent, Mr. Charles, The Works of	278
King, Mrs. Hamilton, The Works of	118
Kinglake's Eothen , Editions of	526
Langbridge, Rev. Frederick, Works by	546
Lehmann, Mr., The Works of	26
Lowell, Mr. J. R., The Works of	26
Machen, Mr. Arthur, The Works of	398
Martineau, Harriet, The Publications of	26
May Book, The	418
Melville's (Lewis) Collection of Thackeray's Stray Papers	202
"Mermaid" Series of English Dramatists	438
Micélet, Mme., as an Authoress	398
Mitchell, Dr. S. Weir, The Writings of	478
Montagu, Mr. Irving, The Works of	318
Muddock, Mr. J. E., The Works of	298, 318
Murray's (Mr. Henry) Collaboration with Robert Buchanan	526
Myers, Frederic W. H., The Publications of	78
Newman, John Henry, Works relating to	318
Peep of Day , Who was the Author of?	358
Posnett, Mr. Hutcheson Macaulay, The Writings of	478
Préface's (Col.) Bibliography of Coleridge	6
Quarterly Review, The	278
Radford, Mr. Ernest, The Works of	242
Rakes, Thomas, The Diary of	458
Ralph Roister Doister	180
Rambler, The	288
Raymond's (Walter) Good Souls of Cider-Land	242
Reade's (Charles) Peg Woffington , Editions of	138
Riddell, Mrs. J. H., The Works of	506
"Rita's" The Ending of My Day	158
Robertson's (T. W.) "War"	118
Salt, Mr. H. S., The Works of	378
Savage-Armstrong, Mr. G. F., The Works of	222
Savonarola, Biographies of	418, 438
Scott's Tales of a Grandfather , Editions of	46
Sendall, Sir Walter, Editions of the Works of	278
Shore, Miss Arabella, The Publications of	78
Smith, Alexander, The Works of	242
Soldiers, Songs for	298
Stevenson, Robert Louis, Works relating to	98
Symons, Mr. Arthur, The Works of	506
Tennyson, The Boom in	223
Thackeray, Editions of the Works of	202
Criticisms of the Works of	242
Thompson, Mr. Maurice, The Works of	78
Thomson, "Seasons," The Poems of	78
Tolstoy, Editions of the Works of	180
Verhaeren, M. Emile, The Works of	202
Wallace's (General) Ben Hur	526
Will's (W. G.) "Charles I."	546
Yeats's (Mr. W. B.) Play The Land of Heart's Desire	298
Yonge, Miss, The Works of	278

PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

(New Series.)

	PAGE
No. 67: Reflections on the Change of Century ..	19
No. 68: Dialogue from an Unwritten Novel ...	40
No. 69: Open Letter to a Living Writer	72
No. 70: First and Last Sentences of an Unwritten Novel	91
No. 71: Lines on some Domestic Incident or Object	113
No. 72: Historical Personages wished to be Recalled from the Grave	132
No. 73: Suggestion of a Neglected Book	152
No. 74: Original Poem	172
No. 75: Literary Portrait	194
No. 76: Original Character Sketch	216
No. 77: Verses descriptive of the Sound of a Band of Music	236
No. 78: Heterodox Criticism of a Meritorious Work	270
No. 79: Twelve Best Books in the Spring Supplement	291
No. 80: Theory of Cathcart's Association with White Lilac	311
No. 81: "Thing Seen" in connection with the Easter Holidays	331
No. 82: Lines on the Planting of a Rose-bush ..	352
No. 83: Personal Reminiscences of a notable Man or Woman	373
No. 84: Character Sketch of Bird or Beast	391
No. 85: Note on a New Word, Phrase, or Habit of Speech	412
No. 86: Suggestion of a Literary Subject for a Painting	432
No. 87: Prose Description of an Actual Garden ..	451
No. 88: Reminiscence of School Life	470
No. 89: Note on "A Eoo' That Has Interested Me"	500
No. 90: Poem on Alfred the Great	519
No. 91: "The London Sight that Impresses Me Most"	540
No. 92: "The Country Sight that Impresses Me Most"	559

OBITUARY.

Besant, Sir Walter	504, 515
Buchanan, Mr. Robert	504, 515
Canton, Miss Winifred Vida	334
Smith, Mr. George M.	315
Stubbs, Dr., Bishop of Oxford	376
Tanner, Dr.	256
Ward, Mr. Ebenezer	435
Yonge, Miss Charlotte Mary	276

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS' NEW BOOK.

THE WISDOM OF THE WISE.

By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS (Mrs. Craigie).

Cloth, 3s. 6d. net; paper, 2s. net.

SOME EARLY PRESS OPINIONS.

"Mrs. Craigie, more than any other woman who is now writing, is, in the true, manly sense, a woman of letters. She is not a woman with a few personal emotions to express; she is what a woman so rarely is—an artist.....Her comedy, 'The Wisdom of the Wise,' suggests, at times, a play of Congreve in its straightforward wit.....It turns serious at every other moment, balancing itself adroitly between sentiment and cynicism.....If it is a popular success, then the finer literary qualities of dramatic writing are not yet wholly unappreciated."—Star.

"A bright, entertaining, witty comedietta."—World.

"Mrs. Craigie confers an obligation upon all who can appreciate bright character-drawing and lively writing."—Globe.

"Abundantly clever and refined.....Its author's wit and elegance of fancy provide the necessary good things.....Highly agreeable to read."—Scotsman.

"All that the characters say is worth listening to. There is a truth in every bantering phrase, a moral in every poignant sentence."—Daily Mail.

"It is in many ways clever and delightful.....If it had been published in book form, with some such title—to adopt Mrs. Craigie's earlier manner—as 'A Duke, some puppets, a historian, an heiress—and marriage,' it would probably have been an enormous success, a pointed satire upon the matrimonial cynicism of the upper classes, and everybody would have wondered why it was not at once produced on the stage. It possesses, moreover, not only these qualifications for literary success, but a quality which is far more important—intention."—Speaker.

I. PAGES from a JOURNAL. Essays, Notes, and Tales from a Journal of the last Thirty Years. By MARK RUTHERFORD, Author of "Clara Hopgood," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

The Contents comprise such subjects as: A Visit to Carlyle—June—The Break of a Great Drought—Spinoza—Faith—Sir Walter Scott's Use of the Supernatural—and some Notes on Milton.

"Will not fail to be welcome to those who have made the acquaintance of the works of the writer."—Daily News.

AN IMPORTANT ADDITION TO "UNWIN'S LIBRARY OF LITERARY HISTORY."

II. A LITERARY HISTORY of AMERICA. By Barrett WENDELL, Professor of English at Harvard University. With Frontispiece. Cloth, 16s.

"This solid and well-digested treatise deserves a welcome from any reader who wishes to be exactly informed upon the details, ideals, and tendencies of the rich literature which she has had."—Scotsman.

"A workmanlike volume, which will give any student a fair idea of the work of American authors.....Is likely to be useful to those preparing for examinations."—Publishers' Circular.

A FASCINATING NEW TRAVEL BOOK.

III. AMONG the BERBERS of ALGERIA. By ANTHONY WILKIN, Author of "On the Nile with a Camera," &c. Fully Illustrated. Cloth, 16s.

"Mr. Wilkin is fond of travel, knows where to seek his adventures, and how to enjoy them. He is also a good photographer and an interesting writer; so that it is with some anticipation that we turn over the pages of his new volume.

It provides us with a unique glimpse of life throughout the wide country of Algeria..... It is bright with the spirit of adventure and sparkling descriptions."—Daily Chronicle.

IV. TRAMPING with TRAMPS. Studies and Sketches of Vagabond Life. By JOSIAH FLYNT. Fully Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A book—neither fiction nor war-book—that will keep every reader's attention chained down from page 1 to page 398, and set his tongue going about it afterwards.....Deserves to become a classic, both as immensely good reading and as invaluable material for the sociologist and reformer."—Daily Mail Gazette.

"A work which will be read with interest by all who study the important social question of vagabondage."—Morning Post.

V. THE JEW in LONDON. A Study in Racial Character and Present Day Conditions. With an Introduction by Canon BARNETT, a Preface by the Right Hon. JAMES BRYCE, M.P., and an Important Map specially made for the volume. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

"A careful and instructive study of the Jewish question, especially as it affects London, alike from the social, industrial, and religious points of view.It may be read with profit alike by those who concern themselves with practical questions of a social and economic kind, and by those whose interest lies rather in studies of a historical and religious order."—Glasgow Herald.

"A collection of well-verified facts and interpretations which sheds a most serviceable light upon some obscure racial and industrial problems.....A very thorough piece of work."—Daily Chronicle.

FIVE NEW NOVELS.

I. SARAH, "P.G." The Experiences of a Paying Guest. By H. SANT MARTIN-LANYON. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"In 'Sarah, "P.G."' Mrs. H. Sant Martin-Lanyon has come near to writing one of the most fascinating novels of the season."—Daily Express.

II. VANITY. Being the Confessions of a Court Modiste. By RITA. Second Edition. 6s.

LADIES.—Do you desire some valuable wrinkles on how to dress? Do you know how a number of the smart set clothe themselves for nothing? Do you wish to know how you should look when properly gowned? Would you like to know all about the ins and outs of a Court modiste's business? Do you want a really nice present to send to a friend?

If you want any of these things,

BUY "RITA'S VANITY," The Confessions of a Court Modiste.

III. EDWARD BARRY, South Sea Pearler. By LOUIS BECKE, Author of "By Reef and Palm," &c. Unwin's Green Cloth Library. 6s.

"One of the most exciting stories of the sea we have read for many a long year.....Mr. Becke is a master of narrative, and such is the swift passage of events that the reader sits with held breath devouring whole pages at a glance.

It is the most absorbing romance since 'Treasure Island.'"—Echo.

IV. TRINITY BELLS. A Tale of Old New York. By AMELIA E. BARR. Profusely Illustrated and with Decorated Cover. 6s.

"Mrs. Barr has written many good stories, but we do not remember any one that we like better than this."—Lloyd's News.

"An excellent little tale."—Daily Telegraph.

V. THE STORY of the TREASURE SEEKERS. Being the Adventures of the Bastable Children in Search of a Fortune. By E. NESBIT. Illustrated by Gordon Browne and Lewis Baumer. Cloth, 6s.

"A delight to read."—Dundee Advertiser.

"We cannot realise anybody who could fail to enjoy it."—World.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.

Rev. Dr. JOSEPH PARKER.

THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A PREACHER'S LIFE.

An Autobiography and an Album.

By JOSEPH PARKER, D.D.,

Minister of the City Temple, London.

WITH PORTRAITS AND ILLUSTRATIONS.

"This fascinating autobiography."—Methodist Recorder.

"It is a book of uncommon interest, and, in those portions which relate to its author's later life, one of heart-moving pathos."—Christian World.

"We have to thank Dr. Parker for a sparkling book, full of good things put as only Dr. Parker can put them."—London Quarterly Review.

"The volume has the vigour and the freshness of which Dr. Parker possesses the incommunicable secret."—Literary World.

"To many this volume will prove a book of deep interest."—Academy.

"The book has the magic of the writer's personality."—Outlook.

"Dr. Parker has produced a book that is interesting from its first page to its last.... The volume has all those characteristics of Dr. Parker to which we have become accustomed in his numberless books..... A most readable book, which we feel sure will be read and much enjoyed."—Glasgow Herald.

VOLUMES 1, 2, 3 NOW READY.

Price 3s. 6d. each, net.

THE

CITY TEMPLE PULPIT.

Sermons by the Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D.

"After reading these sermons by the famous preacher whose reputation is so world-wide, we feel here indeed we possess the results of sanctified genius. Dr. Parker lights his own fire, and his originality is extraordinary. He is a Bible-inspired man. In fact, his love of the Bible comes out in every line. The prayers at the beginning of these sermons are full of pathos, directness, communion with God. The sermons amount to twenty in all, and it were difficult to say which is better than another. All are so good, rich, and helpful."—Christian Leader.

Monthly Parts, price 6d. net. Cloth cases for binding Parts, price 6d. net.

THE CHEAP ISSUE OF

Dr. Parker's People's Bible,

Now offered, in Sets of FIVE VOLUMES for 17s. 6d. net, cloth, payable in advance.

ALL VOLUMES SOLD SEPARATELY.

Price 6s. each. (Original Price, 8s. each.)

The Volumes of the various Sets cannot be assorted at Subscription Price.

Full Prospectus post free on application to the Publishers.

London: HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER,

For JANUARY,

COMMENCES a NEW VOLUME, and contains Contributions by SIR EDWARD J. POYNTER, P.R.A.

STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

THE HON. MRS. CHAPMAN.

THE REV. DR. JESSOPP.

EDMUND ROBERTSON, Q.C., M.P. (late Civil Lord of

L. OPPENHEIM.

SIR MICHAEL FOSTER, K.C.B., M.P.

THE HON. LADY PONSONBY.

THE MOULVIE RAFIUDDIN AHMAD.

JOHN TREVARTHEN (Farm School, Redhill).

HENRY JEPSON.

ROBERT BROMLEY.

THE HON. JOHN COLLIER.

SIR WEMYSS REID.

SIDNEY LOW.

THE BISHOP OF NEWPORT.

THE EDITOR.

LORD ROBERTS ON ARMY REFORM (reprinted from Nineteenth Century, June, 1884).

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO. (LTD.).

Frontispiece.

"Midnight, December 31st, 1900."

"A New Century and an Old Riddle."

"England's Peasantry—Then and Now."

"The Admiralty and Submarine Boats."

"On Spion Kop."

"Scientific Use of Hospitals."

"The Role of Women in Society."—II.

"The Sources of Islam."

"Hooliganism."

"A Day of Purification."

"The Nicaragua Canal Question."

"Varying Ideals of Human Beauty."

"Current Politics: (1) A Liberal View."

"Current Politics: (2) A Conservative View."

"The Catholic Doctrine of Indulgences."

"Note on the Papal Indulgence at Oberammergau."

"'Kim' opens magnificently. In five minutes we know 'Little Light of all the World' and the old Thibetan priest, who adopts the lad as a chela to beg for him..... 'Kim' promises to be full of incident."—DAILY EXPRESS.

RUDYARD KIPLING'S GREAT STORY "KIM"

COMMENCES IN

CASSELL'S MAGAZINE FOR JANUARY. NOW READY, PRICE 6d.

A MAGNIFICENT NEW EDITION OF THE GREAT HISTORY OF OUR COUNTRY.

On January 23 will be published Part I., price 6d., of

THE CENTURY EDITION OF CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF ENGLAND

1. A large number of Superb Coloured Plates, exquisitely produced, have been expressly executed for the "Century" Edition.

2. The "Century" Edition is brought down to the dawn of the 20th Century.

3. The "Century" Edition will be printed on superior paper.

4. The "Century" Edition will contain nearly 2,000 Original Illustrations by leading artists, including a number prepared for this issue, and will be in all respects

A WORK WORTHY OF THE NEW CENTURY.

* Orders for Part I. should be registered at the Booksellers' immediately, as the interest taken in this Edition has far surpassed that which has been manifested in previous issues, and an enormous demand is consequently anticipated.

Messrs. CASSELL & COMPANY will publish on Jan. 25,

Part I., price 6d., of

MYSTERIES of POLICE and CRIME

BY

MAJOR ARTHUR GRIFFITHS.

FULLY ILLUSTRATED.

A splendid Rembrandt Photogravure of Claude Duval from the celebrated Picture by W. P. Frith, R.A., will be given with Part I.

In this work Major Arthur Griffiths deals more particularly with the "mysteries" of crime and its partial or complete detection; with offences not immediately brought home to their perpetrators; offences prepared in secret, committed by offenders who have remained long, perhaps entirely, unknown, but who have generally met with their true deserts; offences that have in consequence exercised the ingenuity of pursuers, showing the highest development of the game of hide-and-seek, where the hunt is man, where one side fights for life and liberty, immunity from well-merited reprisals, the other is armed authority to capture the human beast of prey.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, London; and all Booksellers.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1496. Established 1869.

5 January, 1901.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

INTEREST in the authorship, significance, and form of that literary orchid, An Englishwoman's Love-Letters, is in no wise abating. That the solution offered recently in our columns by "Theta," and apparently, though mysteriously, approved by the anonymous author, does not satisfy all readers, is shown by a letter we print this week. Meanwhile guesses at the authorship fill our ears, like the "thousand twangling instruments" that perplexed Caliban. It is known that the MS. of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters was offered to Mr. Murray through Mr. Pinker, the well-known literary agent; and on this circumstance is built the theory that the book is the secret venture of some well-known and shrewdly mercantile novelist. In this connexion we have heard whispered the name of a humourist who has done, and may wish to do again, serious and striking work. But hardly has this guess filled us with amaze, when a penetrating critic suggests to us the name of a young writer, whose authorship of a certain book of verse did not long remain a secret. Were this second suggestion to gain acceptance, the interest which already attaches to the book would certainly lose nothing.

MEANWHILE, without questioning the talent in An Englishwoman's Love-Letters, or the interest of the present discussion, we cannot help remarking that the book and the mystery which attaches to it do not strike us as healthy signs of the time. With all its cleverness and human interest, a book like An Englishwoman's Love-Letters is without the living wind that blows through true literature; it is essentially vaporous and not quite wholesome. It is clever and engrossing, and touches many hearts; but a book may do all this without being essentially valuable. The hopes of fiction lie in big conceptions, a wide stage, and the power to embody character and emotion; not merely to state these in narrow exquisite compass. Of course, if the book is a genuine correspondence these remarks do not apply. But even in that case they may not be wholly without justification. For we feel almost certain that a fashion in fiction is about to spring up, taking as its models A Gift from the Grave and An Englishwoman's Love-Letters. If so, we regret that we can give it but a doubtful welcome.

PROBABLY many of our readers were struck by the contents of the postcard which we received from Mr. Frederic Harrison a month ago, when we asked a number of critics to name the books which had pleased and interested them most during 1900. Mr. Harrison replied:

The only first-class book of 1900 has been Maurice Hewlett's Richard Yea-and-Nay.

For this faith which is in him Mr. Harrison gives his reasons in an article on Mr. Hewlett in the current Fortnightly. He begins boldly: "At last we have a fine writer of romance—of historical romance in the old meaning of that somewhat languishing art." Mr. Harrison sees continuous progress in Mr. Hewlett's art. After the Little Novels of Italy, he says:

It remained to be shown if our artist could construct an elaborate, full, coherent romance; true to historic realism; ample in incident and plot; correct in pictorial tone; a truly romantic epic, wrought out from end to end by living men and women, playing their parts in due relation and sequence. This Maurice Hewlett has done in his new piece, The Life and Death of Richard Yea-and-Nay.

After examining the texture of this romance, Mr. Harrison does not burk its phrasiness. Quoting some "fine idealisms," such as "the sacred air in which a loved woman moves," and others, he says:

They tell me they find all this harsh, difficult to follow, queer. But for my part I prefer a real historical romance such as this, told, it may be, in somewhat antique old English, to photographs of thieves' slums, and the monkey tricks of schoolboys and recruits—aye, or to a wilderness of monkeys, and to all the drawing-room flirtations and divorce-court vulgarities which are the fashion of to-day.

MR. BEERBOHM TREE's remarks upon the future of the dramatic profession and the unassailability of the actor, made at the professional matinée of "Herod" this week, seem to have set a well-known poet dreaming somewhat in the manner of the Judæan king. At least, so we gather from the following lines which reach us, signed "S. P.":

A DREAM.

Bear with me, oh!

I dreamed last night of a mime of willowy grace
To be the conqueror of the Lyceum Knight
And ravish immortality through me.
There shall the critics blindly dash themselves,
There shall the D. Mail strike, and there the World
Shall aim each week its William Archery.
And other actors shall repair to him,
Immune from cost when Centuries are born,
And he will fill their wounds with balm, ah! ah!
And he shall be the hope of tragic poets,
The succourer of neo-Elizabethans.
Shall send a light on the St. James's lost
And help them with their first and second acts.

[Murmurs of sympathy]

And I will think in Tennyson and dream in Marlowe,
Imagine in Shakespeare and in Tree conceive.
Till it shall dazzle Mr. Sidney Colvin
And Messrs. Edmund Gosse and Stephen Gwynn.
And it shall fill Her Majesty's o' nights,
Allure e'en gods into the gallery—ah!
And all the golden West from sumptuous cates.
And when 'tis over I will strive with him
To buy Paolo and Francesca from Alexander.

WE understand that the profits of the Daily Mail during 1900 amount to £80,000.

THE retirement of Sir John Tenniel from the staff of Punch suggests, perhaps, to the public mind the ending of an epoch more markedly than might an event of really historical importance. For fifty years the same hand, with hardly an interval, has drawn the weekly Punch cartoon. The record, as a mere statement of fact, is wonderful; but when we consider the quality of the work—its alertness, humour, insight—it becomes a matter on which our time may congratulate itself, as well as Sir John Tenniel. Thousands of people looked to his work as a guide to the proper appreciation of an event or of an individual; and many of us, on reflection, will discover that our idea of Beaconsfield is mainly composed of memories of a great series of cartoons. That in the current issue lacks no quality which made the earlier work great. It is a last gift equal to the first.

WE might fill pages by chronicling the ways, more or less literary, in which the Twentieth Century has been hailed and advertised. The Times' selections from its own back numbers extending over the nineteenth century have been very interesting. The selections include the announcement of the death of Byron. One is astonished to be reminded that the news took nearly four weeks to reach London. The announcement was made in these terms in the Times of May 15, 1824:

A courier arrived in town yesterday morning with the distressing intelligence of the decease of Lord Byron, at Missolonghi, on April 19, after an illness of ten days. A cold, attended with inflammation, was the cause of the fatal result. Lord Sydney Osborne's letters from Corfu are dated April 27. His Lordship was about to proceed immediately to Zante, where the body had arrived.

Lord Byron had perfectly recovered from his illness in February, which was of quite a different nature from that under which he died.

THE Morning Post has also searched its nineteenth century files with interesting results. In 1800 this paper was sold for sixpence, of which sum the Government took three halfpence in stamp duty. It is impossible to read the fashion paragraphs of December 31, 1800, without recalling Lamb's essay on "Newspapers Thirty-five Years Ago," and without being at the same time reminded of the personal paragraph of to-day, in which the change of tone is, after all, very slight. We read:

Lord Nelson and Lady Hamilton, on their return from Fonthill, alighted at the Mayor's in Salisbury, where they regaled themselves with bread and cheese and porter, in preference to more sumptuous fare.

His Majesty yesterday morning rode out on horseback, the ground being too hard for taking the diversion of hunting.

Sir Hyde Parker's honeymoon is only to last three weeks, when he must return to his command in the Channel Fleet, having left his Lady the consolation of an annuity of £2,000 in a case of an accident.

Several of the Irish members in the Imperial Parliament are outbidding each other for Mrs. Jordan's late residence in Somerset-street.

Grimaldi's Punch, in the Pantomime at Drury Lane, can only be equalled by Byrne's elegant performance of the Gentleman of the wooden sword.

The Earl of Essex is called the Bonaparte of the Partridges in Hertfordshire this year, having made a battle of Marengo among them almost every day.

By the last packet which came from Lisbon we noted the seasonable arrival of Mr. Winter.

ONE of the best new-century journalistic devices has been the New York World's appeal to eminent men for their answer to the question: "What in your opinion is the chief danger, social and political, that confronts the coming century?" The dangers foreseen by the World's correspondents are dreadfully various. We select from the list a few of those which are pointed out by literary men and women:

MR. WILLIAM WATSON.—Greed.

MR. GILBERT PARKER, M.P.—Apart from international questions incident on the extension of the Empire, to my mind the greatest danger to the welfare of the world in the coming century will be the spread and power of big monopolies and trusts.

IAN MACLAREN.—It appears to me that the great political danger in the beginning of the new century will be the collision of the Western Powers in the East, and the chief social danger will be anarchy among the masses of the people at the base of our modern society. May I add that in my opinion the safeguard against both perils is the application of the Sermon on the Mount to the live alike of nations and of individuals.

MR. MAX O'RELL.—An irresponsible and unbridled Press.

MR. ARTHUR W. PINERO.—Trades unions—the relations of workmen and employers.

MR. STANLEY J. WEYMAN.—The influence on half-educated nations of an irresponsible Press, whose first object must (with very rare exceptions) be pecuniary.

MR. ZANGWILL.—The reactionary reversion to Mediaeval ideals of militarism caste and ecclesiastical despotism ere they have been sufficiently purged by modern thought.

MISS BRADDON.—The homage paid to wealth.

DR. MAX NORDAU.—The chief danger, threatening civilisation itself, seems to me to be that infernal selfishness called by pseudo-philosophers "Individualism." In social life it leads to anarchy; in home politics to party-preying; in international politics to wars, conquests, land-grabbing; in art and literature to silly pooh-poohing of all traditions and to attitudinising. Progress is the outcome of a strong social sense. "Individualism," such as preached by the madman Nietzsche, and brought into fashion by his contemptible followers, necessarily leads to barbarism.

MR. GEORGE R. SIMS.—The spread of insanity.

MR. F. C. BURNAND.—Social and political practical Atheism.

QUIDA.—Tyranny: tyranny of majorities; tyranny military, medical, scientific, political.

We fancy that Mr. G. R. Sims's fear is as shrewd and well-founded as any in this list; but assuredly Mr. Watson's and Miss Braddon's less concrete forecasts are well-founded.

EVEN in these days of publicity it appears that a well-known writer may, if he pleases, journey half round the world and back, and the fact of his doing so shall justify the use of that much-abused word "transpire." In the British Weekly, for instance, the "Man of Kent," who is nothing if not up-to-date, says casually: "I hear that Miss Elizabeth Robins, the very clever author of The Open Question, has been to Klondyke, and is to write a novel about that region. Miss Robins, I am sorry to say, has not been in good health lately." Had Miss Robins been to Newlyn, the Engadine, Heligoland, or even Jerusalem, there would have been less occasion for surprise. But Klondyke is no Sabbath day's journey, and some of us would regard an expedition to its icy gold-fields as a life's adventure.

MESSRS. RAPHAEL TUCK & SONS have issued a series of souvenir post-cards in honour of Lord Roberts's home-coming which are distinctly interesting and well reproduced. If the pictorial post-card is to be done at all it could hardly be done better. We suppose that it may have some educational value for children, but, like everything else that lends itself to prettiness, there is a tendency to overdo it.

THE analytical table of books published during 1900, issued by the Publishers' Circular, shows a fall of 418 as compared with the previous year, and this in spite of the fact that the South African War was responsible, in six months, for over a hundred volumes. Some classes of books have not suffered at all; in politics, travel, history and biography, medicine, art and science, there has been an increase. Fiction—poor dependent upon placid times—has suffered most. We append tabulated totals for 1900, which include new editions:

Theology, Sermons, Biblical	708
Educational, Classical, and Philological	732
Juvenile Works, Novels, Tales, and other Fiction	2,109
Law, Jurisprudence, &c.	147
Political and Social Economy, Trade, and Commerce.....	487
Arts, Science, and Illustrated Works.....	448
Voyages, Travels, Geographical Research....	244
History, Biography, &c.	716
Poetry and the Drama	370
Year-books and Serials in Volumes	410
Medicine, Surgery, &c.	266
Belles-Lettres, Essays, Monographs, &c.	330
Miscellaneous, including Pamphlets, not Sermons	182
	<hr/> 7,149

THE Daily Chronicle's "Chronicle Office" paragraphs, which have been developed so successfully by Mr. Clarence Rook, will in future have an interesting birthday feature, worked on novel lines. Under the daily heading, "This is my Birthday" (Shakespeare), will appear the name of a remarkable man born on the day in question, together with quotations from poets and great writers, which seem to describe his qualities with unconscious felicity. Thus on January 1 Shakespeare and Pope were drawn upon for testimonies to Burke in the following manner:

"THIS IS MY BIRTHDAY."—SHAKESPEARE.

EDMUND BURKE, Jan. 1, 1730.

A very handsome man. . . .

He speaks well.—Shakespeare.

His voice was propertied as all the tuned spheres.

Shakespeare.

Lover of peace and friend of human kind.—Pope.

Formed to delight at once and lash the age
With native humour tempering virtuous rage.—Pope.

Statesman, yet Friend to Truth! Of soul sincere!

In action faithful, and in honour clear!

Who broke no promise, served no private end;

Who gained no title, and who lost no friend;

Ennobled by himself, by all approv'd.—Pope.

It will be seen that the success of this plan depends entirely upon the skilful and penetrating choice of quotations. We understand that the scheme has been worked out by a young lady, who may be congratulated on her originality and thus-far success. Particularly happy are the following lines from Dryden applied on Wednesday to General Wolfe:

And yet Dominion was not his design;

We owe that blessing not to him but Heaven;

Which to fair acts unsought rewards did join,

Rewards that less to him than us were given.

THE new year and century have opened twitteringly. We are embarrassed by a number of volumes of hopeful verse, some of them mere wafers of poetry accompanied by letters beseeching our glance and approval. And on the top of all comes the promised Thrush, the new periodical for the sole use of poets and their readers. The Thrush comes in unexpected covers of brown paper, which do not give it a very gay appearance. It is also unexpectedly thin, consisting of eight pages on which are printed four poems. An imaginative sonnet by Dr. Garnett hails Shelley as an Eagle of Song, but ends rather wickedly with a reflection on the un wisdom of printing verse. The sextet runs:

Phœbus unfold, for surely not without

Some gracious aid it pleased thee to extend

To altitude so vast could Shelley rise.

I hope so, says Apollo, but I doubt

Myself in rivalry a lay have penned,

But have not published and therein was wise.

We conceive that the object of the Thrush is to induce would-be rivals of Shelley to publish their secretly penned lays. Mr. Henley follows with a little poem called "The Way of It," in three stanzas, of which these are the first and last:

It came, the news, like a fire in the night,

That life and its best were done;

And there was never so dazed a wretch

In the beat of the living sun.

So I went for the news to the house of the news,

But the words were left unsaid,

For the face of the house was blank with blinds,

And I knew that she was dead.

Although we do not think that the first number of the Thrush will set the Castalian spring on fire, we wish it success. Any serious attempt to foster poetry, and the reading of it, is worthy to be encouraged in these days.

DR. J. A. CARLYLE's well-known translation of the Inferno (published 1849) has just been re-edited and carefully revised by Dr. Elsner. No alterations have been made in Carlyle's version, except where he had followed a reading now generally rejected: all such corrections are enclosed within square brackets. Mr. Paget Toynbee has done a similar service for Cary's Inferno (1808), and the result is that at very slight cost the Dante reader may possess himself of an authoritative text of two "classic" translations, and a thoroughly up-to-date commentary, of the first cantica. In view of this fact, and the present strength of the Dante movement, it is interesting to read Carlyle's preface to his first edition. He was told that his plan of publishing text, translations, and notes would "make a piebald, monstrous book, such as has not been seen in this country." It was due to this criticism that he tried the market with the Inferno only, fifty years ago.

A CORRESPONDENT suggested last week that the facsimile edition of the First Folio projected by the Clarendon Press is not called for at present, but his own letter furnished evidence that the want is real if not clamant. And now Messrs. Downey inform us that they are actively preparing a reprint of both the Folio and Quarto texts on parallel pages. The "Bankside Shakespeare," as it is called, has already been issued in America under the editorship of Mr. Appleton Morgan, and it will be issued here in twenty separate Plays at £10 10s. net. It contains the text of the earliest version of each play printed in the lifetime of Shakespeare, paralleled with the 1623 or First Folio Text, both texts being numbered line by line and collated with both the Folio and Quarto texts. The edition reproduces the antique and pedantic ornaments of the Quartos and Folios; numbers consecutively every line, whether speech, stage direction, exit or entrance; copies every typographical slip, misplaced punctuation, error in orthography, or inverted letter in both texts, and gives the precise "justification" of the lines of each version to the widths of the original pages.

APPROPOS of the revival of Napoleonic research, we notice that Mr. Francis Edwards, of High-street, Marylebone, has issued a good catalogue of Napoleonic literature from his stock. One of the most expensive items is entered as follows:

Combe (W.), Life of Napoleon, a Hudibrastic Poem, 30 very fine coloured plates by George Cruikshank, first edition, royal 8vo, newly bound in full polished levant morocco extra, gilt edges, by Lloyd, a fine copy. 1815. £9.

MR. THOMAS B. MOSHER, of Portland, Maine, sends us a parcel of booklets turned out in the appropriate manner of which he appears to have the secret. Paper, format, printing, all are excellent. Sesame and Lilies, Sonnets from the Portuguese, and The Rubaiyat are a new joy in their dainty and appropriate dress. These pretty volumes are to books what delicate biscuits are to grosser food. English publishers might learn much from Mr. Mosher, just as in some directions he might learn from them.

MR. HEINEMANN points out that the translation of d'Annunzio's Le Vergini delle Rocce which we attributed, in our recent article on d'Annunzio, to Miss Georgiana Harding, was the work of "Agatha Hughes"—the pseudonym of a lady writer.

Bibliographical.

THE Bibliography of Coleridge which Col. Prideaux has based upon that compiled by the late Mr. R. H. Shepherd is now ready. It is a neat little pamphlet of ninety-five pages, in the familiar French-grey wrapper, and is to be obtained from Mr. Frank Hollings, of Great Turnstile, Holborn. It will be remembered that the bibliography was published originally in Notes and Queries during the summer of 1895. Mr. Shepherd left behind him some further notes, of which Col. Prideaux has availed himself, contributing much additional matter, and revising the whole. The bibliography is now, probably, about as comprehensive, as well as accurate, as it need be. Besides giving lists (with details) of the poet's successive publications, whether in volume or in periodical form, it has full references to collected editions of the poems, to the principal books which discuss Coleridge's career and character, and so forth. Very properly, Col. Prideaux has not attempted to record "the numerous books of an unimportant nature, or the countless magazine articles, dealing with the life and work of Coleridge, which have been published since his death." It should be noted, too, that this bibliography does not profess to cover American or Continental editions of, or books about, Coleridge. Col. Prideaux does, however, rightly give expression to the regret that "we have left it to our cousins across the sea to produce the first complete edition of a great Englishman's works in prose and verse." It is greatly to our disgrace as a nation that no complete edition of Coleridge's prose works has yet appeared in England.

For a long time there has been in circulation a story in which the actors were said to be Bishop Wilberforce ("Soapy Sam") and Lord Palmerston. The statesman was supposed to have been driving in his carriage when he overtook the Bishop, who was on foot. "Pam," we are told, put his head out of window, and said to the Divine:

"How blest is he who ne'er consents
By ill advice to walk;"

to which the Bishop at once replied by continuing the stanza:

"Nor stands in sinners' ways, nor sits Where men profanely talk."

Now I see that Sir John Mowbray, in his Seventy Years at Westminster, after giving an account of a meeting of the Privy Council at Windsor (in 1858), says: "Lord Derby, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Sefton, and several of us walked to the station. Lord Sefton remarked to Lord Derby, 'We shall be at Paddington before my brougham will be there.' Lord Derby rejoined, 'Walk, my boy, walk; it will do you good.' On which the Chancellor [Lord Chelmsford] observed, 'No, my Lord; he will say to you:

"How blest is he who ne'er consents
By ill advice to walk."

Now, did Lord Chelmsford make this jocose quotation in ignorance of having been anticipated by Palmerston, or did he plagiarise from "Pam"? There is room for a history of English anecdote, on the model of the well-known French work on French wit.

Writing last week about Ella Wheeler Wilcox, I ought not to have spoken of the lady as "Miss": she is a married lady. Née Wheeler, she wedded, in 1884, a Mr. Robert M. Wilcox. Her Drops of Water was published in New York in 1872, and there was an English edition of that volume. I derive this information from Mr. Potter Briscoe, of Nottingham, one of those public librarians who take an interest not only in books but in literature. "It is difficult," he remarks, "to decide the 'condition' of ladies unless they give the prefix 'Mrs.' or 'Miss.'" It is, indeed; and still worse is the plight of the reviewer when they do not give on their title-page any indication whatever of their sex. Take, for example, the little volume of verse just issued, entitled Men of Men. "C. Fox Smith" appears as the name of the author; but who is to know, save by accident, that the "C." stands for "Cicely," and that the writer is a lady not yet quite out of her teens? I think very highly of Men of Men, and regard it as a pity that a book so full of excellent patriotic verse should be ascribed, ignorantly, to a mere man. Miss Fox Smith, by the way, belongs to Manchester, but evidently is not a member of the "Manchester School" of politicians.

I said last week that Mrs. Edwardes's Ought We to Visit Her? was the only English work which Mr. W. S. Gilbert had adapted to the stage. I ought not to have said that, because I knew better. I forgot, however, for the moment, that so long ago as May, 1871, Mr. Gilbert produced at the Court Theatre, London, a dramatisation of Great Expectations which had sufficient vitality to allow of its being revived at another house half a dozen years later. In a little autobiography which he published in the Theatre magazine, Mr. Gilbert told, apropos of this piece, a good story against the Licensor of Plays. At one place, Magwitch, the returned convict, had to say to Pip, "Here you are, in chambers fit for a Lord." When the MS. came back from the Censor, the word "Lord" was found to be struck out and the word "Heaven" substituted. Thus carefully and intelligently did the Licensor of that day remove from our drama all suspicion of irreverence.

I see it stated that there is to be a new edition of The Silver Domino, "brought down to date"—presumably by the surviving author of the engaging work. The Domino made its first appearance in October, 1892, and seems to have been reprinted in the following month, as well as in March, 1893. It remains to be seen whether it will be greatly in demand in 1901. There was not much vitality in these "Side Whispers, Social and Literary"—the echoes of them quickly died away.

We are promised a new edition of John Wesley's Journal, for which, I should say, there is room, though, of course, it has always been freely utilised by Wesley's numerous biographers. It was avowedly the basis of the volume (published just ten years ago) called Wesley his Own Biographer. I may note here that The Bibliography of John and Charles Wesley, by R. Green, brought out in November, 1896, appeared in a second edition in March, 1899.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Science, Sociology, and Spiritualism.

Studies: Scientific and Social. By Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace. 2 Vols. (Macmillan.)

If the greatness of a man can be estimated by the extent of the influence he exerts in his day and generation, then Dr. Russel Wallace may claim a place in the first rank of men of light and leading. In the world of science he is regarded as one of the greatest naturalists of the century just closed; among social reformers his writings are accepted as those of a master; and he is a tower of strength to the Spiritualists, to be exhibited when occasion requires as proof that belief in the existence of immaterial things is not incompatible with profound scientific knowledge. All these aspects of Dr. Wallace's character are presented to us by the essays reprinted in the two volumes under notice. We see him as a naturalist explaining the effects of forces acting within and without the earth's crust in moulding the land surface and making the ocean bed, describing the distribution of plants and animals over the world and the conditions which determine it, expounding the principles and perplexities of the theory of evolution in nature, and throwing new light upon the divisions of the races of men. His political expressions are shown to us in papers on the depression of trade, the House of Lords, and the Disestablishment of the Church; and his Socialistic views are reflected by essays on the nationalisation of the land, justice, human progress, and poverty. A man so wide in his sympathies needs not one reviewer but many, and, in the absence of this, only the conspicuous lines of his character can be sketched.

Darwin, Wallace, and Huxley are the names of the triumvirate which founded and established the theory of evolution by natural selection, and it is a remarkable fact that the casts of their minds show the influence of the environment in moulding mental characteristics. Darwin, in his five years' voyage with the Beagle, Wallace isolated in the Tropics, and Huxley in the Rattlesnake, were all so situated that they were continually being furnished with new facts while in a state of intellectual solitude. Such conditions favour the development of an introspective frame of mind, of reliance upon personal observation, and originality of thought. When, in 1858, Wallace hit upon the idea that natural selection is the process by which new species are introduced and varieties departing indefinitely from original types are evolved, he was shivering under a cold fit of ague at Ternate, in the Moluccas. In a general way, he knew that Darwin was engaged in the study of variation, but when he sent his paper to the Linnean Society the clue to the origin of species had not been published, and it was not till later he learned that his conclusions were the same as those arrived at by another. The idea of evolution is, of course, as old as the Greeks, but it was Darwin and Wallace who raised it from the philosophic stage to the level of a working hypothesis.

The enunciation of a theory is, after all, only a small matter in comparison with the enucleation, and for this a discerning mind is essential. Not only must the way be pointed out, but the causes which have determined the course followed must be understood. In respect of this quality of insight into the workings of nature, Dr. Wallace is distinguished among naturalists. Whether replying to critics of natural selection—and the objections do not now come so much from the Church party as from naturalists themselves—or dealing with the distribution of organic life, or meeting attacks upon the views he champions as to the permanence of oceanic basins and the excavation of the beds of many lakes by ice action, he is always convincing in his arguments. He seems to know nature so intimately that he is able to explain her operations in a manner which carries the conviction of truth with it. Like Sentimental Tommy, he can always be depended upon to "find a wi" in any difficulty, and by exercising this faculty he has led natural selection out of many tight places.

From the numerous interesting papers in the two volumes two or three appeal to us for special mention. Among the most important in a scientific sense are those dealing with the method of organic evolution, and the much-debated subject of the inheritance of acquired characters. At first sight, it would seem that the theory of evolution must depend upon the transmission of acquired characteristics from one generation to another; but this is by no means the case, and the balance of evidence is certainly against such an assumption. Whether muscles or mental faculties are considered, there is no proof that strength and skill due to long-continued exercise are passed on to children. With but few exceptions, men of genius start up suddenly, and though their offspring or their descendants may be great, they rarely equal their parents. All arguments which can be adduced in support of the inheritance of acquired characters break down on examination, while, on the other hand, there is a mass of evidence that a wide range of modifications of structure can be accounted for by variation and natural selection. This is Dr. Wallace's position, and most students of natural history agree with him.

Of late years the Darwinian view, that modifications of species have been produced by the gradual accumulation of innumerable slight variations, each good for the original possessor, has been attacked, especially in America; and serious endeavours have been made to show that modifications are produced capriciously by monstrosities or sports of nature. Against this view, which Dr. Wallace strenuously opposes, may be urged the facts derived by actual measurements of various parts of numerous specimens of one kind of animal—such, for instance, as crabs—living under the same conditions. Measurements made by Prof. Weldon show that variations from the average are comparatively large, and that it extends to every part of the structure of the animal and to every external and internal organ. Natural selection—that is, the survival of the fittest among the individual variations annually produced—seems, indeed, to be all-sufficient to account for organic evolution.

Students of the science of language will find an essay on the expressiveness of speech suggestive in places, even though they do not agree with the conclusions. The argument, illustrated by numerous examples, is, that as many words are truly expressive of the meaning attached to them, they may form a clue to the origin of speech. For instance, in the word whistle we have a near approach to the action of whistling; in squall, screech, and yell we have a fair imitation of cries due to sudden pain and anger; and in wail, groan, and sob we have the more subdued indications of grief. Many similar words are shown to convey by their sounds the sentiments they express, but perhaps the best examples are from descriptive poetry, as in the lines:

Myriads of rivulets hurrying through the lawn,
The moan of doves in immemorial elms,
And murmuring of innumerable bees.

Max Müller treated this theory of the origin of language with disdain, but Dr. Wallace shows that much can be said for the view that speech has been evolved from the emotional cries of animals and the mouth-gestures of savage ancestors.

Little space has been left to mention Dr. Wallace's essays on Sociology and Spiritualism, but there are a few points to which we must refer. The nationalisation of the land is prescribed as the panacea for all social evils, and Spiritualism is preached as a means of moral salvation. The essential condition of a real social advance is said to be equality of opportunity, which is defined as "absolute fair play as between man and man in the struggle for existence. It means that all shall have the best education they are capable of receiving; that their faculties shall all be well trained, and their whole nature obtain the fullest moral, intellectual, and physical development." So far as education is concerned, it may almost be said that equality of opportunity exists at present, for it is possible for any boy with brains and aptitude for work to climb the educational ladder from the Board School to the University. But Dr. Wallace makes the phrase mean that surplus wealth shall be claimed by society, in order to secure similar advantages to all; for he holds that the transmission of wealth is as opposed to natural laws as the transmission of culture. To our thinking, however, the principle is unsound, because inequality of opportunity is one of the most powerful factors of human progress. People who have opportunities do not recognise them, and those who have not make them if they possess sufficient strength of mind. In fact, it almost seems that the best way to produce really great men is to discourage them in their early days and so bring out power of overcoming difficulties. Remove all obstacles and incentive to competition and you replace evolution by devolution.

Spiritualism is only touched in a few pages of the volumes, but sufficient is said to make a scientific mind wonder at the miracles which faith can accomplish. As with religious belief, so with Spiritualism—it is a matter of personal conviction, and some of us are so constituted that we should distrust the evidence of our senses, and criticise the desires of our sentiments in either matter. Blessed are they to whom a less sceptical frame of mind has been given.

In the Wake of the War.

Campaign Pictures of the War in South Africa. By A. G. Hales. (Cassell. 6s.)

With Seven Generals in the Boer War. By Major A. W. A. Pollock. (Skeffington. 6s.)

In the Ranks of the C.I.V. By Erskine Childers. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

One Thousand Miles with the C.I.V. By J. Barclay Lloyd. (Methuen. 6s.)

Shadows of the War. By Mrs. Bagot. (Arnold. 10s. 6d.)

The "Times" History of the War in South Africa. Vol. I. (Sampson, Low.)

It is significant of the duration of the war in South Africa, and of the length of its literary baggage train, that in the first week of the New Year we find five war books still claiming our attention. With these we shall deal as briefly as possible. Mr. Hales has been the most abused of the war correspondents in South Africa. His outspokenness about the conduct of the war has apparently angered people who were prepared to be outspoken only in alternate weeks, or when defeat was in the air. Mr. Hales has been outspoken all the time, and has, therefore, been berated. At the same time, he has given handles to his critics. Diffuse, sentimental, and wordy, his dispatches have wanted the tone which would have recommended their burden of protest and accusation. These faults mar nearly every page of his book. We have disquisitions in the vein of the amateur essay, and few descriptions are not spoiled by attempts to write finely or to write loudly. In short, Mr. Hales tires out the language and his readers together. A cold, tight style, woven of fact and brief comment, would have done Mr. Hales's business; but there is a deal too much of this sort of thing: "Oh, England, England, if I had a voice whose clarion tones could reach your ears and stir your hearts in every city and town, village and hamlet, wayside cot and stately castle, in all your sea-encircled isle, I would cry to you to guard your coasts." For a page and a half we are implored to listen—"for fools have laughed before to-day whilst kingdoms have tottered to their fall," &c., &c.—before we are brought to the point, the inadequate victualling of Sir Leslie Rundle's force.

Into the justice of his well-known criticisms of the conduct of the war we are powerless to inquire. Mr. Hales may have the case he thinks he has; but, if so, he states it wildly, and, striving to impress us, leaves us cold and doubtful. After asking at the top of his voice, and at great length, why hundreds of "strong young soldiers of our Queen" died in South Africa, he answers as follows:

I will tell you why they died, and tell you in language so plain that a wayfaring man, even though a fool, cannot misunderstand me, for the time has arrived when the whole Empire should know the truth in all its native hideousness. Those men were done to death by wanton carelessness upon the part of men sent out by the British War Office. They were done to death through criminal neglect of the most simple laws of sanitation. Men were huddled together in camp after camp; they were allowed to turn the surrounding veldt and adjacent kopjes into cesspools and excreta camps. In some camps no latrines were dug, no supervision was exercised. The so-called Medical Staff looked on, and puffed their cigarettes and talked under their eye-glasses—the fools, the idle, empty-headed noodles. And whilst they smoked and talked twaddle, the grim, gaunt Shadow of Death chuckled in the watches of the night, thinking of the harvest that was to follow.

All of which may have a serious basis in fact. It is the unhappy truth that in the healthiest country in the world our troops have died from disease in appalling numbers; and it is the fact that the nation is so far dissatisfied about the causes of this mortality that a special inquiry has been ordered. It is possible that the result of that inquiry will show that Mr. Hales has accurately and courageously reported cruel evils; but it will never show that he reported them in a convincing or dignified manner.

Very different is the plain soldierly narrative of Major A. W. A. Pollock, who raced about South Africa in the interests of the Times. His narrative covers the period between October 14, 1899, and July 20, 1900, and begins with his voyage to the Cape in the Dunottar Castle with Sir Redvers Buller, and his return in the same ship, and in the same cabin, nine months later. There is little more to be said of Major Pollock's narrative than that it includes experiences under Gatacre, Clements, Roberts, Methuen, Mahon, Baden-Powell, and Hunter, and that it is written with knowledge and without vagaries of style or opinion. Major Pollock is a good sportsman and trencherman, and he does not disdain to give the results of the finals in the Third Division Boxing Tournament at Sterkstroom, or to reproduce the menus of dinners given at Mafeking by the war correspondents to Major-General Baden-Powell and Brigadier-General Mahon.

The exploits of the City Imperial Volunteers were certain to find chroniclers in the ranks of that body; but the cheery, wholesome, and boyishly happy story told by Mr. Erskine Childers is a better outcome than we had a right to demand. Mr. Childers, who is a clerk in the House of Commons, found himself transferred from frock-coat officialdom and social ease to the hard and unsavoury work which "stables" imposes on an artillery driver between the decks of a troopship. He was constantly with the horses, leading them round the stable-deck for exercise, or cleaning out the stalls. All was routine, hard work, and health. Thenceforward, through all the roughnesses of the campaign, Driver Childers preserved his cheery interest in himself and his surroundings, writing up his diary in every conceivable situation, and once, at least, while in action with his gun. Mr. Childers is great on bivouacs, victuals, and smokes. Here is a good picture:

We ate our tea sitting on rocks overlooking the valley, and at dark a marvellous spectacle began for our entertainment, a sight which Crystal Palace-goers would give half-a-crown for a front place to see. As I have said, all day long there are casual veldt-fires springing up in this country. Just now two or three began down in the valley, tracing fine golden lines in spirals and circles. The grass is short, so that there is no blaze, but the effect is that of some great unseen hand writing cabalistic sentences (perhaps the "Mene, Mene" of De Wet!) with a pen dipped in fire. This night there was scarcely a breath of wind to determine the track of the fires, or quicken their speed, and they wound and intersected at their own caprice, describing fantastic arcs and curves from which one could imagine pictures and letters.

Even campaigning may have its literary side. During a short sojourn in a convalescent camp near Pretoria Mr. Childers entered in his diary:

I have literary arguments with a field-battery bombardier. We both rather pity one another, for he can't appreciate Thackeray and I can't understand Marie Corelli, whose works, with their deep spiritual meaning, he speaks of reverently. He hopes to educate me up to Ardath, and I have offered him the reversion of Esmond which I bought yesterday.

Mr. Childers carries his narrative right up to the day when Londoners hung out their banners and risked their limbs to welcome the C.I.V., and congratulates himself on the liberal education which he received in his year's campaigning. "It is something, bred up as we have been in a complex civilisation, to have reduced living to its simplest terms and to have realised how little one really wants."

Mr. J. Barclay Lloyd's narrative is concerned with the Infantry Battalion of the C.I.V.s, and particularly with its cyclist section, in which he was a Lance-Corporal; in fact, the best thing in the book is a stirring account of a "Cyclist's Despatch Ride." Mr. Barclay tells a plain, unpolished story, which his comrades and their near and remote friends will value. A very practical suggestion made by Mr. Barclay is this: "Of all moneys collected for supplying the deficiencies of the Commissariat Department . . . let one half at least be set aside for conveying the articles purchased by the other half to those for whom those articles are destined." That is the only way, he assures us, to secure the actual arrival of presents to troops.

A narrative of special limitations and interests is Mrs. Bagot's account of the work done by the Portland Hospital, of which she was the originator. The marrow of the book lies in its sick-bed stories, which Mrs. Bagot, both as an unofficial observer and as a nurse, was able to pick up. Her account of the Field Hospitals at Bloemfontein is sore reading, but it does not suggest that the best was not done that could be done. That plague of flies in the fever tents is no invention. "You could tell exactly how ill a patient was by the amount of flies on his face. If he was really bad, his face was nearly covered with them. . . . Little could be done to get rid of them; but bathing the face with scent and water, and quickly covering up again with the netting, soothed and comforted the patient for the time." Mrs. Bagot's powers of writing are hardly equal to her opportunities. A more practised writer would have described Mr. Kipling's visit to Modder Camp with greater effect. Mrs. Bagot's narrative lacks drama and telling detail; but it is quite readable.

The "Times" History of the War in South Africa is by far the most serious attempt yet made to tell the whole story, political and military, of the conflict in South Africa. It is the joint production of the special correspondents of the Times in South Africa, and of specialists at home, the whole being edited by Mr. L. S. Amery. With becoming leisure the first volume brings us only so far as the Boer ultimatum. Two chapters detailing the grievances and struggles of the Uitlanders have been written mainly by Miss Flora Shaw, and Mr. W. F. Monypenny has described the movement in Johannesburg which led to Imperial intervention. Mr. Amery's list of book authorities is long and impressive, and it includes one more warm tribute to the value of Mr. Fitzpatrick's wonderfully timely and trustworthy work, The Transvaal from Within. The illustrations to the volume consist chiefly of portraits, reproduced, with complete success, by the Rembrandt intaglio process. Oddly enough, Mr. Kruger's thumbless right hand, correctly pictured in the portrait of 1867, is provided with a thumb in a portrait group of 1899, but examination shows that the apparent inconsistency is due to a reversal of right and left in the second picture as reproduced.

The Landscapes of Bunyan.

Bunyan's Country: Studies in the Bedfordshire Topography of the Pilgrim's Progress. By Albert J. Foster. With Illustrations by the Author. (Virtue. 6s.)

THE greatness and renown of some books have a virtue to defend almost any sane commentator upon them against the charge of being unnecessary. The Pilgrim's Progress is one of those few books. Here is a whole volume of nearly two hundred pages written, illustrated, and published to show that Bunyan might have had such and such Bedfordshire scenes in his mind when he wrote the first part of his "immortal allegory." If Mr. Foster had devoted his lettered leisure to similar labours round about an author less firmly established in our reverence, the result would rightly have been called futile and unworthy. As it is, we read his simple and unpretentious chapters with a genuine, if mild, interest. Conjecture has flourished luxuriantly round the circumstantial origins and formative causes of The Pilgrim's Progress. Dr. John Brown, in a masterly piece of constructive criticism, has raised conjecture to the height of scientific demonstration. Others, in a vein of wilful particularity, have seemed to trace the entire Progress to Spenser's Fairy Queen, to the chap-books of the period, and to other exclusive sources, regardless of Bunyan's appeal:

*Take heed also, that thou be not extream,
In playing with the out-side of my Dream.*

But no commentator within our knowledge has treated the landscape side of Bunyan with anything like the fulness and ingenuity of Mr. Foster's book. That Mr. Foster should sometimes carry conjecture to the frontier of absurdity was perhaps inevitable, so dangerous is that enticing game:

It will be remembered that at the end of the valley the Pilgrim found the cave where dwelt the "two giants, Pope and Pagan." There are, we believe, no caves actually in the valley, but they abound in the sandstone, all around, and Bunyan could easily locate one where he wished to find it.

Just so; but why will Messieurs the conjecturers put themselves to the trouble of writing down this sort of thing? It must be said for Mr. Foster, however, that he never confuses conjecture with ascertained fact, in the manner of his Shakesperian fellows; and some of his identifications—the House Beautiful, the Slough of Despond, the Valley of the Shadow of Death, and "the door on the side of the hill," are decidedly neat and persuasive. Mr. Foster, by a series of skilful and minute arguments, connects The House Beautiful with Houghton House, that superb mansion built by Inigo Jones (?) for the Countess of Pembroke. As a final touch he refers to the following passage:

They desired him to stay till the next day also, and then said they, we will, (if the day be clear,) show you the delectable mountains, which, they said, would yet further add to his comfort. . . . So he consented and staid. When the morning was up they had him to the top of the House, and bid him look South, so he did; and behold at a great distance he saw a most pleasant mountainous country . . .

—and points out that it is precisely from the ridge in a direct line with the ruins of Houghton House that a fine view of the Chilterns is to be obtained. The extraordinary and delightful naïveté of imagination which enabled Bunyan, with perfect naturalness, to invest common and everyday objects with a remote and magical charm is well shown in his sublimely audacious metamorphosis of the Chilterns—the bare Chilterns only a few miles away, and surely one of the least distinguished ranges in the wide world!—into the Delectable Mountains near to the Celestial City. Another beautifully quaint instance is that of the Lions (“These Beasts range in the night for their prey”) encountered in the narrow passage before the Porter’s Lodge:

Looking very narrowly before him as he went he espied two Lions in the way. Now, thought he, I see the dangers that Mistrust and Timorous were driven back by. (The Lions were chained but he saw not the Chains.) Then he was afraid . . . But the Porter at the Lodge, whose name is Watchful, perceiving that Christian made a halt, as if he would go back, cried unto him saying, Is thy strength so small? fear not the Lions, for they are chained.

And then:

So Watchful the Porter rang a Bell, at the sound of which came out at the door of the House, a grave and beautiful Damsel, named Discretion, and asked why she was called.

Can you not hear Lady Pembroke’s porter reassuring our visitor against the chained watch-dogs, and see the trim figure of Lady Pembroke’s wench, as with a coy curiosity she answers the bell?

Mr. Foster will not pin himself to any actual Valley of Humiliation, but he is fairly sure that the Valley of the Shadow of Death was located “in the pretty gorge in which stands the village of Millbrook.” (By the way, as Millbrook is only some half-dozen miles from Mr. Foster’s own parish, there is a wise discretion in his remark: “We hope that we have given no offence to Millbrook people!”) He clinches some rather clever arguments by quoting the present notice of the Bedfordshire County Council to the effect that they will not be answerable for any damage which may arise should a heavy vehicle approach too near the morass on the outward boundary of the road. Mr. Foster “would not for a moment suggest” that there is anything in Millbrook to answer to Bunyan’s description of the “mouth of hell”—except the village smithy! Surely Bunyan derived his “mouth of hell” from the same source as his “door on the side of the hill”—namely, the now disused horizontal shafts of the quarries at Totternhoe—those quarries which helped to build the Abbey Church of St. Albans, and which to-day combine with the Dunstable branch of the London and North Western Railway smokily to deface the first ridges of the Delectable Mountains.

The author’s illustrations are scarcely as satisfying as his “scripture,” but the book as a whole will pass, in its modesty and ingenuity. If it should reach a second edition, Mr. Foster would be well advised either to alter the concluding pages or to eliminate the half-hearted assurance that he has no intention of identifying the Celestial City with—Bedford, seeing that his desire to do so is apparent despite the disclaimer. He might also omit the two-page description of the midnight bicycle-supper in the ruins of Houghton House: interesting, doubtless, as a personal reminiscence, it has no connexion whatever with Bunyan. By the way, the inclusion of the word Bedfordshire in the sub-title of the book is discreet, as this is not the only county which may colourably aspire to topographical connexion with the Progress. Surrey, too, makes claims which have been worked out in some detail.

Parody without Risibility.

Studies in Style. By W. H. Helm. (Heinemann. 5s.)

WE were never more convinced of fun in the equipment of the parodist than in laying aside Mr. Helm’s ingenious excursions into criticism of ridicule. Without fun, a parody, be it ever so skilful and penetrating, is a corpse: it has no life.

This little book of Mr. Helm’s has no life. It is full of clever things, close observation, neat burlesque, the reductio ad absurdum of a number of the mannerisms of the day; but never for a moment does it thrust its fingers into one’s sides or screw its features into the irresistible invitation to the laugh. One never more than smiles, which, in parody, is not enough. Mr. Helm lacks also another of the precious gifts—though not so imperative a gift as fun—of the parodist: he has no pleasant malice; he soberly disapproves, and writes his satirical imitation as a vent to his feelings. The best parodies do not proceed from a critical but a mischievous impulse.

But in one instance Mr. Helm achieves a distinct comic effect. His treatment of Zola’s Fécondité is most admirable, with a certain suggestion of imagination that we miss from his other efforts. It runs thus:

ROTUNDITY.

BOOK XV., CHAPTER VII.

(Continued.)

AND still the years revolved. And William was now a hundred and twenty, and Mary a hundred and seventeen. It was another marvellous dawn in summer-time, and as William rolled out of bed and rolled himself in his dressing-gown, the round-faced clock of the neighbouring farm rolled out the hour of five. The servants of the farm were commencing their diurnal rounds. Through the open window of the bedroom the vast and rolling plains could be seen extended as far as the eye could roll. The cattle were rolling on the greensward, and, from the far distance, the powerful noise and the odours of the great city rolled through the stirring air. Rotundity was everywhere; in the shape of William’s head and the pupils and irises of his eyes, in the figure of Mary, and in her round abuse of the old husband for disturbing her round of sleep before the hour of the morning roll came round; it was present in the wheels of the farm carts, in the grindstones of the old mill on the river a mile away, in the pumpkins that were swelling in the fields, in the apples upon the trees, and in the barrels of cider that lay in the big round barn. The last of the stars, round also, paled before the rotund orb of day, lighting up once more the vast globe of the earth, trembling in its rolling shiver of rotundity. The very seeds of the trees were round; the boles of the vast oaks, planted twenty years before by William himself, were round also. William came round the bed and kissed his friend and wife of so many rolling years. It was the rounding off of their lives, the happiness sprung from the assurance that their own faith in rotundity had triumphed over the selfish creed of those who preferred flatness and squareness to bulk and globularity. And the divine dream, the Utopian belief in roundness, flew to the circular dome of the sky, overspreading the nation founded on rotundity, making the huge ball of the world one rounded city uniquely endowed with the circles of hope and peace and prosperity. Ah! that the eternal globosity might revolve for ever, carrying the ball of human progress beyond the furthest frontiers of a civilisation that should be expanded for ever into an ever-extending, ever-rolling sphere of unimaginable rotundity.

(To be continued.)

That is good, yet one dash of irresistible fun would have made it still better.

A Book of Mark.

Deirdre Wed, and Other Poems. By Herbert Trench.
(Methuen. 5s.)

MR. TRENCH is a poet of very exceptional technical accomplishment. His diction is strikingly rich and classical, he has a stately metrical sense, with a bold tendency to innovation, the success of which seems to us dubious; but it would be rash to pronounce without more slow and deliberate consideration than can be given without frequent and gradual re-readings. He has a fertile fancy and much promise of imagination. But he is not content simply to toy with fancy, like Shelley in his "Cloud" and "Skylark." He constantly proclaims himself a meditative poet, rouses the expectations, and (therefore) claims to be judged by the standards of a meditative poet. We are driven to look for thought and substance in his work. Yet, unfortunately, we are disappointed. Again and again we yield to the awakened expectation of some grave significance; and, asking ourselves at the end "What does it mean?" we are forced to confess "Nothing," or at least but little, nothing compared to the promise of the fine utterance, the grave and impressive manner. This is perhaps one of the most satisfying of the shorter poems, and at least illustrates Mr. Trench's classic manner; but it cannot be said that the net meaning is either deep or original.

COME, LET US MAKE LOVE DEATHLESS.

Come, let us make love deathless, thou and I,
Seeing that our footing on the earth is brief—
Seeing that her multitudes sweep out to die,
Mocking at all that passes their belief.
For standard of our love not theirs we take:
If we go hence to-day,
Fill the high cup that is so soon to break
With richer wine than they!

Ay, since beyond these walls no heavens there be,
Joy to revive or wasted youth repair,
I'll not bedim the lovely flame in thee
Nor sully the sad splendour that we wear.
Great be the love, if with the lover dies
Our greatness past recall,
And nobler for the fading of those eyes
The world seen once for all.

The poet seems to have little more to offer or tell us than the multitude he scorns, "mocking at all that passes their belief." He does not mock, and there seems the end of the distinction.

In the long poem, "Deirdre Wed," he has the advantage of set subject-matter, and therefore it is more satisfactory. It is full of rich descriptive fancy, unmistakable work of a poet. But human passion, warmth of the heart, or underlying significant purpose of any mark, it has not. It becomes languid, despite its qualities, by the monotony of description long drawn out, the absence of flesh and blood. Nor does it redeem itself, as it might have done in the hands of Shelley or Keats, by ethereal splendour or blood-redness of imagery. Keats would have given it sensuous passion, Shelley aerial magic. In Mr. Trench's hands it falls between the two. Yet Mr. Trench has considerable gift of imagery, only it is not of the opulent or burningly beautiful degree to carry off the lack of warm-blooded human interest. Nor has he the vaporous atmosphere of fairyland which largely compensates like deficiency in Mr. Yeats's Wanderings of Usheen, to which the choice of an Irish legend naturally directs the reader's recollection. Yet it is a poem of individuality, which no one can read without feeling that Mr. Trench has a claim to be heard. The volume hardly satisfies us. Yet there is evidence in it which, none the less, creates a strong impression that Mr. Trench has a future before him. His time will come with the knowledge and clear-sightedness that life holds in trust for maturity, and doles out with a parsimonious hand. For it seems clear to us that Mr. Trench is sealed for an intellectual poet, and as yet is searching his predestined path. This is, for all we have said, a book of mark.

An Exalted Lover.

Later Love - Letters of a Musician. By Myrtle Reed.
(Putnam. 7s. 6d.)

THE gentleman who calls himself Myrtle Reed (which by a vague association of ideas suggests tobacco, but may, after all, not be a pseudonym), author of Love-Letters of a Musician, presents us in this new volume with melodious meditations on things in general from the view-point, as he would say, of an adoring spouse. These are introduced by phrases from Schumann, Wagner, or Tschai-kowsky, and furthermore labelled with directions for an imaginary conductor—allegro vivace, andante appassionata, murmurando, scherzando, and the like. How far these means of creating an atmosphere are legitimate may be doubtful. At any rate, the present critic has coldly set himself to regard the Letters from the standpoint of one who lives in a world in which silence is better than sound of any sort. So judged, they are found to be full of pretty thoughts expressed in terms of incredible stiffness and—not to put too fine a point upon it—affectation. We are slow to blame any writer for diligence in the choice of his words, and careful attention to the knitting of his sentences. In a slipshod age that would be a dismal thing to do. But, unhappily, ill-success is more disastrous in its effect than frank happy-go-lucky negligence; just as an ill-tuned instrument gives out music more tiring than noise. The Musician is better in his descriptions of nature than in his expressions of emotion, and we quote him here at his very best, though the first line contains a phrase which (only that you can produce authority for anything) one would declare to be not English.

(Tap-tap-tap—allegro vivace, gentlemen):

There are few birds left, aside from the sparrows. For many a week the tide of travel has been southward—I have not seen one journeying towards the north.

Long ago the orioles cleft their golden path through summer clouds. Thrush and robin have gone to make music upon the upland ways of southern streams. The meadow-lark will rest in strange fields and repeat his plaintive minor cadence which has in its inmost depths the sound of tears.

The bluebird's wings will flash against the silver noon-day, the bobolink will chant his mellow notes upon the far-off plains, and blackbirds and swallows will hover over distant waterways, and stretch silhouettes of flight upon the sunset sky.

A bird is joy incarnate. The red wine of life runs in exultant course through every vein, and there is gladness in every quiver of his ecstatic wings . . .

Even after dark some little voice is heard. Drowsy, half-whispered chirps penetrate the twilight stillness, and in the night soft wing-beats and hushed fluttering foretell the rapturous freedom at dawn. . . .

All the pent-up sweetness of the summer is hidden in the little throat—the rush of water and the drip of rain, the scent of shorn fields and the hum of bees through the clover; the soft stir of shining leaves and the luminous, fragrant nights.

This is very pleasant; and the rest of the letter, describing wild geese and the seagulls rejoicing in the first cold; and all the feathered folk listening, heads on one side, for the mysterious notes that summon them irresistibly as the notes of the Pied Piper to make their mysterious departure, is pleasant too. But the letter ends: "Ah, Sweetheart! You are my South-land and my summer, and all the beauty in my world." Well, let us hope the lady liked it.

Other New Books.

NEW RHYMES FOR OLD.

BY ANTHONY C. DEANE.

Mr. Deane has a fluent gift of light versification and a sufficient satirical bent to give his lines a savour; but we cannot pretend that this book has any real reason for being. It was distinctly pleasant journalism; it is a very mild addition to the shelf. Mr. Deane, unfortunately, has no individuality: his point of view is precisely that of most writers of light verse in University periodicals and periodicals that are published in London; he wants either more fun or more scorn—more scorn for choice. Thus amended he might be a distinct voice, instead of an echo, very distant, of Mr. Seaman. This book contains all the inevitable things—the parodies of Mr. Kipling and Omar Khayyam; the comic “sell” poem, with the name of Jones in it; the precise colloquial mannerisms invented by Calverley, as:

Others would moan, would cry “Alas”!
I, you observe, do not;

the acidulated references to the Laureate. It is the typical affair throughout, and harmless and well-intentioned as it is, it has aroused in us a feeling of intense weariness. Now and then, as when Mr. Deane pours ridicule on the poetry of Mr. Yeats, we are more than weary. A man who would travesty the delicate genius of that poet must give us something better than this:

And oh, the smile of the Slave as he shakes his fetters!
And oh, the Purple Pig as it roams afar!
And oh, the—som—thing or other in capital letters—
As it yields to the magic spell of a wind-swept star.

We have no objection to parodies of Mr. Yeats if they are witty and thoughtful; but this is mere inept surface-treatment. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

LIFE AND SPORT ON THE PACIFIC SLOPE.

BY HORACE A. VACHELL.

Mr. Vachell has lived and done business for seventeen years in California, and, knowing its past and present, he believes in its future. “The land of to-morrow” he calls it in this book of miscellaneous candid impressions, which we can recommend to all who desire to taste California before trying it. The “Men of the West,” the “Women of the West,” and the “Children of the West” successively engage Mr. Vachell’s pen. Some of his stories are distinctly amusing. The slick assumption of culture in this land of hope and hurry is well illustrated in the story of a State senator’s maiden speech. Mr. Vachell asked him how he had fared at Sacramento:

“First-rate,” he replied, taking hold of the lapel of my coat; “yes, first-rate. I was really scared out of my wits, but I didn’t wilt. And I rehearsed carefully my own little song and dance. You read my maiden speech? Yes; good, eh? My boy, I practised it in front of my mirror. Yes, I did! And I gave ’em a little of everything; a dash of Mill; a teaspoonful of Spencer, Shakespeare, the Bible; and a line from ‘The Mikado.’ It was great, great! It hit ’em all. I tell you—don’t give me away—that the Western orator’s vale mecum, his staff, his shield, his cruse of oil is—a dictionary of quotations.”

The notion of California as a country beset with desperadoes is, of course, dissipated by Mr. Vachell, who, however, can recall much queer morality that obtained twenty years ago. To-day the cowboys are picturesque, noisy, and thriftless, but they do not shoot at sight.

Drunk, they are dangerous; sober, most capital fellows: cheery, kindly, without fear, hard as nails, and generous to a fault. From such men Roosevelt recruited his famous rough riders, and they make the finest irregular cavalry in the world; but they are, and always will be, Ishmaelites. They are profoundly ignorant of everything outside their own calling, and always laugh disdainfully at a tenderfoot’s blunders. It is best to laugh with them, but sometimes the tables are turned. I know a man, now famous, who once silenced a camp full of cowboys. He had made some trivial blunder—I forget what—which provoked the jeers of the “boys.” “My God!” he exclaimed, “is it possible that you fellows, born and bred in this cow county, laugh at me? Look here, I have been twice round the world; I speak half-a-dozen languages; I have lived—lived, mark you—in thirty States of your Union; I have met your famous men, and you, you dare to laugh at me because I do not know the one little thing which you know. Well, laugh away, boys. What I don’t know about cow-punching is worth a laugh, but what you don’t know about everything else in the world is enough to make a man cry.”

Mr. Vachell’s pages about bear, wapiti, and goat shooting, small game shooting, and sea-fishing are excellent as far as they go. But he is nothing if not various, and he throws a good many severe judgments into a chapter headed “Ethical.” Fraud and jobbery, vulgar display, the sharpening instinct, political bribery, and an “almost universal desire to live intensely rather than peacefully and comfortably” are among the less admirable traits of a people in whom, with all these faults, Mr. Vachell thoroughly believes. His book is a vivacious, free-and-easy statement of what the West is, rather than of what it ought to be; and as such it is welcome. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

LOGS OF THE GREAT SEA

FIGHTS. VOL. II.

ED. BY T. STURGES JACKSON.

The Navy Records Society is doing a useful, and not less picturesque than useful, work in routing up and printing all kinds of obscure yet illuminative naval records of the past. This second volume of Logs, edited by Mr. T. Sturges Jackson, naturally resembles its predecessor, in which we found endless detail that lends life and individuality to the great naval battles fought by England with her wooden ships. Here we have the logs of some of the ships engaged in the battles of the Nile, Copenhagen, and Trafalgar; and the quality of these events is felt in a hundred phrases. Says Lieut. George L. Browne of the Victory to his parents, in a letter on the arrival of the ship at Spithead: “We have brought the remains of our deceased chief home in a butt of rum. I suppose he will be sent on shore with the honours of war, and there will be an end to all his greatness.” An anecdote quaint and characteristic of the time occurs in a letter written by Captain Morrison of the Revenge, after Trafalgar:

I must tell you an anecdote of a Frenchwoman. The Pickle schooner sent to me about fifty people saved from the Achille, which was burnt and blew up. Amongst them was a young Frenchwoman of about twenty-five, the wife of one of the main topmen. When the Achille was burning, she got out of the gunroom port and sat on the rudder-chains till some melted lead ran down upon her and forced her to strip and leap off. She swam to a spar where several men were, but one of them bit and kicked her till she was obliged to quit and get to another which supported her. She was taken up by the Pickle and sent on board the Revenge, and amongst the men she was lucky enough to find her husband. We were not wanting in civility to the lady. I ordered her two purser’s shirts to make a petticoat; and most of the officers found something to clothe her. In a few hours Jeanette was perfectly happy and hard at work on her petticoat.

Thus did domesticity thrive amid blood and smoke and the yawning deep on Nelson’s death day. This is the twentieth volume issued by the Society, and we observe with pleasure that new volumes are in preparation. (Naval Records Society. 10s. 6d.)

“THE SHIP.”

BY CAPTAIN F. G. GUGGISBERG, R.E.

Though primarily intended for the past and present cadets of the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, Captain Guggisberg’s book will interest the outsider who is in any way in touch with military matters. It will be news to most people that the R.M.A. was founded in 1741 by George II. on the recommendation of John, Duke of Montagu, who was then Master of the Horse, and the work of the school was actually started before the end of the year. The course in 1741 is fully set forth in "The Directions for Teaching the Theory and Practice," and originally not only the cadets, but also the "practitioner engineers, officers, and non-commissioned officers" had to attend the lectures when not on duty. We have an account of the working of the Academy and of the status of the gentlemen cadets by one who was a cadet gunner in 1744, so the early history of the school is well accounted for. Those who wish to know how it prospered in the eighteenth century, during the great war with France, and through the nineteenth century to our own day, must be referred to Captain Guggisberg's fascinating pages, where they will find everything set out in full. In addition to the information contained in the body of the work, there are some valuable appendices dealing with the officers, staff, and sports at the "Shop"; and in the "Roll of Honour" will be found some notable names. Many of the illustrations are in colour, copied from old prints, but the majority are from photographs very well reproduced. (Cassell. 12s. 6d. net.)

EDITED BY THE REV. GEORGE ARBUTHNOT.

SHAKESPEARE SERMONS.

Stratford yearly commemorates her immortal son by a "Shakespeare week" at the time of his birthday. The vicar makes it a practice to invite an eminent preacher on the nearest Sunday to address the mimes and others who attend from what he calls, for what reason we know not, the "Shakespeare pulpit." Here is a selection from the results, good, bad, and indifferent. The best is by the Rev. R. S. de C. Laffan, a late headmaster of the Stratford Grammar School; the worst, not even excluding the vicar's own, is a screed on modern fiction by a right rev. prelate whose name shall not be particularised. More preachers than one take a text from the story of Balaam, which is one of the lessons for the day: it seems to be forgotten that the prophet was not the only speaker on that occasion. The fact is, that Shakespeare does not lend himself in any way to the uses of the pulpit. A great moral force, if you will, but a great artist too, and a moralist whose outlook upon life is not from the windows of any house of either seventeenth or nineteenth century orthodoxy. His only recorded personal relation to a preacher is in the account book of the Corporation of Stratford, who paid for a quart of sack and a quart of claret sent as a compliment to a preacher at New Place, when Shakespeare was living there in retirement. That the Bard took his share of the liquor cannot be doubted; but there is no evidence that he listened to the sermon. (Longmans.)

DALMATIA ILLUSTRATA.

BY WILLIAM ROYLE.

To anyone who has known the silent and ancient cities of the Dalmatian coast this book of sketches will be welcome. There is an intense fascination in the voyage down the Adriatic, for after leaving Pola the traveller plunges at once into the Middle Ages, and leaves modern Europe far behind. In fact, it is not too much to say that Dalmatia gives a new meaning to mediæval, and especially to mediæval Italian, literature, for nothing seems to have changed since the republics of Venice and Ragusa were mistresses of the sea. The hands of the clock have stood still, and the contemporaries of Romeo and Juliet yet walk the narrow streets of the little towns. Zara, the capital, only known to Europe as the place where Maraschino comes from; Sebenico, with its land-locked harbour; Spalato, built into the remains of Diocletian's palace; and Ragusa itself, once the seat of a sovereign republic—all lie asleep at the foot of the barren rocks of the Dalmatian mountains; and though here and there Austrian officials have tried to credit the existence of the vanishing nineteenth century, they cannot be said to be the fairy prince who is to kiss the sleeping beauty back to life. Mr. Royle has a due reverence for his theme, and in his letterpress he gives plenty of information on the cities of the coast. His illustrations are well intentioned, but fail to do justice to the subject, as, indeed, all illustrations but the very best must fail. Still, to those who know Dalmatia they will recall many pleasant hours between the grey mountains and the deep blue sea. The country lies, as it were, in a backwater, out of the rush of modern life and modern travel; and even to recall it with Mr. Royle's help is restful. (Vinton. 12s. 6d.)

THE VANITY FAIR ALBUM. VOL. XXXII.

Three grades of portraits are, as usual, to be found in this entertaining volume. We have unrestrained caricature, characteristic portraiture, and plain portraiture. In all Mr. Leslie Ward ("Spy") shows his cleverness, but it is in the second class that he excels. The throwing of a well-known man into his characteristic easy attitude is his special and frequent triumph. The portraits of the Hon. Walter Lionel Rothschild, M.P., and Mr. Arthur de Rothschild in this volume are excellent examples. Nor could anything be better than the easy seizure of characteristics in the portrait of Sir Thomas Salter Pyne. Among other portraits of great excellence are those of the Marquis of Clanricarde, Mr. George Wyndham, Mr. Justice Buckley, Captain the Honourable Hedworth Lambton, R.N., and Mr. Frederick Treves.

The young author of The Lady Madeleine Wendamore; or, Love from the Ideal, and Other Poems, would have been well advised to have waited until his talent for versifying had matured before publishing. His vein is youthful, intense, and bathetic; and his love of strange hyphenations like "heaven-winged," "year-task," "pink-caved nostrils," "shadow-melancholy," "pleasure-pain," and the like is to be deprecated. The verse is of this order:

The faint smile which was on the Youth's sweet face,
Dies as he looks at Madeleine. His eyes
Still say—"Oh where?"—he passes; he is gone
And Madeleine thinks of his smile; smiles too
As a rosy hope buds, blooms from out her heart,
Then falls in hopeless petals o'er her Soul—
Entombs her smile. This hope re-lives, and dies
As hopelessness; yet lives again, yet dies.
Her castellated mansion-home she reaches.

In Hand in Hand with Dame Nature (Sherratt & Hughes) Mr. W. V. Burgess records his own leisurely rambles in rural spots, and his reflections by the way. These reflections unfortunately mar the book by their vapidness. "That the truest ministry reaches us through the soul, and not through the brain, is, I think, frequently made manifest." This is the kind of sentence that makes the next something of a terror. But when Mr. Burgess is writing about flowers, birds, and field life, that is to say, when he is definite, he is pleasantly readable. Still, he should not write: "Then we may lay down in the deep grass."

The Apartments of the House, by Joseph Crouch and Edmund Butler (Unicorn Press), is a well-devised and profusely-illustrated manual for the well-to-do householder who wishes to be in the decorative swim. It deals in chapters with the Hall, the Dining Room, the Drawing Room, the Bedroom, Furniture, Accessories, &c., and throughout there is a careful and erudite reference of styles to their periods and an insistence on sound principles. The illustrations are chosen with great care. An excellent book of its kind.

The Picturesque History of Yorkshire (Dent) reaches its sixteenth shilling part, and contains the stories of Brignall Banks, Rokeby, Barnard Castle, and other Teesdale localities made famous by Scott. Cotherstone, Wycliffe, Dalton-on-Tees, and Guisborough are among the localities described.

Fiction.

The Novel of Super-Nature.

Stringtown on the Pike. By John Uri Lloyd. (Hodder. 6s.)

Pharaoh's Daughter, and Other Stories. By William Waldorf Astor. (Macmillan. 6s.)

A Cabinet Secret. By Guy Boothby. (White. 5s.)

A Vizier's Daughter. By Lillias Hamilton. (Murray. 6s.)

THE voice of Fate is for most of us sufficiently faint to excuse a denial of its existence, but it is a voice with an echo which, unlike that of any other voice, gathers volume with repetition. At death-beds it has been known to shout, making for itself a veritable choir of even the furniture in the house where the sick man lies. It was a seer as well as poet who wrote:

The breeze from the embalmed land
Blows sudden toward the shore,
And claps my cottage door.
I hear the signal, Lord—I understand.

Here there is solemnity of reverence, but the function of the supernatural in art is, as a rule, to produce a feeling of delicious languor, of intellectual enervation, of pleasurable fear. Let us consider for a few moments the supernatural as presented in four recently published novels.

In Stringtown on the Pike, a Kentucky romance of the 'sixties, omens, as interpreted by an old negro, seem to be not so much the prophets as the originators of misfortune. The transplanted cedar-tree foretells with cruel accuracy the death of the transplant. A limb sprouts from it, and presently the negro says: "Dah am room fo' a coffin undah dat limb, suah," and knows that his master will die. Not in vain had he himself ignorantly planted a "weepin' willah befo' de doah" of his Dinah, for they lost thirteen children: "dah am no way t' change dat awful willah-tree sign." The story moves in the shadow of his predictions, and acquires thereby a sort of forthrightness rare in melodrama. In manipulating the supernatural a poetic imagination is essential. This Mr. Lloyd possesses. The reader does not accept the dukkeripen which inspires Mr. Watts-Dunton's one novel and best verse more gratefully than he does the more sinister symbols which presage the doom of Mr. Lloyd's fair foundling and the two enemies who love her. The reason is, that the element of beauty enters into his work. This character may be too precocious with the pistol, that one too obtuse to Natura mystica and his own fallibility. The whole work, like one painted in distemper, has, no doubt, the effect of a sombre dream. But it is not a confused dream. It has a lucidity not unmajestic, if we except an occasion when the supernatural condescends to explain itself. The passion of Aylwin is higher; in workmanship Aylwin is inferior.

One turns to Mr. Astor with the interest due to a man who presumably can write to please himself. In two cases his contributions take the singular form of what may be styled Astor's Sequels to Shakespeare. Thus we have Brabantio falling in love with an immortal siren of the sea—a mermaid, in fact. In this story the idea is presented that human love is the cause of human mortality. The alchemist "aged thirty years in as many seconds" when he "yielded himself for a single delirious instant to the thrilling sweetness of the beautiful mermaid's embrace." We regard it as a bad sign that Mr. Astor should have written stories about Pharaoh's daughter and Potiphar's wife. It is characteristic of the unredeemed (in art) that they not only essay the impossible, but gravely publish their attempts. Mr. Astor is too fond of manufacturing literary curiosities. He has culture, however, and there are bits in his Cliveden journals which have quite a Pepysian flavour. His treatment of the dark side of Nature is fragrant of scholarly intention, although sensational. Mr. Astor is intelligently interested in metaphysics.

It would be scarcely rash to hazard that Mr. Boothby is not. But, for all that, A Cabinet Secret contains a supernatural element. A cabinet minister, who in the course of his narrative reveals himself as a perfect prodigy of unsuspecting innocence, gives away State-secrets during hypnotic sleep to a fair anarchist. The story boldly assumes that during the present Boer War the Colonial Secretary and other important personages were kidnapped and the Prime Minister assassinated. We have, as in A Prince of Swindlers, an imposter who secures a footing in the most exclusive society by a clever parade of wealth. The kidnapped persons escape a fearful end, designed for them with a superfluous ingenuity that excites an amused surprise. It may safely be said that no intellectual effort whatever is required to read Mr. Boothby. He involves you in no labyrinth; he merely piles his agonies into a pyramid, and you look at them. His colourless baldness of style barely rewards research. Style and story are, like the raised letters that announce the notorious foodstuffs of infancy, plain almost to the point of mannerism. He is the priest regnant of the simple cult of Cock and Bull. His super-nature will never mean more than that.

In the last story with which we have to deal the supernatural element is provided by palmistry. The heroic Hazara maiden alluded to in the title of Dr. Hamilton's story tasted the horrors of a barbarous war in treachery and bondage, and her bitter lot was legible in her hand. A Vizier's Daughter claims to be a discreet embodiment of fact, and, like all pictures of an embryonic civilisation, is painful. It may well be authentic, for the writer is or was court physician to Abdur Rahman, the Ameer. The East is a nesting-place of cruelty, and Afghanistan seems to be no exception, though Abdur Rahman may be an Oriental Marcus Aurelius. Slaves are cheap and abundant. Hired labour receives the stick if it dare to ask a higher wage than the standard one. High officials are harassed by overwork and suspicion. Dr. Hamilton's heroine is a lovable creation, and one shudders as one sees this frank, proud, aristocratic girl thrown twice on the mercies of a horrible villain. The book contains some vivid sketches of harem-life. Eastern types are not often seen in English fiction in their proper perspective. It was clever to show, as Dr. Hamilton does, that a woman of Afghanistan may be intermittently by turns diabolically cruel and positively good-natured.

In this story the value of the supernatural is to establish the feeling of Fate, of inevitability. The gentle pain of the reader at the climax is thus unmarred by shock.

Rightly considered, the supernatural is merely the dark side of Nature. The use of it need by no means imply paucity of resource; it is rather a test of resource. In the hands of a Boothby it is a conjuring trick. In the hands of a Lloyd it is a magic. But it can be something finer still in the hands of him who enjoys insatiably the mysteries of common men and things.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final Reviews of a selection will follow.]

ON THE TRACK.

By HENRY LAWSON.

A volume of short stories by the author of While the Billy Boils, full of local colour and the incisiveness of a man who knows his characters well. "A Vision of Sandy Blight" and "Bush Cats" are among the suggestive titles. (Sydney: Angus & Robertson.)

NORTHERN LIGHTS AND SHADOWS.

By RALPH GRAHAM TABER.

A collection of stories dealing with "the quaint little people who inhabit the Arctic and sub-Arctic zones of North America." The effort of the author has been to present facts in an attractive dress. His attempt looks interesting. (Greening. 3s. 6d.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage) 17/6

„ Quarterly 5/0

„ Price for one issue /5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Bismarck's Love-Letters.

WHEN the Bismarck Memoirs were published their appearance was throughout Europe heralded for a sign and for a portent. On the eve of publication excerpts of them, columns in length, kept the telegraph wires busy; every European journal of repute reserved a broadside for their review. Before their publication these autobiographic Memoirs of the greatest master of latter-day statecraft were regarded as the Sibylline Books of the nineteenth century, heavy with fate. In this country, at any rate, the Memoirs were a disappointment. Written with a view to publication, they were, in the main, the well-weighed utterance of a statesman, a review of his life's work, an account of his political stewardship, the farewell, and, perhaps, a note of warning of one writing in the evening of his days. Consequently, to those who desired a portrait of the man who, save only Napoleon, threw his shadow farthest over the Western World, these Memoirs were unsatisfying. Forceful, far-seeing as they were, they lacked the saving grace of human interest. This month, however, a volume of letters (Fürst Bismarck's Briefe an seine Braut und Gattin. Stuttgart: Cotta) has been published which furnishes the material for a portrait of the man as he was in all the phases of his complex character. It consists for the most part of letters written to his wife between the years 1846 and 1892. There are over five hundred of them, of very varying interest as of dissimilar length.

These letters were not written for publication. In them Bismarck seldom trenches on politics. He was writing love-letters. Again and again he touches on some burning question of the hour, only to break off short. "You can read all about it in the newspapers; let us talk of something of deeper interest to ourselves. How are the babies, and has the white mare foaled yet?" A thousand and one trifling incidents, unimportant in themselves, and perhaps superabundant in their repetition, yet infinitely helpful to a just appreciation of the many-sided character of the writer, furnish the matter of this ponderous volume. For these letters show us a Bismarck with whom we in this country, at any rate, are imperfectly acquainted—Bismarck the man as distinct from the politician. They give us a picture of the Man of Blood and Iron with his armour doffed, of the Macchiavelli of the Mailed Fist writing straight from his heart. They show him to us as those who were dear to him knew him, and the portrait is human and pleasing. A devout lover, a devoted husband, an affectionate father, and a clean-lived country gentleman, without fear and without reproach, is the Bismarck silhouetted by these letters, a needed complement to the Bismarck of the Memoirs, and a wholesome corrective to the ghoulish caricature conjured by the perfervid imagination of Busch. Every one of the letters bears its unconscious evidence to the high character and lofty motives, the deep-rooted loyalty and selfish patriotism, of the Empire-maker. They bear witness, too, of more purely human qualities, of an intense and passionate love of nature, of a robust sense of humour, and, withal, of a generous, considerate kindliness.

The compilers, with Teutonic exactness, have entitled the volume Prince Bismarck's Letters to his Bride and Wife. It is a distinction without a difference. Bismarck was always his wife's lover, and consequently from the first letter he wrote to his betrothed, in January, 1847, to his last telegram to Princess Bismarck, in 1892, he wrote love-letters. During the first ten years of this period the letters are by far more interesting and more frequent. The explanation is obvious enough. When once Bismarck had gained a firm foothold on the ladder of his ambition there was proportionately less necessity for separation from his wife and family. He could afford to be with his heart where his treasure was. During the term of his engagement and probation his letters are a self-revelation that is of vast consequence to a proper understanding of his character—a character cast on grand, simple, and almost homely heroic lines. The first letter of the five hundred that follow is typical. Bismarck writes formally to Herr von Puttkamer for leave to pay his addresses to his daughter. It was his period of storm and stress. Behind him lay an eventful and not altogether edifying past. For the moment he was in the evil odour of freethought, an ungoverned frame of mind that was like to stink in the nostrils of an orthodox and straightlaced country gentleman of the Puttkamer stamp. Yet knowing his ill-repute, Bismarck writes with "frankness without reserve":

As regards my public life [he writes] it will be easy enough for you to obtain information from other sources. I confine myself, therefore, to an account of my private concerns and especially of my attitude towards Christianity. . . . After a course of religious instruction, irregularly attended and misunderstood by my sixteenth birthday, I had no other belief than a naked deism that was not long without a pantheistic taint. It was about this time that I ceased to say my prayers, not owing to indifference, but in consequence of deliberate resolve, because prayer seemed to me contradictory to my view of the being of God, for I argued with myself that either God, in accordance with His omnipresence, brought forth all things, and therefore my every thought and will, and therefore was, so to speak, praying to Himself through me, or that, if my will were independent of God, it was a presumption, and implied a doubt in the immutability, and therefore on the perfectness of the divine Council, if we were to believe to be able to sway it by human petitions.

At the University he frankly admits that he followed after the philosophies of Spinoza and Hegel, which eminent guides led him into "the blind alley of doubt":

Meanwhile I was affected by events, in which I had no active part, but, as secrets of others, am not free to communicate, that touched me nearly. Their actual result was that the consciousness of the flatness and unworthiness of my view of life became more alive in me than ever. By the counsel of others, as by my own impulse, I was led to read the Scriptures more consecutively and with a resolute suppression of my own judgment. That which stirred in me gained life when, at the news of the fatal illness of our late friend in Cardewin, I wrested, without sophistries as to its reasonableness, the first fervent prayer from my heart. God did not vouchsafe that prayer of mine, neither did He reject it; for I have never lost the capacity to be able to petition Him, and I feel that there is in me, if not peace, that confidence and courage such as never I knew them before. What worth you may assign to this quickening of heart, two months old, I do not know; I only hope that, however it may be adjudged, it may never be lost; a hope of which I have not been able to assure you more urgently than by the unreserved opinions and confidence in what I had just told you, and to no one else, in the confidence that God will suffer the single-minded to prevail.

A strange wooing according to our notions; yet of its sincerity there is no room to doubt. When Bismarck spoke of matters that he held to be of import as concerning his living soul, he bade double-dealing get itself behind him to keep Satan company. Yet this confession, hysterical and high-flown though it may read to latter-day notions, must have cost him much to write. For all he knew, it might have lost him one whom he desired more than life. Yet he never attempted to gloss his back-slidings over. The same uncompromising honesty marks all his letters to his future wife. There is one very remarkable letter in which he lays bare the motives that induced him to throw himself into public life, in preference to living the life of a private country gentleman to which his tastes and inclinations prompted him. Considerations of space forbid the quotation of the passage as a whole. Excerpts may illustrate it fitfully:

I therefore believed myself able to make the choice, as far as my prospects were concerned, with complete independence, a choice that seemed the most reasonable, given my tastes and conditions. That the nature of public affairs and the servile status of our officials did not appeal to me, that I do not necessarily consider it a blessing to be an official or even a minister, that it appears to me as respectable and, in certain conditions, even more profitable, to grow corn than to write administrative enactments, that my private ambition tends rather not to obey than to command, these are facta for which, apart from my tastes, I can adduce no reason; all the same, it is so. Of all the reasons that could have induced me to combat these disinclinations, the most reputable would probably have been the desire to work more effectively for the benefit of my fellow-citizens than a private individual can do. Apart from the fact that I am really public-spirited enough to devote my powers rather to the furtherance of the commonweal than to my private profit, I am, even at the most presumptuous estimate of my own capabilities, of opinion that it would make no manner of difference, as far as the wellbeing of the inhabitants of Prussia is concerned, if I, or anyone else of the many competent persons with a similar aim, were to preside over a province. The efficaciousness of the individual official is in our case very dependent. The Prussian official is like the individual member of an orchestra, whether he be the first violin or the triangle, with insight of or influence over the whole; he has to play his part as it has been composed for him, whether he considers it good or bad. But I want to make music such as I know to be good or none at all.

Red tape irks him; but to ambition he confesses.

In the case of some famous statesmen, especially in a country of Absolutist constitution, patriotism was, perhaps, the motive that impelled them into public service, much more frequently ambition, the desire to command, to become admired and famous. I must admit that I am not immune from this desire, and many distinctions like those of a soldier in war, of a statesman of a constitutional monarchy, such as Peel, O'Connell (sic), Mirabeau, &c., would exercise an attraction on me, like that of candle on a moth. . . . In short, I am not innocent of ambition, but consider it quite as evil a passion as any other, and a degree more foolish.

In this strain only a man who dealt honestly with himself could write. A stern man, yet a kindly withal. Witness that following. He is making his excuses to his mistress for that he has not waited on her before. The reason was "avarice, the root of all evil."

This winter I have been looking after the poor a little more than usual and have found distress, if not in my villages, at any rate in the neighbouring town of Jericho as it could not be worse. When I remember that half-a-crown would keep a hungry family over weeks, it seems to me almost a theft from the poor, if I were to spend thirty on travelling. I could, it is true, give this amount away and travel all the same; but the fact remains; twice and ten times that sum would only appease a fraction of that misery. Tell me, does this hesitation hurt you, that I am so little importunate to see you that I bother about the misère of money?

Few landlords could have had a keener consciousness of the duties of their walk in life, as few lovers were more constant and more devout in their attentions to their mistress. As he was in the days of his wooing, so he was throughout his after life. His wife—to give her pleasure, to spare her pain—was always his first thought. In one of the rare letters, scribbled during the crowded days of the Franco-Prussian campaign, there is a characteristic post-script to a hurried note addressed to his son:

If either of you should be wounded, wire to me to Royal Headquarters as soon as possible. But don't wire to your mother first.

She was always in his thoughts. In the days when the fate of the Hohenzollern dynasty hung in the balance, the man who turned the scale seemed, from his letters, to have nothing more important to do than to hunt through every linendraper's in Berlin to match a bit of ribbon.

Things Seen.

The Innocent.

He was a small French boy, with intelligent black eyes and close-cropped dark hair, and he was lame of one foot, which explained his seriousness. His world was the hinterland of the Mediterranean seaboard, all bare mountains and desolate valleys, the drearier by contrast with the radiant fruitfulness of the distant coast-line, with its orange groves and gardens of roses. He lived in a decaying village, perched like a bonnet on the top of a high hill, a village pour rire: it was all of stone; the huts were like kennels; no vehicle had ever lumbered down its narrow streets, and the castle that crowned it had been in ruins for ages. We talked, and as we talked I found that there was one dread topic that filled his small mind, waking and sleeping; it coloured his talk, it brought fear to his dark eyes; his conversation was rarely free from an allusion to it. That topic was the gaming-tables at Monte Carlo. He whispered, with tears in his eyes, of a brother who had become a croupier. He indicated on the hillside a large villa—unfinished. It had been begun by a rich Englishman, but he had lost all his fortune in two days at the tables. He told of a wealthy woman who had come to stay at the hotel down there in the valley, who had lost all her money at the tables, and was now a governess at Nice; and so on. His small head buzzed with stories of the disaster that that beautiful city with a dead soul spread around; and when I asked him if he had ever been there he opened his big eyes in grave astonishment, and threw out his small hands in a protest of disapproval of my question. So our talk came to an end, and with that Innocent's rebuke looming larger and larger in my imagination I went on my way—to Monte Carlo.

The Gamblers.

THERE were wise and foolish among the Virgins of Scripture history, and among the gamblers at Monte Carlo there are wise and foolish. It was nine o'clock of a Saturday evening when I entered the Casino. Of the players, some were keeping books, others were pricking on cards the red or black wins, and all were tense and unattractive. They came and went, but the bank's city was a continuing one. It raked and stored, ready to receive the fools of the world, ready to let them go, always without emotion. I was about to move off to another table, when it occurred to me that the intervals between the games were longer than usual. The croupiers had lost their mechanical quietness. They waited between each game, and he whose duty it was to send the little white ball spinning round on its brief career paused till the master croupier, seated in his high chair, gave the sign to begin again. Every head was turned to the right, and mine went with the others, to see a short, middle-aged Frenchman, standing, dropping piles of louis here and there on the board. This insignificant-looking man had the eye of the room. He was the gambler of the week. The delay in the game was to give him time to stake his money, and time to receive his winnings. When he won, a river of gold and notes flowed towards him; when he lost, he smiled faintly and looked at the clock. When he won, he stuffed every pocket of his coat and waistcoat with gold pieces; when he lost, he emptied his pockets and handed a note to a croupier for change—that was all. “Is he winning?” I asked. The neighbour whom I addressed shrugged his shoulders. “Yesterday he won a fortune. To-day it is not so. To-morrow? Bah? Nobody wins who is serious. For myself, I do not play. But my wife (he indicated a middle-aged, pleasant-looking Frenchwoman seated just beneath where he was standing)—my wife enjoys it. We come here for ten days. I give her twenty pounds. She loses it, but that is her pleasure. For myself, I watch. It amuses me. My wife thinks she is gambling seriously. Oh, no!” Just then the woman caught his arm, and whispered in his ear. He again turned his amiable face towards me. “My wife,” he said, “tells me she will not have time to win. I tell her she has time to lose my fortune, her fortune, the fortune of her grandfather, and of her grandmother. Bah! That man there gambles seriously. He is a fool. My wife plays—with what I give her. And when I give it to her I say to the money: ‘Good-bye; you are lost.’”

Midnight, 1900–1901.

I SHALL never blush for the impulse that took me to St. Paul's Churchyard to hear the twentieth century struck from the great clock. It was like meeting a wave at its first breaking, for where can the century be said to have begun if not in London, and under the Golden Cross? “Assyria, Greece, Rome, Carthage, where are they?” Buried under the waves of Time which they once breasted. But London met the Twentieth Century unshaken; it is good, then, to have seen them meet. When the stroke had sounded I struggled to the east end of the Cathedral. Here the crowd was thinner, but even here an individual in a hansom cab was leading, with his umbrella, a gloomy rendering of “Auld Lang Syne.” Had I looked for some happy augury, I should have looked in vain. From the corner of Newgate-street, where once stood the tavern in which D'Urfey is said to have collected his Pills to Purge Melancholy, there came a woman with a baby in one hand and a pot of ale in the other, reeling, and singing at the top of her voice:

The bright summer day
Will soon fade away,
Say what you mean, and be true, love!

But I was in no mood to moralise the scene. Simply I felt, as never before, the oceanic power and nonchalance of Time. A hundred years ago this night, I thought, Charles Lamb heard the stroke which began the period that another stroke has just ended. On this thought I passed the “Salutation and Cat” in Newgate-street, where—as he never forgot—Lamb had loved to sit with Coleridge, drinking egg-hot and smoking Oronooko, and “beguiling the cares of life with Poesy.” With Poesy! Had I not looked down Cheapside, where they of the Mermaid laughed immortally? And not they only. “O Posterity,” chants Carlyle, in the voice of the seventeenth century, “it is within men's memory when there was an open blacksmith's forge on the north side of Cheap; men openly shoeing horses there. And now it has broad flag-pavements, safe from wheel and horse, even for the maids and children; and there runs about on it one little Boy very interesting to me: ‘John Milton,’ he says he is; a flaxen-haired, blue-eyed, beautiful little object; Mr. Scrivener Milton of Bread-street's Boy: Good Heavens!” And over there, in Aldersgate-street, the boy, grown to a man, lived to see how:

When night
Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
Of Belial, flown with insolence and wine.

The nights and crimes of tower-crowned, teeming London brood in these lines as in no others; and in them her nights seem to congregate and mutter. What pitifully short steps took me back to 1801 and Lamb; to 1701 and Addison; to 1601 and Shakespeare; to 1501 and Dunbar; to 1401 and Chaucer's new grave! There, on Snow-hill, died John Bunyan. Down there, where Farringdon-street hides the Fleet river, Goldsmith wrote his Inquiry into the State of Polite Learning, among the washerwomen and hucksters of Green Arbour-court. And there, beyond, where the houses rise, and the river is hinted, Shakespeare acted in the Blackfriars Theatre and went prospering thence to Bankside. Down this street, to a wretched burial-ground in Shoe-lane, Chatterton was borne from his Holborn garret. His garret and his grave have alike been destroyed. To these men what did not London mean? They loved its night air, they looked up to its stars, they said: “I will do this, and this.” There were many voices in the street, but the voice that filled me was that midnight stroke of Paul's, that made all these my fellows.

W.

Some Questions in Shakespeare.

GENTLE reader, you know a great deal. You know all the readings of “The Blessed Damosel,” and you possess facsimiles of R. L. S.'s Davos Platz booklets. You have read the poems of “A. E.,” and can quote sumptuously from Pater's “Gaston de Latour.” Your Kiplingiana would fill a number of the ACADEMY, and your theory of the authorship of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters would astonish Mr. Murray. You have hopes that you will one day publicly correct Dr. Robertson Nicoll on the weight of Browning's watch-chain, and Mr. Watts-Dunton on the colour of George Borrow's hair. But do you—we ask hat in hand—do you know your Shakespeare? If so, you will think the following questions very easy indeed:

1. What was the name of Hamlet's uncle?
2. Who was Falstaff's tailor?
3. What was the story that Imogen read in bed?
4. Reconstruct, as far as you can, the menu for the wedding feast of Paris and Juliet.
5. What Shakespearean characters suffered from—
 - (a) Toothache?
 - (b) Corns?
6. Quote any critical opinions you can remember on the legs of—
 - (a) Rosalind.
 - (b) Rosaline.
7. How many Rosalines are there in Shakespeare? How many Angelos? How many Polixeneses? How many Kates?
8. Who played billiards, who chess, and who (it is alleged) football?
9. What was the maiden name of Petruchio's wife?
10. Describe the tragedy of Mariana's brother.
11. Which of the plays has the fewest female characters?
12. Mention the three blue-eyed characters in Shakespeare.
13. In which play is “young Dizzy” mentioned?
14. Give the Shakespearean pronunciation of—
 - (a) Aliena.
 - (b) Fidele.
 - (c) Jaques.
 - (d) Gonzalo.
 - (e) Philostrate.

15. What is the longest word in Shakespeare?
16. Who had a statue of pure gold?
17. How long did Leontes take to woo and win Hermione?
18. Give the Shakespearian derivation of "mulier."
19. Describe in as much detail as you can the following rings:
 - (a) Pisanio's.
 - (b) Falstaff's.
 - (c) Bertram's.
20. Where does Shakespeare mention Machiavelli?
21. Give notes on Shakespeare's acquaintance with the habits of—
 - (a) The rhinoceros.
 - (b) The hyena.
22. What characters were born respectively under the following constellations:
 - (a) Mars?
 - (b) Saturn?
 - (c) Mercury?
 - (d) Ursa major?
23. How many years had Falstaff known Poin before he met Mrs. Quickly?
24. Discuss Falstaff as a poet, and give a bibliography of his works in verse, realised and projected.
25. Describe the Duchess of Milan's wedding-gown.
26. Where is breach of promise mentioned in Shakespeare?
27. Two comparatively unknown characters in Shakespeare are Bridget and Biddy. Who are they?
28. On what day of the week and at what hour did Romeo kill himself?
29. Give a brief history of Mother Pratt, of Brentford.
30. "What was a month old at Cain's birth that's not four weeks old yet?" Give the answer to this Shakespearian riddle.
31. Tell what you know of Lysander's aunt.
32. Relate Cleopatra's fish story.
33. Give the name of Mrs. Quickly's spiritual adviser.
34. What was Shakespeare's favourite name for a dog?
35. What did Shakespeare know of—
 - (a) Lapland?
 - (b) Guiana?
 - (c) Arabia?
36. How many instances of second marriages occur in Shakespeare? Who were the parties?
37. Who was Julius Cæsar's comrade at school?
38. Where does Shakespeare mention Glasgow?
39. What was Falstaff's waist measurement?
40. "Jupiter ascends."
SICR: He came in thunder: his celestial breath was sulphurous to smell.
Annotate this passage from Cymbeline.
41. From which of the plays did Charles Kingsley derive the title Westward Ho!?
42. Give the arguments in the case of William Visor of Wincot v. Clement Perkes of the hill.
43. How many children had Mr. Justice Shallow? What were their names?
44. Where does Shakespeare mention the birch as an instrument of correction?
45. "What the dickens" is one of the Shakespearian ejaculations. Who used it?
46. What was the colour of Orlando's hair?
47. In which play does "Honi soit qui mal y pense" appear?
48. On what occasions did Falstaff refer to the story of the Prodigal Son?
49. Mention any instances of bearded women in Shakespeare.
50. Give any items you can from Perdita's menu for the sheep-shearing.
51. There is a larger than Falstaff in Shakespeare. What was his name?

52. Who made Desdemona's handkerchief?
53. What was the name of Poin's sister?
54. Mention any Shakespearian instances of sea-sickness.
55. Give reasons for believing that the story of King Cophetua and the beggar-maid was a favourite with Shakespeare.
56. Mention any Shakespearian views on the spelling of the word "abominable."
57. Recount the circumstances in which Orsino's nephew lost his leg.
58. Where was the stuffed alligator?
59. Who said:

"Base is the slave that pays?"

"Curses not loud, but deep?"

"Throw physic to the dogs; I'll none of it?"

Correspondence.

An Englishwoman's Love-Letters.

SIR,—Your correspondent "Kappa" says: "I do not suppose there will be any dispute over Theta's explanation of the story contained in An Englishwoman's Love-Letters," but I for one do most emphatically protest against the solution she presents, as being altogether incompatible with facts as related in the letters themselves. For instance, is it conceivable that the mother, knowing that the affections of the young couple were already deeply engaged, knowing also of the insuperable barrier to their union which "Theta" suggests existed between them, should not have immediately put down her foot and, without giving any quarter, insisted on that intimacy being ended at once, telling her son of the necessity that required such a sacrifice? And yet we are asked to believe—as indeed the letters show—that "her opposition was at first discreet, calculated, diplomatic," and later on, after agreeing to explain her objections at a stated time, she voluntarily absents herself, allowing the lovers to correspond and see each other as freely as if no such barrier existed, a proceeding quite inexplicable under the suggested circumstances.

Another correspondent, "Phi," says that the theory of lunacy in one or other of the families is expressly guarded against. I think not. On the contrary, it appears to me to be distinctly suggested, and, supposing it to be so, would account for many things that otherwise remain unexplained. Her parents' separation shortly after her birth, without any scandal; her occasional visits to her mother during her sane intervals; the attitude of her own people when the engagement was broken off; and, more than anything else, would it convince us that, as the editor of the letters would have us believe, "they were both equally the victims of circumstances and free from blame."

Personally I incline to the belief that he did tire of her, and that the process of disillusion had commenced before the mother came actively on the scene; further, that he afterwards used his mother's opposition (from whatever cause it may have arisen) as a cloak to cover his own fickleness. One man in a hundred, of the ordinary type of men, might perhaps have appreciated those letters, and the utter abandonment of devotion they express, and not have tired, sooner or later, of them and of the writer. From her own showing he was not this man, but a mere "common or garden" one, who at first, no doubt, was flattered at the preference shown to him by this exceptionally clever and cultivated girl, but who soon wearied of her and her "metaphors" and was too cowardly to tell her so. "You are the most generous woman I have ever known . . . the best and most true hearted a man could ever pray to meet." These are the crumbs of comfort he held out to the poor girl who was starving for his love, and at the end, when she is dying and craves for one message, he sends her his "profoundly grateful remembrances." Of such a man, if the term can be applied to so contemptible a creature, one can almost believe (admitting the story to be true) that he kept her letters not from any sentiment or affection, but with the deliberate intention of one day converting them into money. I sincerely hope, however, that "Theta" is correct in supposing them to be merely the clever and artistic creation of an inventive brain. I know one lady of my acquaintance (very happily married) who is quite capable of having written the whole series.—I am, &c., R. F.

A Paradox on Art.

SIR,—I have read with the greatest interest Mr. Arthur Symons's article, "A Paradox on Art"; and, while agreeing with him heart and soul that "Art" not only embraces literature, sculpture, painting, and music, but all creations which are truly beautiful—"Art is the creation of beauty in form, visible or audible"—I cannot but raise my voice, or pen rather, in protest against the following statement: "To have created beauty for an instant is to have achieved an equal result in art with one who has created beauty which will last many thousands of years."

It is doubtless presumptuous of me to call in question any remark made by so able a writer as Mr. Symons; yet am I alone in feeling—aye, and feeling most strongly too—that a performance, par exemple, of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," or of Tchaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathétique," by an orchestra under Mottl's or Wood's or Weingartner's able conductorship, is not as great a creation as the creation of the Symphonie itself? Or, again, that the impassioned utterances, "creations"—soul-stirring and unequalled though they be—of an Irving, a Siddons, a Bernhardt, not to mention many another, are not as great as the original which inspires them? I do not question that these artists are as perfect in their art as are Beethoven, Tchaikowsky, Shakespeare, Goethe, Racine, to name but a few of the greatest "creators," in theirs; but is their art, the art of interpreting, re-creating, equal to that which first created the great masterpiece?—I am, &c., L. GLEITSMANN.

"Brunch."

SIR,—May I be allowed to explain to your correspondents that I had no intention of claiming "brunch" as a word of my own invention when I wrote the lines in the Westminster Gazette to which you referred?

The word was originally made known to me by such of my contemporaries at Eton as went up to either University, and I believed its popularity to be so widespread as to need no disclaimer of parentage on my part.

Whether "brunch" is a happy or unhappy combination of meals must be a matter of opinion. Personally I have found it disgusting. But I should be overwhelmed with remorse if the explanatory definition, which I added to my lines, were to jeopardise the favour of the feast.—I am, &c., GUY C. POLLOCK.

and moreover, as some do aver, the last years of the century. My wife wished to see the new play of Mr. Phillips, which is mighty well spoken of, but I desired her to be quiett, having newly made a vow to abstain from all plays, which I resolve, by God's blessing, to keep for a week: and so to end my journell. My condition is thus: my health (only for catching cold) better lately, but I am at a losse to know whether it be my pills of quinine, or my having left taking my morning tubb. As for publique matters, though the Queen, God bless her! is well, we are in an ill condition through these Dutch fellows, being mightily punished for our late presumption. But Lord! to think how this rascal De Wett hath given them the slip. We are in so great a dumspe about this warr, that past success and hopes for the new years are well-nigh forgot. So ends the old years, and I do trust that we may by some means muddle through that which is coming. My new flowered waistcoate just arrived in time for the new years—very noble. And so to bed.

Other replies are as follows:

December 31.—Rose late, and having partaken of light breakfast, to office with all speed. On way thither reflected that the century's end seemed to demand serious thought and consideration of resolutions. Resolved, imprimis, to moderate appetite for drink. Called at —, where determined to take a final cup of ale. There met —, who invited me to drink with him and asked what opinion I had of the century's close. Whereat I told him I discerned little difference between the present and past years' ends. Told him that war was still with us, and poverty, and crime, and covetousness. Further, I told him that in my opinion the next century would end in a like fashion. Hereupon the fellow, who meant well, directed me to observe the many good things which the century had wrought, which I, admitting, still adhered to my general view. At this he became wroth and refused to continue further. So left him and to office. Resolved to abstain from disputatious talks, seeing that little good is derivable from them. Home late and watched numerous travellers moving with uncertain step, albeit they rent the air with song. Was convinced thereby that drink deserved the ill reputation which it has acquired. Resolved to carefully consider on the morrow the advisability of complete abstention from the same.

[H. W. D., South Tottenham.]

So ends the old year, I bless God, with great joy to me and also the century, and mighty wonderful it has been, and I bless God I did live in it. I at Lord Ashley's did hear recount, in brief, but with much wit, a summary of last century's achievements in reforms and science, and I resolved to devote my attention more to the advancement of the race and less to myself, though that is good, and God help me. Our publique affairs are in a straightened condition, and full of gloom, threatening the destruction of Empire and loss of valuable colonies—which God defer—and I do fear private ambition is destroying public devotion, therefore I resolve in the new century, which God bless to us, to take a more determined attitude in public affairs, though, if possible, not to the overthrow of my health and my goodly estate, to attain which it behoves us to be diligent workers. My wife's position at Court is assured, and, looking to the future—not forgetting the past—and my wife's wilful and malicious, though as fully deserved as it went to my stomach, hints on jealousy. I bless God, in the hope I may be more innocent, as I sometimes am, in all my thoughts of the fair sex. My vows as to wine and plays I hope to yet one day take up, having found great benefit therefrom. All which vows, when I reflect on the gracious Providence of the past, I do more solemnly make oath to perfect and observe upon the respective penalties thereto annexed; and, reflecting on my happy lot, which God preserve, I do think myself obliged to think myself happy, and do look upon myself at this time in the happiest occasion a man can be, when, being heir of all the ages—not forgetting the last and one mighty wonderful—I can step into a new and so promising a century, young, with better worldly prospects than ever, and in the as yet best days of my health; and for all this I do vow never to forget blessing God.

[J. R. J., London.]

Other replies received from A. G., Cheltenham; T. C., Buxted; C. B., Shoreham; R. A. C., Newcastle-on-Tyne; T. T., Manchester; L. McD., Glasgow; A. E. W., London; S. M., London; R. W. L., London; H. B. R., Manchester.

Competition No. 68 (New Series).

THIS week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best and most suggestive piece of dialogue from an unwritten novel. Not to exceed 300 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, January 9. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 67 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best reflections on the change of century in the manner of Pepys. We award the prize to Mr. G. M. Taylor, Stanford, Rusholme, Manchester, for the following:

December 31.—Up, and to my office betimes, where all pretty well. Dined at home, when my wife, poor wretch, dressed the remains of our Christmas turkey, it being the last day of the year,

CATALOGUES.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—The JANUARY CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW RE-MAINERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186, Strand, London, W.C.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 3 IN PREPARATION.

CATALOGUE No. 1, 1s., and CATALOGUE No. 2, 2s. 6d.,

May be had on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

A Large Collection of Fifteenth and Sixteenth Century Books on view.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W., South Frederick St. Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS

promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 77, SOHO SQUARE.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each given for any

Presentation Volumes with Inscriptions written inside by Dickens, Thackeray, Browning, Lamb, Keats, Shelley, Tennyson, Scott, Lang, and any notable Authors. Special List (5000 Books Wanted) free.—BAKERS, John Bright St., Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

GRAHAM'S TYPE-WRITING OFFICE.—23, COCKSPUR STREET, PAUL MALL.—All kind of difficult MSS. receive careful attention from experienced workers. Specimen page and references sent if desired. Over five years' experience.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss Mason, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY."

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR.

LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, and FESTINIOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHILTERNHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 21 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd. The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

Principal—G. CAREY FOSTER, F.R.S.
Deans—(Prof. W. P. KER, M.A., LL.D. (Arts and Laws).
(Prof. VAUGHAN HARLEY, M.D. (Science).

The SECOND TERM of the FACULTIES of ARTS and LAWS, and of SCIENCE begins TUESDAY, JANUARY 15th. Among the Special Courses that will begin in the Second Term are—

- (1) "Currency, Banking, and the great Speculative Markets." By Prof. FOSWILL.
- (2) "Walthar von der Vogelweide and other German Poets." By Prof. FOSWILL.
- (3) "Dante's 'Il Convito'." By Prof. BUTLER.

For particulars of the above, for General and Special Prospectuses, apply to T. GREGORY FOSTER, Ph.D., Secretary.

SIR JOHN CASS'S TECHNICAL INSTITUTE, Jewry Street, Aldgate, E.C.

The Governors of Sir John Cass's Foundation are prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for the APPOINTMENT of PRINCIPAL of their new Technical Institute in Jewry Street, Aldgate, which will rank as a London Polytechnic. The Principal will be required to devote his whole time to the work of the Institution, his full duties commencing on 1st September, 1901. The stipend will be £500 a year, and a special arrangement will be made in order to secure the advice and assistance of the Principal elected, in the equipment of the Institution during the next few months.

Applications must be received on or before the 28th day of January, 1901, on forms which, together with full particulars respecting the duties of the appointment, can be obtained on application to the undersigned.

W. H. DAVISON,

Clerk to Sir John Cass's Foundation.

St. Dunstan's Chambers,
10A, Idol Lane, Eastcheap, E.C.

UNIVERSITY of EDINBURGH.LECTURESHIP IN ANCIENT HISTORY.

The University Court of the University of Edinburgh will, on Monday, 15th February, 1901, or some subsequent day, proceed to elect a UNIVERSITY LECTURER on ANCIENT HISTORY. Tenure, three years. Salary, £150 per annum.

The duties of the Lecturer would mainly consist of the delivery in each year of two Honours half-courses of twenty-five Lectures each, in Greek and in Roman History respectively—one of these half courses to be given during part of the Winter Session, and the other in the Summer Session.

Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, not later than Monday, 4th February, 1901, twenty copies of his Application, and twenty copies of any Testimonials he may desire to present. One copy of the Application should be signed. Further particulars on application.

M. C. TAYLOR, Secretary University Court.
University of Edinburgh,
21st December, 1900.

THE WALLACE COLLECTION.

MR. CLAUDE PHILLIPS, the Keeper of the Wallace Gallery, is Writing an important Series of Articles on the Artistic Treasures in that Gallery. The FIRST ARTICLE, with Illustrations after Pictures by Sir Joshua Reynolds, P.R.A., Group, Watteau, Fragonard, appears in the JANUARY NUMBER of "THE ART JOURNAL." Price 1s. 6d.

Publishing Office: 28, Ivy Lane, London, E.C.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s., post free.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes.....full of thought and knowledge and power."

British Weekly.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LIMITED.

21 & 22, Farnival Street, Holborn, London, E.C.

THE DOWNS SCHOOL, SEAFORD, SUSSEX.

Head Mistress—Miss LUCY ROBINSON, M.A.
(Late Second Mistress St. Felix School, Southwold).

References: The Principal of Bedford College, London, The Master of Peterhouse, &c.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms. Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 49, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

MR. SPENCER'S ENLARGED WORK

JUST PUBLISHED, price 6s.

VARIOUS FRAGMENTS,

WITH MANY ADDITIONS.

By HERBERT SPENCER.

Also recently published by the same Author.

SIXTH EDITION, Revised throughout, price 16s.

FIRST PRINCIPLES.

WITH A PORTRAIT.

London: WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta St., W.C.

UNA.

A SONG OF ENGLAND IN THE YEAR NINETEEN HUNDRED.

By WILLIAM GERARD.

3s. 6d. net.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., LTD..

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2% 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½% 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 3 IN PREPARATION.
CATALOGUE No. 1, 1s., and CATALOGUE No. 2, 2s. 6d., may be had on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.
A Large Collection of Fifteenth and Sixteenth Century Books on view.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

14, Henrietta Street, Great Britain, 21, South Frederick St. Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES sent free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S

TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.
DULAU & CO., 7, Soho Square, London, W.

BARGAINS PREVIOUS to RETIRING.

—CHARLES LOWE, New Street, Birmingham, offers few useful volumes of Novels, Travels, Tales, Sketches, Biographies, Magazines, &c., all sound and clean. The lot 25s.; cost about £20.—CHARLES LOWE, New Street, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each given for any Presentation Volumes with Inscriptions written inside by Dickens, Thackeray, Browning, Lamb, Keats, Shelley, Tennyson, Scott, Lane, and any notable Authors. Special List (2,000 Books Wanted) free.—BAKER'S, John Bright St., Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

GRAHAM'S TYPE-WRITING OFFICE,
23, COCKSPUR STREET, PAUL MALL.—All kinds of difficult MSS. receive careful attention from experienced workers. Specimen page and references sent if desired. Over five years' experience.

PROFESSOR HAECKEL'S GREAT WORK.
THE RIDDLE OF THE UNIVERSE at the CLOSE OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. 414 pp., 4s. net; by post, 5s. 4d. (First large Edition nearly exhausted.) London: Watts & Co., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE WALLACE COLLECTION.—Mr. CLAUDE PHILLIPS, the Keeper of the Wallace Gallery, is Writing an important Series of Articles on the Artistic Treasures in that Gallery. THE FIRST ARTICLE, with Illustrations after Pictures by Sir Joshua Reynolds, P. R. A., Greuze, Watteau, Fragonard, appears in the JANUARY NUMBER of "THE ART JOURNAL." Price 1s. 6d.
Publishing Office: 26, Ivy Lane, London, E.C.

ROYAL INSTITUTION of GREAT BRITAIN, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

TUESDAY NEXT, January 15, at 3 o'clock, Professor J. A. EWING, M.A., F.R.S., M.Inst.C.E., Professor of Mechanism and Applied Mechanics, University of Cambridge, FIRST OF SIX LECTURES on "PRACTICAL MECHANICS (Experimentally Treated): First Principles and Modern Illustrations." One Guinea the Course.

THURSDAY, January 17, at 3 o'clock, ARTHUR WILEY, M.A., D.Sc., Lecturer on Biology in Guy's Hospital, FIRST OF THREE LECTURES on "THE ORIGIN OF VERTEBRATE ANIMALS." Half-a-Guinea.

SATURDAY, January 19, at 3 o'clock, Professor R. K. DOUGLAS, Keeper of Oriental Books and Manuscripts, British Museum; Professor of Chinese, King's College, London, FIRST OF TWO LECTURES on "THE GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE OF CHINA." Half-a-Guinea.

Subscription to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

Tickets may be obtained at the Office of the Institution.
FRIDAY, January 18th, at 9 o'clock, Professor DEWAR, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Fuldian Professor of Chemistry, R.I.; on "GASES at the BEGINNING and END of the CENTURY." To these Meetings Members and their Friends only are admitted.

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY
(Incorporated by Royal Charter).

Patron—HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.
President—A. W. WARD, Esq., Litt.D.
THURSDAY, JANUARY 17th, 3 P.M., at ST. MARTIN'S TOWN HALL, Charing Cross, the following Paper will be read: "THE LATER HISTORY OF 'IRON-SIDES'" by C. H. FIRTH, M.A.
HUBERT HALL, Director and Hon. Secretary.
115, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE SCHOOL,
GOWER STREET, W.C.

Head Master—J. LEWIS PATON, Esq., M.A. (formerly Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge).
LENT TERM commences JANUARY 14th.
The School is carried on in strict accordance with the principles laid down by the Founders of University College, and is organised as a First Grade Modern and Classical School.—For Prospectus apply to the Office, Gower Street, W.C.
T. GREGORY FOSTER, B.A., Ph.D., Secretary.

ROYAL ACADEMY of ARTS
WINTER EXHIBITION

IS NOW OPEN DAILY, from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m.
Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d. Season Ticket, 5s.

THE DOWNS SCHOOL,
SEAFORD, SUSSEX.

Head Mistress—Miss LUCY ROBINSON, M.A.
(Late Second Mistress St. Felix School, Southwold).
References: The Principal of Bedford College, London, The Master of Peterhouse, &c.

UNA.

A SONG OF ENGLAND IN THE YEAR NINETEEN HUNDRED.

By WILLIAM GERARD.

3s. 6d. net.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., Ltd.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months, and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE (Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

TO WRITERS and READERS.The Demon of Indigestion.

LACTOPEPTINE IS A DOCTOR'S REMEDY.

RECOMMENDED BY THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.

ENDORSED BY THE PROFESSIONAL PRESS.

SYMPTOMS: The first stage of Dyspepsia is characterised chiefly by a sense of distension in the stomach; by acid eructations and flatulence soon after a meal; by loss of appetite and nausea. The bowels, too, are generally constive, and sometimes irregular. Acute and sudden attacks of Indigestion are consequent on some manifest cause, particularly an overloaded state of the stomach; and when from this source the symptoms generally follow a full meal. There are various uneasy and painful sensations, as oppression and weight at the epigastrium, and heartburn; with the tongue dry and clammy. When the fit of Indigestion occurs during the night, there are frightful dreams and nightmares; severe pains in the stomach and bowels; and various sympathetic affections, as headache; impaired or indistinct vision; noises in the ears and dulness of hearing; and palpitations of the heart, giving rise to fear of heart disease. These attacks are liable to pass into the more confirmed or chronic states of the complaint.

TREATMENT: The treatment of Indigestion has undergone a revolution during the past twenty years. Formerly the cure of this disease was commonly sought in the free use of purgatives, under the mistaken idea that, by giving the system a thorough cleansing, the root of the evil was certain to be reached. A great step towards a more rational course of treatment of Indigestion was obtained in the introduction of Lactopeptine. Lactopeptine is known among the general public as a "doctor's remedy," for the reason that it is universally prescribed by medical men. Lactopeptine will bring about the digestion of food in a manner perfectly identical with that obtained under the influence of the natural gastric juice. All the elements contributing to the composition of gastric juice are known, and their equivalents easily obtainable for the chemist's laboratory. These several component parts of gastric juice are now prepared in the form of Lactopeptine, in powder or tablets, the formula of which is published. Lactopeptine represents, then, the natural gastric juices—i.e., digestive juices of the stomach, pancreas, and salivary glands—and it will, therefore, readily digest by its own action all foods necessary to the recuperation of the human organism.

It must be clear to all that Lactopeptine introduces no foreign or unknown element to the Stomach; Lactopeptine comes rather as a reinforcement to the natural gastric juices than as a substitute for them. "We have no hesitation in affirming," to quote the Physician and Pharmacist, "that Lactopeptine has proved itself to be the most important addition ever made to our pharmacopoeia," and hence the extended use of Lactopeptine by the Medical Profession in cases of Indigestion, Liver and Kidney Disease, Loss of Appetite, Impoverished Blood, General Debility, Constipation, Headache, Nausea, Chronic and Infantile Diarrhoea, Neuralgia arising from Indigestion, Flatulency, and Heartburn.

WHAT CAN BE SIMPLER?

A dose of Lactopeptine taken immediately after eating causes digestion to commence at once, and effects it exactly as it would be effected by the natural fluids of a healthy stomach.

Lactopeptine is prepared in powder and also in the form of small palatable tablets. You can take one, or two or three, as required. No glass is necessary, and no spoon. Simply a tablet. The most perfect and up-to-date form of medicament.

There is a vast difference between a drastic purgative, which acts almost entirely upon the bowels, the effect of which is always followed by constipation, and the mild but efficacious remedy which we have indicated.

NOT A SECRET REMEDY: FORMULA ON EVERY BOTTLE.

experiment with your health: we have done the experimental work for you, and in this respect ranks with Quinine."

At all the Stores and Chemists in the United Kingdom and Colonies, Lactopeptine is obtainable in 1-oz. bottles in Powder or Tablets, price 4s. 6d., also in 1/2-oz. bottles, price 2s. 9d. When ordering do not ask for digestion tablets, but Lactopeptine Powder or Tablets.

"ONE OF THE CERTAINTIES IN MEDICINE."

Schouler's History of the United States of America,

UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

What is it? A critical History of the United States, minutely and graphically describing the inner facts of her heroic colonial struggles, touching upon the organisation of Congress, the welding together of the primitive States into one grand Nation for mutual defence and general welfare; the accessions of the vast territories South, West, and Northwest; the troubles of 1812; the difficulties with Mexico; the Slavery Question, embracing the mainsprings of the Civil War, and which developed the greatest armed conflict the world has ever known.

A Supplementary Volume (the Sixth), covering the Civil War, has lately been added. and of this Volume Three Editions have already been issued.

Schouler's History is not a catch-penny affair, illustrated in glaring colours or with cheaply-made wood-cuts, but a Solid American History, containing a series of maps, showing the boundaries of different periods, presenting at a glance the development and growth of the country. This work is printed on an extra quality of paper in a clear-cut type, and bound in handsome green English buckram stamped with gold, presenting an elegantly finished appearance.

Who wrote it? Professor James Schouler, known as the "Macaulay of America," an author, educator and eminent lawyer, and a lecturer on Law and History in two of the great universities of this country. He spent fifteen years conscientiously seeking through the public and private records and libraries for these facts before a single line was written on this work.

Why prepared? To give to the American people an authentic, comprehensive, readable description of that wonderful period, that the hero's deeds and hard-won fame should live; that colleges, universities, students—in fact, every home might have an unprejudiced American History, that the youth of to-day might be inspired by the noble deeds of their forefathers.

What is said of it.

Trustworthy. "It is trustworthy, interesting, and remarkably impartial."—Chas. E. Howard, Prof. of History, Leland Stanford, Jr., University.
"It is marked by fulness and accuracy of treatment, fairness of judgment and a fine sense of relative values."—Elizabeth Kendall, Associate Prof. of History, Wellesley College.

Incomparable. "The books have so established themselves as scholarly and attractive that it would be vain to compare them for the period treated with any other work in the field."—A. C. McLaughlin, Prof. of History, University of Michigan.

The Best. "The best work covering this period."—J. A. James, Prof. of History Cornell University.

A Necessity. "It will be referred to by scholars who will trust it as an authority, and it will be read by the citizen who wishes a clear outline of political or social events."—The Outlook.
"An excellent work, and fills a place which no other book even pretends to fill."—John Fiske.

Schouler's History is complete in six large octavo volumes, bound in American Buckram.

DODD, MEAD & COMPANY,
372, Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Please mention THE ACADEMY in writing to advertisers.

JARROLD & SONS' LIST.

Maurus Jokai's Famous New Novel.

FOURTH EDITION

THE DAY OF WRATH.

By MAURUS JOKAI. 6s.

Author of "Black Diamonds," "The Green Book," &c.

With specially engraved Photogravure Portrait of Jokai.

"A masterpiece; the characterisation is unusually excellent."—Gentleman.

"There is no novel in which Jokai's all-round forcefulness and daring wealth of colour are more terrific. It is altogether as barbaric, outrageous, and grand as could be imagined, even from the pen of Jokai."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Fergus Hume's Exciting Novel.

A WOMAN'S BURDEN.

By FERGUS HUME. 6s.

Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," "The Lone Inn," &c.

"Cleverly told, and the characters powerfully delineated, the situations startling. It will hold the reader enthralled till the last page is finished."—Aberdeen Free Press.

Curtis Yorke's Latest Novel.

CARPATHIA KNOX.

By CURTIS YORKE. 6s.

With a Charming Photogravure Portrait of the Author.

Author of "That Little Girl," "Hush Once," "Jocelyn Erroll," &c.

"An instructive picture of Northern Spain."—Daily Mail.
"A very graphic and realistic glimpse of Spanish life. Full of freshness and life, and prettily told."—Aberdeen Free Press.

By a Popular Hungarian Author.

ST. PETER'S UMBRELLA.

By KÁLMÁN MIKSZÁTH. 6s.

With an Introduction by R. NISBET BAIRN, a Photogravure Portrait of the Author, and 3 Illustrations.

The Spectator says: "The freshness, geniality, high spirits, and humour of Mikszáth make him a fascinating companion. His peasants and priests, Jews and gentlefolk, are amazingly human. Mikszáth is a born storyteller."

An Exciting Historical Romance.

VIVIAN OF VIRGINIA.

Being the Memoirs of our first Rebellion by John Vivian, of Middle Plantation, Virginia.

By HULBERT FULLER. 6s.

With 10 charming illustrations by Frank T. Merrill.
"Told with a simplicity and verisimilitude which endows the narrative with all the vividness of reality. The characters are real personalities."—Westminster Review.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 & 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

NOW READY.—In cloth gilt, price 6s.

With Illustrations by A. WALLIS MILLS.

A CABINET SECRET.

BY

GUY BOOTHBY.

In paper cover, price 1s.

NEW VOLUME BY THE AUTHOR OF "PINK PAPERS," &c.

BITS OF TURF.

By NATHANIEL GUBBINS.

THREE POPULAR NOVELS.

Price 6s. each.

MORALS AND MILLIONS.

By FLORENCE WARDEN.

Miss CLEVELAND'S COMPANION

By ADELINE SERGEANT.

BROUGHT TO BAY.

By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

F. V. WHITE & CO.,

14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1497. Established 1869.

12 January, 1901.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

MR. E. T. COOK has never sought to advertise himself, and the paragraph in which he announced his retirement from the editorship of the Daily News last Thursday has a dignified impersonality rare in these days. "The editorship of the Daily News," the paragraph ran, "which commenced in February, 1896, comes to an end to-day. The present is the last issue of the paper for which the editor in question will have any responsibility." As our readers are no doubt aware, Mr. Cook's retirement is caused by an impending change in the proprietorship and the views of the paper. He will be succeeded by Mr. R. C. Lehmann, an authority on rowing, and a popular contributor to Punch. Mr. Lehmann is also an author. His publications include Dale and Lehmann's Digest of Overruled Cases, Mr. Punch's Prize Novels, and Conversational Hints to Young Shooters. He will be assisted by Mr. Harold Spender, and by Mr. Massingham who will write the Parliamentary Sketch. Mr. E. T. Cook has been editor of the Westminster and Pall Mall Gazette, and is author of the well-known Popular Handbook to the National Gallery, and of Studies in Ruskin. A perusal of his last leading article in Thursday's Daily News on "The New Liberalism: a Forecast," must have deepened the regret of sound Liberals that the pen of so sincere and clear-sighted a thinker is no longer to write in the service of the journal he has conducted so ably.

MOST people who know German attempt, at some time or other of their lives, to translate Heine. Many of the translations are bad; a few are good. Among the good translations we would certainly include this rendering of one of Heine's best-known songs, which appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette:

Oh, there's a king, a grim old king, with beard both long and gray.

The king is old. The queen is young. Her face is fresh as May.

And there's a lad, a laughing lad, so blithe and debonair, The queen herself has chosen him, her silken train to bear.

How runs the tale, that good grave tale the peasant women tell?

"So both of them were put to death, for loving over well."

THE Book of Job for the waistcoat-pocket. That is certainly a novel idea. It originated with Messrs. Gay & Bird, who have sent us the small red volume, not much larger than a match-box. Facing the title-page is this apt quotation from Pope: "The whole book of Job, with regard both to sublimity of thought and morality, exceeds beyond all comparison the most noble parts of Homer."

SIR MICHAEL FOSTER, Mr. A. W. à Becket, and Mrs. Craigie have been elected to the committee of the Pension Fund originated by the Author. The donations and subscriptions now amount to nearly £1,500.

AN ingenious and industrious correspondent has answered fifty-three out of the fifty-nine questions in the Shakespeare examination paper printed in our last issue. The questions which "stumped" him were:

12. Mention the three blue-eyed characters in Shakespeare.

13. In which play is "young Dizzy" mentioned?

38. Where does Shakespeare mention Glasgow?

44. Where does Shakespeare mention the birch as an instrument of correction?

50. Give any items you can from Perdita's menu for the sheep-shearing.

51. There is a larger than Falstaff in Shakespeare. What was his name?

A CORRESPONDENT asks us what has happened to The Blessed Damosel, as edited by Mr. Coutts and published by Mr. John Lane in "The Flowers of Parnassus" series. The version there given differs greatly from that in general circulation. But the explanation is simple. The Copyright Law made it necessary to reprint the poem from the earliest version—namely, the one printed in the Germ. Comparison between this and the final version shows that Rossetti wrote the poem first with a 'prentice hand and afterwards with finished art. Thus he altered:

Her blue eyes were deeper much

Than a deep water, even,

to the far more melodious:

Her eyes were deeper than the depth

Of water stilled at even.

Again, in the Germ version we have this stanza:

Heard hardly, some of her new friends

Playing at holy games,

Spoke gentle-mouthed, among themselves,

Their virginal chaste names;

And the souls, mounting up to God,

Went by her like thin flames.

Which afterwards became:

Around her, lovers, newly met

'Mid deathless love's acclaims,

Spoke evermore among themselves

Their heart-remembered names;

And the souls, mounting up to God,

Went by her like thin flames.

Many other examples might be quoted to show how much Rossetti had reason to regret the earlier version.

MRS. PAMELA TENNANT, whose country-life book was so much appreciated last year, has compiled a Book of Peace, a collection of passages from the Bible, the Apocrypha, and the Imitation of Christ. They are so arranged as to stand as readings for the morning and evening of each day for the period of four weeks, and to each reading is appended an old carol. Mrs. Tennant's dedication is charming:

Mother, I dedicate this book to thee.

And I would wish that all through it may know

How great thy teaching was, how wide the flow

Of love thou gav'st thy child unceasingly.

Thy strong hands led me to the eternal springs.

And like the grain set on the young child's lip

Thy spirit bids me praise the highest things,

And dwells beside me in close fellowship.

Then like a pilgrim comes my love to thee

With songs immortal held within his scrip.

"THREE things we believe," says the editor of Celtia, the new Pan-Celtic monthly magazine :

That the cultivation of the Celtic languages means the regeneration of the Celtic race ;

That the Celtic race has unlimited resources of power and vitality ;

That the power of the Celtic race, when unified and brought into play, will exert a great and beneficent influence in the advancement of mankind.

On the problems necessary to the attainment of these ideas Celtia will concentrate itself. In the first number we have an interesting summary of the population of the Celtic race in Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and Brittany. The Anglo-Celtic Dictionary, on which so many hopes are set, will be printed serially in Celtia. Its most striking feature is the diversity of Celtic words used for the same things in the Irish, High-Scottish, Manx, Welsh, and Breton forms of the language. The divergence, we are told, is more apparent than real, inasmuch as "in many cases where words were originally identical one synonym has been currently adopted in one country and another in a neighbouring country. Take the familiar instance of the Celtic words for good. In Gaelic we have maith or deagh, the latter being less usual and always prefixed. In Welsh the latter word is the usual one, and appears under the form da, as dyn da, a good man. The other word is also known, its form being mad, but it is less usual. In Breton, however, da is practically unknown, and mad holds the field."

We have received an advance copy of a facsimile reproduction of the first issue of the Dundee Advertiser, dated January 16, 1801. Copies will be presented with the paper on January 16, 1901, to mark the centenary of the paper. The Dundee Weekly Advertiser in 1801 consisted of eight pages, with three wide columns on each page, and was the largest of the Scottish newspapers of that period. At that time most newspapers consisted of four pages only. The first number contained many items of home and foreign news, an interesting summary of events in 1800, and other matter of historical value. The reproduction has been made by photo-zincography, executed at Dundee from the original copy of the paper which forms the first of the continuous file in the possession of the proprietors. A neater newspaper than the Dundee Advertiser of 1801 we have never seen. An advertisement of the General Magazine, No. 1 of a new series, is pleasantly archaic :

The Contents of this Number are.

1ft. MISCELLANEA PERTHENSIS.

Original Matters.

Letter from Amicus on the premiere entrée of Magazines.

The Kirkward-u, a poem.

Essay on Sensual and Intellectual Enjoyments, by Decius.

Letter from Erasmus on Local Attachments.

EXTRACTS.

Account of James Hay Beattie.

Specimens of Turkish Justice, or rather that of the Mamelukes in Egypt.

Hints of Advice to the Fair Sex.

2d. HOOPER'S RATIONAL RECREATIONS. 24 pages.

3d. VOLTAIRE'S LIFE OF CHARLES XII. 24 pages.

The facsimile extends even to the Three-halfpenny Government stamp.

A WRITER in the "Contributors' Club" of the Atlantic Monthly has some interesting remarks on the inaccuracies of the accurate ; in other words, on the proneness to make mistakes which haunts the most industrious writers. One of the most accurate of copyists has declared that even in his best moods he is sure to make one error in ten pages, and that the average professional copyist makes one error in six pages. The Atlantic writer says that the publishers of the Oxford Bible still offer a guinea for every error detected, and that the guinea is won at least five times a year. He then tosses in the air the mistakes of Macaulay and Shakespeare, and points out that when Keats wrote of "stout Cortez" he must have meant Balboa. That the contemplation of great men's mistakes is a consolation in the presence of one's own we take leave to doubt. For a bad mistake in print there is no comfort ; it seems to blaze in the zenith and shout in the hurricane.

ARPROPOS of our remarks on a certain morbid concentration in An Englishwoman's Love-Letters, a correspondent draws our attention to the extreme opinion of Manzoni, which, though it goes beyond anything we hold ourselves, is of some interest. He said : "I am of the opinion that one must not speak of love in a way to lead others toward that passion. I believe that love is necessary in this world, but also that there will always be a sufficient amount of it : we need not, therefore, take the pains of cultivating it in others, for in cultivating it one helps only to arouse it where it is not wanted. There are other sentiments which the world is in more need of, and that a writer may, according to his ability, spread somewhat more in the hearts of men, such as pity, love of mankind, a kindly disposition, mercifulness, and self-denial. . . . I am so convinced of this that if by a miracle some day I should be inspired with the most eloquent love pages that man has ever written, I should not even take a pen to jot them on paper, so certain am I that I should regret it."

In the January Scribner's Magazine Mr. Robert Bridges has a poem, entitled "A Prayer of Old Age," from which we are impelled to quote these verses :

And now I'm old and worn, and, scarcely seeing

The beauties of Thy work.

I catch faint glimpses of the shadows fleeing

Through valleys in the murk ;

Yet I can feel my way—my mem'ry guides me,

I bear the yoke and smile ;

I'm used to life, and nothing wounds or chides me ;

Lord, let me live awhile !

O Lord, to me the pageant is entrancing—

The march of States and Kings !

I keenly watch the human race advancing

And see Man master Things ;

From him who read the secret of the thunder

And made the lightning kind,

Down to this marvel—all the growing wonder

Of force controlled by Mind.

And this dear land of ours, the freeman's Nation !

Lord, let me live and see

Fulfilment of our fathers' aspiration,

When each man's really free !

When all the strength and skill that move the mountains,

And pile up riches great,

Shall sweeten patriotism at its fountains

And purify the State !

EVERY month in 1901 the Messrs. Harper will publish one of a series of twelve American romances by American authors. These novels in scene and character will represent American conditions in all parts of the country. Their authors will be, for the most part, new writers, young men and young women who see with contemporaneous eyes the life that is going on about them. The first of the series, to be published in January, will be Eastover Court House, a story of rural life in Virginia, by Kenneth Brown. They tell us that Mr. Brown knows his Virginia very thoroughly, and has made a good book about it. Five other stories have been already chosen, and the rest will be taken from MSS. received during the next two or three months.

We are unable to see much merit in the Twentieth Century, a new monthly review issued by Mr. Francis Griffiths. The articles are variously dull, and the book reviews are the worst we have read for some time. The most interesting page occurs in Mr. Cuming Walter's article on "The Magic of John Inglesant," in which Mr. Shorthouse's personality is sketched as follows:

Personally he is one of the most unlikely men to be associated with romance of any kind. He had reached a mature age when John Inglesant was published. Engaged in a most prosaic business in one of the dullest parts of Birmingham, he had never been known to absent himself from it one day during the years that he was engaged upon the composition of his masterpiece. Only a most limited circle of friends knew or suspected that Mr. J. Henry Shorthouse, manufacturer, could write. He had never travelled, and was a most improbable person ever to wish to see any country but his own. In religious circles he was slightly known as an excellent churchwarden to one who has been described as "a difficult Vicar"; and Mr. Shorthouse himself was thought to be narrow in his views, an opinion which is partly confirmed by the extraordinary violence of his denunciation of the Church of Rome in the preface he lately wrote to a volume by the Rev. Arthur Galton. Such, then, is the man who has given the world a romance of singular purity and charm, who has preached tolerance towards all creeds, and who has described foreign lands as if he had drunk in their beauties and absorbed their sweetness during years of leisurely travel or of actual sojourn on the Continent. The inconsistency between the man and his book, between the stay-at-home Birmingham manufacturer and the reveller in golden romance, is simply inexplicable.

Mr. Percy Fitzgerald begins what should prove an interesting account of "the great Douglas case," of which English readers know next to nothing, though they catch a glimpse of it in the scene at Inverary Castle where Boswell was snubbed by the Duchess of Argyll.

SEVERAL more letters on the word "brunch" have reached us. "H." points out a variation of the word in "blunch," and quotes "deeser" as an excellent portmanteau word for deceased-wife's-sister. "Deeser" is said to be one of Calverley's coinages. We have also received a letter on the subject from Ontario, Canada, but its contents have been anticipated.

Henley and Burns, or the Critic Censured, is a collection of papers replying to Mr. Henley's biography of Burns. They have been collected and edited, with unconscionable delay, by Mr. John D. Ross. We have no intention to discuss conceptions of Burns's character. The venom of this collective reply concentrates itself in the verses called "The Penurious Cockney," in which Mr. Henley is made to speak as follows:

Weel up in Scotch, I set mysel' to wark
To strip the Poet to his very sark,
An' gie the world a pictur' o' the Man
An' a' his Doin's—on the cut-throat plan.
My book, gat up regardless o' expense,
Was hailed the book by ilka man o' sense;
Some "half-read" gowks ayont the Tweed might sneer,
An' name mysel' in words no' fit to hear;
I only leuch. The man himsel' was deid—
He couldna reach me, sae I didna heed.

Mr. Henley's next "Ex Libris" should be good reading.

THE Hampstead Annual has again serenely arrived with its suggestions of hill-top beauty and leisure. Literary subjects are few this year, and the most literary, Canon Ainger's paper on Fitzgerald, has least to do with Hampstead. Coventry Patmore was married to Emily Augusta Andrews, "the Angel in the House," at St. John's Church, Hampstead, and fifteen years later Mrs. Patmore died in a cottage at North End. These and other facts connecting Patmore with Hampstead are set forth by an anonymous writer. In the "Hampstead Note Book," Dr. Garnett makes a final and decisive claim for Miss Catherine Fanshawe, as the author of the famous enigma on the letter H, which many people still persist in attributing to Byron. Dr. Garnett says:

I can see nothing to counterbalance the clear and precise statement of Miss Fanshawe herself, preserved in the delightful correspondence of Maria Josepha, first Lady Stanley of Alderley. It is thus introduced by the editor: "In June, 1817, Catherine Fanshawe sent her old friend Serena Holroyd the well-known enigma on the letter H, composed, as she told her, by herself."

On finding that the enigma had been attributed to Lord Byron, Miss Fanshawe wrote to Mrs. Holroyd as follows: "Apropos of Venice and my Lord Byron and of the letter H, I do give it under my hand and seal this 12th day of February, 1819, that, to the best of my belief, the enigma of the letter H was composed, not by the Right Honble. George Lord Byron, but by me."

"CATH. MARIA FANSHAWE."

Oddly enough we received last week an inquiry whether Catherine Fanshawe or Byron wrote the famous lines, "'Twas whispered in heaven, 'twas muttered in hell." Our correspondent's question is answered.

In an interesting article on "The Attraction of Great Men for Cranks," the New York Nation tells some good stories of Huxley and Tennyson. Huxley, who often suffered fools gladly, received the following cablegram from the United States in 1892:

Unless all reason and all nature have deceived me, I have found the truth. It is my intention to cross the ocean to consult with those who have helped me to find it. Shall I be welcome? Please answer at my expense, and God grant we all meet in life on earth.

Huxley's action in this matter is left dark. A pathetic story is told by Hallam Tennyson of his father:

A Waterloo soldier brought twelve large cantos on the battle of Waterloo. The veteran had actually taught himself in his old age to read and write that he might thus commemorate Wellington's great victory. The epic lay for some time under the sofa in my father's study, and was a source of much anxiety to him. How could he go through such a vast poem? One day he mustered up courage and took a portion out. It opened on the heading of a canto: "The Angels encamped above the field of Waterloo." On that day, at least, he "read no more." He gave the author, when he called for his MS., this criticism: "Though great images loom here and there, your poem could not be published as a whole." The old man answered nothing, wrapped up each of the twelve cantos carefully, placed them in a strong oak case, and carried them off. He was asked to come again, but he never came.

The article concludes: "As long as intellectual eminence exists, so long will it be a shining mark for folly, and so long will the intellectually eminent be subject to such alarms as the one which Huxley described in the last year of his life:

I had a letter from a fellow yesterday, to the effect that he had been reading my essays, thought I was just the man to spend a month with, and was coming down by the five o'clock train, attended by his seven children and his mother-in-law! Frost being over, there was lots of boiling water ready for him, but he did not turn up."

Does the use of the type-writer affect literary style? It is like asking "Do tomatoes shorten life?" A writer in the Boston Transcript has views on the subject which he sets forth as follows. We wonder whether any of our readers have observed in themselves the tendency he notes? He says:

As a general thing the typewriter produces a sort of staccato, disconnected, jerky style; to change the metaphor, a fleshless and bony style, and awkward withal. What is written with the machine seldom has the ease and expressiveness that the same author's handwriting might have possessed. The special word-by-word planning that goes with it, be it ever so slight and even unconscious, does get in the way of free expression; and there is a tendency in the writer to think out his sentence less thoroughly, and even to use stereotyped expressions, which fall in more conveniently with one's practice. In spite of all that may be said by operators about the process becoming 'instinctive' after a time, it could not possibly become as completely instinctive as handwriting is unless everybody wrote from childhood with the typewriter, and nothing but the typewriter. And even if everybody did, it might require generations before the operation could become as instinctive with civilised peoples as handwriting is. I am quite aware that many authors who have taken to writing with the machine think that their style has not been affected by it; but are they sure that their friends always agree with them?

MR. W. D. HOWELLS's excursions into verse are not numerous—not so numerous as we should wish. We are glad to find in the January Windsor Magazine a dialect poem from his pen, entitled "Breakfast is My Best Meal," which should appeal to Mr. E. V. Lucas, whose Domesticities (including Breakfast) we noticed in a recent issue. We quote a few lines from Mr. Howells's poem:

My! but my wife was a cook; and the breakfasts she used to get
The first years we was married, I can smell 'em and taste
'em yet;
Corn cake light as a feather, and buckwheats thin as lace
And crisp as cracklin'; and steak that you couldn't have the face
To compare any steak over here to; and chicken fried
Maryland style—I couldn't get through the bill if I tried.
And then, her waffles! My! She'd kind of slip in a few Between the ham and the chicken—you know how women'll do—
For a sort of little surprise, and, if I was running light,
To take my fancy and give an edge to my appetite.
Done it all herself as long as we was poor, and I tell you
She liked to see me eat as well as mother used to do;
I reckon she went ahead of mother some, if the truth was known;
And everything she touched she give a taste of her own.

THE Journal of the Ruskin Union has been incorporated with Saint George, which enters this month on its fourth volume.

Bibliographical.

POOR Harriet Martineau! A literary gossipier has just been confessing that he is wholly unacquainted with her writings. He opines, too, that her name survives "by entanglement with greater names." Now, that is not quite fair to the good lady. I find that so recently as 1899 there was a new edition of Miss Martineau's Feats on the Fiord, of which, also, there had been fresh "impressions" in 1895, 1883, and 1882. In 1895 her Crofton Boys was reprinted, and a like distinction was conferred in 1886 upon her Hour and the Man. Some half-dozen other publications of hers have also been reproduced within the last decade or two. She hardly belongs, of course, to the permanent in literature, but she has an historic interest. Every student should, at least, dip into her Dserbrook; and there is some interesting matter in her book of Biographical Sketches (reprinted, if I remember rightly, from the Daily News). Much has happened since Harriet Martineau died; but by those concerned with literary people and matters she cannot properly be neglected entirely.

The editor-designate of the Daily News is most widely known, perhaps, as an authority on rowing. Mr. Lehmann edited a book on that subject in 1897. His first publication, however, was in 1890, when his Harry Fludger at Cambridge came out anonymously. A year later he collected some of his contributions to the Granta, and issued them under the title of In Cambridge Courts. That book, I remember, had some very pretty views, photographic and otherwise, of 'Varsity buildings, and so forth. In 1892 came The Billsbury Election, and Other Papers from "Punch" (and the Granta). Both volumes contained prose and verse. In 1892, also, appeared Mr. Punch's Prize Novels, which was followed, in 1894, by Conversational Hints for Young Shooters. This list exhausts, I fancy, Mr. Lehmann's additions to contemporary literature.

Messrs. Chatto's announcement of a new issue of Wilkie Collins's Dead Secret is one more proof that Collins retains a large measure of his original popularity. He has by no means been "cut out" by the rising young romancists of our day. During the past decade scarcely a year has passed without a revival of one of his dramatic stories. Thus, in 1891, Blind Love and The Legacy of Cain; in 1894 (and 1896), The Woman in White; in 1895 (and 1896 and 1897), The Moonstone; in 1896 (and 1897), Antonina; in 1897, Basil, and Man and Wife; in 1898, Hide and Seek; in 1899, The Dead Secret and The Guilty River. All this indicates vitality; "the boys of the old brigade" are not yet wholly played out.

Mr. H. E. Scudder, it appears, is to write the authorised official biography of J. R. Lowell. But is any such work really wanted? Surely the Correspondence (in two volumes), published in 1893, is a quite sufficient record in itself? Moreover, Mr. F. H. Underwood compiled a memoir of Lowell which, issued originally in 1882, was reprinted in 1893 and 1895, and is, therefore, presumably acceptable to Lowell's admirers. It is a mistake to make too much of Lowell. His Biglow Papers and Fable for Critics are assured, of course, of continued recognition, and he produced a good deal of thoughtful literary criticism; but very little of his verse can live, and, altogether, the grounds for a big biography are, me judice, lacking.

The new story by Miss Edna Lyall which one of the religious weeklies is so widely advertising will not be in every respect novel to the public. It is to be presumed that In Spite of All will prove to be identical in plot, and to some extent perhaps in dialogue, with Miss Lyall's play, similarly entitled, of which some performances were given last year at the Comedy Theatre. It was a costume play, I remember, and, naturally, of a romantic nature.

Mr. A. D. Innes, who has just been appointed to a high post in the hierarchy of La Belle Sauvage Yard, has been not only a publisher, but an author. He first came to the front with a little book called Seers and Singers: a Study of Five English Poets (1893). Verse Translations from Greek and Latin Poets followed in 1894; to 1895 belongs his Britain and her Rivals in the Eighteenth Century; and in 1898 he edited and annotated Macaulay's essay on Bunyan. Nor is this by any means all his output.

It is said that Mrs. Esther Wood is to contribute biographico-critical introductions to an edition of George Eliot's novels which is about to be published by an American firm. This lady is already known in the world of readers as the author of an attractive volume on Dante Rossetti and the Pre-Raphaelite Movement, published some half-dozen years ago.

Before the late Ignatius Donnelly hurled his Great Cryptogram at the head of Shakespearean students, he had published in this country two books, entitled respectively Atlantis, the Antediluvian World, and Ragnarok, the Age of Fire and Gravel. I imagine, however, that these had no very great circulation over here. Since the Cryptogram (1888) we have had from the same writer Cæsar's Column (1891), Doctor Huguet (a novel, 1891), and Golden Bottle: Ephraim Benezat of Kansas (1892)—works of which I am obliged to confess my ignorance.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Brute Psychology.

Animal Behaviour. By C. Lloyd Morgan, F.R.S. (Arnold. 10s. 6d.)

MR. LLOYD MORGAN has written so often and so well on the habits and the psychology of animals that one turns with interest to any new book that comes from his pen. The present volume is not quite a new book, and that is our chief regret. It arose from an attempt to revise Animal Life and Intelligence for a second edition, and portions of that and of other works by the author are incorporated with it. But in the main the present may be regarded as a new work, and it will be welcome even to those who are familiar with its predecessors.

It deals with problems which arise in connexion with the wide and indefinite subject generally known as Animal Instinct. It is a subject which, in the hands of the careless writer, the sentimentalist or the doctrinaire, leads straight to absurdity or arid dogmatism. The special merit of Mr. Lloyd Morgan lies in the fact that he belongs to none of these classes. He is cautious, tentative, frank, as well as being a competent psychologist and a trained observer. We are always coming across expressions such as this—"I cannot answer these questions, and am of opinion that much detailed observation is yet needed before we can do much more than speculate in the matter." Now that is the only honest and sane attitude in face of many problems we encounter with regard to what is loosely called instinct. In view of the dogmatism of both biologists and psychologists in the past, it is no small advantage to a student to meet with a writer like the Principal of University College, Bristol, who, knowing all that is to be known on the subject at present, declines to commit himself. The only disputable point on which we think he goes too far towards committing himself is that of the origin of instinct. He seems to us to have gone beyond what was necessary in accepting the fashionable Weismannism. Twenty or thirty years ago nearly every evolutionist was more or less of a Lamarckian. To-day they have 'verted in a flock to the new gospel according to Weismann. It has always seemed to us unfortunate that Darwin's work was accepted with so little detailed criticism in the 'sixties. Men went about preaching it like a new religion; people accepted it freely as the converts of a Xavier did its Catholic faith. But there was only a very moderate amount of detailed criticism based on fresh observation and experiment. Weismann's germ-plasm hypothesis is being treated in somewhat the same way. Huge masses of hypothesis, with a very slight basis of fact, have been cheerfully accepted; and when a difficulty has occurred a new subsidiary hypothesis has been promptly provided. That Weismann is for the most part right may be true; but it is not only unproved, the first steps towards proof have yet to be taken.

Prof. Lloyd Morgan and Prof. Mark Baldwin have, severally and jointly, invented a modification of Weismann's hypothesis, which seems to deserve somewhat more notice than it has yet obtained. It is difficult to express in a few words, but the main lines are these: While habits acquired by the individual cannot be transmitted, there is yet a very real causal connexion between such acquired habits and instinct. Habits are of great importance in helping to determine which congenital variations are to survive. Those (so to speak) casual variations in the individual which coincide in direction with his acquired habits tend to be confirmed. Those which conflict with acquired habits put the individual in a less advantageous position than the normal individual, and distinctly in a less fortunate position than the individual with congenital variations which, on the whole, are favourable to the acquired habits. This doctrine of "the natural selection of coincident variations" (which has been unfortunately called by the meaningless name of Organic Selection) seems well worth careful experimental investigation.

The author's definition of instinct is strictly biological. The name is used to cover "those complex groups of co-ordinated acts which are, on their first occurrence, independent of experience, which lead to the well-being of the individual and the race, which are due to the co-operation of external and internal stimuli, which are similarly performed by all the members of the same more or less restricted group of animals, but which are subject to variation and to subsequent modification under the guidance of experience." Thus, Prof. Morgan occupies a midway position between those who regard instinct as purely mechanical, without any real relation to consciousness, and those who regard it as having much the same character as acquired habit. He objects to the practical identification by Wundt of instinctive with habitual actions. The acts we call instinctive have such a marked character that, whatever view we take of their origin, we ought not to class them as a subdivision of habitual actions. Again our author insists, rightly as we believe, that what is inherited is not a kind of consciousness, but instinctive co-ordination. It is not instinctive knowledge, but instinctive capacity for a particular motor response. "A chick pecks at a grain when it is at a suitable distance, not because instinct provides him with the knowledge that this is something to be seized and tested, but because he cannot help doing so. He is so organised that this stimulus produces this result, through an organic co-ordination that is independent of conscious knowledge or experience." While reference to consciousness is excluded from his definition, Prof. Lloyd Morgan is careful to emphasise the fact that "instinctive behaviour is not a mere matter of unconscious automatism." In the higher insects, and in animals above them, some degree of consciousness probably accompanies and modifies instinctive actions. The most careful observers seem to hold this view, though they are far from suggesting that this faint form of sentience is at all like the reason and desire whose results it simulates. Two stages are recognised by our author. By intelligent behaviour he understands behaviour in what adjustment of conduct to circumstances is brought about by individual experience. But he distinguishes it sharply from rational behaviour, which involves the employment of abstract notions. Like Wundt, Stout, and other authorities, he maintains that there is no evidence to show that animals reason. Their intelligent behaviour is guided by particular sequences, not by concepts. They gain what we call their end by the process of casual trial and error. Instinctive and unintended movements lead to a result which gives them pleasure. The association is confirmed by repetition. What begins as a lucky chance becomes a particular routine. The nature of the thing to be done is not considered, nor is a course adopted because it is seen to meet the conditions. Even imitation—that is, reflective and deliberate imitation—is practically impossible for animals as a means of initiating conduct. This view of the nature of animal intelligence is confirmed by Dr. Lloyd Morgan's own well-known experiments with his fox-terrier (here briefly retold) and by Dr. Thorndike's experiments on cats, already known to English students of psychology by the quotations in Dr. Stout's Manual.

The sections on the intercommunication of animals, on their play and on their courtship, is admirably clear and well-balanced; although short, it contains the pith of a good deal of recent work on the subjects handled. Thus Dr. Groos's book is drawn on with effect. We are glad to see such a well-argued protest against the loose talk current about "animal ethics." The protest has been made before by the author, but it cannot be made too often. Animals are, so far as we know, incapable of ethical ideals, because they are, so far as we know, incapable of abstract ideas of any kind. Their consciousness is, as Dr. Stout says, at "the perceptual level." We can only say "that the perceptual data are given in animal experience from which, in ideational sublimation, ethical ideals may be derived by a process of reflection and generalisation."

The book is full of interesting summaries of recent studies of animal habits. The observations of the author himself on dogs, chickens, limpets, and other animals are well known, and he has given many others. Not the least interesting are those of Dr. and Mrs. Peckham, the American naturalists, on the habits of the solitary wasps. We notice that they go far to dispose of the statement popularised by Romanes that certain solitary wasps habitually paralyse their victims by stinging them in "their chief nerve centres," so that they may remain alive, though incapable of motion, until the larvæ of the wasps are hatched and ready to eat them. This standard example ought to disappear even from the popular scientific lecture.

We have praised the book at such length that little space is left for grumbling. The treatment of the interesting subject of animal tradition seems a little disappointing. And, finally, Prof. Morgan leaves us feeling a little uncertain as to the exact position he assigns to consciousness. He is anxious to assure us that he does not regard consciousness as (to use Huxley's words) the "steam-whistle which accompanies the work of a locomotive engine without influence on the machinery." He rightly says: "It is nothing less than pure assumption to say that the consciousness which is admitted to be present has practically no effect whatever upon the behaviour"; and he asks how we can account, "on evolutionary grounds, for the existence of a useless adjunct to neutral process." Yet he maintains that volition, desire, and all forms of consciousness, must be regarded as lying outside the pale of scientific inquiry. "Neither will, nor impulse, nor instinct, nor consciousness itself should be introduced into any scientific description or explanation of phenomena as a cause of their existence or being, for as such it does not enter into the sequence of events." He does not deny that consciousness may be a cause. But consciousness as a cause lies outside of science. Yes, if by science we mean only physical science. But by science we ought to mean all organised, definite, verified knowledge—and we cannot exclude consciousness as a cause from psychology, history, and sociology. The doctrine that human consciousness has no causal efficiency is, perhaps, the most daring contradiction of experience which has come from the workshop of the metaphysician. On the whole, Mr. Lloyd Morgan seems to fully accept the view that physical facts and physiological facts are in causal relation. But he shows a suspicious leaning towards a somewhat crude form of Monism, and, as Dr. Ward has shown in his recent book, the doctrine of "two aspects" easily slips into the doctrine of mere "conscious automatism," occasionally preached by Huxley. The name of Dr. Ward does not occur in Mr. Lloyd Morgan's volume. If he had been familiar with the Cambridge professor's searching criticism of the Monistic position we do not think he would have left certain parts of his final chapter quite as they stand.

The Uprising of Dives.

The English Utilitarians. By Leslie Stephen. 3 vols. (Duckworth & Co.)

"THE philosophers who call themselves Utilitarians and whom others generally call Benthamites," to use Macaulay's phrase, have had throughout the luck which seems to attach itself to mediocrities, and in nothing have they been so lucky as in their biographer. Macaulay himself hated them as bitterly as he hated any human being, and since his death there has been no one, perhaps, but Mr. Leslie Stephen who could have so clothed their dry bones with life as to have given us three handsome volumes about them with hardly a dull page. How far this was a pious duty—for he tells us that he was himself once a disciple of their school—and how far it was due to his having written the History of Thought in the Eighteenth Century, one cannot say.

The feat is the more wonderful that the Utilitarian school was born under the most sordid and Philistine auspices that it is possible to conceive. A century ago, as Mr. Stephen has made plain to us, there was only one class in England that was discontented. The landed gentry, both titled or untitled, had succeeded in most thoroughly curbing the royal power that across the Channel had gained the upper hand with such fatal results, and were now the supreme masters of the country with no troubles immediately ahead worse than a few quarrels over the spoils. The peasantry, who then formed nearly the whole of the wage-earning class, were thoroughly attached to their natural leaders, and not intellectually capable of wishing for anything better than a continuance of the prosperity that quiet times and good prices had brought to them. Nor had the middle class at first sight much to grumble at. Steam manufactures, the cotton trade, collieries had just entered on their wonderful career, canals and mail-coaches had been started everywhere, and the general average of comfort was higher than it had ever been before. Nor were the social disqualifications that pressed so hardly upon the Continental bourgeois present to the Englishman of the same class. Many of the poorer nobility were as ready then as since to repair their fortunes by a rich marriage with those socially below them, and there was no obstacle to any rich merchant or trader acquiring land and thus laying the foundation of a county family. All the professions were open to the sons of the trading classes as well as to those of the landed gentry, and many of them had risen to distinction in the Church or at the Bar. Only from political power—which, in those days, meant the distribution of places and sinecures—were they shut out, and their right to share in these good things they determined to assert. The demand for legislative reform in such matters as jurisprudence put forward by a few writers like Montesquieu and Beccaria happened to be introduced to them at the right time, and immediately the whole of the middle class thought they saw in it the handle that they wanted. Thus the Utilitarian school was born.

The movement, which but for the check afforded by the French Revolution and the war which followed would probably have met with more immediate success than it did, showed at the same time most of the good and bad points of the English character. Moderate in all things, its partisans neither indulged in Utopian visions of a new heaven and a new earth, nor talked high-flown nonsense about the natural equality and brotherhood of man. They merely insisted that the one end and aim of government was that of utility, or, as they put it, that the greatest happiness of the greater number should be the only thing to be looked to by the legislator. But with the unconscious desire at the same time to serve God and Mammon, which other nations so often mistake for conscious tartufferie, they thought that they themselves were the only persons in the community with sufficient wisdom and virtue to realise this aim, and that the fact had merely to be stated for all the rest of the community to recognise the fact. "The wise and good," says Bentham's most trusted lieutenant in a passage that Mr. Stephen here quotes, "in any class of men do, for all general purposes, govern the rest"; and the middle class, we hear from the same authority, are so transparently wise and good that the lower class "account it an honour" to adopt their opinions. Hence, however large a voice the governed may have in the making of the laws—or, as Mr. Stephen says, however far the franchise is extended—it is the middle class that will ultimately decide upon all political questions. There never was a more egregious mistake made.

For the development of these theories, and the part played in their propagation by Bentham, James Mill, the historian of British India, and his son, the late John Stuart Mill, whom Mr. Stephen considers the three successive leaders of the Utilitarians, we must refer the reader to Mr. Stephen's luminous pages. We prefer rather to dwell on the good things which we enjoy in great part, at all events, from the application of their principles. Such are, to give the barest catalogue, the reform of the judicature, including therein the abolition of the worst abuses of the Court of Chancery, and the greater mildness of criminal legislation, the improved treatment of prisoners, free trade, the abolition of excessive pensions, and the increased attention given to education. Other of their aspirations, such as the complete reform of the land laws, are not yet realised, but probably will be at no distant date. On yet others, such as the complete social and political equality of woman with man, the community has not yet made up its mind. Yet those reforms that they have already carried make up a fair show, and go some way towards justifying the existence of the Utilitarian school.

Yet these things are but the parerga, or by-works, of the Benthamites. The one goal to which they have at all times consistently pressed forward has been the reform of government itself, by the admission of the masses to political power. To gain this, they have shrunk from no alliances, they have set aside patriotism—and we have Mr. Stephen's word for it—and have been content to yoke Catholics, Unitarians, and Agnostics together in one ill-assorted and discordant team. In the passing of the Reform Bills of 1832 and 1868, and in the extension of the representative system to local government, these manœuvres were crowned with success, and they appeared to have attained the object of their fondest hopes. Yet the gods, after their fashion, granted their prayers in part only, and in what the early Utilitarians considered the necessary complement, if not the very pith and kernel of their scheme, they have failed utterly. The middle-classes are as far as ever they were from being the exclusive rulers of the country, and Dives was no sooner seated on the throne than he had to make room beside him for Lazarus. It even seems at present as if Lazarus, instead of looking for leading to that "middle rank" in which alone, according to the fathers of the Benthamite sect, wisdom and virtue were to be found in pre-eminence, was divided between again paying allegiance to those ideals from which Dives had tried in vain to wean him, and plunging into Socialistic schemes having for their object the plunder of Dives himself. Thus are the best-laid plans of man brought to nought.

Four Books of Verse.

Odes. By Laurence Binyon. (Unicorn Press.)

The Professor, and Other Poems. By A. C. Benson. (John Lane.)

Love's Argument, and Other Poems. By Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Wings. By Margaret Ethel Ashton. (Kegan Paul.)

DIFFUSENESS is Mr. Binyon's enemy. Many of these Odes are impermissibly long; indeed, so long, and of such constructive, or want of constructive, design, that the term "Ode" becomes a mere courtesy title. And that is a pity, because some of Mr. Binyon's best work has gone into them. Wherever he observes the limits and design of the Ode he is successful. Nothing that he has yet written, we think, is so fine in classic beauty of diction and sweetness of fancy as "The Dryad." We would fain quote it entire, were it not too long; and choice among its equal stanzas is difficult. But we will adventure:

Ah, yet the nymph's white feet have surely stayed
Beside the spring; how solitary fair
Shines and trembles there
White narcissus bloom!
By lichen'd gray stones, where the glancing stream
Swerves over into green and mossy gloom,
Their snowy frail flames on the ripple gleam
And all the place illumine.
Surely her feet a moment rested here!
Nerving her hand upon a pliant branch,
She paused, then listened, and then glided on Half-turned in lovely fear;
And her young shoulder shone
Like moonbeams that wet sands, foam-bordered, blanch,
A sight to stay the beating of the breast!
Alas! but mortal eyes may never know
That beauty! Hark! what bird above his nest
So rapturously sings? Ah, thou wilt tell,
Thou perfect flower, whither her footsteps go,
And all her thoughts, pure flower, for thou know'st well.

The whole of the Ode is on this level; and we trust the extract will be sufficient to send readers to a book which contains some of Mr. Binyon's excellent poetry.

Mr. Benson's volume is not, as a whole, in his best vein—which, as readers know, is thoughtful and full of felicitousness. One would surmise, from some of the poems, that illness had abated the emotional pulse without which the wing of poetry flags. But here and there he finds himself, as in this poem:

FATIDICA.

Oh! I had thought to find some haggard, stern,
Sad prophetess, with dim and cloudy brows,
With eyes like winter suns, that under boughs
Knotted and black, in frosty silence burn.

But thou, methinks, art delicate and fair,
With childish hand, and gracious pitying eye,
Too sweet to rend the veils of mystery,
And solve the stubborn riddle of despair!

Yet suddenly, through guarded lips, breaks forth
A smile that ripples all the faith of death,
And penetrates and glorifies my fears;
As icy stars that shiver from the north,
Frosting my sleeve, at touch of human breath
Fall and dissolve, and tremble into tears.

Admirably phrased, too, is this stanza from Silence:

Grave, indifferent, slow,
Over the sodden sand,
Wave after wave, as I go,
Flounders and arches stiff,
Then like a hollowed hand,
Flaps, and the thin tides run
In a blanket of foam to the cliff,
Under a shrouded sun.

Altogether, in spite of the comparatively unfavourable opinion we have passed upon it, Mr. Benson's book has its own recompense for those who will "observingly distil it out."

In Miss Fowler's volume, ornamented with a photograph portrait of the author, there are "secular verses," "sacred verses," and "sonnets." It is curious, by the way, that Miss Fowler should call her rhymes "poems" on the title-page, while employing a more correct and modest designation within the book. Of the three divisions, we much prefer the secular to the sacred; the sonnets are quite negligible. Miss Fowler's sacred muse has two moods: the babbling mood and the big-drum mood. (We do not use these phrases with any other intent than to be descriptive.) Here is an example of the former:

Summer now is over,
Winter draweth near;
Soon the snow will cover
All the landscape drear;

Faded leaves are lying
Underneath the trees,
And a sound of sighing
Mingles with the breeze.

In such manner Miss Fowler begins "An Autumn Hymn." The big-drum style is very different. Here is the conclusion of "A Hymn of Praise":

Swear, ye English nation, that His Word shall light and guide you,
That His kingdom and His righteousness shall be the ends ye seek!

Ye shall spread from shore to shore,
Till the sea shall be no more,
As destroyers of the wicked and defenders of the weak.
If ye scorn to sell your birthright whatsoever may betide
you—

If ye follow in full daylight where at dawn your fathers trod—

Ye shall go from strength to strength,
Till it comes to pass at length
That the whole world honours England because England honours God.

The sentiment expressed at large in this "hymn" is, to be frank, entirely deplorable. The facile patriotism of the Pavilion and the Tivoli is contemptible enough, but when Christian piety is smudged across it the result cannot be set down in terms of politeness.

The secular verses are more pleasant, and disclose more cleverness. One item in Love's Argument may be esteemed quite satisfactory—"The Country of Conceit," written in a light vein, unambitious, slight, yet in its way a neat achievement. It begins:

Safe screened by hills on either hand
From winter storms and summer heat,
There lies a silly little land—
The Country of Conceit.

There adverse breezes never blow;
And no one tries to teach, forsooth,
The things I do not care to know;
Nor tells unpleasant truth.

If Miss Fowler would confine herself to that vein, avoiding the grandiose, the sacred, and the sentimental, her muse would be justified of its appearance in the periodicals. But even these pretty exercises on the lyra elegantiarum need not be collected and made permanent.

Miss Ashton's verses have many touches of prettiness, of a somewhat conventional sort, that recall the illuminated text and the Easter card. They express sincere, but not very individual, feeling in melodious but not very compelling form. One doubts whether Miss Ashton has quite realised what very difficult material for poetry conventional religious diction has, by dint of constant use, become, or what exceptional temperament is required, as in the case, for instance, of Miss Rossetti, to revitalise it. Here is a not uncharacteristic specimen of Miss Ashton's quality:

THE PERFECT DAY.

Into our lives—a rose amid the thorns,
A Star in night;—there came one perfect day,
Framed all in sunshine, lit with light of love,
And compassed round with blessing ev'ry way.
Hush! let us keep it, Sweet.
By God's own grace—complete.

Now,—though the shadows gather round our path,
Now,—though the darkness rise and hide the light,
Now,—though we never reap life's aftermath,
Nor ever touch again so fair a height,
Now,—let come what come may,
We knew one perfect day.

Sweet,—looking up,—we know that Pain must rise,
And Strife,—to mar that day's most perfect peace;
But,—looking farther,—in God's light of Love
We see the Land where all the discords cease:
And where . . . God grant! . . . we may Relive that Perfect Day.

Tusitala and Tembinok'.

In the South Seas. By the late R. L. Stevenson. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

It is an astonishing thing to read the list of other books by the same author prefixed to this posthumous volume. That Stevenson, in his brief life—comparatively brief—and poor health, should have written so much, is well-nigh incredible. There are twenty-eight works here in his own hand, and four in partnership, to say nothing of the two volumes of Letters. And now comes another: In the South Seas; Being an Account of Experiences and Observations in the Marquesas, Paumotu, and Gilbert Islands, in the Course of Two Cruises on the Yacht "Casco" (1888) and the Schooner "Equator" (1889). It is a very pleasant, if not a very remarkable, book, a series of notes in a diary rather than any attempt at shapely literature; but Stevenson could not be dull, could not be ordinary, and could not be other than himself: hence this book is excellent reading.

Certainly these pages add sensibly to our knowledge of the South Sea folk; but where to our mind they are chiefly valuable is in their account of Tembinok', King of Apemana, in the Gilberts. Tembinok' had enough humour and character to be a figure all ripe to Stevenson's heart and hand, and he stands delightfully embodied in this book. Here is the outward man:

Not long ago he was overgrown with fat, obscured to view, and a burthen to himself. Captains visiting the island advised him to walk; and though it broke the habits of a life and the traditions of his rank, he practised the remedy with benefit. His corpulence is now portable; you would call him lusty rather than fat; but his gait is still dull, stumbling, and elephantine. He neither stops nor hastens, but goes about his business with an implacable deliberation. We could never see him and not be struck with his extraordinary natural means for the theatre: a beaked profile like Dante's in the mask, a mane of long black hair, the eye brilliant, imperious, and inquiring: for certain parts, and to one who could have used it, the face was a fortune. His voice matched it well, being shrill, powerful, and uncanny, with a note like a sea-bird's. When there are no fashions, none to set them, few to follow them if they were set, and none to criticise, he dresses—as Sir Charles Grandison lived—"to his own heart." Now he wears a woman's frock, now a naval uniform; now (and more usually) figures in a masquerade costume of his own design: trousers and a singular jacket with skirt tails, the cut and fit wonderful for island workmanship; the material always handsome, sometimes green velvet, sometimes cardinal red silk. This masquerade becomes him admirably. In the woman's frock he looks ominous and weird beyond belief. I see him now come pacing towards me in the cruel sun, solitary, a figure out of Hoffmann.

Tembinok' is not only king, but also chief trader, architect, historian, poet. He comes of a wonderful royal family, the origin of which was the union of an ancestress and a shark. "I think lie" was Tembinok's comment on the legend to R. L. S.; but his scepticism did not diminish his pride therein. Here are a few passages touching this attractive monarch, gathered from his watchful and appreciative guest's record:

He once ran over to me a list of captains and super-cargoes with whom he had done business, classing them under three heads: "He cheat a litty"—"He cheat plenty"—and "I think he cheat too much." For the first two classes he expressed perfect toleration; sometimes, but not always, for the third.

The workmen set apart by the king to build for the Stevenson settlers did not attend to the business as promised.

Mr. Osbourne landed, found nothing done, and carried his complaint to Tembinok'. He heard it, rose, called for a Winchester, stepped without the royal palisade, and fired two shots in the air. A shot in the air is the first Apemana warning; it has the force of a proclamation in more loquacious countries; and his majesty remarked agreeably that it would make his labourers "mo' bright." In less than thirty minutes, accordingly, the men had mustered, the work was begun, and we were told that we might bring our baggage when we pleased.

And here we have Tembinok' not as warrior but as literary artist:

Or perhaps we came later, fell on a more private hour, and found Tembinok' retired in the house with the favourite, an earthenware spittoon, a leaden inkpot, and a commercial ledger. In the last, lying on his belly, he writes from day to day the uneventful history of his reign; and when thus employed he betrayed a touch of fretfulness on interruption with which I was well able to sympathise. The royal annalist once read me a page or so, translating as he went; but the passage being genealogical, and the author boggling extremely in his version, I own I have been sometimes better entertained. Nor does he confine himself to prose, but touches the lyre too in his leisure moments, and passes for the chief bard of his kingdom, as he is its sole public character, leading architect, and only merchant. His competence, however, does not reach to music; and his verses, when they are ready, are taught to a professional musician, who sets them and instructs the chorus. Asked what his songs were about, Tembinok' replied, "Sweethearts and trees and the sea. Not all the same true, all the same lie." For a condensed view of lyrical poetry (except that he seems to have forgot the stars and flowers) this would be hard to mend.

In the South Seas has other things than the study of Apemana's king, but to us it is valuable chiefly for that. Among the peculiarities of the Marquesans, we might note, is admiration for the portrait of Mr. Andrew Lang, as contained in the Stevenson album.

The Soul of a Christian.

The Soul of a Christian. By Frank Granger. (Methuen. 6s.)

IN his opening chapter Mr. Granger declares his intention of treating his subject-matter in terms of psychology so far as they may be stretched. This is rather bewildering, because it is not obvious at the first blush what other language it would be possible to use in dealing with the soul. Afterwards it becomes clear that what he means is that he purposes to keep clear of the Pauline phraseology in which most of the professors—from Bunyan and Baxter to Whitefield and Cardinal Newman—have tried to narrate and explain their spiritual experiences. Newman, in his early days of inherited evangelicalism, went so far as to codify all that the Scriptures tell of conversion and election, and to judge himself by that standard. He frankly confesses that his own soul passed through no such crisis as seemed to be indicated, and this open confession (in the Apologia) brought upon him a great flight of letters from persons who judged themselves to have experienced that which he yet lacked. There have been men who have taken the matter, not indeed more seriously, but more grievously than Newman; every lunatic asylum can furnish instances. Yet a very simple and even obvious consideration should have sufficed for consolation, viz., that Paul derived his doctrine from the only source to which he had access—to wit, his own experiences; and that two conversions are just as little likely to resemble each other as two faces.

The basic principle of Mr. Granger's treatise—the principle upon which he proceeds to deal with the psychic phenomena of ecstasy, inspiration, illumination, and the like, is the hypothesis of Oversoul, which explains personality "by subordinating it to something higher in which it is included, as the personages of a drama are determined by the action in which they take part." He confesses having thus to be at issue with such writers as Tertullian and Swedenborg and Blake (might we not add Shakespeare?), to whom the individual mind is a microcosm, the arena of contending spirits. "The life of the soul is an imperfect unity. And what we have postulated is a perfect unity, which, therefore, lies beyond the individual experience."

Though the book is seriously written and seriously meant, it is lighted up by constant references to the experiences of spiritual persons of renown and extracts from their writings. One feels in reading them that good people are too generally underrated: they are quite as interesting as the wicked.

Totally irrelevant as it is, we cannot find it in our heart to close this notice without quoting, from the chapter on Ecstasy, the following passage from the autobiography of a backwoods preacher in the days of a great Revival in Kentucky:

A new exercise broke out among us, called the jerks, which was overwhelming in its effect upon the bodies and minds of the people. No matter whether they were saints or sinners, they would be taken with a convulsive jerking all over which they could not by any possibility avoid, and the more they resisted the more they jerked. I have seen more than five hundred persons jerking at one time in my large congregation. Most usually persons taken with the jerks would rise up and dance. Some would run, but could not get away. To see these proud young gentlemen and young ladies, in their silks, jewellery, and prunella from top to toe, take the jerks would often excite my risibilities. The first jerk or so you would see their fine bonnets, caps, and combs fly; and so sudden would be the jerking of the head, that their long, loose hair would crack almost as loud as a waggoner's whip.

Mr. Granger does not, indeed, often "excite our risibilities," but he abounds in an amiable gaiety. We are not prepared to say that his treatise is conclusive; one is tempted to long sometimes for the cut-and-dried syllogisms of the past, which left no room for doubt as to precisely what it was that you were aiming at; but it is stimulating, and well illustrated from the lives of the historic mystics.

A Woman of the Revolution.

The Baroness De Bode: 1775-1803. By William S. Child-Pemberton. (Longmans.)

THESE are documents of the French Revolution. The Baroness De Bode was by birth an Englishwoman, Mary Kynnersley, of Loxley, and her letters, now in the possession of Lord Norton, were mainly written to her sister and his grandmother, Mrs. Adderley, of Coton. They are good letters, bearing the stamp of a strong, clear intelligence, and they certainly help a patient reader to understand why the French noblesse, to which the lady and her husband belonged, fell. The De Bodes were no bad specimens of their class. The Baron was a man of great personal courage, which was notably displayed at a critical moment during the Reign of Terror. His wife had many virtues, besides that of an unconquerable spirit. But through all this correspondence of the fourteen years that preceded 1789 the complete unconsciousness of the imminent situation, of the problems crying out to be solved, is unmistakable. The bride is fêted at the little Rhineland courts:

The Countess La Leyn, who lives about six miles off, came in about eleven o'clock at night, with people with her masked in Orpheus and Uridice. It was vastly pretty—a grand procession of shades—men and women all dressed in white and ivy garlands. She herself as Uridice, in white and silver and very rich diamonds, followed by Orphée and Cupid and a long train of devils, and Pluto in a car drawn by black horses. Lord! Kitty, I am sure you would an use your-self vastly if you were in this country, and I should be the happiest creature in the world if you was with me.

Soon, however, the letters have other topics than masked balls to deal with. The Baroness has a child every year, and endless intrigues begin to place them in the world: one boy is to be a Chevalier of Malta, another a chanoine. In 1788 the Baron obtains the feudal fief of Soultz in Alsace, and the Baroness writes triumphantly of her new and very practical privileges. "We are entirely master," she says; the peasants are "our subjects." She enumerates the droits—of hens, chickens, capons, corn, hay, and potatoes. Every wife must spin them so much hemp or flax in the year; every male and female, every cart and horse, must give them so many days' work; every innkeeper must pay a fee for leave to put his sign up. Of the oppressiveness of these droits, of the slumbering discontent on the very point of breaking out, not a hint. Democratic fervour was hardly to be expected from noblesse, not of the most opulent, engaged in establishing a growing family. But even the ideals of the noblesse itself are evidently tottering when the Baroness can write as she does of the convent of Attenburg in which her sister was abbess. She was known as the "merry abbess." The chanoinesses were all of good birth; they made the vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, and they were "obliged to do their Church duty, and the rest is all mirth and innocent gaiety." They lived "vastly well." The abbess had a coach, and took the chanoinesses out by turns for a drive. "A girl, if she is not monstrously well-married, is much better in such a place." Such was a house of religion in 1788.

Next year the storm broke, and before long the De Bodes were homeless. One may pity them without accepting their own theory of "our own innocence as to all our misfortunes being occasioned without our being in any manner accessory." At any rate the Baroness took her adversity unflinchingly. She set forth alone to seek her fortune in Russia, intrigued for it with Catherine and her crew of favourites, and at last obtained new estates in a land where droits were still to be had for the asking. Asking had never troubled the lady, and one cannot help being amused at the very comprehensive draft thus made on the generosity of the Adderleys:

I trust much to your kindness in being able to make a good collection to set me up in our new house—in all countries they are so generous to the poor unfortunate émigrés. Pray let the Duchess of Cumberland be asked. My case is very extraordinary, and, therefore, we ought to put aside all false shame after we have been plundered of everything as we have been. If the things are not new, so much the better; at least everything should be made up. I will give you a list of things that would be most useful, such as: tent bedsteads, either of wood or iron, that we can take to pieces to pack up; mattresses, pillows, bolsters, sheets, coverlids, blankets, table-cloths, napkins or towels, knives and forks, spoons (pewter ones will do), plates, dishes, soup-dishes, pots and kettles, b-d-curtains and window-curtains, frying-pans and gridirons, ironing-irons, fire-shovels and tongs and pokers and grates, common flat candlesticks and snuffers, pins, needles, pen-knives, garden-knife and sizzors, spinning-wheels for hemp and others for cotton, weaving-shuttels and weaving-comb, spades, bells, a common English girl that is a good dairy maid—we will take care of her, and if she marry give her some land—the seed of Clover and artificial grass, garden seeds of all sorts and all stones of fruit, seeds of forest trees (if 'tis possible), Hop seeds, any books of arts and sciences and trades, physick and Surgery and Apothecary books, natural history and Botany, Agriculture, &c. Doctor Darwin, for example, might send me his Botany, Agriculture, &c., &c. I mention all these articles—perhaps you will find one that will give one thing and one another; take all they offer us, even if it were a fiddle or a pianoforte.

Other New Books.

VIRGIN SAINTS AND MARTYRS. BY S. BARING-GOULD.

Mr. Baring-Gould is an indefatigable book-maker, yet his work never lacks a certain distinction. In this volume, however, we should say that he reaches his lowest level. It is a pity that a man having such marked ability, to say the least of it, should so dash off biographies of such infinitely difficult subjects. In these eighteen sketches—we cannot call them studies—we have the result, no doubt, of much knowledge and research; and the author's strong common sense and logical faculty serve him well in the elimination of legend from fact. Yet the result is largely barren, and that simply because the value of such work must depend upon absorbing sympathy and a most intimate consideration of divergent types. We do not doubt Mr. Baring-Gould's sympathy, but it is too general, too loose, too much the servant, too little the master. The names of St. Cecilia, St. Agnes, St. Bridget, St. Theresa, of Constantia and Febronia, suggest matter too great for such treatment as is here accorded them. The book, in a word, is too easy, too popular. The biographies neither of saints nor martyrs can be of much value as mere compilations. It is true that Mr. Baring-Gould sometimes expresses an opinion with singular vigour, as when he says: "What was the reform to which Theresa devoted all her energies? To induce certain men and women to kick off their shoes." But we submit that this is something more than flippant—we are inclined to call it foolish. Mr. Anger's illustrations to the volume are without value of any kind—mere obtrusions in the text. It is difficult to understand why any attempt at illustration should have been made. These nerveless, conventional figures represent nothing. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE PREACHER'S DICTIONARY. BY G. F. CAVALIER.

We find ourselves unable heartily to approve the application of the snippet system to Theology. A little distinctive gravity of guise and deliberateness of manner becomes it better. And whereas it were not easy to overpraise the diligence and thoroughness with which it is clear Mr. Cavalier has for many years been reading and note-taking, it is impossible not to dread the use that the less lettered preacher may make of his garnered harvest.

Mr. Cavalier writes, in the strictly theological parts of his work—as in the articles on the Eucharist, on Baptism, on Heresy, and the like—from the rather narrow standpoint of a High Church Anglican; and it may be noted that, incidentally, he contrives in an important detail to misstate the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation; but under the more general headings of Labour, Happiness, Care, there is a treasury of tit-bits for such as like to see these things out of their place. Any hope that by such means the clergy might be set in the way of wider reading is frustrated by the lamentable omission to give any reference more precise than the bare name of the author cited.

Fine phrases start to the eyes as the leaves are turned. "The pencil of the Holy Ghost hath laboured more in describing the afflictions of Job than the felicities of Solomon," writes Bacon, under Care; and near him is Ward Beecher with "Many of our cares are God dragging us, and they would end, if we would stand upon our feet and go whither He would have us." "The one intolerable sort of slavery, over which the very gods weep, is the slavery of the strong to the weak; of the great and noble-minded to the small and weak; the slavery of wisdom to folly" is obvious Carlyle; and near at hand on the same subject, Slavery, is Ruskin with "The distinguishing sign of slavery is to have a price and be bought for it." "Life," says Emerson, "is a succession of lessons, which must be lived to be understood. All is riddle, and the key to the riddle is another riddle." And La Bruyère: "Life is a kind of sleep; old men sleep longest and do not wake till they die." "A comedy to him who thinks, a tragedy to him who feels" is the pregnant verdict of Horace Walpole—a strange morsel of pessimism to have found its way into these pages.

Lord Lubbock speculates upon the notion of the eternity of heaven spent in wide tours among the stars. But it is strange to find under Beatific Vision nothing more conclusive than references to Jacob's Ladder, and the dying exclamation of St. Stephen. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s.)

UNDER ENGLAND'S FLAG,
FROM 1804 TO 1809.

BY CAPTAIN
CHARLES BOOTHBY, R.E.

This book will be warmly welcomed by those who remember the same writer's A Prisoner of France, though it is rather disconcerting to have to go back in date. The present volume contains journal extracts and correspondence prior to the record printed in the earlier volume; this method of publication gives the reader a bewildering sense of mental gymnastics. "I was nominated," says the young R.E., "early in 1805, to proceed with a foreign expedition, going, no one knew whither, under the command of Sir James Craig." The expedition appears to have had a roving commission to make itself useful where it could. It first saw fighting at the Battle of Maida, in Calabria, where a French army of 7,500 was defeated by an English force of 4,000. In that engagement the 1st Regiment of French Light Infantry, which attempted a bayonet charge, was practically destroyed. Then followed the siege of Scylla, and, after a recall, Captain Boothby spent some time in frontier inspection in Spain. The Battle of Corunna is fully and vividly described. Though the author was not actively engaged, he was under hot fire with General Hope, who assumed command when Sir John Moore was fatally wounded. Moore was Boothby's hero. In a letter to his father, twelve days after the battle, he writes:

His latest anxiety seemed to be for victory. "Are they beat? Are they beat?" he repeatedly asked. He wished to send some message to General Hope, who had succeeded him in the command. "Hope, Hope," he said at intervals, but could not articulate more. His last words were, "Tell my mother." He could no longer speak, and expired. Was not this the death of a hero and a good man?

The letters and extracts from Captain Boothby's journal here given us have more than the vital interest of history. They reveal a personality of great charm, a character in the making, full of youthful affection and generosity, and at the same time resourceful and fearless. From the first to the last of these letters the growth in strength and perception is very marked. They represent the development of a man of the best type. (Black. 6s.)

THE PEACE CONFERENCE AT THE HAGUE.

BY F. W. HOLLS, D.C.L.

The Hague Conference has completely passed out of sight amid the clash of arms of the past fifteen months, and even at the time it was sitting there were few persons who thought that it was anything more than a Utopian dream. That this notion prevailed was largely due to the attitude maintained by some members of the Conference towards the Press. Journalists were not admitted, and as the diplomatists were unsympathetic and in some cases even hostile to the journalists at the Hague, the newspapers withdrew their representatives, and little notice was taken of the Conference. The author of this book, Mr. Frederick W. Holls, was one of the American members of the Conference, and it is his conviction that at the Hague a great and glorious result was accomplished not only in the humanising of warfare and the codification of the laws of war, but, above all, in the establishment of a permanent International Court of Arbitration. The official records of the Conference have not yet been published in the English language, and Mr. Holls's aim has been to tell what took place with sufficient fullness for the student of International Law without making the book too technical for the general reader. Particular attention has been paid to the action of the British and American Governments and their representatives at the Conference. The work of the various committees is given very fully, and by the help of the Table of Contents and of the Index any point can be referred to at once. In the appendices we have the full text of the Final Act, Treaties, and Declarations adopted by the Peace Conference in French and in English; the General Report of the U.S.A. Commission; and an account of the Hugo Grotius Celebration at Delft, on July 4, 1899. The book is invaluable to students of International Law and publicists generally. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

The timeliness of Captain W. E. Cairnes's book, Lord Roberts in Peace and War: a Biography (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.), is obvious. It is a straightforward, useful, undistinguished work of 331 pages.

Messrs. Horace Marshall & Son's little "Story of the Empire" series now includes The Story of Uganda, by General F. D. Lugard (1s. 6d.). Uganda presents the most advanced native African civilisation, and in this handy book its history, resources, social life, and flora and fauna are outlined by a man whose qualifications for the task are too well known to need indication.

Everyone believes to some extent in graphology, and those who wish to systematise their ordinary graphological instincts can consult many manuals on the subject. The latest is Mr. Richard Dimsdale Stocker's The Language of Handwriting (Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d. net). We always look into such books with terror, for it is hard to see one's character at the mercy of dogmas about the bar of a t or the character of one's i dots. We open this book at the chapter on Important Letters, and read: "The small b is of no special importance; but when the up-stroke is looped, I generally look for strong motherly or fatherly instincts." The many analyses of the signatures of well-known people are an interesting feature of the book, which is evidently the result of long and sincere study. But why is a book like this issued with its leaves uncut?

The "Flowers of Parnassus" series of booklet poems, which Mr. John Lane is publishing under the editorship of Mr. Money-Coutts, is delightful biscuit literature. We now have Suckling's "Ballade Upon a Wedding" very sympathetically illustrated by Mr. Herbert Cole; and "The Nut-Brown Maid" in a new version condensed by the editor from Bishop Percy's rendering, his thirty stanzas being reduced to seventeen. Mr. Coutts remarks: "If, as may be supposed, the original poem has gathered large accretions since the fifteenth or sixteenth century, it is permissible to hope that the removal of obscurities and prolixities may be rather a restoration than a desecration, presenting not a distortion, but a clearer view of the first design."

In Picnics and Suppers (Sonnenschein), Col. A. R. Kennedy-Herbert ("Wyvern") once more demonstrates his mastery of culinary arts. His present book is practically a treatise on cold dishes. Defending himself against a charge of expensiveness often brought against him, the author points out that the use of the ingredients which make for expense and richness in food can always be regulated by taste and discretion, but that he has found that such options are rarely regarded, "the recipe is either passed over or acted upon au pied de la lettre without consideration."

Fiction.

A Princess of Arcady. By Arthur Henry.
(Murray. 6s.)

It would be interesting to attempt to construct from the internal evidence of this American novel a portrait of its author; but we will only say of him here that his knowledge and wisdom of life vastly exceed his experience in letters. The book is curiously, even charmingly, naïve; at the same time it is simple, sincere, and the frank expression of a temperament not without fineness and dignity. A clue to that temperament may be found in the novelist's casual remark (he is addicted to casual remarks): "If ever there was a youth of twenty who, through April, May, and June, was not in love, I am happy to have missed him." A Princess of Arcady is original; the author has borrowed neither his point, his view, nor his methods: it is, indeed, so original in very essence that we could not possibly describe the matter of it except at great length. Its chief characteristic is an intense sympathy with plant life and with children. Here is a portrait of the infant heroine:

In his little companion he had chanced upon a perfect type of the purely feminine. Here were all the traits in embryo which, when preserved and developed, make the ideal woman, who is, above all things, sympathetic and receptive, one in whom the very assumption of an interest possesses a more seductive charm than the violent passion of others; whose sins seem more innocent than the virtues of austerity. Such women have inspired, without design, the achievements which have made epochs and kingdoms famous when the patronage of the throne alone would have failed. It is in the eyes of such that the poet must look for his revelations. They seem to be the unconscious repositories of Nature. Their souls are her secret laboratories, her studios, her hidden places, wherein, undisturbed, she works her masterpieces.

This is good, and there is much else in the book worthy of praise. Yet none of the characters is effectively realised—mainly, we think, because of the author's lack of mere technical skill. While not remarkable as literary art, the novel is distinctly remarkable in other ways. It pricks one's curiosity, and to read it is certainly not to waste time.

From Valet to Ambassador. By Philip Treherne.
(Sands. 6s.)

THERE is some cleverness and a great deal of amusement in this satire on modern manners. The tale is told in the first person by the hero, whose grandfather had "all the disadvantages of a public school and university education." "I was a careful, punctual boy, and kept my clothes tidily; therefore my guardian persuaded me to become a valet, and try and earn an honest livelihood . . . so as to retire in an independent manner when the time should come." Smedson's experiences with the Earl of Northforeland, who finally wrecked himself in the share market, are wittily told, but the main and best part of the book is occupied with his exploits as confidential adviser to Bolingbroke Barnes, the millionaire. Barnes is extravagantly drawn, but not without effectiveness. It is historically reported that ten thousand soldiers were killed in order to get water for the fountains of Versailles. Barnes employed labour about his palaces in like multitudes, though less fatally:

"How do the neighbours like it round here?" I queried.

"Like it, Smedson! That's good; they have to lump it, and I pay all the neighbourhood round, every farm labourer I can get hold of, double wages to come and shovel mud, and I'll bet there are not many landed proprietors who would do the same. The wages I give are so high, that the men can't even get through them in drink. What do you say to that, Smedson? . . . I've had a great testimonial signed by all the brewers in this county to thank me for the enormous custom I've brought them."

At the end of the book the mission to Longalinga, the Central African potentate, is contrived with a genuine feeling for satire, and the interview between the king and the millionaire is especially good. The novel is crude and far too facile, but it seems to us that Philip Treherne, by application and self-restraint, might achieve something reasonably good. He knows his world, and has wit and a gift for narrative.

The Goblin. By Catherine and Florence Foster.
(Wells Gardner. 6s.)

THIS is a clever and diverting novel, crowded with what are called "character-sketches," of life in the country among the upper circles. "The Goblin" is the nickname of the hero, Dick Luttrell, who, with his young brother, Willie, and his friend, Lord Calliard ("Carrots"—a subtle reference to hair), constitute the three musketeers of the tale. We meet the trio first as children, and they are good:

"God can do anything, can't He?"

"Yes, Archie."

Emboldened by the Bishop's confirmation of his own unwavering faith, Archie continued:

"If God said a pig was to jump out of the window, a pig would, wouldn't it?"

And Willie, who walked by faith where his elder and more prosaic brother trod by sight, chimed in:

"Even if there wasn't a pig?"

When they grow up Archie becomes a prig of the pious sort, and marries the heroine, who ought to have married Dick, and Dick marries someone else, and this someone dies, and so on. As a whole the book is too long, unwieldy, and discursive. The plot is unoriginal (hunting-accidents, for example, are now too outworn to serve as the motive-power of a plot), and there are scores of needless incidents. But the talent displayed is everywhere fresh and plentiful. The authors have learnt how to observe, and how to put their own individuality into their work. Sometimes they put that same individuality into the characters: which is an error of art, though often an amusing one. As here:

"Oh, I don't know," he said; "I know the kind of books I don't like. I hate books that 'sparkle with epigram,' where the people talk like a lot of Christy Minstrels, and everybody goes one better than the last in smart sayings. Now I have only said one really clever thing in my life, and I said that by accident, and no one even noticed it, much less said, 'How specially brilliant you are this evening.' Oh, and I hate books about artists and actors; and I hate books that are fond of such words as 'muckle' and 'Hoots'; and I hate books with an 'I' in them. I never know whether the hero's a man or woman, until they make some chance allusion to her abundant tresses or the cut of his trousers; and I hate those present-day adventurous books about 'Sieurs.'"

"'Sewers'?" repeated Willie.

We may say that we have somewhat enjoyed The Goblin.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE WASTREL.

BY MARY ANGELA DICKENS.

In this story by the author of On the Edge of a Precipice we have a weak-kneed hero of forty years. "All his life long Mark Awdrey had never made the faintest attempt to reconcile theory and practice." A study in fecklessness on one side, and villainy on the other. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

A MISSING HERO.

BY MRS. ALEXANDER.

A lively, not too sensational, story by the popular author of The Wooing o't. Anglo-Indian and Anglo-African flavours are given to the story, which involves several love affairs and a "rightful heir" complication. (Chatto. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage) 17/6

„ Quarterly 5/0

„ Price for one issue /5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Nietzsche's Letters.

On the 28th of August, 1900, Friedrich Nietzsche died at Weimar in the arms of his sister Elizabeth. Owing to her tireless husbanding of her brother's strength Nietzsche remained as long as he did among the living. Perhaps no patient, suffering from such a malady, was ever tended with the same ingenious care, the same passionate tenderness. The personal magnetism of his sister, more than her nursing, galvanised the wrecked nerves and relaxed muscles of the sufferer into faint life. Whoever visited him, whatever question was addressed to him, he always kept his eyes fixed searchingly on her. Her face, her low, persuasive voice, her gentle hand, seemed to him the only sure anchor left in a reeling, topsy-turvy world. During his last years she supplied his vision and his mind. They became years of almost perfect inward peace, which they never could have been without this devoted sister's unfailing tact and judicious management. As one looked at Nietzsche, half lying back in his white draperies, which gave him the air of a Brahman priest, his deep-set, sunken eyes gazing out from beneath the bushy brows, the nobility of his inscrutable expression, the leonine, majestic pose of his thinker's head, one had the feeling that this man could never die, but with that fixed outlook would lie there for all eternity.

THUS Dr. Peter Gast, disciple of Nietzsche, and one of the editors of his works, prefaces the first volume of Nietzsche's letters which has just appeared in Germany (Friedrich Nietzsches Gesammelte Briefe. Erster Band. Berlin: Schuster & Loeffler). The whole correspondence will fill four volumes, and this first instalment consists of 211 letters, a few of which have been made public before in periodicals and in Frau Forster Nietzsche's biography of her brother. Nietzsche was a diligent, and sometimes a brilliant, correspondent. The eighty-seven letters addressed to his old schoolfellow, Baron von Gersdorf, reveal much of Nietzsche's inner man; and in them can be traced the evolutions through which this extraordinary mind passed. They begin at Bonn, where the alert young student entered the University after his triumphant career at the classic gymnasium of Pforta. His fastidious refinement revolted from Bier Materialismus, and he abhorred Kneips and all rowdy dissipation. At this time he was troubled about the formation of his style, and wrote to Gersdorf:

"I know it will amuse you when I admit that my chief trouble in preparing my paper on Diogenes Laertes is style—my German style, not to speak of my Latin. The scales have fallen from my eyes, and I find that I have lived too long innocent of style. The categorical imperative: 'Thou shalt and must write!' has awakened me from my dream. I tried hard to write well, and, lo! my pen was paralysed: I could not do it. and it annoyed me. Then I had buzzing in my head the style-admonitions of Lessing, Lichtenberg, and Schopenhauer. It comforted me to reflect that these three authorities one and all maintain that it is difficult to write well, that no man is born with a good style, but it is necessary to work and hew hard wood to attain it. . . . The conviction was born in me, too, that some gay devils must be let loose in my style; I ought, it struck me, to learn to play on it as I would on a piano, and not play only acquired pieces, but free improvisations—free as possible, yet with method in them."

The "gay devils" were, however, kept well in hand till Nietzsche's last period; not till Zarathustra do they begin to dance wildly and unbridled on every page. The young Nietzsche had many enthusiasms. He reared idol after idol in the Walhalla of his affections, all of which in later years the hammer of his invective was to level with the dust. In his early letters he expresses a burning desire to become personally acquainted with the novelist Spielhagen because of his admiration for "Problematische Naturen." He adores Emerson and raves about Schopenhauer. He speaks of the "irrational sublimity" of Lassalles:

"Bismarck is to me an unexhaustible delight," he wrote in 1868. "I read his speeches as I drink strong wine, my tongue lingering over the enjoyment. What you tell me of the machinations of his opponents does not surprise me. There must from necessity be an irreconcilable feud between such a grand nature and all that is petty, narrow-minded, bigoted, and borniert."

At Leipzig, where Nietzsche went from Bonn, he diversified his philological studies with theatre and concert going. Here he met Wagner, who instantly became the absorbing passion of his life. Of what he called afterwards his "Wagner sickness" there is much to be learned in these letters. His satisfaction at being made professor at the University of Basle at the early age of twenty-five was increased by the proximity of Basle to Tribchen, where Wagner was then living. In '72, on the household there being broken up, he writes touchingly:

"Saturday was a day of sad farewells. Tribchen has now ceased to exist. We skulked among its ruins deeply moved. Emotion of parting was everywhere, in the air and in the clouds. The dogs would not eat. If you spoke to the domestics they sobbed. It was inconsolable work packing the manuscripts, books, and letters. These three years which I have passed in the neighbourhood of Tribchen, visiting the Wagners twenty-three times, of what significance are they not? What should I be without them? Happy am I to have been able to perpetuate that dear Tribchen world in my books."

Up till the time of the first Bayreuth Festival, Nietzsche's literary gifts were entirely used in the service of Wagner. Then came on Nietzsche's side the amazing volte-face—in his own words, "the operation which was to cure him of his Wagner disease," and give him a chance of asserting his own individuality. After the apostacy of Menschliches Allzumenschliches, nothing infuriated Wagner more than to hear the name of his former much-loved friend and disciple breathed in his presence. Nietzsche dubbed him the Cagliostro of Music and the great "Schauspieler"; and to the same correspondent whom he had expressed a wish to coach in Wagnerism before he went to Bayreuth, so that he might go thither "not as Gersdorf, but as Friedrich Nietzsche," he talks of the pretentiousness and theatricality of Richard Wagner's music and its decadent influence on the music of the day. Presentation copies of Menschliches Allzumenschliches and Parsifal crossed in the post. It was a crossing of swords. Nietzsche wrote:

"Wagner has sent me Parsifal. My impression on first reading it is that it is more Liszt than Wagner. I am too Greek to tolerate its anti-reformation spirit. It is, in fact, too Christian: sheer phantastic psychology, no flesh and much, too much, blood (especially does the sacramental scene strike me as being full-blooded in the extreme). I have no sympathy with hysterical hussies. Much that is passable in the text would be revolting on the stage. . . . The language sounds like the translation of a foreign tongue."

After this the emancipation from Wagner was complete.

There are constant references to his own works in the later letters dated from the Engadine, the Riviera, and Italy, where Nietzsche went in search of the health he never found. He gloried in Nature, feeling a special affinity with her in a thunderstorm.

"Solitary walks are my refreshment [he wrote in the days of his Basle professorship]. Yesterday there was a grand and mighty Gewitter. I rushed to a mountain in the neighbourhood, and watched the spectacle from a hut where a man was slaughtering two kids. The storm grew and waxed furious, lashing round me ribbons of hail. I felt a curious exaltation, and recognised the fact that we can only understand Nature properly by throwing off our worldly cares and responsibilities, and flying into her arms. What was man to me at that moment, with all his restless little aims and strivings? What the eternal question of Right and Wrong, Good and Evil, Ought and Ought Not? How different these free powers of cloud, lightning, hail unadulterated by ethics; pure, clear Will unblurred by breathings of the intellect."

Zarathustra was mostly composed in the open air; its author, as he climbed the mountains round Sils Maria, in the Engadine, hurled down into abysmal depths the "old tables of the law." "I write with my feet," he said once, "more than with my hand." He was vain of his small ears. "Have you remarked," he asks a correspondent, "that I have the smallest ears possible; perhaps they are the sharpest?" His oft-repeated conviction that he was in advance of his time, a prophet crying in the wilderness, is pathetic. "I am sending you my youngest and wickedest child, Jenseits von Gut und Böse," he wrote from Sils Maria in 1886. "I have just been reading a very serious article on it, headed 'Nietzsche's Dangerous Book.' The writer deals with the contents as if they were dynamite. Not to-day or to-morrow do I expect justice, but centuries hence."

Shortly before the total eclipse of his intellectual powers in 1889 Nietzsche summed himself up characteristically in a letter written to Prof. Knortz, who proposed to lecture on his philosophy at an American University:

The task of giving any true picture of me as thinker, writer, and poet seems to me one beset with insuperable difficulties. The first attempt was made by the Danish critic, George Brandes, who has given a course of lectures on me in Copenhagen, which he assures me has made my name popular in Scandinavia. In France I have a limited circle of admirers, among whom is M. Taine . . . I am certain that my position of 'Immoralist' is too premature for these times, the soil is too unprepared. All thought of propaganda is far from me, and I have not lifted a finger in that direction. I believe my Zarathustra to be the deepest work that exists in the German language and the most perfect, but for that to be the general opinion presupposes whole races yet unborn. I should almost advise people to begin to study me in my last works—Jenseits von Gut und Böse and Genealogie der Moral. To me personally my middle books are the most sympathetic—Morgenröthe and Die Fröhliche Wissenschaft. Die Unzeitgemässen Betrachtungen—youthful productions, in a certain sense—are of the highest importance in the history of my development. . . . The essay against Strauss raised a hurricane; the one on Schopenhauer I especially recommend to be read. For some years of my life which belong to the happiest I was linked in closest intimacy and friendship with Wagner and his wife, Frau Cosima Wagner. If I now belong to those who oppose the Wagnerian movement tooth-and-nail, I am prompted by no personal motive. . . . My books, I fancy, in wealth of psychological experience, in boldness and freeness of expression, belong to the very first rank. In the art of construction and artistry of presentment I fear no comparison. Long affection, confiding familiarity, profound reverence unite me to the German language. Sufficient reason for my inability to read, with few exceptions, any books written in that language.

And in this language, after his mental decease, a whole mushroom literature sprang up on Nietzsche. The fame for which he thought he had been born centuries too soon came to him in his lifetime. But he lay on the verandah, as Dr. Gast says, looking like a Brahman priest in his white draperies, and was unconscious of it.

Surely the irony of fate was never more strikingly exemplified than in the case of Friedrich Nietzsche, who described himself as a "singer of joy and a dancer through life" on the very threshold of a living death.

Things Seen.

Courtesy.

It was Christmas night. We strove to be merry, but with small success; for half of the little company gathered in the dining-room of that foreign hotel had followed the sun in search of health, and two of them sat solitary. One was a Russian—bearded, taciturn, shy; the other was an Englishwoman—of pleasant appearance, probably hypochondriacal, and certainly lonely. As she had been in the hotel for some weeks, the management, following the custom of the country on Christmas Day, had presented her with a bottle of champagne. She sipped it timidly, with a wandering eye, which soon fell upon the Russian, and, as their glances met, she, prompted by a compassionate feeling—for loneliness has no frontier—bowed and raised her glass to a toast. The Russian blushed, and fingered the tumbler of water that stood beside his plate. He waited a moment, as if troubled; then he ordered a bottle of champagne. He filled a glass, rose from his seat, walked across the room, paused before the lonely lady, brought his heels together, raised the glass, and toasted her in his unintelligible tongue. Then he returned to his seat, continued his meal as if the incident had not happened, and soon retired. I observed that his wine had not been touched.

Southerners.

WHITE and sunny, the little Mediterranean seaport dozed in the winter sunshine. Nothing stirred. It was noon. On one side of the shining boulevard the blue waters sparkled, on the other stood the white and green villas and hotels with their sun-blinds tight shut. Nothing stirred save at the far corner of the esplanade, where a date-palm grows. There an awning had been stretched over a primitive roulette table, and around it were gathered a score of men, shielded by a red awning from the winter sun. Gamblers? Yes, of a kind. They were soldiers, and fishermen, and odds and ends of humanity. They staked sous and thin, scraggy cigars, and the place was full of laughter. They laughed when the bank gathered in the stakes, and when a sailor won three cigars he shared them with his mates. The bank was an elderly Frenchman—stout and jovial—who raked in his winnings without moving from his seat, and when the cigars that he had won were out of reach willing hands saved him the trouble of moving. His wife, an old wrinkled woman, sat by his side. She did little else but smile at her husband's witticisms. His tongue was never still. Winning or losing, it was always the same to him. He chaffed the players, and they chaffed him. And they had kind hearts those gaming-table proprietors. For when a child having carefully placed a sou on the red and lost, the old woman took him in her arms, and the old man, with a "There! there!" returned him double his stake. The sun shone, the gamblers laughed, nobody interfered, and nobody seemed any the worse. For it was the South, where the sun always shines, where a man would rather cultivate his carnations than run a newspaper "crusade." And Monsieur and Madame, the proprietors of the gaming-table? Well, he enjoyed his work, and was respected and popular; she helped him and admired him. Ashamed? Oh, no! They are Southerners.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

THE life of Garat, Marie Antoinette's favourite singer, as told by M. Paul Lafond, is an interesting study, since everything belonging to the transitional period between the old and new regimes must ever interest us. Indeed, it is only in contrasting the end of the nineteenth century with the tempestuous beginning in France, and in measuring all that that extraordinary start was destined to herald, that we are in a position to realise how rapidly the world has moved during the last hundred years. M. Paul Lafond is a fervent lover of the ancien régime, and is neither intelligent nor honest enough to admit the old horrors or the new reforms. He can see nothing in the French Revolution but blood and terror, and Louis XVI., least interesting of monarchs, of whom not a wise, or intelligent, or generous act has ever been recorded, is his accepted notion of a hero and a martyr. Hence it follows he must enormously belaud the most fatuous type of artist the world has seen.

Garat, with all his insufferable vanity, his impertinence, his fatuous silliness, had more character than one looks for in a singer. This warbling Garçon had all the defects and qualities of his race, added to those of his art. His passion was dress, and to keep attention fixed upon himself there was no vulgar trick he was incapable of. The idol of the Court first, and afterwards of the Directory salons, he managed to turn all the corners and skirt the precipices of the Terror with smiling grace. He was brave, and had the courage to remain faithful to the queen who had protected him. In spite of his affected suppression of the letter "r," and his invention of the tiresome lisp, his musical genius cannot be disputed. He remains the greatest of French singers without any musical training whatever. "Nobody had in such a degree the large and beautiful lyric declamation, pathos of expression, and science of diction. At the first bar those who had the fortune to hear him were held in admiration; at the twentieth, it was intoxication; at the end of the piece, pure madness. Nobody has shown in his art such spontaneity, imagination, effervescence, and good sense. In a chord he could indicate a thought, an accent, a sentiment. With him the precision of dramatic action was always clear and clean, the expression just, the emotion profound and sober. Impossible to touch the heart and soul more deeply, to move more the nerves and imagination."

But for those who take no interest in Garat himself, the book offers a wide and varied field of instruction. We may eliminate M. Lafond's inept remarks about the Revolution and its consequences, blest consequences which have brought us to-day to the largest and most liberal period of French political existence, and we will find him well documented on the periods of his predilection and of his denunciation. The morals of those days were not edifying, and then, as ever, it was the nobles who set the worst example. The court paid to Garat by women in exalted places passes the limit of credibility. Hearing once a great lady complain of a too quick and violent explosion of love in her regard, Garat exclaimed: "Tiens! that sort of thing happens to women also."

M. Marcel Prévost has written a new novel, L'Heureux Ménage. He has left the tormented and prophetic problem of feminism, and returned to his old favourite study, the feminine soul in bondage to the sweets and bitters of—what shall we call it?—merely physical love. Not that the book has any of the impropriety so sadly familiar in M. Prévost's famous studies of this subject of predilection. Here and there a risky phrase, here and there a too lucid suggestion, and towards the end at least one scene that is none the less shocking in its presentment because the actors happen to be husband and wife. But for the rest a book many will find exceedingly moral because it turns on conjugal love, and most men will approve of, since the wife forgives infidelity after infidelity, and welcomes her husband back from the arms of each newly abandoned mistress with accumulated fervour and without a word of reproach. There are such women, no doubt, and it is quite conceivable that the average male should find them the ideal of wifehood, but I regard their tolerance as affronting and repulsive. The doctrine of pardon may be applied to a big passionate error, which is clothed in the dignity of the inevitable; incorrigible vice itself, such as M. Prévost here treats of, may be accepted with pity and indulgence, but that the kind of love he describes Mme. Royaumont as preserving through such experiences should survive a long wedded life of hideous infidelities is a blot on human judgment and understanding. The book is attractively and rapidly written, and the eternal seducer of woman, Paul, is drawn with a sure and sympathetic hand. It is easy to see that he inspires his creator with affectionate indulgence, which is the reason the wife's undying passion is taken for granted without revolt or surprise. M. Prévost thinks he has explained everything when he has assured us, through the mouth of Mme. Royaumont, that she has "une âme conjugale." The scene of the ultimate (as far as the story goes) reconciliation of the âme conjugale and its volatile mate, will doubtless be found touching to those in sympathy with such a trivial sorrow as the husband's, or such an undignified love as that of the conjugal soul. Paul has discovered that his latest flame has laughed at him behind his back, that he is growing old and has a few new wrinkles or a few less hairs on his faithless head. Cecile, who is about to leave him for ever, in order to console him, abandons her projected flight from his roof, opens her arms, and the only explanation of his conduct he deigns to offer is "Cecile, console-moi." All the other women, she remarks, have only loved a few months of his life, while she has loved all the life of her dear Paul. For sure it is not much of a life to love, but such as it is she has placed her treasure there and must abide by it.

H. L.

The Luck of the Artist.

PEOPLE who do not paint pictures or write stories often express a childlike wonder that anyone should be able to do so; but they fail to recognise how large an element of luck goes to the producing of a successful work of art. The painter and the novelist may well comfort themselves when they have failed by remembering an old Cornish proverb which alleges of everything human that "'tis accordin' as it may drop."

Of course, the man who is to make a success must start with certain gifts. He must also work hard, and produce picture after picture, story after story, which is only fit to put on the fire, in order that he may learn the trade he has chosen to adopt. One has often heard artists wonder when early work has been turned out and inspected what on earth induced them to believe when it was done that they could ever by any possibility do anything worth doing. The wonder is natural enough, but results cannot be expected at once, and the boy who means to become a writer is doing all that can be desired if he is watching life, and trying hard to describe it, and failing, and trying again. It is a very good exercise, even though you have no gift of poetry, to hammer out villanelles and rondeaux. The occupation may be described as mechanical, and so it is, and so you are brought to realise that words are your tools and that you must learn, as a mere preliminary, to use them as Grinling Gibbons used the tools of the wood-carver, or even to play with them as Cinquevalli does with billiard-balls. You must learn to draw, in fact: to see what you want to do, and do it.

Then comes in this question of luck. You may have produced many good things before you are visited by the finest idea that ever man conceived. You are reading some ancient chronicle, let us suppose, and suddenly come on a scrap of tradition, told in half-a-dozen lines, in which you see the germ of a short story. You have to make alterations, and here again you depend on your luck. In such a case there is almost always a jump: you alter detail after detail, and you know the reason in every case. Then you suddenly alter everything, and Heaven alone knows why. For example, in one case a writer conceived the idea of a man being compelled to watch a murder, which, through some seizure of the senses, he was unable to prevent. That was naturally suggested by a true story he had read in the newspapers. Then came the jump. Opposite the original scribble in his note-book he wrote: "The man compelled to watch himself commit a murder." He had had luck, but, even so, he was only half-way to success. He had to write his story.

Again and again the good idea does not come off. Mr. T. C. Gotch, lecturing some time ago, declared that he heartily envied certain pre-Raphaelite painters. There were many things that they took it for granted they could not do: for example, they had not been taught that it was possible for the painter to model hands as they are modelled in "The Child Enthroned." Therefore, when they had conceived an idea, they simply went straight ahead and put it on canvas, and rested from their labours. Nothing is more tragic than the history of some pictures which never got painted. They were roughed in, and they were delightful: one would have been glad to possess them when they had cost the painter only a couple of days' work; and a little later one would have liked to be able to compel the artist to desist. But in one little corner he had not done the utmost that could be done, and so there were further labours. The result of them was that the bit on which he had been working no longer seemed to belong to the picture of which it was part. So there was more work to be done; and the end of it all was waste of paint and another canvas hidden away in the obscurest corner of the studio. Yet one has known the painter get an idea and get it on the canvas apparently with no more difficulty than the thrush seems to experience in singing his morning song. That was when he had the luck.

It is exactly the same with stories. You have done your best to learn how to write, and have some reason for believing that you have not altogether failed. You are blest with an idea, and in a flash you see the story from beginning to end. You even know what will be its length when it is completed. You try to write it, and you fail; and the result is the same after many such efforts. It may be that the essential thing is that you shall take an eminently respectable and everyday man and invest him with an atmosphere of honour, and your failure is due to the fact that you have not effected this. It is intended he should awe a whole village: you have depicted him so badly that he would not scare a child. So the story remains a mere sentence in your note-book, and the years go by until, to all intents and purposes, you have forgotten it. Then comes a day when you have nothing particular to do, and the story recurs to you and you sit down and write it, and by the simplest methods make your old man a magnificent bogey. The story gets published and people think you fortunate to have a tale of 5,000 words presented to the public in a magazine whose proprietors are known to pay generously. They do not know, and you do not explain to them, that at one time and another you have burned 15,000 words written in abortive attempts to tell that same simple story.

Sometimes you may not wait for your luck. An editor demands a story, and you dare not disobey. Also, there are plenty of tales already outlined in your note-books. You go over them with care, and select the one that seems most likely to come easily. Then you sit down, and by dint of doggedness, and by thinking of your tailor, and your landlord, and the club-subscription which is fast becoming due, you manage to get the tale told after a fashion. The editor and his subscribers may be pleased, but the only satisfaction you get is the cheque, and that is a spoonful of jam that hides a pile of nauseating powder.

The great thing is to get simplicity. A child whose portrait had been painted by Mr. Whistler said afterwards that he seemed to blow it on the canvas, and simply to take exercise with his brushes. Every artist will declare that that is how he did the only work by which he desires to be known. The good idea is not in itself worth anything to the man who is critical as to his own work. The best that one does is done most easily. Immortal lyrics may be turned out in railway carriages on the Underground. Stodgy leading articles may cost the author hours of research in the British Museum. It is all a question of luck, and most artists are never allowed to produce the one work which they really desire to give to the world. It is perfectly clear to them, but they cannot find how to begin; or, if they see that, they fail to discover when they should end, and canvas after canvas goes away to a dark recess of the studio, page after page of MS. is thrown on the fire. But luck only comes to those who have taught themselves by dint of long toil how to make use of it when it arises.

H. D. LOWRY.

Grub-street.

IN the very interesting Green-Gyzzarn section of the New English Dictionary—to which we shall return—Dr. Murray deals with Grub-street as a phrase, and defines it as follows: "The name of a street near Moorfields in London (now Milton-street), 'much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems' (J.); hence used allusively for the tribe of mean and needy authors or literary hacks." The "J." stands for Johnson's dictionary.

One's heart can warm to this eighteenth century rookery of littérateurs and lampoonists and news-mongers. If it produced poor literature, it was at least the cause of literature in others. It evoked the scorn of Dryden and Pope, and the name glints despicably in the works of Swift, Steele, and even Byron. Besides, though the street is gone, and its associations covered under a splendid name that might have been reserved for better duty, Grub-street is ever with us. Its garrets are merely scattered over London; hidden from scornful eyes, they rarely want their lean tenants. Moreover, we doubt whether one littérateur in fifty is without a visiting fear that one day Grub-street will offer him her chill hospitality. When did Grub-street become a word as well as a street name? It has been held by Londonarians like Thornbury and Mr. Wheatley that the first employment of the name in allusion to squalid literature occurs in Andrew Marvell's "The Rehearsal Transposed" (1672). But Dr. Murray's excavations give earlier dates. Taylor, the Water-Poet, is quoted as writing in 1630: "When strait I might descry The Quintessence of Grub Street well distild Through Cripplegate in a contagious Map." What this means we cannot tell, but we suppose that Dr. Murray is satisfied that Taylor referred to literary manufactures. Mr. Wheatley has noted the reference, but he, too, is doubtful of its meaning; As the works of Taylor, the Water Poet, do not happen to lie at our elbow, we must leave the question in darkness, or to the attention of some learned correspondent. We should have thought that Taylor might be referring to the earlier and very different association of Grub-street with those "bowyers, fletchers, bow-string makers, and such like occupations" mentioned by Stow (1598), or with the "bowling alleys and dicing houses," which he says were superseding them. As late as 1651 a forgotten dramatist wrote: "Let Cupid go to Grub-street and turn archer"; and even in 1667 Charles Cotton could write of "Arrows loos'd from Grub-street bow in Finsbury." The Finsbury archery grounds and playing fields were close to Grub-street. However, as early as 1648 Dr. Murray finds an unmistakable mention of Grub-street as a literary locality in the Mercurius Fidei (Thomasson Tracts, British Museum) where "the Grub-street pamphleteer" is named. Archery and Satire seem, indeed, to have fledged their arrows in Grub-street for about forty years, until the poisoned variety ousted its rival. Marvell's references to Grub-street are not quite in the eighteenth-century vein: "He, honest man, was deep gone in Grub-street and polemical divinity." "Oh, these are your Nonconformist tricks; oh, you have learnt this of the Puritans in Grub-street!" But seven years later the true Grub-street odour invades the air. Oldham's "Satire Upon a Printer," quoted by Mr. Wheatley, contains the stanza:

May'st thou ne'er rise to History, but what Poor Grub Street Penny Chronicles relate,
Memoirs of Tyburn and the mournful state
Of cut-purse in Holborn cavalcade.

Shadwell, the reviled of Dryden, reviles "silly Grub Street songs worse than Tom Farthing."

In the dawn of the eighteenth century Grub-street had become the home of the neediest hacks, backbiters, and news mongers of the age of coffee-house gossip and Treasury hire. We will not stir up the muddy waters of the Dunciad. The Journal to Stella contains nearly twenty references to Grub-street, and they are variously illuminative. Here are a few:

Jan. 31, 1710.—They are here intending to tax all the little printed penny papers, a halfpenny every half sheet, which will utterly ruin Grub-street, and I am endeavouring to prevent it.

Aug. 1, 1711.—Thornhill, who killed Sir Cholmley Dering, was murdered by two men on Turnham Green last Monday night. . . . We have only a Grub-street paper of it, but I believe it is true.

Dec. 6.—I was this morning making the ballad, two degrees above Grub-street.

Aug. 7, 1712.—Do you know that Grub-street is dead and gone last week? No more ghosts or murders now for love or money. I plied it pretty close the last fortnight, and published at least seven penny papers of my own, besides some of other people's; but now every single half sheet pays a halfpenny to the Queen. The Observer is fallen; the Medleys are jumbled together with the Flying Post; the Examiner is deadly sick; the Spectator keeps up and doubles its price; I know not how long it will hold.

Grub-street produced, and haunted, literature long after that, and though changed as a locality it has flourished as a phrase. In English Bards and Scotch Reviewers "Grub-street" stands for the inkstained crowd of critics:

Blest be the banquets spread at Holland House,
Where Scotchmen feed, and critics may carouse!
Long, long beneath that hospitable roof
Shall Grub-street dine, while duns are kept aloof.

But these lines were not accurate, and they doubtless contributed to make Byron ashamed of the satiric outburst of his youth. As an adjective Grub-street now means immersed in the writing trade. "At present I am perfectly Grub-street, but then I have the pleasure of earning every penny I spend," wrote Lowell in an early letter.

It is seventy years since the name Grub-street disappeared from the tributary of Cripplegate, but the phrase does its work so well that it cannot be spared. In his New Grub-street Mr. Gissing has portrayed the modern and diffused successor of the eighteenth century slum, and though 'the picture is more decent than the other, it is hardly less depressing.

Correspondence.

"An Englishwoman's Love-Letters."

SIR,—May an outsider be permitted a few words on the subject of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters?

Your last critical remarks on the subject strike me as timely and just, and one needs no intimate acquaintance with the book to realise its narrow and unhealthy tone. Even such quotations from the text as have appeared in various reviews are amply indicative of two salient facts to the thoughtful reader—namely, the unwomanly nature of the confessions, and their studied literary quality. Human as they are, candid and touching as they are, they are so charged with literary niceties, and the mental consideration of the artist, that surely they ought not to impose on anyone as the genuine utterances of a love-sick woman. Women are not so exhaustively candid as all this; and surely a refined woman should not be specially lacking in the elusiveness of womankind, when the expression of their more delicate sentiments is concerned.

The critical outsider knows also that literary nicety is acquired. These Letters, then, being all so prettily adequate to the phases of the case, must certainly be adjudged the work of a literary person. Can one be genuinely passionate and literary also in the same moment? Something should ring false. The sentiment, probably. Here the sentiment is all, beautifully tender and correct in the literary sense; but it rings false in its over-candour—it is unwomanly. Some things might explain the extreme candour of expression; but these things, were they specified, could only emphasise the worst qualities of the book. If the book is not essentially a shade worse than valueless, I am no judge of the literary value of any book. Indeed, if a thing is unwholesome it cannot be other than pernicious. Were the Letters genuine, the same judgment should apply. Beautiful as one may admit the book to be, in its sentiment and literary quality, it is, nevertheless, narrow, pitiful, and sickly in an evil meaning of the words.

But the literary mind of to-day is not over-healthy; and one is tempted to infer from indications that a pen here and there is making much of this anonymous authorship in vague hope of pleasing a famous somebody whose name, no doubt, is merely reserved for a time. Have we no powerful critic who is able to rate the book at its real worth, and so give pause to the fuss? I would give the Devil his due. So, also, I would give this book its due—which, in the best interests of literature, is all that any book deserves.—I am, &c.,

OUTSIDER.

SIR,—Perhaps I am a day behind the fair, but among the many suggestions of authorship I have not seen the names of the writers of The Etchingham Letters.

There are so many resemblances in style, and in some of the matter even, that I hazard the guess that the same hands may be found in both.—I am, &c.,

J. G. PATTERSON.

The Society of Authors (Incorporated).

SIR,—The attention of the Society of Authors has been called to the fact that persons who are not members of the Society have, from time to time, asserted to publishers, editors, and others that they would call in the aid of the Society of Authors in support of their claims.

Anyone having reason to suppose that an unauthorised use is being made of the Society's name should communicate with the Secretary and give him full details of the case. The Secretary will, on receipt of such a statement, be glad to give information as to whether the persons using the Society's name are in fact members, and, if they are members, whether they are acting with the knowledge or sanction of the Society.—I am, &c.,

G. HERBERT THIRING, Secretary.

Author and Critic.

SIR,—Scourge the little vanities of little authors, by all means; but I hope you will admit that the critical statement (touching a matter of fact, and not of sentiment), that is nevertheless a mis-statement, should be held open to refutation by the injured (I might even say the insulted) party, however humble. If you do, will you find a corner amidst your correspondence for the following excerpt from a review, in the Times, of a book of mine recently published, and for my answering protest, which the Times did not print?

"Presently they were seated entwined on the sedilium beside the ruined altar. . . ." Mr. Capes has heard of sedilia in the plural, and has leaped to the extravagant conclusion that the singular is sedilium, just as another author speaks of "a penetralia," or says "their bona fides are unimpeachable." It is so easy to leave Latin alone, if a man's education has been neglected, or if his Latin rusts in disuse.

To the Editor of the Times.

SIR,—“If a man's education has been neglected”—he should not think to become a critic. The reviewer of a book by me makes merry (the Times, December 26) over my misuse of the word sedilia. I would suggest, in reply, that the pedantic is not the only necessary equipment for a critic. A knowledge of colloquialisms, and the un-cock-sureness resulting from an appreciative study of dictionaries, should at least figure in the account. The word sedilium (whether Anglicism, diminutive, or simply Church Latin) has always been quite familiar to me as applied to the chancel seat, where only one (as sometimes happens) is in evidence. Challenged, I turn to the two dictionaries (Chambers's English, Gase's French-English) most apt to my hand. In each sedilium receives authority—indeed, in the former it is given as the rule, and sedile as the exception. Pedantry is no more to be admired in an author than in a critic.

—I am, &c.,

BERNARD CAPES.

Not for Scholars.

SIR,—One hears and reads a great deal nowadays of “lists of best books.” Those submitted, while no doubt excellent in their way, always appear to me to be suitable to a great extent only for the library of a scholar.

I have never yet seen published a list of books which would be most suitable for the home of an intelligent man of the working or middle class.

In submitting for criticism the following fifty titles, I am presuming that a Bible is the only book in the house.—I am, &c.,

T. C. WARD.

Dictionary.
History of England.
Geography.
Atlas.
Spon's Mechanic's Own Book.
Enquire Within.
Brewer's Phrase and Fable.
Concise Cyclopædia.
Lubbock's Pleasures of Life.
Lubbock's Use of Life.
Ruskin's Sesame and Lilies.
Ruskin's Frondes Agrestes.
Ruskin's Readings in Fors
Clavigera.
Lorna Doone.
David Copperfield.
Pickwick.
Dombe and Son.
Oliver Twist.
Vanity Fair.
Newcomes.
Esmond.
Treasure Island.
Kidnapped.
Twain's Tom Sawyer.
Twain's Huck Finn.
Adam Bede.

Ball's Starland.
Blackie's Self-Culture.
Darwin's Origin of Species.
Smiles's Self-Help.
Smiles's Thrift.
Southey's Life of Nelson.
Farrar's Life of Christ.
Shakespeare.
Longfellow.
Tennyson.
Scott's Poems.
Palgrave's Golden Treasury.
Pilgrim's Progress.
Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.
Carlyle's Heroes.
Scott's Ivanhoe.
Scott's Waverley.
Scott's Kenilworth.
Kingsley's Westward Ho!
Kingsley's Hypatia.
John Halifax.
Uncle Tom's Cabin.
Last Days of Pompeii.
Shorter's Victorian Literature. (This would be a guide for future purchases.)

A Shakesperean Americanism.

SIR,—If, as your reviewer considers, Mr. Stephen Phillips is unfortunate in the “unintended Americanism” in:

“Am I that Herod

That fired the robbers out of Galilee?”

the author of Herod may take comfort in reflecting that he is unfortunate in the best of company. The last two lines of Shakespeare's 144th sonnet (“Two loves I have of comfort and despair”) run:

“Yet this shall I ne'er know, but live in doubt,
Till my bad angel fire my good one out.”

On the whole I venture to doubt, therefore, that Mr. Phillips's phrase is either an Americanism or unintended.—
I am, &c.,

WILLIAM G. HUTCHINSON.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 68 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the most interesting and suggestive piece of dialogue, not exceeding 300 words, from an unwritten novel. All kinds of stories are indicated by the dialogues sent in, the sex novel being predominant. We have decided to award the prize to Mr. J. C. Hadrev, Wynand House, Bowes Park, N., for the following:

“Come out on to the balcony, Mrs. Crewe,” said Graham. “I’m going to smoke—if you don’t object.”

Ulrica followed him through the French window. She leant against the light iron railing, and looked downwards into the quiet little Parisian street.

“What is your latest news from Ralph?” Graham asked, after a few minutes’ chat.

“He is at the hospital at Wynberg. He hopes to be home in the autumn.”

“I expect he’ll be glad enough to get back,” said Graham carelessly. Ulrica’s face was turned away, and she did not speak.

“Do you know,” he continued, after an instant’s silence, “it was on this very balcony I first saw your face—that is, your portrait?”

“Was it? I suppose Dorothea showed it to you?”
Graham shook his head. His thoughts had reverted to the evening of Ralph’s confession. He had been very sorry for his friend then—well, after all, he was sorry for him now, poor devil, though he saw him chiefly in the light of a dog in the manger.

“I didn’t know Ralph had any portrait of me,” Ulrica said at last.

“He has. And I told him to throw it into the Seine,” said Graham, absently.

“You—?” Ulrica stared. Graham rose and flung the end of his cigar over the railings.

“I beg your pardon!” he exclaimed. “I should not have said that.”

She looked at him, speechless, for a moment. Then she said, in a rapid whisper:

“You know all about it, and you think I have spoiled his life!”

“No!” said Graham unsteadily, “I know all about it, and I think he has spoiled yours!”

Their eyes met. But Ulrica turned away.

“You are utterly mistaken,” she said in a low, emphatic voice.

And she stepped proudly back into the room.

[J. C. H., London.]

Other Dialogues received from: P. C. P., London; E. L., London; F. R. J., London; R. W. R., London; E. R., London; A. G., Cheltenham; G. W. H., West Didsbury; A. P. F., Canterbury; W. S. B., London; H. N., Wellingborough; E. R. C., Sydenham, R. O., London; E. M. S., London; A. J. C., —; S. W., Glasgow; G. M. W., Hull; S. A. D., Ulverston; E. L., London; E. C. M., Cork; M. B. A., Manchester; S. H., Warwick; F. B., Gravesend; F. L., Maidenhead; K. C., Wolverhampton; L. R. R., London; C. F., Cork; E. K. P., Wadhurst Park.

Competition No. 69 (New Series).

WE offer a prize of One Guinea for the best open letter to a living writer. Not to exceed 250 words, or (we need not add) the bounds of good taste.

RULES.

Answers, addressed “Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.,” must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, January 16. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

CATALOGUES.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT of LITERATURE.MONTHLY LIST OF FRESH PURCHASES IN SECOND-HAND BOOKS.

No. 601, just published for JANUARY, includes Works on Bibliography and in Spanish Literature.
Post free from

H. SOTHERAN & CO., Booksellers, 140, Strand, W.C.;
and 37, Piccadilly, W.

NAPOLEON.—CATALOGUE of BOOKS,
VIEWS, PORTRAITS, relating to NAPOLEON I. and his GENERALS. 16 pages.

ASIA.—CATALOGUE of BOOKS relating to ASIA
MINOR, ARABIA, PERSIA, AFGHANISTAN, BALO-
CHISTAN. 64 pages. Just ready.

FRANCIS EDWARDS, Bookseller, 83 High Street, Marylebone,
London, W.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 3 IN PREPARATION.

CATALOGUE No. 1, 1s., and CATALOGUE
No. 2, 2s. 6d.,

May be had on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

A Large Collection of Fifteenth and Sixteenth
Century Books on view.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

14, Beckett Street, Covent Garden, 90, South Frederick St.
Birmingham, and 17, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES sent free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS

promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

WILLIAMS & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

BOOKS, RARE and OUT-OF-PRINT, SUP-
PLIED.—State wants. CATALOGUES free. Libraries and Small Parcels Purchased for Cash. WANTED, Gardner's HISTORY, 2 vols., 1863.—HOLLAND CO., Book Merchants,
Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each given for any Presentation Volumes with Inscriptions written inside
by Dickens, Thackeray, Browning, Lamb, Keats, Shelley, Tenny-son, Scott, Lang, and any notable Author. Special List 13,000 Books Wanted free.—RAKER'S, John Bright St., Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or to seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done, 10d. per 1,000 words. Simple and references.
Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

GRAHAM'S TYPE-WRITING OFFICE,
23 COCKSPUR STREET, PALL MALL.—All kinds of difficult MSS. receive careful attention from experienced workers. Specimen pages and references sent if desired. Over five years' experience.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY
(LIMITED).

ENLARGED AND CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE

(Over 500 pages, 8vo, bound in green cloth).

All the Principal Works in Circulation at the Library

ARRANGED under SUBJECTS.

Forming a Comprehensive Guide to Notable Publications in most Branches of Literature.

Books of Permanent Interest on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY,
ARTS, SCIENCES, PHILOSOPHY, SPORT,
THEOLOGY, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, and
FICTION.

Price 1s. 6d.

Also a FOREIGN CATALOGUE, containing Books in FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
RUSSIAN, and SPANISH.

Price 1s. 6d.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road; and 48, Queen Victoria Street, London.

WELSH INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION ACT, 1889.

CENTRAL WELSH BOARD.

APPOINTMENT OF ORAL EXAMINERS, 1901.

On the 15th of February, 1901, the Executive Committee of the Central Welsh Board will proceed to the APPOINTMENT OF ORAL EXAMINERS.

A. French (Grammatical and Conversational), 3 appointments;

B. French, Latin, and General Subjects of the Lower Forms, 4 or 5 appointments;

C. Latin and General Subjects of the Lower Forms, 2 or 3 appointments;

D. German (Grammatical and Conversational), 1 appointment.

The Examinations will take place between June 12 and
July 13, 1901.

Preference will be given to Candidates who have had experience in Secondary Teaching. Women will be equally eligible with men.

Applications for further particulars as to duties and remuneration should reach the undersigned not later than Monday, the 25th instant.

OWEN OWEN, Chief Inspector.

Central Welsh Board Office,
Cardiff, January 17th, 1901.

COMMERCIAL EDUCATION.—The

DIRECTORS of the LIVERPOOL INSTITUTE require the services of a MASTER qualified to give instruction in the Advanced Commercial Department of the High School for Boys. Subjects: Modern Languages, Commercial Geography, Economics, Commercial Science, Correspondence, &c. Preference will be given to applicants trained in Continental Schools of Commerce. Duties to commence 24th of April next.
Salary, £250 per annum.

Applications, with not more than three testimonials, to be sent in to the undersigned at the Liverpool Institute, Mount Street, Liverpool, not later than February 16th.

HAROLD WHALLEY, Secretary.

ROYAL INSTITUTION of GREAT BRITAIN, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Professor R. K. DOUGLAS, Keeper of Oriental Books and Manuscripts, British Museum, Professor of Chinese, King's College, London, will, THIS DAY (SATURDAY), January 19, at 3 o'clock, begin a COURSE of TWO LECTURES on "THE GOVERNMENT and PEOPLE of CHINA."

Subscription to this Course, Half-a-Guinea; to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

Tickets may be obtained at the Office of the Institution.

UNA.

A SONG OF ENGLAND IN THE YEAR
NINETEEN HUNDRED.

By WILLIAM GERARD.

3s. 6d. net.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRUBNER & CO., Ltd.

LONDON LIBRARY.

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.
PATRON.—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.
PRESIDENT.—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.
VICE-PRESIDENTS.—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P.,
HERBERT SPENCER, Esq.; the Right Hon. W. E. H.
LEUCKY, M.P., D.C.L.
TRUSTEES.—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, Right Hon.
LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S., Right Hon. EARL of ROSE-BERY.

The Library contains about 200,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year; Life-Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room Open from 10 till half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 1888, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.
C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian

COMPLETE SETS OF THE PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

to

"THE ACADEMY,"

can still be obtained for 3s. 6d. They consist of 37 Portraits—viz.:

BEN JONSON.
JOHN KEATS.
SIR JOHN SUCKLING.
TOM HOOD.
THOMAS GRAY.
ROBERT LOUIS
STEVENSON.
SIR WALTER SCOTT.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON.
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.
LEIGH HUNT.
LORD MACAULAY.
ROBERT SOUTHLEY.
S. T. COLERIDGE.
CHARLES LAMB.
MICHAEL DRAYTON.
WALTER SAVAGE
LANDOR.
SAMUEL PEPYS.
EDMUND WALLER.
WILKIE COLLINS.

JOHN MILTON.
WILLIAM COWPER.
CHARLES DARWIN.
ALFRED, LORD
TENNYSON.
HENRY WADSWORTH
LONGFELLOW.
ANDREW MARVELL.
ROBERT BROWNING.
THOMAS CARLYLE.
PERCY BYSSHE
SHELLEY.
CHARLES DICKENS.
JONATHAN SWIFT.
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE
THACKERAY.
WILLIAM BLAKE.
SIR RICHARD STEELE.
ALEXANDER POPE.
DOUGLAS JERROLD.
FRANCIS BACON.
HENRIK IBSEN.

THE
PALL MALL MAGAZINE.

Edited by GEORGE R. HALKETT.

The FEBRUARY NUMBER,

PRICE ONE SHILLING,

is NOW READY, and contains many REMARKABLE
ARTICLES.

SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN. Reminiscences by George Grossmith.
THE QUEEN OF HOLLAND. By One of her Subjects.
ETON AND THE WAR. By Mrs. Warre Cornish.
THE EVOLUTION OF THE NOVEL. A. T. Quiller Couch.
NINETEENTH CENTURY DRESS. Illustrated by Mrs. Brown Potter.
HOOLIGANISM. Arthur Morrison.
WAR CORRESPONDENT IN THE FIELD. A. G. Hales.
CAN AN OFFICER LIVE ON HIS PAY? By a Staff Officer.

RISE OF THE ROMANTIC SCHOOL. The Late Charles Yriarte.
MR. BALFOUR AT DOWNING STREET. With Special Pictures.

Contributions from the Duke of Argyll, Harold Begbie,
Marie Van Vorst, Eden Phillpotts, Mrs. Howarth, Alfred Kincaid, E. J. Sullivan, Maurice Greifen-hagen, &c. &c.

There are Two Special Plates in Colour. No better number of the Pall Mall Magazine has been published.

Price ONE SHILLING.

18, CHARING CROSS ROAD, W.C.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

No. 395. JANUARY, 1901. 8vo, price 6s.

- 1.—THE CAUSES of the AMERICAN CIVIL WAR.
- 2.—LANDSCAPE: SYMBOLIC, IMAGINATIVE, and ACTUAL.
- 3.—SOPHIA DOROTHEA.
- 4.—THE EARLY HISTORY of FOX-HUNTING.
- 5.—RECENT APPRECIATIONS of OLIVER CROMWELL.
- 6.—VELAZQUEZ.
- 7.—FICTION and POLITICS.
- 8.—THE CORRESPONDENCE of CICERO.
- 9.—MADAME DU DEFFAND and HER FRIENDS.
- 10.—THE SITUATION in IRELAND.
- 11.—OUR SOUTH AFRICAN TROUBLES.

THE ENGLISH
HISTORICAL REVIEW.

Edited by S. R. GARDINER, D.C.L., LL.D., and REGINALD L. POOLE, M.A., Ph.D.

No. 61. JANUARY, 1901. Royal 8vo, price 5s.

1. Articles.
THE EARLY HISTORY of BABYLONIA. By Sir
HENRY H. HOWORTH, K.C.L.E. IV. The Earliest Semites.
CANON LAW in ENGLAND: a REPLY to Dr. MAC-
COLL. By Prof. MAYLAND, LL.D.
A SPANISH ACCOUNT of DRAKE'S VOYAGES. By
G. JENNER.
THE FOREIGN POLICY of ENGLAND UNDER
WALPOLE. By BASIL WILLIAMS. Part IV.
2. Notes and Documents.—3. Reviews of Books.—4. Notices of Periodical Publications.
LONGMANS, GREEN & Co., London, New York, and Bombay.

In crown 8vo, cloth gilt. Price 6s.

ONE OF MANY.
By VERA MACHA.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

Western Mail.—"An interesting novel The characters are drawn with boldness and effectiveness."
Nottingham Guardian.—"A novel of considerable merit. The author has handled her theme with exceptional ability, and her story is deeply interesting."
Lloyds.—"A well-written story.....the character-drawing is very sharp and good."

Western Mercury.—"The authoress has woven an absorbingly interesting story around a rather complicated plot, the gradual unravelling of the skeins of which at once engages and then thoroughly sustains the unflagging interest of the reader from the beginning to end. The novel is uncommonly well constructed..... The heroine is a charmingly-drawn character.... The novel is well worth reading."
Pall Mall Gazette.—"The book is well put together."

London: DIGBY, LONG & CO., 18, Boulevard St., E.O.

Now Ready. Price 3s. net, post free.

WELSHMEN:

A Sketch of their History from the Earliest Times to the Death of Llewelyn, the last Welsh Prince.

By THOMAS STEPHENS, B.A., F.R.G.S.

First Notice:—"A great amount of reading and research has been brought within the compass of a small volume. The style is easy and attractive."
Scotman.

London: J. F. SPRIGGS, 21, Paternoster Square.

DUCKWORTH & CO'S LIST

MR. LESLIE STEPHEN'S NEW BOOK.
THE ENGLISH UTILITARIANS.
Demy 8vo. 3 vols. 30s. net.

Literature.—"This is a book we must be profoundly thankful for. The work will never be done again with equal thoroughness and appreciation. A permanent addition to English philosophical literature; one that will be not only quoted in the future, but read."

BY CH. SEIGNOBOS AND CH. V. LANGLOIS.
INTRODUCTION to the STUDY of HISTORY. By CH. V. LANGLOIS and CH. SEIGNOBOS. Authorised Translation by G. G. BERRY; Preface by Professor YORK POWELL. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

Educational Times.—"The very book for the serious student of history."

WITTE'S ESSAYS on DANTE.
Translated by C. MABEL LAURENCE, B.A. Edited by PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

Athenæum.—"Mr. Wicksteed and Miss Laurence are to be congratulated. The translations have been admirably done. Most useful book."

SPINOZA'S LIFE and LETTERS.
By Sir FREDERICK POLLOCK, Bart. New and Cheaper Edition. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.

JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU and the ORIGINS of LITERARY COSMOPOLITANISM: A Study of the Literary Relations between France and England in the Eighteenth Century. By JOSEPH TEXTE. Translated into English by J. W. MATTHEWS. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE POEMS of CATULLUS.
Edited by H. MACNAGHTEN and A. B. RAMSAY, Assistant Masters at Eton College. Small crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Times.—"A useful and elegant edition."
Spectator.—"They understand their author, and they know where to give help."

THE STORY of CATULLUS. With Translations of several of the poems, by H. MACNAGHTEN, formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Assistant Master at Eton College. Small crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Athenæum.—"The literature of Catullus has been scarce of late, and this addition to it is welcome. The versions reach a high degree of excellence."

IMPORTANT BOTANICAL WORKS.

A TEXT-BOOK of PLANT DISEASES. By GEORGE MASSEE, F.L.S., Principal Assistant, Royal Herbarium, Kew. With 92 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Speaker.—"Rarely, if ever has there been issued at cheap price so useful a manual of practical botanical knowledge. Full of sound science and helpful information."

Literature.—"The book deserves to become the leading English text-book on the subject."

A HANDBOOK of BRITISH RUBI.
By the Rev. W. MOYLE ROGERS, F.L.S. Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

AGRICULTURAL BOTANY, Theoretical and Practical. By JOHN PERCIVAL, M.A., F.L.S., Professor of Botany at the Agricultural College, Wye. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Standard.—"Mr. Percival has met a distinct want. All branches of the subject are very clearly treated, with the help of numerous and excellent illustrations."

A GLOSSARY of BOTANICAL TERMS. By BENJAMIN DAYDON JACKSON, Secretary of the Linnean Society. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

Notes and Queries.—"His Dictionary may be pronounced an exhaustive and highly meritorious performance."

PROBLEMS of EVOLUTION. By F. W. HEADLEY, Assistant Master at Haileybury College. With 14 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.

Glasgow Herald.—"An exceedingly able and suggestive book."

Notes and Queries.—"A book of great interest. A clearness of exposition unfortunately not common."

DUCKWORTH & CO.,
3, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

MR. HEINEMANN'S LIST.

A POLITICAL HISTORY of CONTEMPORARY EUROPE SINCE 1814. From the French of CHARLES SEIGNOBOS. 2 vols., demy 8vo, £1 net. Standard.—"Students of contemporary history will be grateful for his important historical work. Nothing can be better than his description of our political progress from the end of the Great War to the present day. The summary of French political history is equally well done; the section on Germany is singularly interesting."

SEMANTICS: the Science of Meaning. From the French of M. BRÉAL. Translated by Mrs. HENRY (JST). With an Introduction by Professor J. F. POSTGATE. 1 vol., 7s. 6d. net. Guardian.—"It displays on every page the author's truly encyclopaedic learning. The conclusions he formulates are the skilful deductions of a well-disciplined imagination."

A NEW VOLUME of "LITERATURES OF THE WORLD."
Crown 8vo, 6s.

A HISTORY of CHINESE LITERATURE. By Professor H. A. GILES, LL.D. Also uniform with the above, crown 8vo, 6s. each.

A HISTORY of ANCIENT GREEK LITERATURE. By GILBERT MURRAY, M.A.

A HISTORY of FRENCH LITERATURE. By EDWARD DOWDEN, D.C.L. LL.D.

A HISTORY of MODERN ENGLISH LITERATURE. By the EDITOR, Hon. M.A. of Trinity College, Cambridge, Hon. LL.D. of St. Andrews.

A HISTORY of ITALIAN LITERATURE. By RICHARD GARNETT, C.B. LL.D.

A HISTORY of SPANISH LITERATURE. By J. FITZMAURICE-KELLY.

A HISTORY of JAPANESE LITERATURE. By W. G. ARNOT, C.M.G., D.Lit., late Japanese Secretary to H.M. Legation, Tokio.

A HISTORY of BOHEMIAN LITERATURE. By FRANCIS, COUNT LUTZOW.

A HISTORY of SANSKRIT LITERATURE. By A. A. MACDONELL, M.A.

A HISTORY of RUSSIAN LITERATURE. By K. WALISZEWSKI.

A NEW VOLUME of "THE GREAT EDUCATORS."
Crown 8vo, 5s.

COMENIUS, and the BEGINNINGS of EDUCATIONAL REFORM. By Professor W. S. MONROE.

Guardian.—"A clear and concise account of the man and his work. The book should cover a gap and serve to introduce more commonly one of the most potent reformers that the history of education has known."

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

IMPORTANT

Official Educational Books.

SPECIAL REPORTS on EDUCATIONAL SUBJECTS. Vol. VI. Preparatory Schools for Boys: their place in English Secondary Education. Issued under the direction of MICHAEL E. SADLER. Price by post, 2s. 7½d.

REPORT on TECHNICAL and COMMERCIAL EDUCATION in EAST PRUSSIA, POLAND, GALICIA, SILESIA, and BOHEMIA. By JAMES BAKER, F.R.G.P. Price by post, 6d.

ANNUAL REPORT of the BOARD of EDUCATION for 1899-1900. Vol. I. The Report, by post 8d. Vol. II. Appendix to Report (Secondary Education), by post, 1s. 7d. Vol. III. Appendix to Report (Elementary Education), by post, 3s. 11d.

BOARD of EDUCATION. Schools in receipt of Parliamentary Grants. Grants paid to School Boards under Section 97, Elementary Education Act, 1870. School Board Accounts and List of Loans. By post, 3s. 3d.

MATHEMATICAL TABLES for the USE of STUDENTS. 5s. per 100.

PARIS EXHIBITION, 1900. Education in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, being a descriptive Handbook accompanying the British Section. By post, 1s. 2d.

EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE:
East Harding Street, E.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

MRS. ALEXANDER'S NEW NOVEL.
Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.
A MISSING HERO.
By Mrs. ALEXANDER, Author of "The Wooling o't."

UNIFORM EDITION of ZOLA'S NOVELS.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

GERMINAL; or, Master and Man.
By EMILE ZOLA.

Edited, with an Introduction, by ERNEST A. VIZETELLY. Everybody should read "Germinal" as a prelude to M. Zola's new story, "Work," which will be published by Chatto & Windus in March. In "Germinal" the author depicts the tragic sufferings of the working classes as typified by the coal-miners of Northern France. In "Work," whilst changing the scene, he takes up the subject from the point at which he left it in "Germinal," and deals with remedial measures tending to change oppressive labour into healthy and beneficial work.

Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s.

ECCENTRICITIES of GENIUS: Memories of Famous Men and Women of the Platform and the Stage.

By Major J. B. POND. With 91 Portraits.

A NEW EDITION—Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE DEAD SECRET.

By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Moonstone."

* * This Edition has been RESET in NEW TYPE, uniform with the recent New Editions of "THE WOMAN in WHITE" and "THE MOONSTONE," and is bound in uniform style.

THE INIMITABLE MRS. MASHINGAM: a Romance of Botany Bay. By HERBERT COMPTON. Author of "A Free Lance in a Far Land."

Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"It is very long since we read so delightful a story."

Daily Graphic.

"The interest is sustained to the end."—World.

THE FOURTH GENERATION. By Sir WALTER BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl," &c. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"As interesting as a fairy tale."—Times.

THE MAN THAT GOT CHOKED
HADLEYBURG, and other Stories and Sketches. By MARK TWAIN. With a Frontispiece by LEWIS HIRSCOCK. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"Shows Mark Twain at his very best.... How I made my Debut as a Literary Person" shows Mr. Clemens in a new light. It is the most thrilling and soul-stirring thing of its kind we have ever read."—Black and White.

"AS A WATCH in the NIGHT":
a Drama of Waking and Dream. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRITCH, Author of "Madame Izan," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"A strong and fascinating story.... strangely attractive."

Pall Mall Gazette.

"An extremely clever socio-political novel.... It is a notable book, and should add to the reputation of a clever and attractive writer."—Review of the Week.

PHILIP WINWOOD: a Sketch of the Domestic History of an American Captain in the War of Independence. By ROBERT NEILSON STEPHENS. With 6 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"A bright and spirited story.... The plot is ingenious, and maintains its interest unflinching to the end."—Hookman.

AS LUCK WOULD HAVE IT.
By WILLIAM WESTALL, Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"A capital book, pleasantly written and never dull."

St. James's Gazette.

THE "PRETTY POLLY":
a Voyage of Incident. By W. CLARK RUSSELL, Author of "The Wreck of the 'Grosvenor,'" &c. With 12 Illustrations by G. E. ROBERTSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 5s.

"The story is told in Mr. Clark Russell's blithest and breeziest manner. Hundreds of boys will be pestering their fathers to charter them a brig as a present."—Daily Chronicle.

THE BAG of DIAMONDS, and THREE BITS of PASTE. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN, Author of "A Crimson Crime," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 4s.

"We can heartily recommend it to all who enjoy a few hours' reading of the thrilling, the melodramatic, and the highly wrought."—Scotsman.

THE CLOISTER and the HEARTH.
By CHARLES READE. (A LARGE TYPE, FINE-PAPER EDITION.) Fost 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

"One of the books which never seem to get out of date is Charles Reade's 'The Cloister and the Hearth.'... It is a long novel, but the use of the fine paper allows its well-nigh 800 pages to be compressed into less than an inch of thickness, and the size is very handy for the pocket. The type used is large and distinct."—Westminster Gazette.

HANDLEY CROSS; or, Mr. Jorrocks's Hunt. By ROBERT SURTEES, Author of "Mr. Surtees's Sporting Tour." With 75 Illustrations by JOHN LEECH. A NEW EDITION. Fost 8vo, cloth, 2s.

"There is no need to praise so breezy and rollicking a sporting novel. It long ago made its own welcome with every man who ever galloped across country with a pack of bound-in pursuit of a wily, vanishing fox. The old illustrations by John Leech have happily been retained, and they add not a little to the charm of the story."—Leeds Mercury.

LONDON MEMORIES: Social, Historical, and Topographical. By C. W. HECKETHORN, Author of "London Souvenirs," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A book which we can cordially recommend to the Londoner."—Academy.

"Gossip about old London is generally good reading, and Mr. Heckethorn's volume is no exception to the rule."—Daily News.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1498. Established 1869.

19 January, 1901.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper]

The Literary Week.

THE best English poem on Elijah! That is the subject of the Seatonian prize offered by the University of Cambridge to all members of the University who have proceeded to the degree of Master of Arts. The successful candidate is required to print the poem at his own expense.

We beg to inform several correspondents that guesses as to the identity of the author of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters have ceased to be amusing. Indeed, the wild conjectures of the week must have produced no small annoyance. Guessing at the authorship was carried too far by the Saturday Review when its critic suggested that, "if Mrs. Meynell did not write this book, she may well be flattered to have found an imitator so enthusiastic and adroit." Nor was this rash attribution redeemed by the protestation: "We are anxious not to attribute the authorship of anything to anybody." Mrs. Meynell did not write An Englishwoman's Love-Letters.

It would seem that the criticism passed upon the section devoted to living poets in Mr. Quiller-Couch's anthology has been considered. For we understand that a new edition is in preparation wherein Mr. Quiller-Couch will not be handicapped by considerations of space. Even then we fear he will not please the writer of the following:

TWO TREASURIES.

(With Apologies to Mr. Henley.)

Sitting down to Palgrave,
After reading Q.,—
Like winter turned to May,—
I had a feast to-day,
A feast of lyric joy,
A feast that could not cloy,
With never a line of Wilfrid Blunt,
Or anybody new.

To Hyde and Rands and Howells
I bade a long adieu;
My weary arms had rest,
My eyes regained their zest,
And old immortal words
Sang in my heart like birds—
Sitting down to Palgrave
After reading Q.

We are glad to see that Mr. Clarence Rook's extremely clever book, The Hooligan Nights, has been issued in a cheaper edition. The book ends, it will be remembered, with Alf's wedding, and the departure from a South London church in a pony-cart. "They swung round the square, and young Alf, looking back, waved his whip at me. And so young Alf turned the corner." These words have a curious bearing on young Alf's later career. Only two months ago he died for his country in South Africa. The question, "What shall we do with our Hooligans?" was answered by young Alf with his life. He did not die a hooligan.

As we prepare for press, the remains of the late Bishop of London are being laid to rest in St. Paul's Cathedral. Dr. Creighton was a graceful and dignified figure in the Church; in literature, a world-famed student of ecclesiastical history; in life, a man of abounding energy and radiant good sense. His energy was of a rather rare kind; it was all spring and "go," and yet no man could more serenely push his work aside and say, "Well, what can I do for you?" To a young man who once apologised for tapping at his study door he exclaimed: "My dear Mr. —, I have always plenty of time." Prof. Blackie once quoted to him his own motto:

Never hurry, never worry,
Never fret or fume,

but added, "You have the power of practising my precepts better than myself." We have no doubt, however, that Dr. Creighton's peculiar energy, his abounding wit, and his surplusage of intellect (if we may use the expression) added to the difficulties of his life. Bishoprics overtook him, too, while his History of the Papacy was in progress, and his MSS. mocked him from a desk strewn with the affairs of a diocese. He mourned that he had not only no time to write, but could not find time to read and think. His was a two-stranded life, and he knew it. His description of bishoping will be remembered. He said:

There could not possibly be anything more ghastly from a human point of view than being a bishop. You can never please anybody. I was told I ought to be a bishop, and believed it was God's will, and we are bound to keep moving on wherever God's will leads us, we have no choice to do anything else. . . . I went to Peterborough. Yes, I was very happy there. The clergy? Oh, the dear clergy. I think England the most extraordinary country in the world, and its clergy the most extraordinary people in it. The clergy averagely do an immense amount of work, but they really are the most self-centred, undisciplined, and difficult people I ever came across.

THERE are forty entries, all told, under the name of "Creighton (Mandell), successively Bishop of Peterborough and London," in the British Museum Catalogue. Elsewhere we refer to some of the works which won him the respect of all scholars. Asked once if he approved of men writing their own epitaphs, he said, "That depends," and added, "I only want this over me:

HE TRIED TO WRITE TRUE HISTORY."

His advice to a young historian was "Suppress nothing, and don't generalise or form your theories until you have a good grasp of all your facts." A popular writer Dr. Creighton was not; it is not often, after all, that one sees his books. His History of the Papacy during the Period of the Reformation, an uncompleted work in four volumes, is for scholars. His Queen Elizabeth, magnificently illustrated, is for the wealthy. His Geography for Beginners is for schoolboys. His Story of Some English Shires is for the general reader, but it is the least remarkable of his books. Dr. Creighton founded, and for some years edited, the English Historical Review. A short time before his death the late Bishop permitted a volume of extracts from his writings to be made, forming a small devotional book for daily reading. It was on the point of being issued when his death occurred, and will be issued in a few days by Mr. Elliot Stock under the title Counsels for Church People.

LAST week we printed the six Shakespeare examination paper questions which had "stumped" a correspondent who had answered fifty-three out of the fifty-nine. The learned gentleman who compiled the paper has again obliged us. "First give me permission," he writes, "to correct one or two slips in 'Some Questions in Shakespeare':"

"In Question 23 'Poins' should be 'Bardolph,' and the question should read: 'How many years had Falstaff known Bardolph before he met Mrs. Quickly?' As the lady says, in '2 Henry IV.,' that she had known Falstaff 'these twenty-nine years, come peascod time,' and in the first part of the same play Sir John avers that he has maintained 'that Salamander' of Bardolph's will give 'any time this two-and-thirty years,' the problem is a simple one.

'Pisanio's' ring should, of course, be 'Posthumus'; and the question as to Shakespeare's reference to Glasgow has no foundation—in fact, Shakespeare does not mention Glasgow.

THE answers to the other questions which have 'stumped' your correspondent are as follows:

12. The three blue-eyed characters in Shakespeare are Sycorax ('this blue-eyed hag'), Imogen ('blue of heaven's own tint'), and probably Cordelia, if the expression 'heavenly eyes' may be taken to indicate colour.

13. 'Young Dizzy' is one of the prisoners in 'Measure for Measure' (iv. 3).

44. The birch is mentioned in the same play (i. 4):

As fond fathers,
Having bound up the threatening twigs of birch,
Only to stick it in their children's sight
For terror, not for use.

50. Attentive readers of 'The Winter's Tale' will find the following items in Perdita's preparation for the sheep-shearing:

Three pound of sugar.
Five pound of currants.
Rice.
Saffron, to colour the warden pies.
Nutmegs seven.
A race or two of ginger.
Four pound of prunes and as many raisins o' the sun.

51. The greater man than Falstaff, we have it from Justice Silence, was Goodman Puff of Barson (2 Henry IV.)

THE Glasgow question did not baffle G. S. of Edinburgh, who offers this line from "Hamlet": "You go not till I set you up a glass." Three of his other answers, although incorrect, are ingenious:

12. The three blue-eyed characters in Shakespeare—Imogen, Sycorax, and Hermia ("Hermia's spheny eyne").

50. Items from Perdita's menu for the sheep-shearers: "I must have saffron, to colour the warden pies; mace—dates—none; nutmegs, seven; a race or two of ginger; four pound of prunes, and as many of raisins o' the sun." "Three pounds of sugar; five pounds of currants; vice" ("The Winter's Tale," iv. 2).

51. The name of a larger than Falstaff: "Colbrand the giant" ("King John," i. 1).

Fun has now progressed to its third number under Sir George Newnes's proprietorship, and we find it an excellent pennyworth of laughter. Mr. F. C. Gould is the regular weekly cartoonist, and everyone will enjoy his presentment of Sir John Tenniel's retirement from Punch above the title: "Dropping the First Mate." Sir John descends the ladder in place of Bismarck. Mr. Punch looks down with genuine grief on the departing figure, and on the top rung of the ladder Toby lifts his head to the heavens and howls his regret. A high standard of draughtsmanship is being maintained in Fun by the art editor, Mr. Leslie Wilson. Here is a literary jokelet:

1ST AUTHOR: "My mother has never read a single line of my work."

2ND AUTHOR: "Or did she just read one?"

Two interesting letters from R. L. Stevenson appear in L'Echo de la Semaine. They were addressed to M. B. H. Gausseron, who had proposed to make a French translation of the New Arabian Nights. Stevenson, who was in the South of France, wrote:

Campagne Defil—Saint Marcel,
Baulieu de Marseille.

DEAR SIR.—My publisher tells me that you are thinking of translating my Arabian Nights.

Would it be of any interest or assistance to you if I glanced over the proof-sheets? I should be very glad to do so; and though I am not learned in grammar, I have had considerable practice in French.

Excuse the pencil; unfortunately, I am not very well.—Yours truly,
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

P.S.—I have read your Rontins Fidèles. I have even written a review of it, and I consider myself lucky in my translator. If only you don't throw up the job.

While the matter was in progress, M. Gausseron lost his little boy, and mentioned his bereavement to Stevenson, who replied in a letter that is interesting not only as a message of sympathy, but also for its touch of self-revelation. In it Stevenson wrote:

I am like a blind man in speaking of these things, for I have never known what mourning is, and the state of my health permits me to hope that I shall carry this good fortune unbroken to the grave. But I have done what is perhaps, I imagine in my ignorance, almost as hard to endure. I have outlived my own merits in the eyes of more than one whom I used to esteem and love. For a child as young as yours it is almost impossible to have had any demerits; and that spares you a pang of anguish.

MR. ALFRED HARMSWORTH makes startling predictions about Twentieth Century journalism in the North American Review for February. He sees coming the Simultaneous Newspaper—a newspaper of national circulation, which, after swallowing all others, shall be published all over England or the United States, as the case may be, with only such differences as the demand for local news necessitates. The main point is that instead of many newspapers there will be only one, it may be two or three. Mr. Harmsworth points out that the whole tendency of the times is the concentration of great affairs in the hands of the few. Thus England is governed by the Cecils, railways are combining their interests, and lamp-oil is supplied to English cottages by Mr. Rockefeller. Similarly, newspapers will be bought up by a gigantic combination, and the multiple or simultaneous newspaper will be an accomplished fact. Mr. Harmsworth does not say that he approves this state of things, and personally he would oppose it vigorously. But while promising to oppose it vigorously, he tells us that it is inevitable:

I hardly know how the public could prevent the development of a newspaper monopoly. The initial stages would be accomplished without any great publicity, and when once an exclusive news-service had been secured, the rest would follow as a necessary consequence. People would not consign themselves to a condition of total ignorance of all news simply because they objected to a monopoly. To refer to an illustration already used, as long as the oil in the lamp gives a good light and costs a moderate figure, people do not greatly trouble themselves about the Standard Oil Company and its methods.

ON the advantages of this journalistic concentration Mr. Harmsworth is eloquent:

Imagine the influence which would be exerted if an overwhelming majority of the newspapers in the United States spoke with the same voice, supported the same principles, and enunciated the same policy! Such a state of things would be a terror to evil-doers and to the supporters of anything inimical to the commonwealth. Napoleon once remarked: "Four hostile newspapers are more to be feared than a thousand bayonets." But a hostile Press, issued simultaneously throughout the land, would be simply irresistible.

THE contrary possibility—that this giant of advocacy might exert his power in baneful and unpopular directions—is dismissed by Mr. Harmsworth on what seem to us rather insufficient grounds. He says that "a journal so demented as to purposely run counter to the honest feeling of the nation would soon have to file its petition and pass out into oblivion. The same would be true of a simultaneous newspaper." Does Mr. Harmsworth, then, contemplate with cheerfulness the creation of a single vast public opinion, and the obliteration or temporary neglect of differences of thought and feeling each demanding expression, and tending to work together to vitalise and develop the whole? We are frankly at a loss to interpret Mr. Harmsworth's mind. He smashes or brushes aside every argument that can be brought against his idea, but adds in the same breath: "Let me repeat, however, that I am not advocating newspaper monopolies." Mr. Harmsworth says he is only pointing out that they will probably arrive; but—again we are comforted—"it is unlikely that the complete newspaper monopoly will arise in the earlier end of the new century."

A Kew watchmaker appears to keep a tame litterateur on his premises. His watches are commended to the public in the following terms:

At Kew Observatory, Watches are in a few days as severely tested as if they had gone near the North Pole or part of the way "Through the Dark Continent." In ovens and refrigerators, and in all possible positions, watches are tried to the utmost. They must bear it all without a single touch to the regulator, however much they may pine for it. Stern eyes of trained observers, less pitiful than Dante's demons, will mark their demeanour the while. Should they wince more than the brief allotted breadth of seconds, they are condemned to the ignominy of an inferior certificate or none. These trials are only for watches of high rank, and if their time-keeping qualities throughout the ordeal are such as to entitle them, are awarded what is known and valued as the Kew Certificate.

MISS MILLARD, of Teddington, is her own litterateur, and her advertisements of laces and curios contain many a pleasing touch. In a catalogue that lies before us we read:

Ancient Crewel and Rarest Needlework, from the earliest kind possible to find anywhere on sale at the present time. In handling these pieces one must confess to a tender and pathetic feeling in having the poet's words vividly brought to mind:

"Long laid to rest the patient hands,
That played with formal tints;
And faded are the silken strands,
As sad and sallow chintz."

Pair of lady's pale blue satin and silver shoes of Henry VIII. reign, with outdoor pattens in ruby velvet embroidered in silver. Of course these shoes are greatly faded, but are so rare and desirable that it matters little, and, indeed, after so many years can only be expected. The wearer must have had a sweet little foot, and was, no doubt, of royal blood, as such shoes in those days were only worn by the highest in the land; the famous Gunning shoe could never have been anything to compare with these; a chance for the collector, £7 7s.

THE force of intrusive journalism can hardly go further than it does in a long article on the personality, associations, and family of Mr. Stephen Phillips, printed in the New York Saturday Review. Mr. Phillips's clothes, pipe, parentage, marriage, brothers, sisters, and poet-cousins (Mr. Binyon and Mr. Bridges) are all described in turn. We have no intention to quote these irrelevancies. But some of the particulars given about Mr. Phillips himself have at least the charm of novelty. We were not aware that Mr. Phillips's "distinguished merit has caused the Queen to put him on the Civil List." Neither, it seems, were we correctly informed of his place of residence. "Mr. Phillips," we are assured, "does not seek sequestered scenes, daisied meadows, the banks of babbling brooks, or the solitude of sylvan glades in which to do his musings. With measured tread, head slightly bowed, and with his trusty briar in his mouth, the poet prefers to roam along the bustling streets near his Finsbury home, which is situated in the heart of London; there to take his inspiration from the multitudinous phases and aspects of metropolitan life, pausing now and again as he walks to make a note of some suggestion which may prove useful to him later on when he is seated at his desk." We do not, however, advise any young admirer of Mr. Phillips to hang about Finsbury-pavement in the hope of seeing Mr. Phillips "doing his musings." A third piece of news is even more startling. We are told that "Sir Richard Hatton, of the Spectator, says that Phillips is a born journalist."

PROF. BARRETT WENDELL, whose Literary History of America we review this week, holds the English Chair at Harvard, where he has established a reputation rather similar to that enjoyed, on this side, by Prof. Walter Raleigh. He has now been teaching literature for twenty years, and during that period he has written a number of books, including a manual of English Composition, Shakespeare, a Study in Elizabethan Literature, "Raleigh in Guiana," a play, and some novels, of which the best known is, perhaps, The Duchess Emelia.

MR. STEDMAN's anthology of American poetry is considered a big thing in America, big in itself and in all it suggests. It is significant, however, that a writer in the Forum is unable to discuss the book without falling into remarks on the longevity of poets, the confusion between maiden and married names, the number of poets with identical names, the occupations of poets, &c. On the last-named subject he points out that the professional poet is almost unknown in America. "I believe Walt Whitman was the only American who inscribed 'Poet' on his door-plate, and he was the only American writer who has recorded his whole experience in song." The following added remarks are interesting:

I suppose no American ever set himself the task that Browning undertook—to write a poem every day for a given period. Browning was a professional poet, and you may get from him an idea of the total energy of an Englishman. But American poetry is occasional. Glenville Mellen is known as "the singer of one song," and "Waiting" is the one emotional experience John Burroughs has given poetic expression to in a busy lifetime. Hawthorne and Webster are credited with two or three poems carelessly preserved. James Fenimore Cooper wrote perhaps three. Bryant must do his day's work in his office, Lowell and Markham and Burton in a teacher's chair, Bret Harte in the mines, Stedman and Carryl at the Stock Exchange, Cheney at the Library. Field must labour at the "News" office, Ellsworth in invention, Crosby at the bar, Mitchell at the Sanitarium, Collyer at the forge, Brooks and Van Dyke in the pulpit. Cooper and Hawthorne exhausted their energy in fiction. Winter has dramatic criticism to write. Emerson had lectures to deliver. Lanier played the flute in the Baltimore orchestra.

IN reference to the biography of Helen Faucit, Sir Theodore Martin has written to a correspondent, who had called attention to a reminiscence of the performance of "King John" in the late Thomas Arnold's History of English Literature: "I thank you for your letter, and for the extract from Thomas Arnold's book. I had not before seen it, but, in any case, I could not have used it, there exist so many much more elaborate records of the performance of 'King John' at Drury Lane under Mr. Macready. The difficulty was not what to print, but what not to print." This, it will be noticed, is a reply to the objections urged against the biography, of two free quotations from contemporary dramatic criticisms. The letter concludes: "I am glad you have found my translations of the classics serviceable. They were meant as a help to men who wished to keep up their knowledge of the classics, which is very apt to slip away from us in active life."

THE Lady's Magazine (Pearson, Ltd.) makes its debut this week. It is neat and well printed and illustrated, but we find in it no original feature. We should not know that we were turning the pages of a brand new magazine if we did not refer to the cover. Mr. Hall Caine's new novel, The Eternal City, begins its run with plenty of Papacy and intrigue and spectacle. A principal character is introduced as follows:

"Who is Donna Roma?" said the Englishman.

"Santo Dio! the man doesn't know Donna Roma."

The white plumes bobbed up, the powdered face fell back, the little twinkling eyes closed, and the company laughed and seated themselves in the loggia.

"Donna Roma, dear sir," said the young Roman, "is a type of the fair lady who has appeared in the history of every nation since the days of Helen of Troy—one of those exquisite creatures whose lovely eyes and rosy mouth exercise a function in the state. . . . Why did the Prime Minister appoint So-and-so?—Donna Roma! Why did he dismiss Such-and-such?—Donna Roma! What feminine influence imposed upon the nation this or that?—Donna Roma! Through whom come titles, decorations, honours?—Donna Roma! Who pacifies intractable politicians and makes them the devoted followers of the Ministers?—Donna Roma! Who organises the great charitable committees, collects funds and distributes them?—Donna Roma! Always, always Donna Roma!"

IN Messrs. Mudie's Select Library Catalogue for 1901 the classification inaugurated last year is continued, and is extended to History, Travel, and Topography. To borrowers the catalogue is more than ever useful, and we find it excellent for reference.

Bibliographical.

THE daily papers have naturally dealt more or less comprehensively with the publications of the late Bishop of London. They have not, however, quite exhausted the subject, having no room for details. One may record, therefore, that the Bishop's opus maximum—The Papacy During the Reformation—was given to the public between 1882 and 1897, in this way: between 1882 and 1887, four volumes; in 1894, the fifth volume; and then, in 1897, the whole work in six volumes. Dr. Creighton's monograph on Queen Elizabeth had the distinction of appearing in three different forms at different prices. The first two were seen in 1896, and the third (and cheapest) in 1899. Some of the Bishop's publications were very slight in bulk—simple sermons or addresses, for instance, like The Hope of the Future (preached at Sandringham in 1899) and The Position of the Church of England (an address delivered at ruridecanal conferences in the same year). He also published his Rede Lecture and Hulsean Lecture in 1895. On the whole, one is struck by the wide range of his intellectual interests. He was by no means historian and ecclesiastic exclusively.

The announcement of Mr. F. S. Ellis's forthcoming autobiography reminds one of some of his more recent literary benefactions—for example, the Concordance to the Poems of Shelley, which he brought out in 1892. It is not so very long since he issued his metrical arrangement (with metrical glossarial notes) of the old English version of "Reynard the Fox." Mr. Ellis has been one of those literary publishers of whom the number cannot be too large for the interests of literature. I believe the firm of Ellis & Elvey confine themselves now to the sale of old and rare books. One would like to have a record of their original contributions to the book world. Why do not all the publishers follow Messrs. Macmillan's example, and give us a Bibliographical Catalogue of their productions from the beginning till now?

Those who have purchased Mr. Quiller-Couch's Oxford Book of English Verse will hear with mingled feelings that a revised edition of that work may be looked for soon. It is hinted that Mr. Quiller-Couch had to reduce the bulk of his anthology at the last moment, and hence the limited (and, as many think, inadequate) measure of room accorded to contemporary bards. Will this section of the book be expanded, or will it be omitted altogether? The subject seems to demand a volume for itself. It is said, by the way, that Mr. Quiller-Couch proposes to introduce John Wesley into his next novel. Wesley figured in a recent novel by Miss Braddon?

Sir Robert Finlay has been recommending people—and, primarily, I suppose, Scotch people—to read Scott's Tales of a Grandfather more than they do. Is there any sign, then, that the work is falling off in popularity? Perhaps young persons are annoyed when they open the book and find that it consists (more or less) of facts, and not (altogether) of fiction. It cannot be that the Tales are not sufficiently accessible. Within the last decade there have been several editions, all at moderate prices—one in 1892 (in three volumes), one or two (cheap) in 1893, and two in 1898, the last-named being in two and one-volume forms, with an introduction by Dean Farrar (que diable allait-il faire? and so forth).

IN none of the notices of the late Mr. R. C. Christie seen by me were there any allusions to what was probably his most popular achievement—his edition of the poems of Dryden, contributed, with an introductory memoir, to the "Globe" series of Messrs. Macmillan. This was, and is, an excellent piece of work; would that Mr. Christie had thought well to edit Dryden's plays, or at any rate a selection from them. Of his masterpiece, The Life of Etienne Dolet, Martyr of the Renaissance, a new edition (at half-a-sovereign) was issued so recently as 1899, the year which witnessed the Bibliographical Society's publication of his Incunabulum of Brescia.

I note that Mr. Edgar Pemberton's forthcoming book on Mr. Bret Harte is announced as "a treatise and a tribute." This is pleasing, for it seems to suggest that the work will not be a biography after all, or, at any rate, will be biographical only to a small degree. Mr. Pemberton has had in contemplation, I believe, a memoir of Mr. Charles Wyndham, the actor; but it is possible, I understand, that he may produce, instead, an account of Mr. Wyndham's long occupation of the Criterion Theatre. That would have real value for theatrical students.

The selections from Reviews of the Century which have been made and printed by a contemporary, have been read, we may be sure, with interest. The idea, however, is by no means new. It is, in fact, just ten years old, for in 1890 there was added to the Scott Library a little volume, edited by E. Stevenson, and called Early Reviews of Great Writers—a careful and interesting collection, covering the period between 1786 and 1832. In this case, if I remember rightly, the reviews were given in full, and are, therefore, the more readable and suggestive. This resuscitation of old judgments is, however, rather hard on the judges.

Reviews.

Magic and Religion.

The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion. By J. G. Frazer. Second Edition. 3 vols. (Macmillan. 36s.)

THE publication, ten years ago, of the first edition of The Golden Bough was a momentous event in the history of the studies to which it belongs. It did more than any other book, with the possible exceptions of Prof. Tylor's Primitive Culture and Mr. Lang's Myth, Ritual, and Religion, to shift the discussion of religious origins to a more profitable field than that of philology. The literary charm of Mr. Frazer's treatment interested a wide circle of readers in the scientific aspects of folk-tale and folk-custom, and the range of learning upon which he drew for the illustration of his argument served once for all as an object-lesson in the value of the comparative method. Mr. Frazer's plan of starting from the interpretation of a particular historic custom and gradually introducing his discussions of primitive religious ideas as bearing upon this was undeniably fascinating. It was not, perhaps, the most scientific scheme that could be devised, since it somewhat tended to obscure the important question of the stratification of religious ideas, which in a more formal treatise, such as Prof. Jevons's Introduction to the History of Religion, prevails so largely. But in spite of this, and in spite of the possibility that some of its central conceptions may not find ultimate acceptance, The Golden Bough, especially in its new and greatly enlarged form, will always remain at once a model of scholarly investigation and a storehouse of carefully classified anthropological facts. And, as Mr. Frazer rightly points out in the preface which he has written for this second edition, the interest of his subject is not merely a curious one. Like all great scientific advances, that which The Golden Bough represents has its revolutionary side. The anthropological study of religion in its genesis makes impossible certain ways of regarding religion in its essence.

It is indeed a melancholy, and in some respects thankless, task to strike at the foundations of beliefs in which, as in a strong tower, the hopes and aspirations of humanity through long ages have sought a refuge from the storm and stress of life. Yet sooner or later it is inevitable that the battery of the comparative method should breach these venerable walls, mantled over with the ivy and mosses and wild flowers of a thousand tender and sacred associations. At present we are only dragging the guns into position; they have hardly yet begun to speak. The task of building up into fairer and more enduring forms the old structures so rudely shattered is reserved for other hands, perhaps for other and happier ages. We cannot foresee, we can hardly even guess, the new forms into which thought and society will run in the future. Yet this certainty ought not to induce us from any consideration of expediency or regard for antiquity to spare the ancient moulds, however beautiful, when these are proved to be outworn. Whatever comes of it, wherever it leads us, we must follow truth alone. It is our only guiding star: huc signo vinces.

For the benefit of those who now approach The Golden Bough for the first time, it may be well to give a brief summary of the problem with which Mr. Frazer sets himself to grapple and of the means by which he attacks it. "Lapped in a green hollow of the Alban Hills" lies the placid lake of Nemi, known to the ancients as the lake of Aricia. On the northern shore once stood a grove and sanctuary of Diana Nemorensis, "Diana of the Wood." The priest of this shrine held his office on a singular tenure, only so long, in fact, as his hands could keep his head. Within the grove stood a sacred tree, a branch of which was, according to legend, the Golden Bough which Æneas must pluck before he began his perilous descent into the world of shades. Could some runaway slave succeed in plucking this branch, he was entitled to challenge the existing priest to single combat, and, if he slew him, to hold office in his stead as "King of the Wood" until he, too, met a similar fate. This remarkable and bloodstained custom has laid hold upon many imaginations, from Macaulay, who sang of

The priest who slew the slayer,
And shall himself be slain,

to the author of Eleanor. It lasted to the age of the mild Antonines; but classical writers give no intelligible explanation of its origin, and to the Italians of history it was probably only a conservative survival. Comparative anthropology claims, however, to lay bare the primitive cycle of religious ideas in which so extraordinary a ritual is rooted. Here are some of the questions which Mr. Frazer asks himself, and to which he endeavours to find answers: Why was the priest called a king? Why was he the king "of the wood"? Why must his accession depend upon the previous murder of his predecessor? Why must this murder be itself preceded by the capture of a bough from the sacred tree? Each of these topics in its turn leads to a wide excursion among the tangled jungles of primitive ceremony and psychology. The relation of kingship to priesthood; the nature of incarnation, taboos, tree-worship; the spirit of fertilisation; the seasonal festivals of agriculture; the rationale of human and animal sacrifice; totemism; the belief in an external soul—upon them all Mr. Frazer accumulates an exhaustive store of example and illustration, sometimes, it must be confessed, pursuing his research beyond the absolutely necessary limits set by his main argument.

The contents of the new edition may be roughly estimated as about double those of the first. This increase in bulk is due not to any extension of the scope of the book, but to the incorporation throughout of a large quantity of new material rendered available by the progress of Mr. Frazer's own studies and of anthropological research generally during the last decade. Occasionally a whole new section, such as that on "The Saturnalia and Kindred Festivals" is added. A useful preliminary analysis affords the student something of a key through the labyrinth. On the other hand the index, in which the character of the work required extreme fulness, is as irritatingly inadequate as ever. And we find that the general argument is less modified or strengthened in deference to criticisms than we should have expected. For example, Mr. Frazer explains the periodical death of the King of the Wood, and of other similar priestly functionaries elsewhere, somewhat in this fashion: the priest is identified, by a process of primitive thought to which parallels can be given, with the deity of whom he is priest. But the deity must periodically suffer death and be reincarnated, in order that he may not grow old and so lose the virility upon which his protective powers depends. This process is carried out in his human representative. When priest slays and succeeds to priest, the youth and strength of the god receive a fresh lease of life for a new period. But, as it seems to us, Mr. Frazer has still to prove that these notions, of the identity of priest and god, and of the liability of the god to decay and loss of powers, are in any way in the necessary and normal line of religious evolution. They occur in certain parts of the world, notably in Mexico: but have they been universal, and in particular, can they be traced in the history of European or Mediterranean cults? We incline to doubt it, and to think that Mr. Frazer too readily finds evidence of the god incarnate in the priest. Thus at spring festivals a worshipper masquerades in a garment of young leaves, a Jack in the Green, and Mr. Frazer at once assumes that such a personage represents, is even identified with, the spirit of vegetation. It is not necessarily so. We may have to deal with a mere dramatic or symbolical representation of the spring. Or the underlying notion may be a magical one. One of the commonest forms of magic is the magic of immediate contact. And the worshipper clad in the leaves which are god is the worshipper putting himself under the immediate influence and direct protection of that god. But he is still worshipper, and by no means god. It is Prof. Jevons, if we remember right, who has suggested what seems, on the whole, a more plausible explanation of the "slayer slain" than Mr. Frazer's. The priest is slain, not because he is the god, but because he has killed the god. His death is not a sacrifice, but it arises out of sacrifice. The god is incarnate, not in a man, but in an animal; and is sacrificed not to restore his vitality, but in order that his worshippers may partake of that vitality by eating him in the sacrificial meal. This is the magic of physical contact again. But who will dare to slay him? Only the bravest among the tribesmen, who thus incurs special sanctity by being the first to come in contact with the divine blood. At the same time he incurs blood-guiltiness—witness the curious Greek ritual of the bouphonia—and when his special sanctity has worn off then his death is a deferred punishment.

Mr. Frazer has, however, much improved the speculative part of his book by a more exact definition of the difference between magic and religion. Magic is, of the two, the earlier attitude of man towards the not-man. It is primitive science.

Wherever sympathetic magic occurs in its pure, unadulterated form, it assumes that in nature one event follows another necessarily and invariably, without the intervention of any spiritual or personal agency. Thus its fundamental conception is identical with that of modern science; underlying the whole system is a faith, implicit but real and firm, in the order and uniformity of nature. The magician does not doubt that the same causes will always produce the same effects; that the performance of the proper ceremony, accompanied by the appropriate spell, will inevitably be attended by the desired results, unless, indeed, his incantations should chance to be thwarted and foiled by the more potent charms of another sorcerer. He supplicates no higher power; he sues the favour of no fickle and wayward being; he abases himself before no awful deity.

It is true that the causes put into play by magic are not, as a matter of fact, those that can actually produce the desired effects: but that is a detail; the scientific intention is there. Religion comes in with animism; the recognition, or supposed recognition, in the not-man of personalities believed to act like man and to be approachable in the same way in which a fellow-man is approached.

By religion, then, I understand a propitiation or conciliation of powers superior to man, which are believed to direct and control the course of nature and of human life. In this sense it will readily be perceived that religion is opposed in principle both to magic and to science. For all conciliation implies that the being conciliated is a conscious or personal agent; that his conduct is, in some measure, uncertain; and that he can be prevailed upon to vary it in the desired direction by a judicious appeal to his interests, his appetites, or his emotions. Conciliation is never employed towards things which are regarded as inanimate, nor towards persons whose behaviour in the particular circumstances is known to be determined with absolute certainty. Thus, in so far as religion assumes the world to be directed by conscious agents who may be turned from their purposes by persuasion, it stands in fundamental antagonism to magic as well as to science, both of which take it for granted that the course of nature is determined, not by the passions or caprice of personal beings, but by the operation of immutable laws acting mechanically.

The distinction is a valuable one, and the only fault we have to find with Mr. Frazer's statement of it is that he appears to include "spells," "incantations," and "charms" under the head of magic, whereas it is arguable that these were, originally at least, of the nature of prayer, which is conciliation, and so belong to the religious stage. Of course magical practices survive when religion has superseded, their conscious meaning sometimes disappearing and sometimes taking on a religious colour. Sacrifice, for instance, which probably has its roots in magic, tends more and more to become propitiatory rather than sacramental. But Mr. Frazer's definition of the term magic requires a caution; it does not cover the magic of the witch or of any sorcerer who professes to obtain his objects by the aid of an evil spirit or familiar. Such magic answers to Mr. Frazer's definition of religion. The practice of it is, in fact, a continued underground cult of dethroned deities, such as the heathen mother-goddess whose open worship Christianity had banned, or in earlier times, as when Canidia mixed her potions, some obscure Italian deity unrecognised by the official hierarchy of Rome. For magic in this sense it was perhaps better to find some less ambiguous term.

The new section on "The Saturnalia and Kindred Festivals" contains some interesting matter. Mr. Frazer quotes the recently discovered "Acts of St. Dasius" to show that as late as the beginning of the fourth century it was still the custom of the Roman legion in Lower Mœsia to put to death its Saturnalian "king." This "king" was chosen by lot thirty days before. For a month he went richly arrayed and indulged in every form of riot and wantonness. At the end of that period he cut his own throat on the altar of the god. St. Dasius was a Christian soldier, who refused to sully his last days by debauchery, and who for his refusal was slain by his fellows. Mr. Frazer also traces a spring festival analogous to the Saturnalia in the Saccæa at Babylon and the Purim of the Jews. He believes that here, too, there was a ceremonial human death, that the story of Esther had its origin in a myth intended to explain the survival of the custom, and that it was possibly performed dramatically at the feast, the slain man and his priestly successor taking respectively the parts of Haman and Mordecai. This leads to a startling suggestion, which is, that the Crucifixion was of the nature of such a dramatic performance, in which Christ, as a condemned prisoner, was made to play the part of Haman. The arguments by which this view is supported cannot be detailed here, and it must be frankly admitted that much in them is conjectural; but it is obvious that, if Christ was put to death as a festival mock king, an explanation is forthcoming of certain features of the Gospel narrative—the crown of thorns, the superscription on the cross, and so forth—which certainly do not belong to Roman judicial procedure, and for which no other reason can be plausibly assigned. Mr. Frazer considers that Barabbas was the Mordecai on this occasion.

The Popular Style.

Harvest-Tide. By Sir Lewis Morris. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)

We are not devoted admirers of The Epic of Hades, but it is a great drop from that to this latest volume of Sir Lewis Morris. Then he wore the singing-robe of Tennyson; and we prefer it to this composite Sir Lewis, following now one model, now another, and again welding clichés from many sources to a perfectly featureless result, in which no individuality is discernible—least of all the poet's own. In one poem we have the familiar Tennysonian style which we associate with Sir Lewis; in another (to which we shall return) he has apparently essayed the mood of Tennyson's "Higher Pantheism"; in a third, he has seemingly been reading Mr. Watson's "Hymn to the Sea," for he adopts its English pentameters. The metre, of course, is classical; but (save for a couplet of Coleridge) we are not aware that any poet before Mr. Watson had attempted to naturalise the metre. Consequently, it is of Mr. Watson we think when we read such verse as this:

Man that is born of a Woman the pride and the shame of Creation;
Man that soars upward to Heaven and sinks to the nether-
most Hell;
Man that is lower than the brute and yet higher in rank
than the Angels;
Man with vile lusts that dishonour, and yearnings that soar to the skies.

The reader will not desire more. Of the third kind to which we referred—the colourless—the “Coming of the Muse” is a specimen. We quote from it—it is too long to quote entire:

The shy Muse, rarely seen, at times
Floats down, yet will not stay,
But hides her unembodied rhymes
Far, far away.

From out the blank unpeopled page
There shines no vision fair,
And on the poet's noble rage
Broods cold despair.

In vain to toil, in vain to strive,
Efforts and vows are naught:
No favouring impulse comes to drive
The lagging thought.

Then sudden, 'mid the darkling chill,
Dead hope and strivings vain,
A ghostly radiance seems to fill
His heart and brain.

Far-off and thin, translucent, white,
His straining eyeballs trace,
Half-hidden, a phantom of delight,
A sweet veiled face.

And straight, 'tis Life, 'tis Youth, 'tis Spring
That comes his toil to cheer;
Blithe Fancy spreads a joyous wing—
“The Muse is here.”

This has the tinge of no poet in particular, but it would be difficult to find more crusted phrases in an equal compass. Could you have more worn poetic cliches than the rhymes of that second stanza? “Vision fair,”—“noble rage”—“cold despair.” Sir Lewis might have left the “noble rage” in the repository of the eighteenth century. Mrs. Meynell has directed upon the poor phrase some of the most feathery satire. We quote from The Flower of the Mind:

Pope and all the politer poets nursed something they were pleased to call a “rage,” and this expatiated (to use another word of their own) beyond all bounds. Of sheer voluntary extremes it is not in the seventeenth century conceit that we should seek examples, but in an eighteenth century “rage.” A “noble rage,” properly provoked, could be backed to write more trash than fancy ever tempted the half-incredulous sweet poet of the older time to run upon. He was fancy's child, and the bard of the eighteenth century was the child of common sense with straws in his hair—vainly arranged there.

This delicate derision should have made it impossible for any modern poet to revive the dull old phrase. Sir Lewis seems, however, to have been browsing on the eighteenth century, for a little further on we have “vernal grove.” But in the same stanza “foam-flowered wave” whisks us back again to Mr. Swinburne:

One moon-flower making all the foam-flowers fair.

But if you would understand how Sir Lewis Morris can be a popular poet, you must read “A New Orphic Hymn.” It is an echo of Tennyson in “The Higher Pantheism,” and not at all Orphic. Thus it opens:

The peaks, and the starlit skies, the deeps of the fathom-less seas,
Immanent is He in all, yet higher and deeper than these.
The heart, and the mind, and the soul, the thought and the yearnings of Man,
Of His essence are one and all, and yet define it who can?

Sir Lewis does not define it, but he pours out a succession of platitudes in language sufficiently sonorous to give the general man a conviction he is reading something very deep and lofty, and—rather to his surprise—understands it. Which puts him on good terms with himself and the poet.

The malefic invisible atoms unmarked by man's purblind eye,
That beleaguer our House of Life, and compass us till we die;

All these are parts of Him, the indivisible One,
Who supports and illumines the many, Creation's Pillar and Sun!

Though Sir Lewis may devoutly hold it true, it goes perilously near bathos to tell us that microbes are a part of the Deity. But it is the one instance of anything like imaginative expression. The next stanza is, at any rate, not obvious:

Yea, and far in the depths of Being, too dark for a mortal brain,
Lurk His secrets of Evil and Wrong, His creatures of Death and of Pain.

What the creatures of Death and of Pain may be, how or why they lurk far in the depths of Being, or what the depths of Being may be, are matters as puzzling as what sort of a philosophy, “too dark for mortal brain,” lurks in this cryptic stanza. Yet even it will have a vague impressiveness for the popular reader.

These things fairly represent the staple of the book, but better things than these Sir Lewis Morris sometimes does, as in the poem to the birds, “Flying Southward by Night,” where he bids them remember England in their land of sun:

Here is your home and ours, where the young brood
Were born, and essayed first their callow wings:
Here, where laborious summers gained their food,
And homely love despised all outer things.
Here is full life, not there, though flowers and fruit;
Unfading spring, and weal be yours and rest,
The North still holds the nest.

That is at least scholarly verse and unaffected, with a thought in it; and the rest of the poem is not unworthy of it, marred by few cliches. If the volume contained more of equal merit, we should have had pleasure in expressing an opinion more favourable.

A Great Seaman.

Paul Jones: Founder of the American Navy. By Augustus C. Buell. 2 Vols. (Kegan Paul. 12s.)

It was time that some attempt at an exhaustive biography of Paul Jones should be made. We have had scraps of him before, episodes, interested depreciations, disinterested eulogies—all tending to the fuller knowledge of a most vital and powerful personality, yet with so much clashing of evidence and variation of points of view that the main figure looms luridly as something between a demon and a god. Mr. Buell has set Paul Jones clearly before us; he has gathered much information from sources hitherto untapped, and has produced a most interesting and exhaustive biography of the Scotsman who was a consistent, but worthy, enemy of England. We cannot go all the way with Mr. Buell in some phases of his hero-worship, but such favouritism as he shows is by way of inference and comment, and not by distortion of facts. This may readily be forgiven to an author whose “effort has been to write a history of Paul Jones as truthful as a great-grandfather's services under Paul Jones were faithful.”

Accident, rather than any great obsession of “liberty and the rights of man,” made Paul Jones the most formidable sea-enemy of England of his time. This, it seems to us, is a perfectly just statement of the case. The man who sailed under English mercantile colours for several voyages became the proprietor of an estate in Virginia by a mere accident of death. His brother, William Paul, the adopted son of William Jones, a Virginia planter, had assumed the adopted father's patronymic; and this brother dying soon after Paul had anchored in the Rappahannock, the patronymic and the estate came into the possession of the young captain at a crucial period. The ferment of the rebellion was already stirring. Jones settled down to "the idyllic life of a Virginia planter"; but not for long. Adventure, the sea yearning, the passion for wide horizons were in his blood. Two years later he was gazetted first senior lieutenant in the young American navy. Five men received captains' commissions; the soul of the whole movement only a lieutenant's. Of these five captains:

Four . . . were respectable skippers; and they all outlived the war! One of them was the kind of naval captain that the God of Battles makes. That one was Nick Biddle—poor, brave Nick!—and he died in hopeless battle with a foe double his own strength, half of his hapless ship going down and the other half going up by the explosion of his magazine.

The first expedition of the first squadron of the new navy, which lasted from February 17 to April 8, 1776, was abortive. Its only result was the dismissal of one incompetent captain and the suspension of Paul Jones's chief. The first lieutenant, a month later, was given the command of the Providence, a sloop-of-war carrying fourteen guns and 107 men. With this little ship Jones scoured seas thick with English cruisers, and captured in all sixteen vessels. In June of 1777 he was, after a period of duty on the Board of Advice, appointed by Congress to the command of the Ranger, a ship-sloop with a battery of twenty long six-pounders. On October 19 he set sail for France, carrying despatches which contained the fateful news of the surrender of Burgoyne. Then followed one of the many disappointments which dogged, though they never dimmed, a brilliant career. The Indien, a new ship building at Amsterdam, of which Jones was to have taken command, was, upon launching, denounced by the British Minister to the Netherlands as an American ship-of-war in disguise. The secret had been betrayed to the British Government by Thornton, one of the numerous private secretaries of the egregious Arthur Lee. The States General, not daring to give up the ship to the American Commissioners, she was sold by them to the King of France, the next best thing to having her themselves. Paul Jones returned to the Ranger at Brest to find that his first lieutenant, Simpson, had been stirring up dissatisfaction among the crew. Said Jones to his refractory junior:

I command this ship, Mr. Simpson, by virtue of my senior rank, by virtue of the resolution of Congress . . . and by virtue of the order of the Commissioners. But I will urge none of these considerations upon you in your present attitude. So far as you are concerned, I will only say that I command this ship by virtue of the fact that I am the best man aboard—a fact which I shall cheerfully demonstrate to you at your pleasure! And I wish you to signify your pleasure to me here and now!

Lieutenant Simpson, who was a brave man and no fool, did not choose to go further. And on this matter of Jones's discipline we may here quote from the narrative of Henry Gardner:

I sailed, in my time, with many captains; but with only one Paul Jones. He was the captain of captains. Any other commander I sailed with had some kind of method or fixed rule which he exerted towards all those under him alike . . . Not so Paul Jones. He always knew every officer or man in his crew as one friend knows another. . . . I have seen him one hour teaching the French language to his midshipmen and the next showing an apprentice how to knot a "Turk's-head" or make a neat coil-down of a painter. He was in everybody's watch and everybody's mess all the time. . . . Above all things, he hated the cat-o'-nine tails. In two of his ships—the Providence and the Ranger—he threw it overboard the first day out. . . . All the men under his command soon learned this trait in his character. One Sunday . . . he told them that, many years before . . . he had seen a man "flogged round the fleet" at Port Royal, Jamaica. He said the man died under the lash; and he then made up his mind that Paul Jones and the cat-o'-nine tails would part company. "I tell you, my men," he said, "once for all, that when I become convinced that a sailor of mine must be killed, I will not leave it to be done by boatswain's mates under slow torture of the lash! But I will do it myself—and so G—d—quick that it will make your heads swim."

No wonder that his crews loved him!

In the Ranger he set out from Brest for a cruise on the British coasts, and off Carrickfergus captured the twenty-gun sloop-of-war, the Drake. "Small as the ships were," says Mr. Buell, "this action involved the turning of a new page in naval history, and to that fact alone it owes its celebrity. It was the first instance in modern naval warfare of the capture of a regular British man-of-war by a ship of inferior force." But this exploit gives place to the really glorious fight between the Bon Homme Richard and the Serapis—the former under the command of Jones, the latter of Captain Richard Pearson. A personal appeal to Louis XVI., after the French Alliance, had secured for Jones, then Commodore, this commission by way of solatium for the loss of the Indien's command. In August, 1779, the flag-ship, with three smaller vessels, left the Road of Groaix for a circuit of the British Islands. One of the smaller vessels was the Alliance, under the command of Pierre Landais, as great a coward and traitor as ever disgraced a quarter-deck.

On the afternoon of December 23, the Bon Homme Richard being to the windward of Flamboro' Head, the whole Baltic Fleet appeared running out of Bridlington Bay, under convoy of the Serapis and a sloop-of-war. Paul Jones's chance had come. In a letter to Dr. Franklin he wrote:

Earnest as I was for the action, I could not reach the Commodore's ship till seven o'clock in the evening, being then within pistol-shot, when he hailed the Bon Homme Richard, and we answered him by our whole broadside.

The last entry in the log of the Serapis ran thus:

Ships now fairly abeam, a cable's length . . . on the same tack, wind abeam, south-west, light but steady. Sea smooth, moon full, sky clear, time 7.15 p.m. We hail second time, enemy answers with broadside.

The battle lasted for close on four hours. The heavier battery of the Serapis told with deadly effect. After an hour's broadsiding Jones saw that the game was not to be won that way. "Dick," he said to Gardner, his first quarter-gunner, "his metal is too heavy for us at this business. He is hammering us all to pieces. We must close with him; we must get hold of him." And close they did. When the ships were ranged alongside, the anchor-fluke of the Serapis caught in the mizzen foot shrouds of the Richard; the fluke was immediately lashed fast to the stays, and boarding became practicable. The Richard was on fire and had five feet of water in her hold; her starboard side was completely driven in, so that the whole gun-deck was in imminent danger of collapse. Yet she conquered by the desperate valour inspired by the overwhelming personality of one man. And having conquered, and the wounded being removed to the conquered ship, she sank with her dead, and with her flag flying. It was the flag which the girls of Portsmouth had made out of pieces of their best silk gowns.

We have not space to follow the career of Paul Jones through the further vicissitudes and triumphs which marked its amazing course. He was made a Chevalier of France by Louis XVI., and was the lover of Aimée de Telison, a natural daughter of Louis XV.; he became a vice-admiral in the Russian Navy, and died in his boots at forty-five. The fiery activity of the man burnt out his life. If he had lived he would, we may suppose, have played some startling part in the bloody drama of the French Revolution. Perhaps it is as well for his memory that he saw no more than the vague first stirrings of that upheaval. As it was he died with a reputation unsmirched, a personal honour untarnished. His faults were the faults of greatness, and no Englishman need grudge his name a place beside the names of Drake and Grenville. His was their spirit, though he sailed under another flag.

Things Seen in Spain.

Spanish Highways and Byways. By Katharine Lee Bates. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a companion volume to Mr. Clifton Johnston's Along French Byways, which we reviewed with pleasure a few weeks ago. It does afresh, and freshly, what has been done many times before: it records the impressions of a wide-awake tourist in Spain just as they were received. Miss Bates travelled through the most romantic cities and provinces of Spain with a lady companion; and, thanks to her knowledge of Spanish and her keen American eyes, she observed enough to fill this book with vital descriptions. The travellers went firmly resolved to eschew the bull-fight, and all we can say is that Miss Bates's account of the bull-fight she did not eschew is mighty good reading. To be sure, the horror and nausea of it haunted her for weeks, and her sufferings even excited the notice of her Spanish host, who was greatly puzzled. He pointed out that the corrida had been a mild one, very suitable for a beginner—no fire-darts, no houghing of the bull, nothing really horrible. "And, after all," he urged, "animals are only animals; they are not Christians." "Who were the Christians in that Circus?" I asked. "How could devils have been worse than we?" He half glanced toward the morning paper, but was too kindly to speak his thought. It was not necessary. I had read the paper, which gave half a column to a detailed account of a recent lynching, with torture, in the United States." In Madrid, in Seville, in Granada, in Santander, and among the Basques, Miss Bates had glimpses into Spain and the Spanish mind. Her identification of religious types is quick and interesting. Spain is not all pious; some of her children are born to laugh at priests. One of the best things in the book is the author's discourse with such an indiferente—a cheery old pagan who had never read Calderon, but was inordinately proud of a paper-bound geografia he had written for use in Spanish schools. From this he read long passages to Miss Bates, and the only feature of which he seemed ashamed was its occasional sops to superstition, as when he stated that in the Cathedral of Santiago de Compostela is the veritable body of St. James. "He cast a quizzical glance at me in reading this, and then laughed himself purple in the face. 'One has to say these things in this country,' he gasped, still breathless for his mirth. 'Drops of water must run with the stream. If only there were a shrine where people might be cured of being fools!'" This man had also compiled an anthology of Castilian poems; its most striking feature was the printing of each poem in a different type. He explained that this made the reading harder for children, and so exercised their minds the more. We leave the idea to the consideration of educational editors. Miss Bates read to him Calderon's "El Mágico Prodigioso," with its great argument between Cipriano and Lucifer as to the nature of God. The old wordling was delighted, and for the moment it seemed that he was almost persuaded to be a Christian. But when the drama was finished, he remained silent for several minutes, shook his head, and delivered himself: "Not true; it is not true. There is no devil but the evil passions of humanity. And as for Cipriano's definition of God—it is good, yes; it is great, yes; but who can shut God into a definition? One might as well try to scoop the ocean into a cocoa-nut shell. No! All religions are human fictions. We have come, nobody knows whence or why, into this paltry, foolish, sordid life, for most of us only a fight to gain the bread, and then Bueno! I am on the brink of the jump, and the priests have not frightened me yet." This unbelieving compiler of schoolbooks was highly popular with his neighbours, and suffered none of the petty persecutions which are meted out to Spanish Protestants. College boys did not stone his windows, work and promotion had not failed him, for his house he paid only the rent of a Catholic, and he was held in high honour for the scholarship that had underpinned his faith. Miss Bates has written a thoroughly bright and discerning book on a land that lures us all to its tower-crowned cities and arid plains, alike steeped in romance. One word more: the chapter on "Choral Games of Spanish Children" should interest some of our children's authors.

An Epic of Poor Men.

On the Track and Over the Sliprails. By Henry Lawson. (Sydney: Angus & Robertson.)

SOME little while ago we drew attention to that humane and understanding volume of Australian stories, While the Billy Boils, and now its successor and companion lies before us, notable for the same qualities of sympathy and vigour, truthfulness and humour. Together the two books make up a little body of Australian literature that stands alone as the truest and most national thing that any writer in that country has produced.

The title which we have placed at the head of this article would cover both collections; for Mr. Lawson has always sought his heroes among wanderers and wastrels. Bullock drivers, sheep shearers, professional sharpers, gold diggers, fence builders—these are his material, with the arid Bush of Australia for background, with its squalid inns and selections, its bark shanties and rambling stations, and here and there an iron-roofed town. Another man might spend a lifetime in these surroundings and find nothing but ugliness: Mr. Lawson, having the true vision, brings away a load of treasure. Mitchell's kindly philosophy; Steelman's hard-bitten worldly wisdom; Andy's simplicity and might; the Lachlan's dogged remorse; Middleton's Peter's quiet force—these are made real to us and memorable. All are poor men, all hump the swag and drink too much whiskey and fight bloody and brutal fights, and all would probably be avoided by the majority of us as unpleasant tramps or detrimentals; and every one has a drama encircling him which Mr. Lawson has penetrated. Australia should be very proud of him: he has done so much to express the genius of the country.

The best stories in Mr. Lawson's new book are, we think, "Middleton's Peter," "No Place for a Woman," "An Incident at Stiffner's," "The Hero of Red Clay," "The Selector's Daughter," "New Year's Night," "The Story of the Oracle," and "The Songs They Used to Sing," which is not properly a story at all, but a very persuasive piece of true sentiment. "The Selector's Daughter" is a study in very sombre realism. "The Hero of Red Clay," which is the longest of these little dramas, is touched in with a sardonic irony that many more ambitious novelists might envy. In "New Year's Night" we have Mr. Lawson in a happier mood, but a mood that brings us very nigh to tears. "Poor human nature" might, indeed, be the gloss to most of his pages.

His knowledge of the simple heart is profound, and his pity for it is profound also.

To quote is not easy, because these are stories in which matter comes before manner. Not that Mr. Lawson misunderstands form; on the contrary, his form is often impeccable; but he has not such literary graces as make for detached quotation. But the end of Wild, the drunken bush doctor, is a detachable episode, not only good in itself, but one that illustrates Mr. Lawson's gift of narrative directness:

Poor Doc. Wild died in a shepherd's hut at the Dry Creeks. The shepherds (white men) found him, "naked as he was born, and with the hide half burned off him with the sun," rounding up imaginary snakes on a dusty clearing, one blazing hot day. The hut-keeper had some "quare" (queer) experiences with the doctor during the next three days, and used in after years to tell of them between the puffs of his pipe, calmly and solemnly and as if the story was rather to the doctor's credit than otherwise. The shepherds sent for the police and a doctor, and sent word to Joe Middleton. Doc. Wild was sensible towards the end. His interview with the other doctor was characteristic. "And, now you see how far I am," he said in conclusion, "have you brought the brandy?" The other doctor had. Joe Middleton came with his waggonette, and in it the softest mattress and pillows the station afforded. He also, in his innocence, brought a dozen of soda-water. Doc. Wild took Joe's hand feebly, and, a little later, he "passed out" (as he would have said), murmuring "something that sounded like poetry" in an unknown tongue. Joe took the body to the home station. "Who's the boss bringin'?" asked the shearers, seeing the waggonette coming very slowly, and the boss walking by the horses' heads. "Doc. Wild," said a station hand. "Take yer hats off."

They buried him with bush honours, and chiselled his name on a slab of blue gum—a wood that lasts.

We notice with pleasure that Mr. Lawson, who is now settled in England, has begun to contribute stories to Blackwood's Magazine.

Other New Books.

HELENA FAUCIT (LADY MARTIN). BY SIR T. MARTIN.

It was well that a memoir of Helen Faucit should be written, but not so well, perhaps, that it should be written by her husband. He had, of course, all the facts of her career at his fingers' ends, but he lacked of necessity the power which a biographer ought to possess—that of regarding the career described with disinterested and impartial eyes. In this volume Miss Faucit does all things admirably. It is possible that she was invariably successful in her impersonations, but it is hardly likely. She was not always satisfied with them herself—a fact which Sir Theodore, by quoting from her diaries, permits her to bring out, thus breaking very pleasantly the sustained flow of his own eulogies. For some years Miss Faucit had the histrionic field practically to herself, as far as her own sex was concerned, and she was then admittedly our leading actress. Her performances, whatever their intrinsic merit, have certainly an historical interest, which thoroughly justifies this record of them. Incidentally, too, the memoir comes in contact with literature, inasmuch as it tells us of Miss Faucit's association with Hawthorne, Carlyle, Thackeray, George Eliot, Robert Browning, Westland Marston, Matthew Arnold, and Charles Kingsley. Arnold would have liked her to act in his Merope, and George Eliot and Kingsley would have been glad to write plays for her. Some of Kingsley's friends, however, thought that if he wrote for the stage he would impair his influence in the pulpit and on the platform, so he withdrew the proposal. The other two suggestions, as we all know, came to nothing. Altogether, this biography is not without a literary flavour, though manifestly it is mainly for the lovers and students of the stage. It is not fortunate in its index, which is both inadequate and inaccurate. It speaks, for example, of Mrs. "Sterling," and the Mr. Wyndham referred to in connexion with p. 302 is obviously not Mr. Charles Wyndham, but Mr. R. H. Wyndham, of Edinburgh. Moreover, is Sir Theodore quite sure that the play called "Plighted Troth" (p. 88) was by George Darley? The point has always been doubtful. (Blackwood.)

LINE AND FORM.

BY WALTER CRANE.

This volume, and the author's previous work, to which this is intended as a companion volume—The Basis of Design—together register in print and drawings all that is characteristic in Mr. Crane's art. The essence of that teaching is that all valid design takes its structure and idea direct from Nature; and that when the designer ceases to draw his inspiration from her his designs will sink into tasteless caprice.

How far design can be taught is another question, which Mr. Crane does not discuss in these lectures; but it is strange that with all our schools of design there should be so little really original and imaginative work produced: so little, indeed, that the other day Mr. Crane, as examiner of design for the Technical Education Board, only discovered one examinee of real merit, and she was disqualified from taking the scholarship by reason of age. Nor does Mr. Crane discuss why a certain combination of lines gives more pleasure than another; and perhaps it is as well that both difficulties, which have really nothing to do with the practice of the art, should be shelved until the elements of the subject are better known.

Whether students will benefit from these lectures or not it is certain that the reader will learn from the volume how to tell a good design from a bad one, and so, possibly, himself become an inspiration, which may be all that our technical schools are in want of. Anyway, nothing but good can result from these lectures, even if they do no more than convince us that what is wanted in modern life is more freshness of idea, greater resourcefulness and imagination, less system and less imitation. The following passage, taken with the illustrations of the text, may be regarded as a "line" symphony: at the least, it shows the high claim which Mr. Crane makes for design:

Line is, indeed, as I have before termed it, a language, a most sensitive and vigorous speech of many dialects; which can adapt itself to all purposes, and is, indeed, indispensable to all the provinces of design in line. Line may be regarded simply as a means of record, a method of registering the facts of nature, of graphically portraying the characteristics of plants and animals, or the features of humanity . . . it can appeal to our emotions and evoke our passionate and poetic sympathies with both the life of humanity and wild nature, as in the hands of the great masters it lifts us to heaven or bows us down to earth: we may stand on the sea-shore and see the movement of the falling waves, the fierce energy of the storm and the rolling armament of its clouds, glittering with the sudden zig-zag of the lightning: or we may sink into the profound calm of a summer day, when the mountains, defined only by their edges wrapped in soft planes of mist, seem to recline upon the level meadows like Titans and dream of the golden age.

(George Bell. 12s. net.)

A SHORT HISTORY OF RENAISSANCE ARCHITECTURE IN ENGLAND, 1500-1800. BY REGINALD BLOMFIELD.

This book is an abridgment of Mr. Blomfield's large standard work, and we have only to say that it bears no unpleasing signs of the cutting-down process. On the contrary, it has all the aplomb of a complete book, and in its size and its equipment of illustrations it commends itself to the student and the amateur. "By Renaissance Architecture in England, as treated of in this handbook," says Mr. Blomfield, "is to be understood that fresh departure in architecture which began with the tentative efforts of imported workmen in the reign of Henry VIII., which reached its highest degree of attainment in the hands of Inigo Jones and Wren, and eventually ran itself out in the uncertainties induced by the literary eclecticism of the eighteenth century." We need not point out how the book is necessarily a key to the understanding, on the part of the non-professional lover of architecture, of many types and a hundred familiar buildings. Twenty goodly pages are allotted to Inigo Jones, of whose work there are abundant remains in London, from the Banqueting Hall to the water-gate of old York House. Wren has over thirty pages; and then, leaving the dual throne, we are brought among men like Hawksmoor, Vanbrugh, Kent (the architect of the Horse Guards), Gibbs (St. Mary-le-Strand and Radcliffe Library, Oxford), Wood (the maker of Bath), Dance the Elder (the Mansion House and St. Leonard's, Shoreditch), Chambers (Somerset House), Dance the Younger (Newgate), and the Adams brothers. We need not say that Mr. Blomfield's sympathies and loyalties are plainly writ across the pages of his book. Accepting Inigo Jones as the greatest architect England has bred, he accepts his rule that architecture should be "solid, proportional according to the rules, masculine, and unaffected." Hence Mr. Blomfield's hopes rest on our emergence from all the neo-French, Italian, Gothic, and German revivals and half-revivals which have made our architecture a higgledy-piggledy for the last hundred years. But he is not hopeful of an immediate renaissance. What we specially wish to emphasise is the charm and usefulness of this book to the intelligent general reader. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)

FACSIMILES OF BIBLICAL MSS. IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM. EDITED BY FREDERIC G. KENYON.

In a large, but not too large, folio volume, Dr. Kenyon here gives us facsimiles of a fairly typical series of MSS., from a Papyrus Psalter of the third century down to the Second Wycliffe Bible of the fifteenth. The original documents are most handsomely reproduced by a photographic process, and to each of them Dr. Kenyon adds a transcript into modern characters and a short account of the history and condition of the text. Prominent among them is the famous Codex Alexandria given by Cyril Lucanus to Charles I., which forms one of the glories of the Museum, and the less known Codex Purpureus, a magnificent copy in gold and silver letters upon purple vellum, of which we have unfortunately only four leaves. Very interesting, too, is the sixth-century palimpsest, showing how a Greek Gospel at St. Luke has been rubbed out to receive a controversial work in Syriac three centuries later. To a theologian, as to a sapper, nothing is sacred. The only possible improvement that can be suggested is that the colours of the originals might have been added, but no doubt the extra expense has proved deterrent. The omission must have gone to the heart of Dr. Kenyon, whose enthusiasm in the cause of palaeography has been signally proved on this as on many former occasions. (British Museum Publications.)

Lives of Lord Roberts are poppering us fast. Mr. Ernest Russell, the author of Lord Roberts of Kandahar and Waterford (Drane), says engagingly: "'Bobs' has been biographed (sic) often, but, however often, the latest 'life' is only less out of date than the earliest. His career continues to be crowded with interest, and this little volume carries the record down to the beginning of what every good Briton will hope is to be another brilliant chapter."

A popular and full account of Lord Roberts's career is Mr. J. S. Fletcher's Roberts of Pretoria (Methuen: Sixpenny Library). In an introduction dedicated "To the Man in the Street" Mr. Fletcher quotes about twenty lines of Wordsworth's "Happy Warrior" in application to the hero of the hour. We can recommend this book; it is good and cheap, and for the moment sufficient.

Mr. Ralph Waldo Trine wrote a striking little book, called In Tune with the Infinite. He now puts in a various plea for consideration toward the animal creation, under the title of Every Living Creature (Bell, 1s. net). The book is small, white, and pretty, and its chapters deal with such familiar and controversial subjects as Hunting, Vivisection, Docking, Cattle Transport, &c. We are not in sympathy with total vegetarianism, nor do we hold that hunting and shooting are debasing sports, though we are sure they are sometimes abused. Where we are with Mr. Trine heart and soul is in his denunciation of the killing of birds to supply millinery establishments with something to sell and thoughtless women with something to wear. But here again we cannot keep up with Mr. Trine, who proceeds to denounce the wearing of furs on the same principle. The ethics of these things are finer and more various than his zeal allows him to perceive.

Three new editions of the week are just as different in kind as they can be. We have Dr. Malcolm MacColl's The Reformation Settlement, ninth edition (Longmans, 3s. 6d. net), with a new Preface in reply to criticism, and enlargements of the text; secondly, we have what is practically a new translation of M. Zola's Germinal, by Mr. E. V. Vizetelly (Chatto, 3s. 6d.); and thirdly, a new and revised edition of Mrs. Beeton's Shilling Cookery Book (Ward, Lock), which the publishers suggest, and we do not think of denying, is "a remarkable shilling's worth."

Fiction.

Parson Peter: a Tale of the Dart. By Arthur H. Norway. (John Murray. 6s.)

JACOB PETER was a smuggler, and vicar of Kingswear, many decades before the Great Western Railway established a terminus there. The idea of a parson being a smuggler seems at first sight distinctly repellent: one imagines that the man must have been both a knave and a hypocrite; but Mr. Norway would hotly deny that his hero was either. The apology for smuggling, even clerical smuggling, is one of the best things in the book:

A hundred years ago there were sheep and goats just as there are now, but it was not always quite so easy to distinguish them. Law had not yet won all her battles. She had made scant progress on the ocean, and none too much upon the coasts, where the bulk of the fishermen and traders had inherited practices and ways of thought which were mediæval more than modern, handed down from a vast antiquity, stamped with that impatience of control which is caught by all men who go to and fro upon the sea, instinct with a love of daring above all other qualities, clinging tenaciously to the freedom which from primæval centuries had been unchallenged on the ocean, resenting fiercely the intrusion of law on that proud domain; cherishing all these passions and traditions mutely, with an angry outlook on a changing world, which was fast robbing them of the privileges of their fathers, and checking them in what they believed they had a right to do. . . .

And so on.

Mr. Norway advises those who cannot accept his plea not to proceed with the story. It is a good story, animated by a real feeling for the sea and seafarers; and if, as we believe, it is Mr. Norway's first effort in fiction, it reflects on him much credit. Both the smugglers and the "King's men" are admirably drawn, and the fighting episodes have spirit. The last disappearance of the Parson in his venturous cutter is brave and pathetic enough to soften the hardest heart towards this man who would interrupt the preparation of a sermon in order to plan the salvage of sunk kegs.

The Joy of Captain Ribot. By A. Palacio Valdés. Translated by Minna Caroline Smith. (Downey. 6s.)

In a letter to Mr. Sylvester Baxter, the "introducer" of this story, Don Armando Palacio Valdés wrote: "It is a protest from the depths against the eternal adultery of the French novel." Having regard to the fact that the book contains one adultery, and two cases in which adultery was prevented only by the adamant honesty of the really charming heroine, we cannot but regard such a statement as somewhat over-coloured. For the rest, though inferior in strength and fineness both to Froth and The Grandee, the only other novels of Valdés that we happen to have read, The Joy of Captain Ribot is an able and attractive piece of fiction, and the sentimentality of its conclusion does no harm to it. Ribot is admirably drawn; Cristina's mother is an amusing figure of comedy. There is in the book an unfamiliar kind of humour, which presumably must be called Spanish. The indiscreet translator remarks that Valdés' "greatness of soul" finds "expression in a consummate mastery of the novelist's art." This is hyperbole of the wildest, but nevertheless the technical excellence of the story is rather notable. Written, of course, under French influences, and under a Latin inspiration, it has qualities of formal beauty which are only too rare in English fiction. What it chiefly lacks is mere power of imagination—in a word, force.

A Scholar of his College. By W. E. W. Collins. (Blackwood. 6s.)

"Then you truly and seriously mean to go back from your definite promise to me, Leuchars?" and the speaker, a stout, red-faced man of some sixty or more summers, scowled angrily as he looked at his companion.

WHEN a novel begins so (. . . and the speaker . . .) you know instantly that it will never startle or shock you or make you think, though it may promote digestion. Mr. Collins's story of college and country-house life is thoroughly and honestly old-fashioned. The people in it are named Jack Treherne, Bertie ditto, Algie Chevely, and so forth. The book is full of all the beloved antique phrases—exigante, facile princeps, amende honorable, "slowly retraced his steps," &c., &c. And the incidents, too, have a similar antiquity:

"Look you here, my man," he said sternly, again getting a good grip of the butcher's collar, "we don't want any of that language. And I will give you a fair warning that if ever I pass this way and catch you or your filthy cur making nuisances of yourselves to your neighbours, I'll break the creature's neck first, and then turn you over your own counter and smack you soundly with your own cleaver"—and he pushed the butcher from him with sufficient force to send the fellow tottering along the pavement backwards for some half-dozen yards, till, arriving at a convenient doorstep, he sat down with considerable discomfort. And there, until his assailant had fairly turned his back, the butcher thought it prudent to remain. Like other fallen idols, he found himself destitute of worshippers, and even the one congenial spirit who presently helped him to recover his feet and brush himself down proved little better than a Job's comforter.

This famous episode, doubtless, occurred first in the ramping "Town v. Gown" days of Cuthbert Bede and Frank Fairleigh; we had thought it "quite, quite dead," but we were mistaken. A Scholar of his College is highly sentimentalised, saccharine, convenable, discreetly smart, and "wholesome." It is about as far removed from life as a carefully written and evidently sincere novel could be. We are glad to admit, however, that the hero is not a prig, but a quite likeable human youth, and that the remarks of the head keeper concerning the necessity of destroying pheasants, on pp. 31-32, show some trace of humour.

The Queen versus Billy, and Other Stories. By Lloyd Osbourne. (Heinemann.)

Nobody has graduated in a better school of literature than Mr. Lloyd Osbourne, and for association's sake he is bound to get a sympathetic hearing. But this volume of pathetic, poignant little South Sea stories may well stand on their own merits. Quite simple and natural Mr. Osbourne is not. He is rarely without just a touch of the whimsical and burlesque. The ludicrous contrasts of the type of civilisation which he knows best prey upon his imagination. But he is thoroughly human, has the gift of observation, and a keen eye for a dramatic situation. His sympathies extend to all sorts and conditions of men in the strange medley which makes up South Sea society: missionaries, Catholic and Protestant, man-of-war's men, disreputable beach-combers, Kanaka "boys," and graceful Samoan women, all are indifferently the material for the humour and tragedy he can see in them. Of the nine stories that make up the volume, the four best seem to us to be "The Queen versus Billy," "The Dust of Defeat," "Father Zosimus," and "The Phantom City": each in its way is genuine art. But the freshness of the whole book is unmistakable.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final Reviews of a selection will follow.]

IN THE NAME OF A WOMAN. BY A. W. MARCHMONT.

With eight pictures. The frontispiece is called, "She fired two shots in rapid succession with deadly effect." The story is told by Gerald Winthrop, and opens briskly in the Bulgarian capital. Gerald, who had gone to Sofia on a mysterious mission, "to get at the bottom of the secret machinations by which Russia was endeavouring to close her grip of iron on the throne and country of Bulgaria," saves a young woman's life. She urges him to join the conspirators, to ally himself to the cause. His adventures make the story. (Longmans. 6s.)

THE PRIDE OF RACE. BY B. L. FARJEON.

A long novel, somewhat after the Zangwill model. In the opening chapter Moses Mendoza pays a visit to Mr. Septimus Gray, schoolmaster, to ask a favour. "If you can persuade Mr. Septimus Gray to take your boy it'll be the making of 'm,'" a gentleman who was once a friend of Mr. Gray's had said to Moses. The book is divided into five panels: "The Rise of Moses Mendoza," "In Society," "Raphael Mendoza and his Wife, Lady Julia," "The Fall of Moses Mendoza," and "Light." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

SHYLOCK OF THE RIVER. BY FERGUS HUME.

Readers know what to expect from the author of The Mystery of a Hansom Cab. "The young man started to his feet. 'Kirby—murdered—at his home?' 'No,' replied the girl, wondering at the strangeness of the remark, 'at his office!'" Mr. Brand drew a long breath, seemingly of relief. "How terrible!" he said. "I suppose the assassin is in custody." (Long. 6s.)

DRISCOLL, KING OF THE SCOUTS. BY A. G. HALES.

The war correspondent of the Daily News has here thrown into the form of a story his experiences and observations during the first year of the South African War. Mr. Hales is a picturesque writer, and he has high spirits, together with a rather wandering pen. A picture of Driscoll is given as a frontispiece to the volume. (Arrowsmith. 6s.)

Educational Supplement.

NEW BOOKS AND NEW EDITIONS

From Mr. Murray's Educational List.

THE STUDENT'S MANUALS.

New Editions. Ready in January.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY of ROME.

FROM the EARLIEST TIMES to the ESTABLISHMENT of the EMPIRE. With Chronological Tables and Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By H. G. LIDDELL, D.D., sometime Dean of Christ Church, Oxford. Revised, and in part Re-written, by P. V. M. BENECKE, M.A., Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. With Coloured and other Maps, and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE STUDENT'S GIBBON. Abridged from the Original Work by Sir WM. SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D. A New and Revised Edition in 2 Parts.

PART II.—Nearly ready. By J. G. C. ANDERSON, M.A., Fellow of Lincoln College and Lecturer at Christ Church, Oxford. With Maps and Illustrations.

PART I.—Published. From the Accession of Commodus to the Death of Justinian. By A. H. J. GREENIDGE, M.A., Lecturer and late Fellow of Hertford College, Lecturer in Ancient History at Brasenose College, Oxford.

Crown 8vo, 5s. each Volume.

LITTLE ARTHUR'S HISTORY of GREECE.

A Companion Volume to "Little Arthur's England" and "Little Arthur's France." By the Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. 12mo, 2s. 6d. [Ready shortly.]

THE GROWTH of GREATER BRITAIN. A

Reader for Schools. Compiled and Edited by ELIZABETH LEE, Author of "A School History of English Literature," &c., Editor of "Cowper's Task and Minor Poems," &c. Price 2s. [Ready shortly.]

This School Reader is conceived on novel lines. The extracts are arranged in sections, comprising "The English Colonies up to 1500," "Australia," "India," "South Africa," &c., and the story of these periods of British history is told by the actual explorers, navigators, colonists, and statesmen who were instrumental in the expansion of England at that time. The selections range from the works of Sir Walter Raleigh to the speeches of Lord Beaconsfield, and include yet more modern authorities. There will be a literary introduction, weaving the threads together, and the extracts will be supplied with biographical and historical notes. The name of the author, who is a contributor to the "Dictionary of National Biography," carries assurance that the editorial work will be well done.

THE GREEK THINKERS. By Professor

THEODORE GOMPERZ, of Vienna University, Hon. LL.D. Dublin, Ph.D. Königsberg, &c. Translated by LAURIE MAGNUS, M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford. Demy 8vo, 14s. net.

VOLUME I.—The Geography of Greece—National Greek Characteristics—The Art of Writing—Colonies—Commerce—Society—Religion—Anthropomorphism—Homer—Hesiod—Ionian Nature Philosophy—Thales—Anaximander—Anaximenes—Heraclitus—The Orphics and Orphic Cosmogony—Pythagoras—Pythagoras and his Disciples—Xenophanes—Parmenides—Anaxagoras—Empedocles—The Historians—Hecataeus—Herodotus as Monotheist, Critic, and Positivist—The Age of Enlightenment and Emancipation—The Physicians—Atomism—Mental and Moral Sciences—Sophists—Protagoras—Gorgias—The Advance of Historical Science. [Ready in January.]

VOLUME II., containing PLATO, is now nearly completed, and is already in course of translation.

This account of Greek Philosophy by the author of the standard German translation of J. S. Mill's "Logic" is inspired by the endeavour to do justice to the chief tendencies in all departments of ancient thought. Composed throughout in a clear and popular style, the work will be found to combine in a singular degree the resources of an almost encyclopedic learning with an appreciation of the results of modern science and of the dependence of the civilisation of the present on that of past ages. "The Greek Thinkers" in this sense include the leaders of religion, of literature, and of the special sciences.

JUST PUBLISHED.

"No such comprehensive work has hitherto been issued, and, in our opinion, 'The Public School Speaker' has leaped at a single bound into the very foremost rank, and has become the classic of its kind."—THE BOOKSELLER.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOL SPEAKER.

Compiled by F. WARRE CORNISH, M.A., Vice-Provost of Eton College. Large 8vo, 7s. 6d.

This work, as its name implies, is a collection of pieces suitable for recitation at school "speeches." The editor has made his selection in the widest manner and from various languages—Greek, Latin, English, German, French, and Italian. He has included drama, general poetry, orations, and other prose pieces, ancient and modern, and is in hopes that no serious omissions can be found, unless it be those intentional ones from classics that are at everyone's command, which he has left out to make room for others more difficult of access.

It will be noticed that he has in many cases given an extract longer than is sufficient for a single recitation—he has done this advisedly with a view to affording greater scope for individual requirements and individual taste.

A complete Illustrated Catalogue of Standard Educational Works published by Mr. Murray may be had, post free, on application. This Catalogue includes Sir William Smith's famous Series of Student's Manuals, smaller Manuals, Dictionaries, Principals, &c.

MURRAY'S HANDY CLASSICAL MAPS.

Edited by G. B. GRUNDY, M.A., Brasenose College, Oxford.

LIST OF MAPS NOW READY.

GALLIA. One sheet, 2s. cloth; 1s. net, paper.

BRITANNIA. One sheet, 2s. cloth; 1s. net, paper.

HISPANIA. One sheet, 2s. cloth; 1s. net, paper.

ITALIA (Northern Italy, South, and Sicily). Two sheets in one case, 3s. cloth; 1s. 6d. net, paper.

GERMANIA, RHAETIA, ILLYRIA, MOESIA, &c. One sheet, 2s. cloth; 1s. net, paper.

PALESTINE, SYRIA, and Part of MESOPOTAMIA, and a Map showing St. Paul's Voyages. Three Maps on one sheet, 2s. cloth; 1s. net, paper.

GRAECIA (Northern Greece, South, and Peloponnesus). Two sheets in one case, 3s. cloth; 1s. 6d. net, paper. [Immediately.]

An Index is bound in each case.

"This method of showing physical features is most effective, and lends the maps a value which is possessed by no other classical atlas known to us.... We recommend all schoolmasters and students who care for geographical matters to look at these maps."—Athenaeum.

".....May be taken as correct and up-to-date.....Both attractive to the eye and informing to the mind."—Manchester Guardian.

NEW EDITION, JUST PUBLISHED.

ENGLISH COLONIZATION and EMPIRE. By

A. CALDECOTT, M.A. (Camb. and Lond.), Fellow and Dean of St. John's College, Cambridge, and Professor of Philosophy, King's College, London. With Maps and Plans. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. With a New Chapter, bringing the work entirely up to date, by F. A. KIRKPATRICK, M.A.

A NEW FRENCH GRAMMAR.—JUST PUBLISHED.

THE TECHNICAL SCHOOL FRENCH GRAM-

MAR. By Dr. W. KRISCH, Teacher of Latin, Greek, French, German, and Spanish at the Wolverhampton Free Library Science School, Examiner in Modern Languages to the Midland Counties Union of Educational Institutions, 1897-99, &c. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

COMMERCIAL FRENCH COURSE. In Two Parts. By W. MANSFIELD POOLE, M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford, Assistant Master at Merchant Taylor's School, and MICHEL BECKER, Professor at the Ecole Alsacienne, Paris, Author of "L'Allemand Commercial," and "Lectures Pratiques, d'Allemand Moderne." With a Map.

PART I.—Consisting of Simple Sentences and Passages in French, with occasional Business Letters, arranged in a manner suited for Practical Teaching, and containing in an Appendix a clear system of French Grammar, with special reference to the Verb, is in course of active preparation. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

PART II.—Comprising an Advanced Commercial Reader, will be duly announced.

MEDICAL WORKS.

A TREATISE on MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE

Based on Lectures delivered at University College, London. By G. VIVIAN POORE, M.D. With Illustrations. 8vo, 12s. net.

[Immediately.]

THE PROGRESSIVE SCIENCE SERIES.—Large crown 8vo, 6s. each vol.

THE COMPARATIVE PHYSIOLOGY of the BRAIN and COMPARATIVE PSYCHOLOGY. By Professor JACQUES LOBB, M.D., Professor of Physiology in the University of Chicago.

[Immediately.]

MACMILLAN & CO.'S BOOKS FOR SPECIAL EXAMINATIONS (1901-1902).

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON, 1901-2.

MATRICULATION, JUNE, 1901.

- Sallust—Catilina. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Sallust—Catilina. Edited by C. MERIVALE, D.D. 2s.
Sallust—Bellum Catilinae. Edited by A. M. COOK, M.A. 2s. 6d.
English Grammar Past and Present. By J. C. NEWFIELD, M.A. 4s. 6d. Key, 2s. 6d. net. Specially adapted to the requirements of candidates for Matriculation.
A Short History of English Literature. By Professor G. SAINTSBURY. 8s. 6d.
Elementary General Science. By A. T. SIMMONS, B.Sc. and L. M. JONES, B.Sc. 3s. 6d. (Adapted to the London Matriculation Course.)

MATRICULATION, JANUARY, 1902.

- Horace—Odes. Book I. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Plato—Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, and Phaedo. Translated by F. J. CURCH. 2s. 6d. net.
Plato—Crito and Phaedo (Chs. 57 to end). Edited by C. H. KEENE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

MATRICULATION, JUNE, 1902.

- Cicero—De Senectute. With Notes and Vocabulary. By E. S. SHUCKBURN, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Euripides—Medea. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. 1s. 6d. Edited by A. W. VERRALL, Litt.D. 2s. 6d.

CAMBRIDGE HIGHER LOCAL EXAMINATIONS.

June and December, 1901, and June, 1902.

- Spenser—Faerie Queene. Book I. With Introduction and Notes. By H. M. PERCIVAL, M.A. 3s.; sewed, 2s. 6d. [June, 1901.]
Bacon—The New Atlantis. With Introduction and Notes. By A. T. FLUX. 1s. [June, 1901.]
Shakespeare—Coriolanus. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DIGHTON. 2s. 6d.; sewed, 2s. [June, 1901.]
Macbeth. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DIGHTON. 1s. 6d. [June, 1902.]
Milton—Paradise Lost. Books III. and IV. With Introduction and Notes. By M. MACMILLAN, B.A. 1s. 3d. each; sewed, 1s. each. [June, 1902.]
Bunyan—The Pilgrim's Progress. With Introduction and Notes. By J. MORRISON, M.A. 1s. 6d.; sewed, 1s. 6d. [June, 1902.]
Walton's Lives and Complete Angler. Edited by A. W. POLLARD, M.A. 3s. 6d. net. [June, 1902.]
Milton—Poetical Works. Edited by D. MASSON. 3s. 6d. [June, 1902.]
Dryden—Poetical Works. Edited by W. D. CHRISTIE. 3s. 6d. [June, 1902.]
Historical Outlines of English Accidence. By Rev. R. MORRIS, LL.D. Revised by L. KELLNER, Ph.D., and H. BRADLEY, M.A. 6s.
The History of the English Language. By O. F. EMERSON, Ph.D. 6s. net.
A Primer of Chaucer. By A. W. POLLARD, M.A. 1s.
English Prose Selections. By Sir H. CRAIK, K.C.B. Vols. I-IV, 7s. 6d. each. Vol. V., 8s. 6d.
The English Poets. Edited by T. H. WARD, M.A. Vols. I-III, 7s. 6d. each. Vol. IV., 8s. 6d.
A Shakespearean Grammar. By Rev. E. A. ARNOLD, D.D. 6s.
Horace. Book III. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [June, 1901.]
Cicero—Pro Lego Manilla. Edited by A. S. WILKINS, Litt.D. 2s. 6d. [June and December, 1901, June, 1902.]
Lucretius. Books I. to III. Edited by J. H. WARBURTON LEZ, M.A. 3s. 6d. [December, 1901, June, 1902.]
Demosthenes—De Corona. Edited by B. DRARE. Revised by E. S. SHUCKBURN, M.A. 3s. 6d. [June, 1901.]
Thucydides. Book IV. Edited by C. E. GRAVES, M.A. 3s. 6d. [December, 1901, June, 1902.]
Moliere—Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. 1s. 6d. L'AVARE. 1s. Edited by L. M. MORRIS, B.A. [June, 1901.]
Le Misanthrope. Edited by G. E. FASNACHT. 1s. [December, 1901, June, 1902.]
Cornelle—Le Cid. Edited by G. E. FASNACHT. 1s. [June, 1901.]
Goethe—Iphigenie. Edited by H. B. COITTEILL, M.A. 3s. Edited by C. A. EGERT, Ph.D. 3s. 6d. [June, 1901.]
Hermann und Dorothea. Edited by J. T. HATFIELD. 3s. 6d. [December, 1901, June, 1902.]
Lessing—Nathan der Weise. Edited by G. O. CURME. 3s. 6d. [June, 1901.]
Schiller—Maria Stuart. Edited by C. SHELTON, Litt.D. 2s. 6d. [December, 1901, June, 1902.]
Grillparzer—Sappho. Edited by W. RITTMANN. 3s. [December, 1901, June, 1902.]

CAMBRIDGE LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1901.

- The Gospel According to St. Matthew. THE GREEK TEXT. With Introduction and Notes. By Rev. A. SLOMAN, M.A. 2s. 6d.
The Acts of the Apostles. Authorised Version. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 2s. 6d.
The Greek Text. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 3s. 6d.
Deffoe—Robinson Crusoe. Edited by H. KINGSLEY. 2s. 6d. [Preliminary.]
Scott—Lay of the Last Minstrel. With Introduction and Notes. By G. H. STUART, M.A., and E. H. ELLIOTT, B.A. 2s. [Junior.]
Shakespeare—Henry V. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DIGHTON. 1s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]
Spenser—Faerie Queene. Book I. With Introduction and Notes. By H. M. PERCIVAL, M.A. 3s.; sewed, 2s. 6d. [Senior.]
Caesar—Gallic War. Book VII. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. J. BOND, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Preliminary and Junior.]
Cicero—Catiline Orations. Edited by A. S. WILKINS, Litt.D. 2s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]
Virgil—Aeneid. Book IX. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. H. M. STEPHENSON, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]
Horace—Odes. Book III. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.]
Livy. Book I. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. H. M. STEPHENSON, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.]
Nepos—Greek Lives (containing Lives of Aristides, Cimon, Miltiades, Pausanias, Themistocles). With Notes and Vocabulary. By H. WILKINSON, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Preliminary.]
Thucydides. Book VI. Edited by E. C. MARCHANT, M.A. 3s. 6d.
Thucydides. Books VI. and VII. Edited by Rev. P. FROST, M.A. 3s. 6d. [Senior.]
Plato—Crito and Phaedo. Edited by C. H. KEENE, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Senior.]
Plato—Euthyphro and Menexenus. With Introduction and Notes. By C. E. GRAVES, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.]
Plato—Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, and Phaedo. Translated by F. J. CURCH. 2s. 6d. net. [Senior.]
Xenophon—Anabasis. Book VI. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior.]
Moliere—Les Précieuses Ridicules. Edited by C. E. FASNACHT. 1s. [Senior.]

OXFORD LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1901.

- The Gospel According to St. Matthew. THE GREEK TEXT. With Introduction and Notes. By Rev. A. SLOMAN, M.A. 2s. 6d.
The Acts of the Apostles. Authorised Version. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 2s. 6d.
The Greek Text. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 3s. 6d.
Poems of England.—A Selection of ENGLISH PATRIOTIC POETRY. With Notes. By H. B. GEORGE, M.A., and A. SIDGWICK, M.A. 2s. 6d.
Shakespeare—Henry V. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DIGHTON. 1s. 6d.
Merchant of Venice. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DIGHTON. 1s. 6d.
Byron—Child Harold's Pilgrimage. Edited by Prof. E. E. MORRIS. Cantos III. and IV. 1s. 6d.
Caesar—Gallic War. Book VI. With Notes and Vocabulary. By C. COLCLOCK, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Virgil—Aeneid. Book I. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Horace—Odes. Book IV. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. Edited by the same. 2s.
Epistles and Ars Poetica. Edited by A. S. WILKINS, Litt.D. 5s.
Livy. Book V. With Notes and Vocabulary. By M. ALFORD. 1s. 6d.
Caesar—The Gallic War. By Rev. JOHN BOND, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 4s. 6d. With Notes and Vocabulary. Book IV. By CLEMENT BRYAN, M.A. 1s. 6d. Book V. By C. COLCLOCK, M.A. 1s. 6d. Book VI. By C. COLCLOCK, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Xenophon—Anabasis. Book II. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Euripides—Alcestis. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Xenophon—Anabasis. With Notes and Vocabulary. Book I. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d. Book I. With Exercises by E. A. WELLS, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Thucydides. Book VII. Edited by E. C. MARCHANT, M.A. 3s. 6d.

OXFORD & CAMBRIDGE SCHOOLS EXAMINATION, 1901.

- Burke—Reflections on the French Revolution. With Introduction and Notes. By F. G. SELBY, M.A. 5s.
Chaucer—Works. Edited by A. W. POLLARD, M.A. Globe Edition. 3s. 6d.
Shakespeare—The Merchant of Venice. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DIGHTON. 1s. 6d.
Hamlet. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DIGHTON. 2s. 6d.; sewed, 2s.
Kingsley—Westward Ho! Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. and 2s. 6d.; 8vo, sewed, 1s.
Spenser—The Faerie Queene. Book I. With Introduction and Notes. By H. M. PERCIVAL, M.A. 3s.; sewed, 2s. 6d.
Cicero—Pro Roscio Amerino. Edited by E. H. DONKIN, M.A. 2s. 6d.
The Catiline Orations. Edited by A. S. WILKINS, Litt.D. 2s. 6d.
Horace—The Odes and Epodes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 5s.
Terence—Hauton Timorumenos. Edited by E. S. SHUCKBURN, M.A. 2s. 6d.; with Translations, 3s. 6d.
Adelphoe. Edited by S. G. ASHMORE, 3s. 6d.
Tacitus—Histories. Edited by A. D. GODLEY, M.A. Books I. and II. 3s. 6d. Books III. and IV. 2s. 6d.
Virgil—Aeneid. With Notes and Vocabulary. Book X. By S. G. OWEN, M.A. 1s. 6d. Books XI. and XII. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. each.
Sallust—Catilina. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d. Edited by C. MERIVALE, D.D. 2s. Edited by A. M. COOK, M.A. 2s. 6d.
Aeschylus—Persae. Edited by A. O. PRICKARD, M.A. 2s. 6d.
Euripides—Andromache. Edited by A. R. F. HAYLER, M.A. 2s. 6d.
Homer—Iliad. Books XIII-XXIV. Edited by W. LEAF, Litt.D., and Rev. M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. 6s.
Iliad. Books I., IX., XI., and XVI. to XXIV. Edited by J. H. PRATT, M.A., and W. LEAF, Litt.D. 5s.
Euripides—Alcestis. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d. Edited by M. L. EARLE, Ph.D. 3s. 6d.
Thucydides. Book VI. Edited by E. C. MARCHANT, M.A. 3s. 6d.
Books VI. and VII. Edited by Rev. P. FROST, M.A. 3s. 6d.
Moliere—Le Malade Imaginaire. Edited by G. E. FASNACHT. 1s. 6d.
Cornelle—Le Cid. Edited by G. E. FASNACHT. 1s.
Voltaire—Charles XII. Edited by G. E. FASNACHT. 3s. 6d.
Merimee—Colomba. Edited by G. E. FASNACHT. 2s.
Goethe—Egmont. Edited by S. PRINCE, Ph.D. 3s. 6d.

COLLEGE OF PRECEPTORS' EXAMINATIONS.

July and December, 1901.

- Shakespeare—Henry V. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DIGHTON. 1s. 6d.
Spenser—The Faerie Queene. Book I. With Introduction and Notes. By H. M. PERCIVAL, M.A. 3s.; sewed, 2s. 6d.
Poems of England.—A Selection of ENGLISH PATRIOTIC POETRY. With Notes by H. B. GEORGE, M.A., and A. SIDGWICK, M.A. 2s. 6d.
Caesar—Gallic War. With Notes and Vocabulary. Book VI. By C. COLCLOCK, M.A. 1s. 6d. Book VII. By Rev. J. BOND, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Virgil—Aeneid. With Notes and Vocabulary. Book I. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. Book IX. By Rev. H. M. STEPHENSON, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Horace—Odes. Books I., III., and IV. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. Edited by the same. 2s.
Livy. Book V. With Notes and Vocabulary. By M. ALFORD. 1s. 6d.
Phaedrus—Fables. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d. SELECT FABLES. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Eutropeus. Books I. and II. With Notes and Vocabulary. By W. WELCH, M.A., and C. G. DUFFIELD, M.A. 1s. 6d.
Euripides—Alcestis. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. 1s. 6d. Edited by M. L. EARLE. 3s. 6d.
Xenophon—Anabasis. With Notes and Vocabulary. Book VI. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d. Book VII. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d.
The Gospel According to St. Matthew. THE GREEK TEXT. With Introduction and Notes. By Rev. A. SLOMAN, M.A. 2s. 6d.
The Acts of the Apostles. With Introduction and Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Educational Supplement.

SATURDAY: 19 JANUARY, 1901.

Self-Education.

It is a trite saying that he who is his own lawyer has a fool for his client; nor will wise doctors treat themselves for serious ailments. Self-education is not exposed to the same objections as self-healing or the drawing of one's own conveyances. Indeed, in a certain sense, no one can educate a man except himself. Your pedagogue may stuff the mental stomach with the matter of nutriment; the organ itself must supply the secretions by which digestion is effected. But in this article only a particular and narrow case of self-education is contemplated. Given one who has never had any formal instruction beyond that of an elementary kind; given a desire on the part of such an one, say at twenty-one years of age, to make good the defects caused by the lack or the neglect of all opportunities of what is called higher education; and given a position which excludes the help and inspiration of a living teacher; it is proposed to consider tentatively what are the books from which, under these circumstances, most gain can be derived. We know that self-education is possible. Small was the debt that Rousseau, for example, with his mastery of written speech and rare suggestiveness of thought, owed to professors or seats of learning. The problem has often been solved; the only question is as to the best method of solution.

The reader will observe that the conditions set forth restrict us to education as it can be got from books. We are compelled to ignore the many other educative agencies by which everyone is surrounded, and which are, at least, as useful as printed counsellors. To couple unlike things, music and example, with all that they can teach, are outside of our purview, no less than table-talk and the scenery of nature. Moreover, by education we mean general, not technical, education. Our aim is to make a man, not to assist the form of progress known as getting on in the world. Lest we should glut our beginner instead of whetting his appetite, we confine ourselves to offering him a list of fifty books, which digested, he may choose his own food. No attempt has been made, be it noticed, to mark off knowledge into a chequer-work of equal squares; nor has the mind been resolved, although some of its powers are named, into exclusive faculties each demanding a separate regimen. Such analyses are, for the most part, futile, or profitable only by way of exercise for the investigator who conducts them. Having thus guarded ourselves against possible misconceptions, let us to our task, grouping the books according to the end in view, and recommending none that will not yield a meaning to careful and repeated study.

First of all, there are two preliminary disciplines of such value as to be practically indispensable. One is Language, which is best examined by the student's comparing some other speech with his own. Many reasons may be urged for Latin as the speech to be selected; such as its clearness, the light it throws on French and English, as well as its frequent use for quotation in learned and unlearned works. Assuming that it is the language to be taken up, it may be studied in the following books:

(a.) LANGUAGE (LATIN).

1. An Elementary Latin Course. By L. Huxley. (Joseph Hughes & Co. 2s. 6d.)
2. The Seven Kings of Rome. By Wright. (Macmillans. 3s. 6d.)
3. Latin Grammar for Schools. By Roby. (Macmillans. 5s.)
4. Latin Dictionary. By Lewis and Short. (Clarendon Press. 25s.)
5. Virgil's Æneid. Edited by Papillon and Haigh. (Clarendon Press. 7s.)

No. 1 is, as its title states, a "Course"—that is, grammar, reader, and exercise-book combined in one. After it has been mastered, the learner should proceed to some easy translation book having a vocabulary at the end, such as No. 2. The bookstalls, however, will supply him at a cheap rate with any number of such books, published by the same firm as the Seven Kings. He next requires a good grammar (as free as possible from jargon), a trustworthy dictionary, and a specimen of Latin literature. Our list has provided for all these wants; with the addition of a few more texts, and as many "cribs," it should enable him to read, though not to write, Latin with ease. Even from the five books alone he could get a modest knowledge of the language and much useful training.

The second preliminary discipline is concerned with the phenomena of number and space, in the consideration of which the books now to be named will be found most serviceable:

(b.) MATHEMATICS.

6. Arithmetic. By C. Pendlebury. (Bell & Sons. 4s. 6d.)
7. Algebra. By Hall & Knight. (Macmillans. 4s. 6d.)
8. Elements of Plane Geometry. By the Association for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching. (Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 4s. 6d.)
9. Modern Plane Geometry. By Richardson & Ramsay. (Macmillans. 3s. 6d.)
10. Elementary Trigonometry. By Hall & Knight. (Macmillans. 3s. 6d.)

It may be noted that No. 7 is continued in a Higher Algebra by the same authors, and that to Nos. 6, 7 and 10 keys, somewhat expensive, are published, also by Macmillans.

No education deserves its name if it does not regard in some sort the physical and the chemical forces, the history, movement and relations of the earth, and the physiology of man. We collect a few books on these subjects under a rough title.

(c.) NATURAL SCIENCE.

11. Lessons in Elementary Physics. By Balfour Stewart. (Macmillans. 4s. 6d.)
12. Lessons in Elementary Chemistry. By Roscoe. (Macmillans. 4s. 6d.)
13. The Earth's History. By R. D. Roberts. (Murray. 5s.)
14. Story of the Heavens. By Ball. (Cassell's. 10s. 6d.)
15. Lessons in Elementary Physiology. By Huxley. (Macmillans. 4s. 6d.)

We pass from science to a different, but no less essential, form of culture. To stimulate the imagination the supreme means at our command is furnished by the poets, above all, by the epic poets and the dramatists. Hence the next group of books:

(d.) POETRY (CHIEFLY EPIC AND DRAMATIC).

16. Shakespeare's Complete Works. Globe Edition. (Macmillans. 3s. 6d.)
17. Milton's Poetical Works. (Globe Edition.) (Macmillans. 3s. 6d.)
18. Æschylus, The House of Atreus (the trilogy). Translated by Morshead. (Kegan Paul. 7s.)
19. Homer's Iliad and Odyssey. Translated by Chapman. (Dent. 6s.)
20. Dante, The Vision of Hell, Purgatory and Paradise. Translated by Cary. (Bell & Sons. 3s. 6d.)

The atmosphere of the Greek writers will grow familiar by degrees. Transition to it may be effected through the "Samson Agonistes" of Milton.

Between poetry and prose fiction there exists an intimate connexion. Nevertheless, as instruments of education, the two things have different functions. The note of a good novel is sympathetic observation; the use of the novel, as we allow ourselves to think, is to quicken the powers of observation in the sphere of nature or society; from which point of view we submit five well-known examples of this form of literature:

(e.) PROSE FICTION.

21. Tom Jones. By Fielding. (Routledge. 2s.)
22. Pride and Prejudice. By Jane Austen. (Dent. 4s. 6d.)
23. Esmond. By Thackeray. (Smith & Elder. 2s.)
24. Père Goriot. By Balzac. Translated by K. P. Wormeley. (Routledge. 3s. 6d.)
25. Peace and War. By Tolstoi. Translated by N. H. Dole. (New York. 15s.)

Self-educated men are, perhaps, more liable than their neighbours to be led away by fallacies, by a mistaken use of words, by preconceived opinions, and by like causes of error. On the other hand, they lack what Hallam calls "a sober and serious, not flippant or self-conceited, independency of thinking." Accordingly, we offer:

(f.) SAFEGUARDS AND HELPS.

26. A Primer of Logic. By Jevons. (Macmillans. 1s.)
27. Lessons in Logic. By Jevons. (Macmillans. 3s. 6d.)
28. English Synonyms. By Crabb. (Routledge. 2s.)
29. On the Use and Abuse of Some Political Terms. By Cornwall Lewis. (Thornton. 6s.)
30. Conduct of the Understanding. By Locke. Edited by Fowler. (Clarendon Press. 2s.)

By this time the student will be anxious and ready to approach the higher questions of life, among which this will soon confront him: Granted that there are things which ought to be done and things which ought not to be done, by what test are they distinguished? He may like to weigh a few answers:

(g.) ETHICS (MODERN).

31. The Ethics of Hobbes. In Selections from his Works. By Sneath. (Ginn & Co. $1.35.)
32. Dissertation on Virtue, and Fifteen Sermons. By Butler. (Bell & Sons. 3s. 6d.)
33. Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation. By Bentham. (Clarendon Press. 6s. 6d.)
34. Introduction to Cudworth's Treatise Concerning Eternal and Immutable Morality. By W. R. Scott. (Longmans. 3s.)
35. Data of Ethics. By Herbert Spencer. (Williams & Norgate. 8s.)

No. 34 is intended as a stopgap until the Treatise itself is reprinted, of which there is hope.

Closely connected, at least in some systems, with Ethics is Politics; but before proceeding to the general science the learner must make some acquaintance with the histories of particular States. Hence the two sections which follow:

(h.) HISTORY.

36. History of Greece. By Oman. (Rivingtons. 4s. 6d.)
37. Outlines of Roman History. By Pelham. (Percival. 6s.)
38. The Student's Gibbon. (Murray. 7s. 6d.)
39. General Sketch of European History. By Freeman. (Macmillans. 3s. 6d.)
40. Short History of the English People. By J. R. Green. (Macmillans. 8s. 6d.)

(j.) POLITICAL SCIENCE (CONSTITUTION OF STATES; POLITICAL ECONOMY; LAW).

41. Aristotle's Politics. Translated by Welldon. (Macmillans. 10s. 6d.)
42. Theory of the State. By Bluntschli. (Clarendon Press. 8s. 6d.)
43. Political Economy. By J. S. Mill. (Longmans. 3s. 6d.)
44. The Spirit of Laws. By Montesquieu. (Bell & Sons. 7s.)
45. The Student's Blackstone. By Kerr. (Reeves & Turner. 7s. 6d.)

Mill, we are told, needs to be corrected at times, but his book carries off the palm from its rivals owing to its perspicuous style. In any case, our object is to induce judgments, not to supply them ready-made.

We close our list with a few miscellaneous books for—

(k.) GENERAL READING.

46. Don Quixote. By Cervantes. (Bell & Sons. 7s.)
47. Goethe's Wilhelm Meister. Translated by Carlyle. (Chapman. 3s.)
48. Essays. By Montaigne. (Bell & Sons. 10s. 6d.)
49. The Advancement of Learning. By Bacon. Edited by Wright. (Clarendon Press. 4s. 6d.)
50. Marcus Aurelius, To Himself. Translated by Rendall. (Macmillan. 6s.)

The self-educator is not obliged to complete the study of one group of books before beginning another, but he will do well to follow in the main the order indicated by the numbering in each section. Let him work through these fifty books again and again, turning, upon occasion, to a dictionary; let him copy out and learn by rote the passages which strike him most; and let him apply his utmost intensity of thought to every paragraph that he reads. When his task is finished, he will be able to guide his own life with some measure of success. He will be fit to drop a vote into a ballot-box, and he will have prepared himself to climb intellectual heights with steady foot.

Reviews.

Winchester.

"HANDBOOKS TO THE GREAT PUBLIC SCHOOLS."—Winchester. By R. Townsend Warner. (Bell & Sons. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE multiplication in late years of histories of our public schools is really a side-ripple of the wave which has borne Mr. Kipling on its crest, and is now binding the Australians in one imperial faggot. Already Messrs. Bell have issued handbooks to Charterhouse, Rugby, and Eton. Messrs. Duckworth's "English Public Schools" series include Eton, Rugby, and Winchester.

As "the Mother of Schools," Winchester has a claim on the regard of all Englishmen. It is but eight years since it celebrated the five-hundredth anniversary of the opening of its doors, and since then quite a sheaf of books has done justice to its history. Mr. Warner's book, taking its size and style from the series to which it belongs, is a well-arranged and, as we have found, a very readable narrative and description of William of Wykeham's great foundation. The only unpublished matter which Mr. Warner claims to give us is derived from some school letters written between Ralph Verney and his father in the seventeenth century, and belonging to the apparently inexhaustible Verney MSS. Ralph went to Winchester as a gentleman commoner in 1682, his father accompanying him, and reporting their arrival as follows:

We wayted on Mr Warden, and from thence wee wayted on our cousin fines at his Chamber, where wee met Mr Harris the Schoole master, who are Both very fine Gentlemen, and were highly civill and obliging to us, entertayned us at Both their Chambers, made us Dine wth them in the Hall, and walkt about with us within the Praecincts of the Colledge and shewed us All: chose one Mr Thomas Terry to Be my sonnes Tutor, who seemes to Be a solid Discreet youth, and Mr Harris sayes He is one of the best, if not the best scholar in the Schoole of his standing, though Hee Bee not yet a Praepositor, and moreover that Hee is of a Sweete (pray turne over the Leaf) Disposition: and Then Mr Harris sent Him, and Mr Windham my Sonnes Chamber fellow, to show my Sonne All about the Towne, w^{ch} They Didd, and Brought Him about 5 a clock after noone unto my Inne at the Signe of the Sunne kept by one Mr Holloway. . . .

We have also an inventory of young Verney's outfit, which included "1 Sylver Issue Plate, with two payres of Stayres on it and 2 little Sylver Hookes belonging thereunto." This was the apparatus for bleeding. Mr. Warner's note is: "When a vein was opened in the neck, a silver pen was inserted to prevent it closing, and the plate was used to keep the pen in its place, and was fastened round the neck with hooks and stayers. The boy was constantly in doctor's hands." Young Verney seems to have been a good enough lad. Dr. Sherrugg's report of him ran: "He hates lewdness and intemperance, but he publicly professeth that he hates also his book like a Toad, and that which he calls y^e Nastiness of y^e Lodging and eating in the Colledg and the drudgery of the Schoole." But Verney's day is quite modern in the life of Winchester. Splendid, indeed, are the traditions of a school of which it can be written: "It must have been a striking occasion when, in 1415, a messenger brought to Colledge the news of a great battle 'apud Agincourt in Pecardiu in festo Sanctorum Crispini et Crispiani,' and received 6s. 8d. for his news."

There is a distinctiveness, a real self-possession, about Winchester which no other school can rival. As Mr. Warner points out, its founder left an impress on the school which time has only deepened. "Wykehamists," not "Wintonians." The school motto is but William of Wykeham's personal motto: "Manners Makyth Man." And the school song has a unique independence. Though its words knit Winchesters together wherever they be, they contain no praise of Winchester, nor do they even allude to the place save that they are wholly concerned with the pleasure of leaving it. We could cull a score of interesting statements from Mr. Warner's pages did space permit. Enough to note that the regular school paper, the Wykehamist, is edited by two boys, one in college, and one commoner, and never by masters. Its independent tone reflects the thoroughly English liberty bounded and safeguarded by accepted usages, rather than written rules, which the boys enjoy. With this has gone a conservatism reflected in that famous vocabulary which calls a half-holiday a "half-rem."—i.e., "half-remedy"—and knows an idle time as a "thoke." Mr. Warner has not failed to make his book useful to parents with boys to educate, who will find precise information on "Admission and Expenses," "Games," "Prizes and Honours," &c. The photographic illustrations complete a well-nigh ideal handbook.

The Making of Us.

The Springs of Character. By A. T. Schofield. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

In reading this rather abstruse book we have found ourselves exclaiming again and again: "A good parent knows all this, does all this." What he does not do, and will probably never be persuaded to do, is to distinguish between conscious, sub-conscious, and unconscious mind; to distinguish, again, between the real self, the supposed self, and the artificial self; or to tabulate good and bad qualities as they are set forth on pages 149-152 of this book. When, moreover, we find that Mr. Schofield crowns his philosophy and metaphysics with a recognition of the all-importance of orthodox Christianity, we are the more inclined to exclaim that the Christian parent has his own sure and short ways to the truths he wishes to enunciate. Still, no efficient parent can read this book without receiving valuable ideas. That he will be greatly inspired or charmed we dare not predict. Mr. Schofield is earnest and erudite; but he does not fuse his thoughts in a glowing and sustaining thesis. At the end of the book there is a formidable list of about one hundred works which he appears to have consulted, and many of which he quotes. Mr. Schofield's quotations have an irritating frequency and baldness, suggesting a rather dead-weight transfer from a commonplace book. There are too many paragraphs beginning: "Wundt says," "Stout says," "To this McEunn adds," or "It is the duty of parents," as C. Mason tells us." We cannot give a typical passage from Mr. Schofield's pages, which must be read as a whole, but we have indicated their nature, and their conclusion. The following illustration in the chapter on "Character and Conscience" is interesting for its own sake: "The natural conscience at different ages varies immensely, being generally most acute before puberty, and gradually deadening in old age. That of children, as we have just seen, is very strong in its sense of sin, and is also severe in its penalties. This has been proved by Prof. Earl Barnes from the result of questions put to some 20,000 school children in England and America. One question was: 'If a mother gave her child some paints and then left the room, and the little child painted all the chairs blue, what should the mother do to her when she returned?' The answers given showed that the younger the school children, the heavier the penalties they wished inflicted. In the lowest standards nothing less than corporal punishment satisfied the offended conscience. As the children rose in the school so was the penalty modified, until in the highest standard punishment disappeared, and the answer to the question was merely that the child should be remonstrated with, and shown its error." A curious example, this, of the growing charity which at last exclaims: "Use every man after his desert, and who should 'scape whipping?"

Text Books, School Books, &c. English.

Source-Book of English History. Edited by Elizabeth K. Kendall, M.A. (Macmillan 3s. 6d. net.)

PARTLY because of a general feeling that history lessons are dry, and that the ordinary text-books are little more than dull epitomes and a meaningless aggregation of facts, and partly because both the method and the matter of all the subjects taught in Secondary Schools have been, within the last few years, targets for criticism to pelt at, there is a growing demand for books, prints, fac-similes, photographs of men and buildings, which will help to make children familiar with the human documents at first hand, and add freshness and reality to the story of the past. The present volume, Mr. Colby's Selections from the Sources, Mr. Henderson's Sidelights on English Literature, and several others which need not be named here, ought to be in every school library. The extracts in this volume (pp. 465) cover the whole of the historical period. We have space for a short selection only; it is from Alfred's dooms:

If a man have only a single garment wherewith to cover himself, or to wear, and give it [to thee] in pledge; let it be returned before sunset. If thou dost not so, then shall he call unto me, and I will hear him; for I am very merciful.

Judge thou very evenly; judge thou not one doom to the rich, another to the poor; nor one to thy friend another to thy foe, judge thou.

If a man strike out another's tooth in the front of his head, let him make bot for it with viii shillings: if it be the canine tooth, let iv shillings be paid as bot. A man's grinder is worth xv shillings.

The book can be confidently recommended.

Western Civilisation. By W. Cunningham, D.D. Vol. II. (Cambridge: University Press. 4s. 6d.)

PROF. CUNNINGHAM is well known as a student of economics on historical lines; probably no writer has done more to change the method of economic research. The present volume completes a series of three text-books dealing with English Industrial History and the Economic Aspects of Civilisation. The first part of the book contains an extremely suggestive and interesting inquiry on the foundations of society and the economic effects of Christian relations with heathen and Moslems. It is difficult for us to realise to-day the homogeneity in idea and practice of Mediæval Europe: Latin was spoken at all the Universities, and the student could pass from one to the other and feel at home everywhere; the merchant and the artist could travel from market to market knowing beforehand what restrictions and assistance to expect. In religion, too, there was the same broad agreement between all the countries. God was the Supreme Head. The Christian would find at home or abroad little differences in the service and ritual between one church and another. What gives this part of the book its freshness is the attempt which is made in it to express, in terms of economy, the great ideas of Mediæval Christendom.

The French Monarchy (1483-1789). By A. J. Grant, M.A. Vols. I. and II. (Cambridge: University Press. 9s.)

"THE aim of this series" ("Cambridge Historical"), writes the general editor, "is to sketch the history of modern Europe, with that of its chief colonies and conquests, from about the end of the fifteenth century down to the present time." Already more than a dozen volumes have been published, and as many more are promised. Few students will probably master all, most will select those volumes which deal with the history of the country their reading or predilection has been a preparation. It will be a mistake if, however, there is not written a general history which would serve as an introduction to the whole series, and would lead the student to feel that in these two volumes there is no attempt to furnish a fresh analysis—that is left to the reader to make out from the facts carefully collected. Prof. Grant does not belong to the "Catastrophic" school of historians. In a summary of the intellectual and social conditions of France he writes: "But, notwithstanding this ignominious end of the old monarchy, it is necessary to protest against the view which would make of its history nothing but a record of 'wickedness, of falsehood, oppression of man by man'; nothing but an instrument of evil, of which the world was happily rid. . . . It had saved France from internal disorders and foreign dominion, and had enlarged her frontiers."

Canada (1760-1900). By Sir John G. Bourne. (Cambridge: University Press. 6s.)

ANOTHER volume in the "Cambridge Historical" series. It is an entirely competent and fair statement of the case for British rule. The first chapter summarises the period under the French régime. Of the banishment of the Acadian French in 1755, an incident made memorable by Longfellow's poem, the author writes: "But while there are writers who defend this sad incident of American history on the ground of stern national necessity at a critical period in the affairs of the continent, all humanity that listens to the dictates of the heart and tender feeling will ever deplore the exile of those hapless people." A sentence admirably illustrative of the temper in which the book has been written. At a time when the relations between English and French Canadians are not over friendly it is satisfactory to meet with a historian who has no fuel for fires of racial hate. At various points in the narrative the intellectual, social, and economic conditions are referred to. Of the present state of education, the author, whilst hopeful in the main, considers that the weakness of the public school system, especially in Ontario, is the constant effort to teach a child a little of everything, and to make him a mere machine. The consequences are superficiality, a veneer of knowledge, and loss of individuality. A very serious indictment, but one which is, alas! also true of the mother country.

Comenius. By W. S. Monroe. (Heinemann.)

JOHN AMOS COMENIUS (1592-1670), the Moravian schoolmaster, the author of the Great Didactic, Janna Orbis Pictus, and numerous other books and pamphlets, was the first, if not to formulate, to give permanent form to the idea that a child's knowledge of the names of things should not precede his knowledge of the things themselves. Rousseau, Pestalozzi, and Froebel all owed much to him directly or indirectly. Indeed, much of modern educational reform is simply directed to making explicit what is implicit in Comenius' teaching. The child is to have physical freedom, to learn by direct experience; its æsthetic powers are to be developed by music and drawing, and punishment should be impersonal and only used for offences against moral laws. Mr. Monroe gives in outline a sketch of the life of Comenius, a short account of his more important works, and adds a bibliography for the use of those who desire to make a first-hand acquaintance with his writings in the original and in translations.

Outlines of the History of the English Language. By T. N. Toller. (Cambridge: University Press. 4s.)

PROF TOLLER tells the story of our "noble vulgar tongue" in this volume, or, more correctly, follows its history very fully from the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to Chaucer. The rest is passed over very quickly; to the nineteenth century a page and a half only is devoted! The selections from old English are invariably translated so that the student unacquainted with pre-Chaucerian English does not find his ignorance a barrier to his enjoyment. As an example of Prof. Toller's erudition and thoroughness, it is sufficient to say that he gives a list of over 400 words which had found their way into English by the middle of the eleventh century. The book is primarily intended for the general reader rather than the student of the English language, although the latter, if we mistake not, will read it with much the keener enjoyment.

English Drama. By J. Logie Robertson. (Blackwood 2s. 6d.)

THE editor of this book thinks that the study of the drama has been too long confined to Shakespeare, accordingly he has made a selection from the plays of twelve dramatists, beginning with Marlowe's "Doctor Faustus" and ending with Sir

Henry Taylor's "Philip Van Artevelde." It seems strange, considering the object of the book, that he should devote fifty pages of it to Shakespeare. A book like this would not precede, but follow the study of Shakespeare, if for no other cause than that the examiners have determined it so. Since the scenes selected are interesting in themselves and characteristic, it could be used with profit and amusement in the higher forms as an occasional reader. But is it wise to tell a boy, whose literary opinions are not based on knowledge, that no comedies since "She Stoops to Conquer" and the "School for Scandal" have come up to their level?

Problems in Education. By W. H. Winch. (Swan Sonnenschein. 4s. 6d.)

MUCH of this book is spoiled by careless writing and incoherent thinking. Again and again grammar or sense is conspicuously absent. On p. 17 we read: "The solid individual becomes dissolved in a network of relations." Mixed metaphors and hazardous grammar may pass; but the sense is surely important in a book the aim of which is to dethrone some educational theories. For instance, what meaning does the author expect a hard-worked and imperfectly educated teacher to get out of the statement: "Allied with this is some form of naturalistic ethics, often a very imperfectly conceived utilitarian one, so imperfectly that impulse is deified, and the immediate pleasure-giving power of any course of action or instruction is held to be sufficient justification"? What is the teacher whom he desires to interest in education to understand by an imperfectly conceived utilitarian form of naturalistic ethics? The book should be re-written, otherwise Mr. Winch's colleagues will never find the pearl hidden presumably in the great heap of his learning. Were the book simplified, and terms like "atomism" and "individualism" defined, Mr. Winch would at least discover whether at the back of his involved and jerky English there was any thought at all which would help his readers to see that education is based upon a discredited philosophy. Anyway, unless as an exercise in paraphrasing, the book is without value, and will certainly fail of its object.

Secondary Teaching. (Manuals of Employment for Educated Women.) By Christabel Osborn and Florence B. Low. With an Introduction by Miss E. P. Hughes. (Scott. 1s.)

THIS is the first volume of a series intended for educated women who are on the look-out for employment. The information contained in these eighty-two pages supplies all the necessary external facts as to the calling—its money value, the leisure and fame it offers, the field of work and how to train for it, its mental and physical strain. The answers to the more vital questions will come only with the knowledge born of experience. We would suggest, in case of doubt, that a trial be made; the step is not irrevocable, and escape in the early stages is easy. Miss Hughes's introduction will, we fear, terrify many a quiet girl; no good can come of impressing upon the candidate, already probably too serious from her severe studies, the high responsibility of teaching. No profession should be entered upon lightly, but there is a cant of "over seriousness" which, unfortunately, high academic distinction too often fosters.

Macaulay's Essay on Pitt. Edited by C. J. Battersby. (Blackie. 2s.)

THE text has been edited on a plan now very familiar, that is, the text is sandwiched between a life of the author, an essay on Macaulay's style and his estimate of Pitt and notes. Why will not editors of English classics allow students to find out for themselves the style of the writer they are beginning to read? What encouragement is there to begin at all after learning that Macaulay is a master of "resonant commonplace"?—a criticism quoted by the editor.

THE PICTURE SHAKESPEARE.—As You Like It. (Blackie 1s.)

THE text of this play has been expurgated for class use; as its title suggests, it is illustrated; it contains notes and a short introduction.

King Henry V. Edited by A. W. Verity. (Cambridge: University Press. 1s. 6d.)

As Mr. Verity has edited already some eight or nine plays of Shakespeare for this series, the reader must be content with the information that the introduction, notes, and illustrations from Holinshed, &c., bulk larger by sixty pages than the text itself. It is not the editor's fault if the schoolboy's knowledge of Shakespeare is not exhaustive.

ARE YOU READING
RUDYARD KIPLING'S
GREAT STORY,
"KIM,"
NOW COMMENCING IN
CASSELL'S MAGAZINE

For January, price 6d?

Tens of Thousands of New Readers of this world-famous Magazine are enjoying this splendid literary treat of the New Century.

"Kim" opens magnificently."

The Daily Express.

"The biggest attraction, no doubt, to the reading world in general will be the story by Mr. Rudyard Kipling, entitled 'Kim.'"

The Queen.

"The instalment closes with an exciting scene of espionage."—The Literary World.

"'Kim' is likely to prove the most characteristic and striking work of the very versatile writer. The illustrations, which are the production of the author's father, are unique and artistic."—The Liverpool Mercury.

An Unrivalled Gallery of Historical Works of Art,

IN WEEKLY PARTS, PRICE 6d. PART I READY JANUARY 23.

THE CENTURY EDITION OF CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF ENGLAND

A SERIES OF
SUPERB COLOURED PLATES

Has been specially prepared for this edition, consisting of reproductions executed in the best style of modern colour printing, of painting, by leading artists representing the great events in the history of the English people.

The CENTURY EDITION will be brought down to the beginning of the 20th century, will be printed on superior paper, and contain nearly 2,000 original illustrations.

PART 2 READY FEB. 6, and Weekly thereafter.
CASSELL & COMPANY LIMITED, London; and all Booksellers.

THE BEST & CHEAPEST DICTIONARIES
IN EXISTENCE.

CASSELL'S FRENCH DICTIONARY.

595th Thousand. 1,150 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

CASSELL'S GERMAN DICTIONARY.

257th Thousand. 1,120 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

CASSELL'S LATIN DICTIONARY.

122nd Thousand. 927 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

CASSELL'S ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

1,100 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

Cassell's Educational Catalogue will be sent post free on application.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED,
London, Paris, New York, and Melbourne.

SMITH, ELDER & CO'S LIST.

STUDENTS' EDITION OF SIDNEY LEE'S "LIFE OF SHAKESPEARE."

With a Photogravure Plate and 4 Full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Shakespeare's Life and Work:

Being an Abridgment chiefly for the Use of Students of "A Life of William Shakespeare." By SIDNEY LEE, Editor of "The Dictionary of National Biography"; Honorary Doctor of Letters in the Victoria University.

* Also the FOURTH ORDINARY EDITION of "A LIFE OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE," with two Portraits of Shakespeare, a Portrait of the Earl of Southampton, and facsimiles of Shakespeare's known signatures, crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.; and the ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY EDITION, in 1 vol., medium 8vo, profusely illustrated with Photogravures, Topographical Views, &c. 16s.

Daily News.—"Mr. Lee's little volume can be most confidently recommended, not only to students, but to all who wish to have at hand a thoroughly trustworthy work of reference."

British Weekly.—"No abridgment was ever better managed than this.... Nothing important even in the notes is omitted.... Was ever so valuable a re-issue published at so small a price as this?"

INTRODUCTION to the STUDY of the RENAISSANCE. By Mrs. LILIAN F. FIELD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Daily Chronicle.—"A thoroughly creditable piece of work, sufficiently concise for educational purposes, and likely at the same time to be acceptable to a reader of literary taste."

A SIMPLE GRAMMAR of ENGLISH

NOW IN USE. By JOHN EARLE, M.A., Rector of Swanwick; Rawlinsonian Professor of Anglo-Saxon in the University of Oxford; Author of "English Prose: its Elements, History, and Usage," "The Philology of the English Tongue," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Guardian.—"Cannot fail to help anyone who reads it attentively, to think, and speak, and write with accuracy and precision.... We should like to see the 'Simple Grammar' in the hands of every educated man and woman."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

ENGLISH PROSE: its Elements, History, and Usage. 8vo, 16s.

WORKS BY THE LATE PROFESSOR JOHN MARSHALL, F.R.S., F.R.C.S.

A DESCRIPTION of the HUMAN BODY: its Structure and Functions. Illustrated by reduced copies of the Author's "Physiological Diagrams," to which series this is a companion work. Designed for the use of Teachers in Schools, and of Young Men destined for the Medical Profession, and for Popular Instruction generally. By the late JOHN MARSHALL, F.R.S., F.R.C.S.

The work contains 200 quarto pages of Text, bound in cloth, and 240 Coloured Illustrations arranged in 11 Folio Plates, measuring 15 inches by 7½, in a limp cover. Price of the Quarto Volume and Small Folio Atlas, 12s. 6d.

PREPARED FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF SCIENCE AND ART.

PHYSIOLOGICAL DIAGRAMMS:

Extended and Revised by the Author. 11 Diagrams life-size, each on paper 7½ by 3½, 9 in., coloured in facsimile of the originals. Price 12s. 6d. each sheet; or mounted on canvas, with rollers, and varnished £1 1s. each. Explanatory Key, 16 pages, 8vo, price 1s.

1. The Skeleton and Ligaments. 2. The Muscles and Joints, with Animal Mechanics. 3. The Viscera in Position; the Structure of the Lungs. 4. The Heart and Principal Blood-vessels. 5. Lymphatics or Absorbents. 6. The Digestive Organs. 7. The Brain and Nerves. 8. The Organs of the Senses—Plate I. 9. Ditto—Plate II. 10. The Microscopic Structure of the Textures and Organs—Plate I. 11. Ditto—Plate II. 12. Diagrams Nos. 1, 3, 4, and 6, are specially adapted for use in Pupil Teachers' Centres and Certificate Classes as aids in the instruction of DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

Messrs. SMITH, ELDER & CO. will be happy to forward an Illustrated Prospectus of the Diagrams post-free on application.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO.,
15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

BLACKIE & SON'S NEW EDUCATIONAL BOOKS.

BLACKIE'S

ILLUSTRATED LATIN SERIES.

General Editor—Prof. R. Y. TYRRELL, Litt.D., Examiner to the Universities of London and Glasgow, &c.

NEW VOLUMES.

The Volumes are published with or without Vocabularies.

Caesar—Gallic War. Books I. and V. Edited by Prof. JOHN BROWN. 1s. 6d. each. [Book I. in January.]

Livy—Book I. Edited by Prof. JOHN BROWN. 2s. 6d. [In January.]

Livy—Book XXI. Edited by G. G. LOANE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Sallust—The Catiline Conspiracy. Edited by the Rev. W. A. STONE, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Virgil—Aeneid VI. Edited by H. B. COTTERILL, M.A. 1s. 6d. [In January.]

Virgil—Aeneid II. and III. Edited by Prof. SANDFORD, M.A. 1s. 6d. each. [Book II. in January.]

NEW FRENCH BOOKS.

A Primer of French Literature. By Prof. WEEKLEY, M.A., University College, Nottingham. 2s. 6d.

Parlons Francais. A New Course of Conversational and Idiomatic French. By F. JULIEN, French Master at King Edward VI.'s Grammar School, Birmingham. 2s. 6d.

French Weekly Tests. Providing a Test Paper in French for each Week of the School Year. Compiled by EMILE B. LE FRANCOIS. 4d.

French Commercial Correspondence By Easy Stages. By ALFRED STARCK, formerly Modern Language Master, Honiton Grammar School. 1s. 6d.

German Commercial Correspondence. For Initiatory and Intermediate Classes or Private Use. By ALFRED OSWALD, Lecturer in German at the Athenaeum Commercial College, Glasgow. 2s.

NEW ILLUSTRATED SCHOOL SHAKESPEARE.

Blackie's Picture Shakespeare.

Under the above title Messrs. Blackie & Son are about to issue an Illustrated Edition of Shakespeare's Plays in single volumes suitable mainly for Schools and the home circle. Each volume will be provided with a brief Introduction and Explanatory Notes, and will contain a Coloured Frontispiece and numerous Black-and-White Illustrations. The Plays are issued in a prettily designed cloth cover at the uniform price of 1s. per volume.

The Series is adapted for University Local and College of Preceptors' Examinations. The volumes now ready are—

As You Like It. | Julius Caesar.
Others are in preparation.

NEW GEOGRAPHIES.

A Brief Introduction to the Commercial Geography of the World. By the Rev. FREDERICK SMITH. With Coloured Maps. 1s. 6d.

The Continental Geography Readers

Each book is provided with an up-to-date synopsis of the geography, illustrated with numerous Coloured Maps. The Reading Lessons are plentifully illustrated with Sketch Maps. The lessons are couched in simple but picturesque language; breadth of treatment rather than minuteness of detail has been aimed at. Price 1s. each volume.

Africa. With Sketch Maps, 16 Coloured Maps.
Europe. With Sketch Maps, 16 Coloured Maps.
Asia. With Sketch Maps, 16 Coloured Maps.
America, Australasia, in preparation.

London: BLACKIE & SON, LTD, Old Baile

The Junior Temple Reader. By C. L. Thomson and E. E. Speight. (Marshall. 1s. 6d. net.)

Few will dispute that this collection of heroic and fairy lore is far and away better than any junior reader of the same type in school use. When The Temple Reader—for use in higher forms—was published, it was commended by critics and schoolmasters everywhere; that book had, however, one signal defect—a defect which, curiously enough, passed unnoticed—the “pieces” selected were both ridiculously short and broke off very frequently when the interest was quickening to delight. The Junior Reader avoids this shock to a child’s nervous system. Each story is fairly long, and always complete. The illustrations—some fifty in number—are various in style.

Essays from De Quincey. Edited by J. H. Fowler. (Black.)

THE essays selected are: “The English Mail Coach,” “Joan of Arc,” “Infant Literature,” “Memories of Grasmere,” “Note on the Knocking at the Gate.” De Quincey is not often read in schools, and these essays will give many a sixth form boy a feeling for form as he watches in imagination the wonderful verbal pageant pass before him.

CAMBRIDGE BIBLE FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.—Daniel. By Rev. S. R. Driver, D.D. (University Press. 2s. 6d. net.)

AN introduction of 106 pages, foot-notes on each page which run up three-quarters of it, will give some idea of the thoroughness with which Dr. Driver has edited his text. Dr. Driver discusses very fully the Authorship and Date, and gives reasons for thinking that the book was composed about 168 B.C., and that accordingly Daniel did not write it.

Carlyle’s Essay on Burns. Edited by John Downie. (Blackwood. 2s. 6d.)

IT gives us a shock to see Carlyle annotated; but reflection bids us take heart again, for we need not read the notes and introduction unless we like. The fear is that some will read these in preference to the text, and stand amazed, like the examinee who had to confess, on being asked to repeat the first sentence in Bacon’s Essay on Marriage, that he had only read the explanations at the end. Mr. Downie has commented on every allusion, and there is no reason why the illusion should pale with increase of understanding.

GEOGRAPHY READERS.—Asia and Africa. (Blackie. 1s. each.)

THESE “geography” readers are a compromise between the “reader” exclusively general, and the ordinary regulation geography book which is made up entirely of “name-lists.” The sketch-maps scattered up and down the text will add to the interest of the reading. The Synopsis need not be studied.

The Sovereign Reader. By G. A. Henty. (Blackie. 1s. 6d.)

THIS reader is made up of scenes from the life and reign of Queen Victoria. The present edition has accounts of the Sudan War and the Conquest of the Transvaal.

A Brief Introduction to Commercial Geography. By Rev. F. Smith. (Blackie.)

THERE can be no question that the youth who reads carefully through this book will learn a great deal about trade and commerce; but since the author intends it merely as an introduction, and a brief one at that, it is a pity that it does not stimulate an interest inductively. Everything is told, and the mental reaction of the learner is apparently entirely ignored.

Macaulay’s Warren Hastings. Edited by John Downie. (Blackie. 2s.)

IT has been said that Macaulay’s claim to fame partly rests on the fact that he was to many readers the first writer who interested them in things of the mind. It is also true that few writers are more allusive. Mr. Downie supplements the text with a Life of Macaulay, a synopsis and criticism of the essay, a short bibliography, and full notes.

Greek and Latin.

Homer: Odyssey. Book VI. By E. E. Sikes. (Blackwood. 1s. 6d.)

MR. SIKES considers that in the whole range of literature there is, perhaps, nothing simpler and nobler than the picture of Nausicaa. However that may be—and there are many claimants for this honour—no pains have been spared to make the pupil’s introduction to the graceful story of Odysseus and Nausicaa a memorable moment. Fine scholarship, carefully selected illustrations, a short Homeric grammar, a little talk on Homer’s folk-lore and on the rise of Greek epic and characteristics of the poem, notes, and good print and paper combine to make plain the rough places of a very difficult language. The schoolboy is to be envied who has such an Ariadne to help him thread the maze of Greek. If the price of this series is considered, we know not where to look for its equal.

The Anabasis of Xenophon. Book VI. By G. M. Edwards. (Cambridge: University Press. 1s. 6d.)

THE plan followed in this book is the same as Mr. Edwards’s editions of Books II., III., IV., and V. of the Anabasis. We suppose schoolboys will go on reading this most arid book to all time, and it is well, therefore, that they should have all the help which scholarship can give. Of this series for schools and training colleges, we may say as Æneas to Dido, “From one learn all.”

Ovid: Metamorphoses (Selections). By J. H. Vince. (Blackwood. 1s. 6d.)

WE agree with the editor that it is desirable that schoolboys should know something of the current teaching on mythology and folklore. Mr. Vince, very appropriately, devotes some twelve pages to metamorphic mythology and magic in classical literature. The frontispiece, “Medea Boiling the Ram,” from an amphora, is a very effective illustration, as is also the one on p. 6, “Herakles Wrestling with Triton.” On the whole the notes are satisfactory, though occasionally too learned.

Cæsar: Gallic War. Book VII. E. S. Shuckburgh. (Cambridge: University Press. 1s. 6d.)

THIS series for schools and training colleges is now very familiar. All information, whether useful or interesting, which the editor’s long experience in editing classical texts has taught him that the pupils will ask for, has been given in the notes.

Georgics of Virgil. Book I. S. E. Winbolt. (Blackie. 1s. 6d.)

So long as workmanship is considered in art as well as the matter of it, so long will Virgil hold an assured place in the affections and admiration of men. No doubt the beautiful lines beginning:

Me vero primum dulces ante omnia Musæ, contain little positive thinking; but they fascinate, and we find the combination of music and images strong enough to produce an emotional response which runs up and down the memories of hours spent in nature’s “quiet seats.” It is the same with Tennyson’s lines:

The island-valley of Avilion,
Where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow;
Nor ever wind blows loudly; but it lies
Deep-meadow’d happy, fair with orchard lawns
And bowery hollows crown’d with summer sea.

Here the music is so powerful that it bears down our science. No better example of perfect workmanship can be found than in the Georgics, and the editor of this book endeavours to make the pupil feel this. The illustrations, too, are suggestive of simple and quiet country life. As editing, for a school-book its standard is unusually high.

The Æneid of Virgil. Book III. By P. Sandford. (Blackie. 1s. 6d.)

IN addition to the usual explanation of the subject-matter of the book, Mr. Sandford has written a delightful essay on Virgil’s style; interesting notes on the metre and illustrations; and, as if this was not enough, he has increased the value of the book by a selection of translations of some of the unforgettable passages. We heartily commend this attractive textbook to the notice of teachers.

Cæsar: The Gallic War. By J. Brown. (Blackie. 1s. 6d.)

THIS is a revised and more fully illustrated edition of the first, published seven years ago. The notable features of the book are an account of Roman books and book-making, and a rather full notice, for a school-book, of the constitution of the army in Cæsar’s time.

A Second Latin Reader. By G. B. and A. Gardiner. (Arnold. 1s. 6d.)

THE authors have aimed at making their series, not only instructive, but also interesting and attractive to young people. If the book is used with a classical dictionary, and if the pupil has some knowledge of the history of Rome and Greece, he will get much pleasure out of the book.

The Fourth-Form Latin Prose Book. By E. C. Cumberbatch. (Longmans.)

A COLLECTION of English sentences for turning into Latin, followed by a prose memoranda and English-Latin dictionary.

French.

French Lessons in French. By F. P. de Champtasoin. (Cassell. 2s.)

NOW that examinees are, by command, to be allowed certain tolérances in accident, more and more will there be a tendency to teach French in French. If the subject-matter of the lessons is also made interesting, and a mental exercise as well as a merely "imitative" one, the difficulty of modern language teaching will be solved. So far, however, the reformers lay stress on imitation and neglect the intelligence. Our single criticism of M. de Champtasoin's book is that it is tiresome to read. The author might reply very fairly: "So it ought to be."

Le Songe d'Or, and Other Stories. By Ernest Weekley. (Blackie. 1s. 6d.)

THE notes to this collection of five short stories are in French, the idea being that the boy who is plucky enough to read in "notes" will not be deterred from doing so because they are written in the language he is learning. At the end of the book there are exercises in the subjunctive and in the inversion of "que" to save the learner from the pitfall in such sentences as "L'Épée que brandissait le capitaine."

Le Chien du Capitaine. Louis Énault. Edited by Margaret De G. Verrall. (Pitt Press. 2s.)

THE new feature of this volume is a classification of the uses of the subjunctive, all the examples of which are taken from the text itself. There are notes and a vocabulary, but no introduction. The narrative is very simple, and suitable for junior forms.

French. "Self-Educator" Series. John Adams. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. 6d.)

THE aim of this series is to help the isolated student. Although the book is neither interesting nor original in plan, it will undoubtedly serve the needs of some learners who do not mind the grind.

Le Coup de Pistolet. Mérimée. Edited by J. E. Michell. (Blackie. 1s.)

AN exciting romance of the kind boys delight in. Whether a teacher should go out of his way to find for his pupils what unaided they will find for themselves in abundance is a question which does not concern us here. The book contains both vocabulary and brief notes.

Science.

Biology.

A Treatise on Zoology. Edited by Prof. E. Ray Lankester. Part II.: The Porifera and Coelentera. Part III.: The Echinodermata. (Black.)

Text-Book of Zoology. By Dr. Otto Schmeil. Translated from the German by Rudolf Rosenstock. Edited by J. T. Cunningham. Part III.: Invertebrates. (Black.)

Problems of Evolution. By F. W. Headley. (Duckworth.)

THE ten parts of the treatise on zoology edited by Prof. Lankester are to be prepared, as far as possible, by graduates of the University of Oxford. Hence we may be permitted to regard the work as a friendly rival of the Cambridge Natural History, which has been in course of publication for several years. The work is not for the reader who considers the materials for the study of zoology to be represented by the collection of animals living in the Zoological Gardens, but for the serious student of animal morphology. Taking the two volumes already published as an earnest of the value of those to come, it may be said at once that the treatise will be a credit to British zoology, and will find a permanent place on the bookshelves of every museum and educational institution where the systematic study of the animal kingdom is carried on. To our mind, the characteristics which distinguish the work from others of much the same type—though there is nothing exactly like it—are the careful consideration given to fossil forms; the comprehensive treatment of systematic zoology; and the concise but instructive way in which the student is led, by text and illustration, to appreciate all the structural facts of value in determining organic relationships and affinities.

In the second part, the sponges are dealt with by Prof. Minchin, his contribution occupying more than one-half of the book, and being the best account of this group that has yet appeared in an English text-book. The jelly-fishes, sea-anemones, corals, and other organisms of the same rank, are described by Drs. Bourne and Fowler. The authors of the third part, Prof. J. W. Gregory, Mr. Goodrich, and Dr. Bather, deal with such animals as the sea-urchin, star-fish, brittle-star, sea-cucumber, sea-lily, and feather-star. As each volume is complete in itself, the order and rate of publication are perhaps not of much importance; nevertheless, we hope that the remaining volumes of the treatise will soon be available.

Dr. Schmeil's work is altogether different in character from the one for which Prof. Lankester is responsible. It is a more or less popular account of animal life from the point of view of the outdoor naturalist, the volume under notice dealing with animals like insects, spiders, snails, star-fishes, jelly-fishes, and sponges, destitute of a backbone. The book should be useful to teachers of nature-study on account of the facts it contains. It was scarcely worth while, however, to go to Germany for a work of this kind, and Mr. Cunningham could have improved it by the free use of editorial functions.

In the opinion of the Lamarckians: "The giraffe's neck grew long from constant straining upward; from constant use the elephant's trunk became a long and perfect grasping implement; much desert walking made the camel's foot what it is; in each generation there was an increment due to exercise, and this increment was handed down to the offspring." The Neo-Lamarckians accept this view with slight modifications.

Mr. Headley shows, in his thoughtful and thorough contribution to the literature of evolution, that Lamarck's theory has no basis in fact, and offers no satisfactory explanation of the phenomena of animated nature. He describes the position of the Neo-Darwinian—the follower of Weismann—and explains how Nature acts as a breeder, selecting for survival animals having variations of structure most suitable for existence in a particular environment. On this principle, no characteristics developed by exercise are inherited—the son of a blacksmith does not inherit his father's strength of arm, and a clever pianist does not transmit to his child the dexterity of finger acquired by him by long practice. Case upon case of this kind have been disposed of by Weismann, Wallace, and other Darwinians; and Mr. Headley adds his testimony to the same side of the scale. He goes even further, for he shows in the second part of his volume how the principles which have brought about the evolution of plants and animals other than man can be used to account for the main facts of human evolution. The book, while scientific in fact and method, can be followed with intelligence by anyone having a nodding acquaintance with natural history; and as a means of bringing the reader into the stream of thought and discussion concerning the causes which have produced the living world, it is admirable.

Rocks and Fossils.

Studies in Fossil Botany. By Dr. D. H. Scott. (Black.)

Geology. By Prof. T. G. Bonney. (S.P.C.K.)

An Elementary Text-book of Coal Mining. By Robert Peel. (Blackie.)

PLANTS, like animals, have left their records in the rocks; and though these fossil remains are by no means evenly distributed through the series of strata, it is possible to determine by them the relative dates of botanical history. Our coal-seams have provided numerous specimens of this kind; and is, in fact, richer than any other formation in the flora of the past. A

2 NEW BOOKS FOR TEACHERS

To meet the requirements of the Board of Education.

Crown 4to, 5s.

AMBIDEXTROUS AND FREE-ARM BLACKBOARD DRAWING AND DESIGN.

By F. F. LYDON,
Art Master, Parmiter's
School, People's Palace
School of Art, and Tottenham Training College.

This work, in addition to a fully illustrated description of the forty-eight graduated plates, which are designed as a progressive course in free-arm drawing and design, gives numerous photographic blocks and diagrams illustrative of the method of work described, and of the best ways to fit up the class-room for the study of this subject. The letterpress shows how the subject may be inexpensively introduced into any school, and made an accessory to the ordinary drawing lesson.

Crown 4to, 3s. 6d. net.

MODEL AND BLACKBOARD DRAWING.

By F. F. LYDON.

The book consists of 44 Plates, which divide themselves into three classes, dealing respectively with the geometric models proper, common objects based on them, and black-board exercises, treated boldly, and reproduced white on black. There are 52 pages of descriptive letterpress, in which the usual difficulties of the student are fully dealt with.

NEW METHODS IN EDUCATION. ART—REAL

MANUAL TRAINING—NATURE STUDY. Explaining processes whereby Hand, Eye, and Mind are educated by means that conserve vitality and develop a union of thought and action. By J. LIBERTY TADD.

With 478 Pictures

and

44 Full-Page Plates

showing children and teachers practising these new methods or their work. A revelation to all interested in developing the wonderful capabilities of young or old, inspiring it with a desire to do likewise. Teachers and parents at once become enthusiastic and delighted over the Tadd methods, which the book enables them to put into practice. Size 7½ x 10½ inches. 456 pages, fine plate paper, bound in cloth boards. 1 vol., imp. 8vo, 14s. net. Prospectus free.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

JUST PUBLISHED.

An Introduction to Modern Scientific Chemistry.

In the Form of Popular Lectures suited for University Extension Students and General Readers.

By Dr. LASSAR-COHN, Professor in the University of Königsberg, Author of "Chemistry in Daily Life," "A Laboratory Manual of Organic Chemistry," and Hon. Member of the Society of Biological Chemistry, London. Translated from the Second German Edition by M. M. PATTISON MUIR, M.A., Fellow of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. With 58 Illustrations by the Author. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

Chemistry in Daily Life.

Twelve Popular Lectures by Dr. LASSAR-COHN, Professor of Chemistry in the University, Königsberg. Translated into English by M. M. PATTISON MUIR, M.A. With 21 Illustrations. Second Edition, Revised and Augmented. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

The Elements of Electro-Chemistry Treated Experimentally.

By Dr. ROBERT LÜPKE, Head Master of the Municipal Dorothea Real Gymnasium, and Lecturer in the Imperial School of Post and Telegraphs, Berlin. With 54 Figures in the Text. Translated from the Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged, by M. M. PATTISON MUIR, M.A. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

H. GREVEL & CO.,

33, King Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

large part of Dr. Scott's work is, therefore, devoted to the plant-remains of the Carboniferous period. All the plants investigated belong to two vegetable sub-kingdoms, namely, the Pteridophytes and the Gymnosperms, and possess clearly-marked characteristics. The former group comprises the Ferns, Horsetails, and Club-mosses, and the latter contains the Conifers and Cycads. The common Horsetail, which may be found in fields and waste places in the spring and summer, is a living representative of a once very extensive family having similar characteristics. There are only about twenty-five surviving species of the genus to which it belongs; but fossil botany provides details concerning many others, and reveals the affinities between them. So with other plants—and especially with those belonging to the two divisions examined by Dr. Scott—the study of ancient forms is essential to the understanding of their mutual relationships. It would scarcely be possible to trace the connexion more clearly, consistent with scientific accuracy, than Dr. Scott has done. His book will be at once accepted by men of science as an authoritative statement of the facts and inferences of fossil botany. The illustrations are remarkably fine, and are not the least attractive characteristic of a very valuable volume.

A general acquaintance with plant structures, and a knowledge of the rudiments of geology—such, for instance, as can be obtained from Prof. Bonney's primer—is the only mental equipment required to comprehend Dr. Scott's work. The primer was originally published a quarter of a century ago, when orthodox Christians regarded the teachings of geology with alarm, and refused to believe the evidence of evolution imprinted upon the rocks. Prof. Bonney has made a number of corrections and additions to bring the book into line with the present state of knowledge; but the fact that the general arrangement and method of treatment remain the same reminds us that credit is due to him for the share he has taken in the emancipation of science.

Mr. Peel's book provides the student of coal-mining with elementary information which will prove of interest and service. We notice incorrect points here and there. Fossils are not merely remains of organisms—the name is also used to designate footprints, tracks, and casts; the section across the Jura Mountains (Fig. 9) is a misrepresentation of fact; the dyke of igneous rock (Fig. 22) looks more like a stack of drain-pipes than actual rock; the particulars as to accidents in mines ought to have been obtained from Prof. Le Neve Foster's latest report, instead of the report for the year 1891.

Chemistry and Hygiene.

Modern Chemistry. 2 vols. By Prof. W. Ramsay. (Dent.)

Progressive Course of Chemistry. By Telford Varley. (Black.)

The Science of Hygiene. By Dr. W. C. C. Pakes. (Methuen.)

PROF. RAMSAY'S two volumes belong to the excellent series of "Temple" primers. The first is concerned with theoretical, and the second with systematic chemistry. It is scarcely necessary to say that the facts and phenomena of chemical science are described in a masterly manner, but taking the accuracy and abundance of information for granted, it is difficult to understand for whom the primers are intended. Certainly not for general readers; and elementary students of chemistry will find the descriptions difficult to follow in places. Notwithstanding this, the primers should be largely used as supplementary to the text-book of the ordinary type, such, for instance, as that by Mr. Varley. There is nothing particularly novel in this volume, which contains a course of work for junior classes. But we cannot have too many books of this type, for they all assist in making chemistry a means of developing common sense. The numerous experiments suitable for performance by individual students are worthy of note.

Laboratory practice is an essential part of the study of any concrete science, but, curiously enough, no single book other than that by Dr. Pakes, dealing with the practical work required from the candidate for the diploma of Public Health, has been published. The five parts are respectively concerned with bacteriology, microscopy, chemistry, physics, and vital statistics. The inevitable result of this wide range is that in places the statements made are more of the nature of notes than explanatory descriptions; nevertheless, the book is full of useful hints and will doubtless be appreciated by teachers and students of hygiene and domestic science.

MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' NEW EDUCATIONAL WORKS.

Catalogues forwarded post-free on application.

BLACKWOODS' ILLUSTRATED CLASSICAL TEXTS.

General Editor—H. W. AUDEN, M.A.,

Assistant Master at Fettes College.

NOW READY.

CÆSAR.—GALLIC WAR. Books IV, V. By ST. J. B. WYNNE WILLSON, M.A., Rugby. With or without Vocabulary. 1s. 6d. Vocabulary separately, 3d.

VIRGIL.—GEORGICS. Book IV. By J. SARGEAUNT, M.A., Westminster. 1s. 6d.

CICERO.—IN CATILINAM. Books I.—IV. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A., Fettes College. 1s. 6d.

OVID.—METAMORPHOSES (Selections). By J. H. VINCE, M.A., Bradford. 1s. 6d.

DEMOSTHENES.—OLYNTIACS I.—III. By H. SHARPLEY, M.A., Hereford. 1s. 6d.

HOMER.—ODYSSEY. Book VI. By E. E. SIKES, M.A., St. John's College, Cambridge. 1s. 6d.

XENOPHON.—ANABASIS. Books I, II. By A. JAGGER, B.A., Hymer's College, Hull. 1s. 6d.

* * Other Volumes to follow.

BLACKWOODS' ENGLISH CLASSICS.

General Editor—J. H. LOBBAN, M.A.,

Formerly Examiner in English in the University of Aberdeen.

With Frontispieces, in fcap. 8vo volumes, cloth.

MACAULAY.—LIFE of JOHNSON. By D. NICHOL SMITH, M.A. 1s. 6d.

GOLDSMITH.—TRAVELLER, DESERTED VILLAGE, and OTHER POEMS. By J. H. LOBBAN, M.A. 1s. 6d.

SCOTT.—LADY of the LAKE. By W. E. W. COLLINS, M.A. 1s. 6d.

MILTON.—PARADISE LOST. Books I.—IV. By J. LOGIE ROBERTSON, M.A. 2s. 6d.

COWPER.—THE TASK, and MINOR POEMS. By ELIZABETH LEE. 2s. 6d.

JOHNSON.—LIVES of MILTON and ADDISON. By Professor J. W. DUFF, M.A. 2s. 6d.

CARLYLE.—ESSAY on BURNS. By John DOWDIE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

POPE.—SELECT POEMS. By G. Soutar, Litt.D. [Shortly.]

HAZLITT.—ESSAYS on POETRY. By D. NICHOL SMITH, M.A. [Shortly.]

* * Other Volumes to follow.

BLACKWOODS' SIMPLEX CIVIL SERVICE COPY BOOKS.

By JOHN T. PEARCE, B.A., Leith Academy. Price 2d. each.

CONTENTS OF THE SERIES.

- | | |
|--|---------------------------------------|
| No. 1. Elements, Short Letters, Words. | No. 5. Half-Text, Sentences, Figures. |
| " 2. Long Letters, Easy Words. | " 6. Intermediate, Transcription, &c. |
| " 3. Capitals, Half-Line Words. | " 7. Small Hand, Double Ruling. |
| " 4. Text, Double Ruling, Sentences. | " 8. Small Hand, Single Ruling. |

The Headlines are graduated, up to date, and attractive.

SEND FOR SAMPLE HEADLINES.

THE UNIVERSAL WRITING BOOKS

have been designed to accompany the above Series, and teachers will find it advantageous to use them as Dictation copies, because by them the learner is kept continually writing at the correct slope, &c.

No. 1 is adapted for Lower Classes. No. 2 for Higher Classes.

Price 2d. each.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, 45, George Street, Edinburgh; and 37, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

BLACKWOODS' LITERATURE READERS.

Edited by JOHN ADAMS, M.A., B.Sc., F.C.P.,
Rector of the Free Church Training College, Glasgow.

Book I., 1s.—Book II., 1s. 4d.—Book III., 1s. 6d.—Book IV., 1s. 6d.

BLACKWOODS' SCHOOL SHAKESPEARE.

Edited by R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

Each Play complete, with Introduction, Notes, and Glossary. In crown 8vo volumes, stiff paper covers, 1s., cloth, 1s. 6d.

The Merchant of Venice. [Ready.] The Tempest. [Ready.]
Richard II. [Ready.] As You Like It. [Ready.]
Julius Cæsar. [Ready.] Macbeth. [Immediately.]

* * Others in preparation.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

History of English Literature. By J. LOGIE ROBERTSON, M.A. 3s.

Outlines of English Literature. By Same Author. 1s. 6d.

English Verse for Junior Classes. By Same Author. Part I., Chaucer to Coleridge. Part II., Nineteenth Century Poets. 1s. 6d. net each.

English Prose for Junior and Senior Classes. By Same Author. Part I., Malory to Johnson. Part II., Nineteenth Century Writers. 2s. 6d. each.

English Drama. By Same Author. 2s. 6d.

Stormonth's Handy School Dictionary. New Edition. 1s.

One Hundred Stories for Composition. In Alternative Versions. 1s. 3d.

Elementary Grammar and Composition. 1s.

LATIN AND GREEK.

Higher Latin Unseens. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Higher Latin Prose. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. 2s. 6d.
* * Key, 6s. net.

Lower Latin Prose. New and Enlarged Edition. By K. P. WILSON, M.A. * * Key, 6s. net.

Lower Latin Unseens. By W. LOBBAN, M.A. 2s.

First Latin Sentences and Prose. By K. P. WILSON, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Tales of Ancient Thessaly. By J. W. E. PEARCE, M.A. 1s.

Higher Greek Unseens. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Higher Greek Prose. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. 2s. 6d.
* * Key, 6s. net.

Greek Prose Phrase Book. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. Interleaved, 3s. 6d.

Greek Test Papers. By JAMES MOIR, Litt.D., LL.D. 2s. 6d. * * Key, 6s. net.

Lower Greek Prose. By K. P. WILSON, M.A. 2s. 6d.
* * Key, 6s. net.

FRENCH AND GERMAN.

The Tutorial Handbook of French Composition. By ALFRED MERCIER, L. ès L., Lecturer, University of St. Andrews. 3s. 6d.

The Children's Guide to the French Language. By ANNIE G. FERRIER. 1s.

Progressive German Composition. With Copious Notes and Idioms, and First Introduction to German Philology. By LOUIS LUBOVICUS. 3s. 6d. Also in Two Parts: Composition. 2s. 6d.—Philology. 1s. 6d. * * Key to Composition, 5s. net.

Lower Grade German. By the Same Author. 2s. 6d.

A Compendious German Reader. By G. B. BEAK, M.A., Oxon.; Modern Language Master at the King's School, Bruton. 2s. 6d.

Arithmetic. With Numerous Examples, Revision Tests, and Examination Papers. By A. VEITCH LOTHIAN, M.A., B.Sc. With Answers. 3s. 6d.

Modern Geometry of the Point, Straight Line, and Circle. An Elementary Treatise. By J. A. THIRD, M.A. 3s.

A Spanish Grammar. With Copious Exercises in Translation and Composition; easy Reading Lessons and Extracts from Spanish Authors; a List of Idioms; a Glossary of Commercial Terms (English-Spanish), and a Copious General Vocabulary (Spanish-English). By WILLIAM A. KESSEN. 3s. 6d.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.

NEW EDUCATIONAL PUBLICATIONS.

PITT PRESS SHAKESPEARE FOR SCHOOLS.—New Volume.

Subject for Cambridge Local Examinations, December, 1901.

KING HENRY V. With Introduction, Notes, Glossary, and Index by A. W. VERITY, M.A., sometime Scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge. 1s. 6d.
Guardian.—"The school edition."

THE CAMBRIDGE SERIES FOR SCHOOLS AND TRAINING COLLEGES.

General Editor—W. H. WOODWARD, of Christ Church, Oxford, Principal of University (Day) Training College, Liverpool, and Professor of Education in Victoria University.

NEW VOLUMES.

OUTLINES of the HISTORY of the English Language. By T. N. TOLLER, late Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge; Professor of English in the Owens College, Manchester. Crown 8vo, 4s.

For Cambridge Local Examinations, 1901.

XENOPHON.—ANABASIS. Book VI. Edited (with Notes and Vocabulary) by G. M. EDWARDS, M.A. 1s. 6d.

CAESAR.—DE BELLO GALLICO. Book VII. Edited (with Notes and Vocabulary) by E. S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A. 1s. 6d.

For Queen's Scholarship Examination, December 1901.

To be published early in the present year.

THE OUTLINES of the GROWTH of the BRITISH EMPIRE. By Professor WOODWARD, of University College, Liverpool. Based upon the same Author's "History of the Expansion of the British Empire." This has been prepared specially in view of the needs of Candidates for Queen's Scholarships. With Maps and Tables. 1s. 6d. net.

CAMBRIDGE SCIENCE PRIMERS.

A PRIMER of ASTRONOMY. By Sir Robert Ball

F.R.S., Lowndean Professor in the University of Cambridge. With 11 Full-page Plates and Illustrations in the Text. Foolscap 8vo, 1s. 6d. net

PITT PRESS SERIES.—NEW VOLUMES.

A KEY to WEST'S ELEMENTS of ENGLISH

GRAMMAR. By A. S. WEST, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge.

[Nearly ready.]

Subject for Cambridge Higher Local Examination, 1901.

BACON.—THE NEW ATLANTIS. Edited by

G. C. M. SMITH, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Subject for London Matriculation, June, 1901.

SALLUST.—CATILINE. Edited by W. C. Summers, M.A. 2s.

Subject for Queen's Scholarship Examination, 1901.

CORNELIUS NEPOS.—MILTIADES, EPAMINONDAS. (With Complete Vocabulary.) By E. S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Subjects for Cambridge Local Examinations, 1901.

ROBINSON CRUSOE. Part I. Edited by J. H. B. MASTERMAN, M.A. 2s.

ENAUULT.—LE CHIEN DU CAPITAINE. Edited (with Vocabulary) by M. DE G. VERRALL, 2s.

FREYTAG.—DIE JOURNALISTEN. Edited by H. W. EVE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

BOOKS SUITABLE FOR VARIOUS EXAMINATIONS, 1901-2.

The Pitt Press Series.

AUTHOR.	WORK.	EDITOR.	PRICE.
Aristophanes	Plutus; Ranae.....	W. C. Green.....	3 6
Euripides	Alcestis; Hecuba.....	W. S. Hadley.....	2 6
".....	Heracleidae.....	E. A. Beck and C. E. S. Headlam.....	3 6
".....	Orestes.....	N. Wedd.....	4 6
Herodotus	Book V.....	E. S. Shuckburgh.....	3 0
".....	Books VI., VIII.....	".....	4 0
Homer	Iliad VI., XXII., XXIII., XXIV.....	G. M. Edwards.....	2 0
Lucian	Menippus and Timon.....	E. C. Mackie.....	3 6
".....	Somnium, Charon, &c.....	W. E. Heitland.....	3 6
Plato	Apologia Socratis.....	J. Adam.....	3 6
".....	Crito, Euthyphro.....	".....	2 6
".....	Protagoras.....	J. and A. M. Adam.....	4 6
Thucydides	Book VII.....	H. A. Holden.....	5 0
Xenophon	Anabasis, Vol. I., Text.....	A. Pretor.....	3 0
".....	" Vol. II., Notes.....	".....	4 6
".....	" I., III., IV., V.....	".....	2 0
".....	" II., VI., VII.....	".....	2 6
Caesar	De Bello Gallico— Comment I., III., VI., VIII.....	A. G. Peskett.....	1 6
".....	" II., III., and VII.....	".....	2 0
".....	" I., III.....	".....	3 0
".....	" IV., V.....	".....	1 6
Cicero	Actio Prima in C. Verrem.....	H. Cowie.....	1 6
".....	De Amicitia. De Senectute.....	J. S. Reid.....	3 6
".....	De Officiis III.....	H. A. Holden.....	2 0
".....	Philippica Secunda.....	A. G. Peskett.....	3 6
".....	Pro Archia Poeta.....	J. S. Reid.....	2 0
".....	" Lege Manilia.....	J. C. Nicol.....	1 6
".....	" Milone.....	J. S. Reid.....	2 6
".....	" Murena.....	W. E. Heitland.....	3 0
Cornelius Nepos	Miltiades, Themistocles, Aristides, Pausanias, Cimon.....	E. S. Shuckburgh.....	1 6
Horace	Odes and Epodes.....	J. Gow.....	5 0
".....	Odes. Books I. and III.....	".....	2 0
".....	" Books II. and IV.....	".....	1 6
".....	Epodes.....	".....	1 6
Juvenal	Satires.....	J. D. Duff.....	5 0
Livy	Books IV., VI., IX.....	H. M. Stephenson.....	2 6
".....	Book V.....	L. Whibley.....	2 6
Plautus	Trinummus.....	J. H. Gray.....	3 6
Terence	Hautimorumenos.....	J. H. Gray.....	3 0
Virgil	Aeneid. Books I. to XII.....	A. Sidgwick.....	1 6
".....	Bucolics.....	".....	1 6
".....	Georgics I., II.....	".....	2 0
".....	" III., IV.....	".....	2 0
".....	Complete Works, Vol. I., Text.....	".....	3 6
".....	" Vol. II., Notes.....	".....	4 6

AUTHOR.	WORK.	EDITOR.	PRICE.
About	Le Roi des Montagnes.....	A. R. Ropes.....	2 0
Cornelle	La Suite du Menteur.....	G. Masson.....	2 0
".....	Polyeucte.....	E. G. W. Brauholtz.....	2 0
De Bonnehose	Lazare Hoche.....	C. Colbeck.....	2 0
Delavigne	Louis XI.....	H. W. Eve.....	2 0
De Lamartine	Jeanne d'Arc.....	A. C. Clapin and A. R. Ropes.....	1 6
De Vigny	La Canne du Junc.....	H. W. Eve.....	1 6
Malot	Remi et ses Amis.....	M. de G. Verrall.....	2 0
Mérimee	Colomba.....	A. R. Ropes.....	2 0
Michalet	Louis XI. et Charles le Téméraire.....	".....	2 6
Molière	L'Avare.....	E. G. W. Brauholtz.....	2 6
".....	Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme.....	A. C. Clapin.....	1 6
".....	L'Ecole des Femmes.....	G. Saintsbury.....	2 6
".....	Les Précieuses ridicules.....	E. G. W. Brauholtz.....	3 0
".....	Abridged Edition.....	".....	1 0
".....	Le Misanthrope.....	".....	2 6
Racine	Athalie.....	H. W. Eve.....	2 0
Souvestre	Un Philosophe sous les Toits.....	".....	2 0
Benedix	Doctor Wespe.....	K. H. Breul.....	3 0
Goethe	Knabenjahre (1740-1761).....	W. Wagner and J. W. Cartmell.....	2 0
".....	Hermann und Dorothea.....	".....	3 6
Gutzkow	Zopf und Schwert.....	H. J. Wolstenholme.....	3 6
Hackländer	Der geheime Agent.....	E. L. Milner Barry.....	3 0
Hauff	Der Schein von Alexandria und seine Sklaven.....	W. Bippmann.....	2 6
Riehl	Die Gantenben and Die Gerechtigkeit Gottes.....	H. J. Wolstenholme.....	3 0
Schiller	Wilhelm Tell.....	K. H. Breul.....	2 6
".....	Abridged Edition.....	".....	1 6
".....	Maria Stuart.....	".....	3 6
".....	Wallenstein I. (Lagerand Piccolomini).....	".....	3 6
".....	Wallenstein II. (Tod).....	".....	3 6
Bacon	Essays.....	A. S. West.....	3s. 6d. & 5 0
Cowley	Essays.....	J. R. Lumby.....	4 0
The Cambridge Milton for Schools.	Ode on the Nativity, L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, Lycidas.....	A. W. Verity.....	2 6
".....	Paradise Lost, Bks. I. & II.....	".....	2 0
".....	" Bks. III. & IV.....	".....	2 0
".....	" Bks. V. & VI.....	".....	2 0
More	Utopia.....	J. R. Lumby.....	3 6
Pope	Essay on Criticism.....	A. S. West.....	2 0
Scott	Lay of the Last Minstrel.....	J. H. Flather.....	2 0
".....	Lady of the Lake.....	J. H. B. Masterman.....	2 6
The Pitt Press Shakespeare for Schools.	A Midsummer Night's Dream.....	A. W. Verity.....	1 6
".....	Twelfth Night.....	".....	1 6
".....	Julius Caesar.....	".....	1 6
".....	Tempest.....	".....	1 6
".....	Merchant of Venice.....	".....	1 6
".....	King Richard II.....	".....	1 6
".....	King Henry V.....	".....	1 6
Sidney	An Apologie for Poetrie.....	E. S. Shuckburgh.....	3 0

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)..... 17/6

„ Quarterly 5/0

„ Price for one issue /5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Gate of Languages Thrown Wide.

EVER since Comenius, almost in Shakespeare's day, "unlocked" the "Gate of Languages," men devoted to the service of their fellow-men have been slowly forcing it more and more open. Who is not familiar, for instance—to speak only of modern times—with the labours of a Hamilton, a Prendergast, an Ollendorf, a Gouin, and a Rippman? These reformers have, indeed, accomplished much, and their names will live; but it has been reserved for me, who am anonymous, to throw the Gate wide.

What is the secret of this achievement? What is the deadweight that, after withstanding so much powerful leverage, has at length yielded to a touch? The answer is simple. The deadweight is the weight of ex-pression, and I overcome it by ignoring it. Im-pression offers but little resistance, and with im-pression I am satisfied. In plain words, I *spe*ak no language but my own; others I am content to understand. And so I am saved from many sorrows—I am saved, as a schoolboy, from the sorrow of wasting time, thought, and tears over weary puzzles that I can never piece together with assurance, because, when they are together, I am no judge of them; I am saved, as a grown man, from the sorrow of forcing my tongue to do violence to itself, when it has at last arrived at a certain sense of its powers and responsibilities; I am saved, as a citizen of the world, from the sorrow of never doing justice to myself among foreigners, or justice to foreigners in myself.

I have been very much in France, and not a little in Germany; I am reputed by certain of my less-travelled friends a considerable linguist; I have talked with hundreds of Frenchmen and Germans in their own language, with hundreds more in my own, and I now deliberately assert that, whereas to listen to French or German from almost any native mouth is one of the rarer privileges of existence, to listen to English from almost any French or German mouth sets up an intellectual impatience and discomfort only exceeded by that of listening to French or German from my own. I do not here speak of conscious play-acting; there is, of course, a certain pleasure in pretending to be a Frenchman.

And the loss of sorrow under my scheme is not the only gain. The schoolboy, instead of half learning to turn one or two languages to practical account, will wholly learn to make effective use of two or three; and the man—ripened boy—in intercourse with the foreigner will read his writings and listen to his speech with more sympathy, with more understanding, and therefore with more respect; and so nations will be drawn together. Will any deny that the dull average man is led, however unconsciously, to his low estimate of the foreigner, less by the foreigner's dignified ignorance of English than by his unrestrained, childlike make-believe of knowledge? And there are not ten foreigners in England who do not, upon occasion, betray themselves. Nay, are there as many Englishmen, speaking English, of whom the same could not be said?

Till the world is awake to my discovery, polyglot interpreters there must be; but let that be a vocation apart, a learned profession, a congenial calling for the man with the bent, who will know how to fit himself, without the help of reformers, in the only practical way. For the rest of us, meanwhile, the literatures of Greece and Rome, of France, of Germany, of Italy, are to be entered through my Gate, not without time and effort, but without distress; and, with more time and more effort, but still without distress, an understanding of the spoken language of such nations as attract us may be surely attained.

If every English boy and girl could leave school with well-nigh as full an understanding of written and spoken French as of written and spoken English, and if every French boy or girl could leave school similarly equipped in English, would not intercourse of every description between our nations be facilitated and ennobled a thousandfold, though each spoke only its own tongue. "But," interjects the amateur psychologist, "such bilingual intercourse is psychologically intolerable, if not impossible. Yes to a Frenchman's Avez-vous faim? involves both more effort and more self-effacement than Oui, and a greater loss of self-respect than even J'ai. English to French is, in fact, as inconsequent as Very well to What's o'clock?" This is an over-statement, arising from imperfect analysis. At the root of the matter is association. Accustom yourself, as I have done, to answer in English, and English will come spontaneously; accustom yourself, like the amateur psychologist, to answer in French, and the spontaneous thing will be French—of a sort—or silence. Established associations must, of course, either be maintained or destroyed—destruction the matter perhaps of a week or two—but for such as started through my Gate the associations would be of one order from the outset, and would work as smoothly as those of a man who meets a word with a gesture. But the psychologist will have other shafts ready: "It is impossible to really understand Ich habe meinen Bruder gesehen till you have turned I have seen my brother into it"; and further, "Remember the mental training involved in writing bad Latin prose and worse verses, and in torturing snippets of often impossible English into more than impossible French." I hold, on the contrary, that every time you write Ich habe gesehen mein Bruder—which, by the old methods, is what you do write, over and over again—you are imperiling your understanding of Ich habe meinen Bruder gesehen; and as for "mental training," you could get infinitely more out of the study of Chinese.

Let us by no means ignore "mental training." We want a good deal more of it than we have got, or are yet likely to get, but in the name of the future of our species, let us get it—where it is to be had in abundance—out of such things as are themselves an essential part of our equipment in the fight that is set before us. We no longer make use of things in themselves useless for strengthening the memory. Why, then, should we for training the mind? Besides, is there no mental training involved in the preparatory processes of im-pression—as I have called it? Let us for a moment look at those processes a little closer. There are two stages: in the first, chiefly by the clumsy, indirect means of translation, we endeavour to convey to the brain of the learner the essential ideas contained in the unfamiliar written or spoken words; in the second, we endeavour to convey those essential ideas immediately and directly—as material sensations are conveyed. In the first stage the learner will need much help, much practice, much exercise in the unfamiliar sound-symbols—for the higher life of a language, even though it be labelled "dead," lies always in the spoken word—much writing from dictation, much memorising of attractive verse; but there will be no mechanical substitution of the foreign symbol for the native symbol, and no storing of grammatical lumber—no dealings with grammar, indeed, except in so far as it serves as a key to the forms of the unfamiliar words and their uncouth syntactical relations.

In the second stage of the process we shall still sometimes need dictionary and grammar—teacher or book—but we shall need much more the effective presentation of the new language in sound, together with a persistent imitation of that presentation, and we shall need most of all untiring practice in exercises of direct im-pression, in the immediate apprehension by the mind, that is, of the idea expressed by the written or spoken word.

Such a completed process would, I believe, send the average boy or girl out into the world with far greater linguistic possessions than are common nowadays. I believe also that such a steady training in im-pression would, in general, produce even better results in ex-pression than our present wasteful methods. It is, after all, a question of relative, not absolute, best. If most of us left school possessing even one foreign tongue in the same degree that we possess the tongue that is native to us, we should no longer need reformers and Modern Language Associations. But we don't; nor do I think we ever shall. Life is too precious. On the contrary, the annual waste throughout the civilised world of time, effort, and heartache in the cause of foreign tongues is, when judged by measurable results, nothing less than appalling.

Professional interpreters, as I have said, there must always be, especially for the languages of low intrinsic value; but to all purposes of ordinary intercourse between nations, to the better understanding and fuller appreciation of the foreigner—whether on paper or in person—and, lastly, to the better understanding and fuller appreciation of one's own personality, the royal road, I claim, lies through my Gate. In the interests of a more abundant harvest from the seed so toilsomely scattered by so many legions of husbandmen, I hereby throw that Gate wide to the world.

An Englishwoman's Love-Letters.

(Subsidiary Series.)

I.

THE thing is going splendidly, I think. Nothing like whetting the curiosity of the British Public on a personal matter! Let us keep it up to the last gasp. I see that the papers are beginning to speculate as to the authorship—an excellent sign.

II.

I know that there is much to be said for the proverb "It's well to be off with the old Love before you are on with the new"; but really I think you might have had more confidence and have printed a larger edition. The book can't be bought anywhere now, except at the shops that take the reviewers' copies. I beseech you to hurry your printers. This want of faith hurts me. Perhaps, after all, we have been too hasty, and I ought to have placed my Love in other hands. My heart is wounded. Are all men, I ask myself, like this? Is there no trust?

III.

Ah! your sweet words of reassurance. Was I so cold, so unkind? Let us forget it. After such a letter as that, I am humbled into the dust. A really large new edition all ready and selling like hot cakes—(your dear imagery!)—how splendid! I feel so happy I don't know what to do. Thank you for the Byrons. As you say, there is no poet like him, and none (I think) so well published. But I can't help wishing, now and then, he were more modern. Have you noticed he never uses the word "obsess" once.

IV.

I suppose you read those cuttings about us. Such a list of names as possible authors—Miss Robins, Mrs. Clifford, Dr. Garnett, Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Herbert Spencer. But we know better, don't we, dear? By the way, you must be careful how you send parcels, or the messenger will give away the secret. Mother thinks they had better go to an empty house in the next street—an old servant of ours is caretaker—and I will fetch them after dark. I have a domino. This seems wisest.

V.

The man forgot to leave the Romeike cuttings last night. Do remind him. We simply can't live without them. I want to know the latest rumour as to the authorship. I fancy Dr. Garnett is dropping out of the running. At dinner last night I heard someone gravely state that he knew for a fact that the book was Ibsen's, translated by Mr. Gosse.

VI.

What a splendid cheque! But how expensive advertising is! If only there could be some way out of it, authors' cheques would be so much bigger, wouldn't they? I suppose you know best, and yet it's awful to see all that money going to the advertisement people. What a sunset this evening! Did you see it? All gold and purple, like a vision of the Orient, or something in Byron.

VII.

Thank you for the Dr. William Smiths'. What an erudite pen; but not exactly the thing for a mind at all pre-occupied, is he? not exactly chic? And I can't help thinking about that advertisement question and the money that might be saved if one didn't advertise at all. I find there are books that are not advertised and yet sell. Life is very sad, very perplexing.

VIII.

I saw a string of sandwich-men to-day, advertising a new poem. Wouldn't that be cheaper than the papers? Or notices in the omnibuses? Forgive me if I am too insistent. The Borrowers' came safely; I like them, but I wish they were more morbid.

IX.

I am sorry you object so strongly to the omnibus idea. My remarks have been made entirely in the interests of the book; but we women are always so unfortunate when we criticise business matters! It's the old story—capable Jack and foolish Jill. All things fail me: I know not where to turn for comfort.

X.

As we are going away on a long visit mother thinks it is best that I should put the affairs of the book in the hands of an agent.

THE END.

Things Seen.

Whence?

THE doors of one's mind should be kept always hospitably ajar, in case of possible surprise visits from Truth. One never can tell. It may yet be proven that some good thing may creep out of Board School education.

I was one of half a dozen quite respectable folk sitting on the top of an omnibus, which was passing through a poor but doubtless tolerably honest suburb, called by some the Whitechapel of the West. Gambolling about the greasy pavement within the purlieus of somebody's "Arms"—a flaring beer palace—I saw four urchins who were clothed with something less of trimness than are the scarecrows of the field. Patches of bare flesh, the loops and windows of their raggedness displayed in plenty. Hero and leader of the rest, a strutting six-year-old, incredibly dirty and scarce clothed at all, puffed consequentially at a bran new clay pipe, which he frequently withdrew from betwixt his baby lips, for the sake of fluency in expectoration and blasphemy. I marvelled.

Of a sudden off flew the dilapidated caps of the band as at a given signal; the pipe was whipped behind its owner's back; the four stood, grave, uncovered, in an ordered line along the curb.

I looked about me bewildered. A shabby hearse followed by one shabby carriage was jolting past us. Not a hat was raised on top of my omnibus.

I want to meet the Board School teacher who has had the schooling of those grimy urchins.

Whither?

WE live in subtle, complex times; and it behoves all true men to watch their feet where they do tread, lest in avoiding a worm they incommode an ant.

Though caviare to the general, this row is worth the attention of the few. 3d. a volume.

It was. The end volume was The Ring and the Book, no less; one of its fellows was Virginibus Puerisque, very much tattered. I bought both.

Glutinously sentimental, but comparatively inoffensive in colouring, and only 1s. 2d.

This was a framed picture; a soldier, a cradle, a baby; the customary accessories; nothing specially baneful.

Not at all a Strad, but probably cheap at the price. 3s. 9d.

An ordinary looking fiddle, without a bow.

There were several other quaint notices in this suburban shop window. The street was sourly sordid; a draggle-tailed locality. The woman within was apparelled in new and pronounced mourning. Two ill-kept infants wailed about her skirt. I spoke to her; but very little. The poor creature appeared to be without redeeming features; a clacking, incontinent, sloppy, and intensely vulgar, commonplace person, bearing about her the reminiscences of a certain poor prettiness, now quite botched and done.

Next door I found and conversed with a white-haired shoemaker.

"She'll sell out as soon as she can. There's bin no business done there this four year an' more. He died las' Tuesday. Pore chap! D.T.'s it was, 'tween you an' me. But 'e 'ad a 'ed on 'im, 'ad Tom. My word! I remember 'im goin' ter th' school roun' 'ere" (a huge red Board School). "One uv Mr. Vivian's boys, 'e wuz. An' min' you, I allers did say as Mr. Vivian seemed a queer sorter man fer a teacher, with 'is velvet coat an' 'is long hair. Wrote poetry an' sechlike, 'e did. Well, it never seemed ter me ter do Tom much good; only ter make 'im 'umpy like, an' sorter lonesome. An' my word, but arter 'is marridge 'e did drink, did Tom!"

I do not think I particularly want to know the gentleman called Vivian.

Dr. John Brown.

CAPRICIOUS chance has a way of interposing between ourselves and certain books, which we know to be enjoyable, which are easily procurable, and which everyone else has read. Whatever be the cause, we find ourselves verging upon middle-age, or nearing the tomb, with the ingenious Jones, or the smiling Smith, unread. It is so with the present writer and Dr. John Brown, of Edinburgh. He has known for years that he would delight in the chronicle of Marjorie and Rab, and has been quite willing to echo Mr. Swinburne's wish that he might attain to

Some happier isle within the Elysian sea
Where Rab may lick the hand of Marjorie.

Yet he had never read Mora Subsecivæ until Messrs. Black's recent dainty edition in three light volumes fell in his fortunate way. He has read them now, every word, and his first reading will not be his last. He has found them rich and rare, beautifully human, excellently Scottish, tender and witty and wise. In these forty-three papers there is no word that is not kindly. The good Doctor grips you by the hand as you read, and his face seems a familiar friend. Scotland is fertile in doctors, lawyers, and divines, of an indescribably national type; racy men, largely planned, strong personalities, shrewd and learned and individual. Stevenson, in his Memories and Portraits and elsewhere, has depicted these characteristic Caledonians; often eccentric, often unconventional, always lovable and delightful. Of these was Dr. Brown, whose "leisure hours" produced literature, while his working hours preserved life.

An animated medley! Grave and pleasant memorials of great physicians, from old Sydenham to modern Syme, full of careful eulogy and discriminating touch, making the dead worthies live and move before us, men, not merely men of medicine. Papers upon literary and artistic matters, the work of a man finely judging fine things—a man finely reverential before the revelations of high minds. Chronicles, reminiscences, anecdotes, all smiling and goodly in the cheerful, brave spirit of them: reports of life from one who found it, in the long run, gracious and good. Nothing splenetic, atrabilious, morose. The Religio of this Medicus, like that of his majestic predecessor and namesake, was infinitely firm, a cause of joy, a source of gratitude and wonder and delight and awe; something, too, of a sweet, old-fashioned Izaak Walton piety was upon him. In his noble tribute to Thackeray, at the great man's death, he records a scene which seems as characteristic of its recorder as of its theme. Thackeray and two friends were walking outside Edinburgh, under an evening sky of loveliest delicacy:

The north-west end of Corstorphine Hill, with its trees and rocks, lay in the heart of this pure radiance, and there a wooden crane, used in the quarry below, was so placed as to assume the figure of a cross; there it was, unmistakable, lifted up against the crystalline sky. As they gazed, he gave utterance in a tremulous, gentle, and rapid voice, to what all were feeling, in the word "Calvary!" The friends walked on in silence, and then turned to other things. All that evening he was very gentle and serious, speaking, as he seldom did, of divine things—of death, of sin, of eternity, of salvation; expressing his simple faith in God and in his Saviour.

There, surely, is a touching thing told touchingly: and it is but one of many such things to be found in these manly and winning volumes. Dr. Brown wrote always with no mere literary cleverness of conscious style, but his mind and heart, full of rich substance for utterance, felt the happy and appropriate words, the simple and sufficient phrase. He is certainly an illustration of Stevenson's saying, in a memorable dedication, that doctors, as a class, are superior to the rest of us. His ardent cordiality is a cordial and cardinal virtue.

Like all good men, he can laugh; quietly, with a laughter of the brain, genial and intelligible. Like all good men (Mr. Andrew Lang excepted) he loves dogs, and has a sympathetic understanding of Scott's refusal to dine from home on the day of an "old friend's" death—said friend, a dog. He has much of Lamb's personal feeling for old literature, and a fine flavour of ripe and ready scholarship in his writings. The heart warms to him, as one reads: each sentence has some charm of human feeling. Few pieces of writing could be more unlike each other in subject and treatment than the "Letter to John Cairns, D.D.," in which he paints his cunning and convincing portrait of his father, and the quaint account of Marjorie Fleming, "the astonishing child who diverted the leisure of Scott." But in each what a grasp of the essential, what a sense of character! His pages pulse with life. He is as little able to be dull as to be merely decorative. The least scientific of readers can take pleasure in his medical papers and addresses, dignified and humorous, and of a skilled simplicity. He has much in common with his brother physician, Wendell Holmes; a like power of making his readers love him personally and feel at home with him. To quote his own words upon another writer, there is in him "a temperance, and soundness, and dignity of view, a good breeding and good feeling, a reticence and composure, which, in this somewhat vapouring, turbulent, unmannerly age of ours, is a refreshing pleasure, though too often one of memory." And he is what Bacon calls a "full man," well stored with knowledge, having no need to draw out his thoughts and fancies to attenuation. His "well-mixed, ample, and genial nature" sustained itself upon the substantial wisdom and beauty of great literature and art. He suggests more than he says. His seventy-two years of life had plenty of leisure, but no idleness, and he was a scholar outside his own profession. He wrote the first adequate notice of Modern Painters; he paid splendid homage to the memory of Leech; his culture was various, genuine, wide. And his writings have a pleasant old-time air or touch. Though he died but nineteen years ago, he seems to belong in spirit to the ancient Edinburgh of Scott and Jeffrey, and a hundred more names of renown. To a new reader he comes with the immediate ease and accustomed courtesy of an old acquaintance; compassionate as Goldsmith, sensitive as Lamb, a man of a well-loved type. If there be a note of exaggeration in this letter from Wendell Holmes, it is pardonable:

I have read, and re-read, and then insisted on reading, for the third time, aloud to my wife, that infinitely tearful and mirthful, smileful and soulful, tender, caressing—where shall I stop?—story of 'Pet Marjorie'; the name and the story not at all new to me, yet never old in its passing sweetness. . . . If only that fragment of your writings were saved from the wreck of English literature, men and women would cry over it as they cry to-day over the lament of Danaë, and your name would be remembered with that of Simonides. You cry, and smile, and laugh too.

Sir Henry Yule, writing upon his death, says of his two plain names:

To all who have known the man or his writings—which means to all north of Tweed, and many south of it—the combination of these two monosyllables is transfigured, and, instead of commonplace or colourlessness, rises an image of all that is most genial, humorous, pathetic, and lovable. And even some of those eyes which saw the simple record of his life without recognition will lighten up when told to associate the name with Rab and His Friends.

Messrs. Black have been well-advised in publishing so conveniently portable an edition of these generous and variously moving papers. Hours Subseque is one of those companionable books for frequent converse of which we cannot have too many—books fatal to pessimism, reporting well of life and human nature.

The Chemistry Hour.

THERE was a time when I could recite Graham's Law, and tell why sulphuretted hydrogen will turn blue litmus paper red if you give it half a chance. But these things have gone from me. Not even in dreams do I sport with dioxides, or recover the joy I felt when the primer said, "Take a test tube . . ."—as if I were free to take such a thing, to say nothing of jolly brass rods, and substances, and matches. Even Frank Bew could not "take a test tube" as often as the book required. My own belief is that the Third Class junior master—the same was Frank Bew—was expected to teach Chemistry with a minimum of broken glass. Hence high jinks with blue litmus paper were few in Number Three.

However, Frank was himself almost as exciting as experiments. He was a generous young Irishman, with a Donnybrook glare in his eye, and a great peace in his soul. Grand in cricket, he was even grander on the football field, where his valour seemed to smoke as he reeled to victory. He it was who whacked me over the Pons Asinorum. But his treatment of the Fourth Proposition of Euclid was a finer display of muscle. His pointer smote the blackboard with Mosaic force, and it was dangerous to approach him when he was saying that the line B C must fall on the line E F. Our failure to see this always brought a calm; and for the next few minutes silence reigned while Frank looked for his scissors, and grimly cut out two triangles, which he proceeded to gum on the blackboard. It has struck me since that, as our whole business was to prove two triangles equal by a line of reasoning, this gumming up of two triangles which we had just seen cut out with one operation of the scissors, was not a perfectly happy device. In practice it worked indifferently; if the gum was weak the triangles were sailing round Frank's feet, while he imagined he was pointing to them; and if the gum was strong he found the triangle A B C irremovable just when he wanted to impose it on D E F. For my part I could have grasped the proposition sooner but for Frank's gnomonic spells of silence. He would stop in full tide and gaze ruefully at the blackboard, as though he had glimpsed a great doubt. These pauses filled me with a fearful joy, for though I had no desire to understand geometry, I had a real ambition to upset it, and it was my cherished belief that two straight lines might be drawn somehow to enclose a space. When Frank fell into one of his reveries I thought he had stumbled on a method, and that as a consequence all knowledge was about to be quashed, and the school precipitately broken up.

I have digressed from the Chemistry Hour. Not without guile, for, in truth, only one thing sticks in my memory, and that is dear old Bew's celebrated attempt to make chlorine. He had cajoled the authorities into letting him have some retorts, and a show of bottles and tubings. These were set out on a small table in the middle of Number Three, to the great disorganisation of our desks and the entire suspension of discipline. At first the experiment went tamely, and in the silence nothing was heard but Frank's breathings of doubt. Then a test tube smashed, and a boy who tittered out of time with the rest got thirty lines. Suddenly a yellowish vapour began to curl thinly in the retort, and the smile on Frank's face had just begun to be seraphic when, with an accession of energy, the yellow vapour rolled forth, escaping by every joint. The fumes came out in insupportable waves. The apparatus was a veritable Krakatoa trembling under that energy, and the Fenian glare in Frank's eye told me that he did not know whether it was a triumph or a débauche. "You observe the odour?" he shouted (it had laid most of us on our backs), and the words had but left his lips when the retort broke over the spirit lamp, leaving the table a singed bottom all involved

With stench and smoke.

The remainder of the lesson was theory and remorse. To some Chemistry is a delight; to others a religion; to me it is an afternoon in the 'seventies. Frank is now battling, as a doctor, with the fumes and odours of a manufacturing town; and, for Euclid, he is wrestling to keep people from crossing that Pons Asinorum which all must cross once and cross for ever. I am told that his patients are cured by the sound of his voice as he runs upstairs, and I believe it.

W. W.

Correspondence.

The "Fortnightly Review."

SIR,—The interesting "Retrospect" in the present number of the Fortnightly Review suggests a few comments.

Why, it may be asked, did the original proprietors "fail altogether" in their management of the Review as a commercial speculation? Why, as Trollope says, "might such failure have been predicted without much sagacity from the first"?

The promoters were not all of them men unversed in business. There was Frederick Chapman, a publisher of long standing; there were Virtue and Spalding, men of some experience; there was one shareholder who undertook to manage the accounts, and was nothing if not a man of business, and surely neither Anthony Trollope nor Cotter Morison were lacking in the shrewd sagacity we look for in men of affairs.

The truth is, I believe, that readers of the very solid food provided found a fortnightly meal too much for their digestions. Moreover, four shillings a month was a heavy magazine tax. And the Review was, I think, too heavily weighted at the outset. The editor and assistant editor were paid liberally, so was the author of the Belton Estate, for in the 'sixties Trollope's star was in the ascendant. Then in 1865 the public was scarcely prepared to welcome an independent journal based on the principles announced by Lewes. New ground had to be broken and pioneers are proverbially losers.

Lastly, though the original capital might have sufficed to put a monthly magazine upon its legs in four years, it was not large enough to give healthy life to a periodical in less than half that time.—I am, &c.,

S. W.

"Variations upon Whitebait."

SIR,—May I send you a line—across five thousand miles of cars and foam—to thank you for your witty and, to me, entirely enjoyable article, entitled "Variations upon Whitebait," in your issue of December 15?

But, dear pedagogue—to whom really I must pay more attention—there is a phrase in your article which somewhat puzzles me. You conclude by saying: "And now, to horse! There is real reading to be done." Why "to horse!"? Do you mean that "real reading" is best done on horseback? Can you really enjoy Gibbon so? On my return to England I will call at your office and beg you to instruct me in this engaging new art of trick-reading. Or can it be that "reading" is merely a misprint for "riding"? Was your meaning, rather: "And now, to horse! There is rough riding to be done."

Pardon this suggested emendation. No offence, I hope. And will you accept, too, this little verse, written, need I say, in all affection:

I made a little whitebait,
Silver from head to tail;
But the critics said it was no fish—
Because it wasn't a whale!

Perhaps, in your kind solicitude for me, you may care to hear that I am busily engaged on a really serious "work." Not a whitebait or a butterfly in it. Only whales and elephants admitted.—I am, &c.,

RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

Mr. Benson's Revivals.

SIR,—I have been hoping to read some adequate appreciation—by the educated dramatic critics, at least—of the just and virile work done by Mr. Benson in all his Shakespearean revivals. It is fortunate that neither Shakespeare nor Mr. Benson depend upon puff paragraphs, hysterical commendation, and watery patronage for public support. But when the critics cannot, in justice to their own fixed ideas, praise this accomplished actor, they ought to abstain from abuse which makes the reader ashamed and the profession of writing contemptible.—I am, &c.,

X.

Rossetti's "Blessed Damozel."

SIR,—I have an autograph MS. of "Some of 'Ye Blessed Damozel'" in which the verses vary from the specimens you give in to-day's ACADEMY. Mr. Rossetti wrote the MS. for a relative of my own who at the time was Mr. Ruskin's assistant. My version of the first verse reads:

The blessed Damozel leaned out
From the gold bar of Heaven:
Her blue, grave eyes were deeper much
Than a deep water, even.
She had three lilies in her hand,
And the stars in her hair were seven.

In your quotation of the third line you omit the word "grave," which certainly makes the line more melodious.

The other verse you quote, of which you give two versions, is different from both in my copy, where it runs:

She scarcely heard her sweet new friends:
Playing at holy games,
Softly they spake among themselves
Their virginal chaste names;
And the souls, mounting up to God,
Went by her like thin flames.

Other verses in my MS. show variations from the versions in the Germ, the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine, and the different editions of Rossetti's published works, which leads me to believe that the author on some occasion wrote the lines from memory, and got mixed up in the various alterations he had made on the poem since its first appearance in the Germ.—I am, &c.,

GEORGE STRONACH.

SIR,—Undoubtedly the final version of this poem is better than the first, but I venture to think that the one published in 1870 is the best of all. It differs from the final one but little, except as regards the stanza you quote, which runs thus (I quote from the Boston Edition):

Heard hardly, some of her new friends
Amid their loving games
Spake evermore among themselves
Their virginal chaste names;
And the souls mounting up to God
Went by her like thin flames.

The only phrase in this to which objection can reasonably be taken is "heard hardly." The line opens better in the final version with "around her," but this improvement is dearly purchased by the alteration that follows. "'Mid deathless love's acclaims" is not only an unmusical line, but it presents no image to the mind and has no very definite meaning. Lower down "virginal chaste names" is changed to "heart-remembered" names, a change which, in my judgment, is not an improvement.—I am, &c.,

C. C. BELL.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 69 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best open letter to a living writer. We award the prize to Miss E. Rickert, 3, Great James-street, Bedford-row, W.C., for the following :

TO M. MAETERLINCK.

MONSIEUR,—You are a true poet and a prophet—yes. No doubt. But, pardon me, Monsieur, you are also a strain—a slight strain upon the imagination. I have read your plays; I have seen one acted. It made a powerful impression—only I did not quite know what it was, nor why I had it; nor did any of the people around me—not one. Ciel!

To illustrate. Why does the princess say so many times: "I am still thinner!"? "At the fortieth time," you say, "she seems so thin, so thin, she is faded into air—pouf!" Good. I yield this point.

But symbolism, Monsieur? It is admirable, within limits—yes; but you have unleashed it upon us. It is affecting to think that everything is something else, if one only knew what; mais prenez garde, Monsieur! When Pélée ties Mélite's hair, as she is combing it out of the tower window, to a willow—symbolism—hein? When the lovers search by the sea for the ring which they saw drop into the well—symbolism—n'est ce pas? But Shakespeare might call it "Bedlam!"

Ah, Monsieur, you are sincere, you are earnest, you are original, you are spirituel; but you lack the smile without which dramatic art cannot be highest. Perhaps when we are all disembodied souls, we can do without humour; but meanwhile, expound to those of us still profane, how, sheared of all desire to laugh at critical moments, we may enter your strange, beautiful magic circle. Expound! Expound!—Votre très humble admirateur.

P.S.—Expound, je vous prie!

Other letters are as follows :

TO MR. GEORGE MEREDITH.

SIR,—From the serene heights of Boxhill, remote from the bustle of book-market and review, what aspect do you bend on the world of print below?

Are you indeed set on impenetrable silence? We have turned new pages in the Book of Egoism since Sir Willoughby Patterne's day; fresh types of eager youths have arisen since Beauchamp started on his career. Must these, and a dozen others, still wait for the Master's hand?

The times, one fears, are out of joint for delicate psychology and thoughtful phrasing. Whilst Mr. Bothby and Mr. Marsh race madly across the literary firmament; whilst Miss Corelli distils wisdom and Miss Fowler is queen of epigram; what room for another Pilgrim's Scrip? How lonely your heroines must be, in that critical purgatory where the inhabitants of contemporary fiction wait immortality! There is little congenial society beyond the limits of their own set. What does Mrs. Berry think of Tess, and how do the Fine Shades agree with Badalia Herodfoot and her companions? Have Clara and Janet made friends with the English-woman whose Love-Letters so delicately indicate their charms? Her undisciplined passion, we know, would shock Diana's sense of decorum: perhaps Emelia understands her best.

Meanwhile, the Comic Spirit hangs her head; the world wags, and takes its follies gravely. Is it not time that their only adequate interpreter, turning on them the search-light of his mind, should "let charity issue of disdain under the guise of honourable laughter"?—I am, sir, your respectful admirer,

[E. U., London.]

TO MR. RUDYARD KIPLING.

SIR,—At the age of thirty-five you have attained fame and fortune. Your popularity is world-wide; you are at the same time the idol of the literary and the illiterate, and the man who never reads a book will greet your name with applause. Success so great and, in the main, so well-deserved has not been won by any other man of letters of the period.

Yet some who admire your work await a little wistfully its future developments. Your hold on the nation is as strong as ever, but is it our fancy that in critical circles enthusiasm for your writings has slightly waned? Refreshing as is your virility, the soul of the artist must compass feminine emotions before it can be mature, and those, at present at least, seem beyond your range.

Your appeal has been mostly to the head; your work has not sufficient heart-power to make it permanent and satisfying. Instead of clever technicalities that merely amaze us, touch us by portraying throbbing humanity in its heights and in its depths! We know that your knowledge of life is broad; we want to feel that it is also subtle. The literature that survives must touch in some way the spiritual nature of man. Strange it seems to say it, but spirituality—which embraces in union heart, mind and soul—is the missing quality in almost all your writings.—Yours faithfully,

[H. J., Hadley Wood.]

TO MR. RUDYARD KIPLING.

SIR,—An admirer of genius may at times be permitted to season his admiration with something of discrimination; and, while I may not dare to suppose that you will agree with the opinions of an unknown critic, I am not, therefore, deterred from giving them expression. Of the pre-eminent qualities of your work it is needless to write; for all men recognise the merit which has carried you to the leading place amongst living novelists. To an invention which never flags you bring a gift of expression which is a constant source of delight to your readers, and, I doubt not, of envy to the little writers who begin with sensationalism and end in banality. The short story you have made a work of art; the races of India, the soldier, the sailor, and the pioneer live in your pages.

But it seems to me that you have carried Imperialism to the limits of forbearance. The tune is in danger of being too long-drawn out, and it might now be very properly committed into feebler hands. Only the life of endeavour appeals to you, the vigorous do-something existence, which fights, builds, extends, or develops for the Empire's sake. Is there not another continent of life into which you, beyond other men, are called upon to enter more fully? I mean the home life, of which you gave us too fleeting a glimpse in your "Brushwood Boy." Above all, there is not room for the clear-cut characterisation which we miss in modern fiction—those abiding types of life which are worthy to stand among the classics!

[A. E. W., Inverness.]

TO MR. ANDREW LANG.

DEAR "ANDREW-WITH-THE-BRINDLED-HAIR,"—In all reverence be it written! Something bold it is to address the author of Letters to Dead Authors in his lifetime, but my cause is good. I would urge you to write (1) a play, (2) an epic, for then you will have made the rounds of literary art. Nearly nine pages in the British Museum catalogue, and two forms yet untried—hoots, Mr. Lang! Being, like Tommy, a wonder, at them brawly; ye'll do them fine!

Yet, I doot, a catastrophe lies in wait for you. By the year 10,000 A.D. (May it be later!) the critics will have cut you up into a score of bits, neatly pigeon-holed and labelled "the brilliant coterie of writers who flourished at the end of the nineteenth century." There will be the translator of Homer, the historian of Scotland the authority on golf, cricket, angling, the poet, the romancer, the essayist, the biographer, the parodist, the interpreter of Aucassin and Nicolette. Even if your texts and treatises on ghosts, dreams, fairies, Longinus, wakes, Aristotle, art, religion, Izaak Walton, animals, English worthies, folk-lore, Poe, St Katherine, and the like should be lost, enough will remain to prove the Protean genius of the clan of Lang—which we call jersel'.

To sum up, your mind is as "brindled" as your hair—a foundation of solid colour, pied with interest in all things good and beautiful.—Yours in hope of the epic and the play,

[E. R., London.]

TO OUIDA.

MADAME,—I could fill the exiguous portion allotted to me in which to address you by merely enumerating your various crusades on behalf of the principles of Sweetness and Light, Truth and Beauty, against every sort of Ignorance and Stupidity and Brute-Mindedness. I could mention how valiantly you have confronted the vivisector, the advocate of conscription, the mondain and demi-mondaine, the Adam Smiths of the world, who regard men as simply "a quantum of lucretion," and so forth. Your creed could, I think, be summed up in the words you have used about Loti—you "have stretched to a nobler and truer scope the nihil humani a me alienum puto." Your fiction has been called unreal. Hyperbolic and dithyrambic you may be at times, but your novels have essential truth: however far you may wander, the silken cord still holds you. The moon, as you have yourself said, is as real as a Dutch cheese, and because the suburban dwellers who swear by Trollope can find none it does not follow that Romance is extinct. The characters of your heroes are not to be measured by the yard-poles of the commonplace. Cothurnated, so to speak, the former breathes an ampler ether, a diviner air; talk with a larger utterance; move with an ampler stride; and bear the fardel of a heavier destiny. How, too, you have written of love—of love which is "the bulwark of patience, the tutor of honour, the praise of perfectness"!

[A. G., Cheltenham.]

Competition No. 70 (New Series).

WE offer a prize of One Guinea for the best first and last sentences of an unwritten novel. Neither sentence to exceed fifty words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, January 23. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the third page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORWATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; 23, South Frederick St.,
Edinburgh; and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 3 IN PREPARATION.
CATALOGUE No. 1, 1s., and CATALOGUE No. 2, 2s. 6d.,
May be had on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.
A Large Collection of Fifteenth and Sixteenth Century Books on view.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
Now fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.
DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

WHAT D'YE LACK?

Ask Miss MILLARD, of Teddington, Middlesex, for any Book ever issued since the advent of printing (however rare or plentiful) up to the very last work published; also for any curio or object of interest under the canopy of heaven, for she prides herself on being enabled, nine times out of ten, to supply these wants. She has the largest assemblage of Miscellaneous Bijouterie in the world, and is always a ready, willing, and liberal buyer for prompt cash.

JUST BEYOND THE LIMITATION.

The Hon. C. H. DAVIS, M.D., Ph.D., President of the Board of Education, Connecticut, U.S.A., writes: "Through my book-seller you have before supplied my wants," adding, "I have perfect confidence that if I desired the tablets upon which Moses wrote the Commandments you could procure them for me."

Miss MILLARD and her Staff have a perfect relish for difficulties.
Address Teddington, Middlesex.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each offered for Arckmann's Cambridge, 2 vols., 1815; Ferguson's Serpent Worship, 1833; Garmen Scintille, an Ode (Macmillan, 1887; Shelley's St. Irvyn, 1811; Prior's Poems, 1707; Lamb's John Woodville, 1802; Keat's Poems, 1817.—BAKER'S, Great Bookshop, Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSIA, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

GRAHAM'S TYPE-WRITING OFFICE,
23, COCKSPUR STREET, FLEET STREET.—All kinds of difficult MS. receive careful attention from experienced workers. Specimen page and references sent if desired. Over five years' experience.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s., post free.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.
"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes.....full of thought and knowledge and power."
British Weekly.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LIMITED,
21 & 22, FURNIVAL STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, E.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

to
"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.O.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS
2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
2 1/2% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2 1/2%

STOCKS AND SHARES.
Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.
The BIRKBECK ALMANAC, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.
Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

WELSH INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION ACT, 1889.

CENTRAL WELSH BOARD.

APPOINTMENT OF ORAL EXAMINERS, 1901.
On the 13th of February, 1901, the Executive Committee of the Central Welsh Board will proceed to the APPOINTMENT OF ORAL EXAMINERS.

A. French (Grammatical and Conversational), 3 appointments;
B. French, Latin, and General Subjects of the Lower Forms, 4 or 5 appointments;
C. Latin and General Subjects of the Lower Forms, 2 or 3 appointments;
D. German (Grammatical and Conversational), 1 appointment.

The Examinations will take place between June 12 and July 13, 1901.

Preference will be given to Candidates who have had experience in Secondary Teaching. Women will be equally eligible with men.

Applications for further particulars as to duties and remuneration should reach the undersigned not later than Monday, the 24th instant.

Central Welsh Board Office,
Cardiff, January 17th, 1901.

ROYAL INSTITUTION of GREAT BRITAIN, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

In consequence of the lamented DEATH of HER MAJESTY the QUEEN, the Patron of this Institution, and out of respect to Her Memory, the President has decided that the LECTURES here shall be DISCONTINUED UNTIL FURTHER NOTICE.

THE DOWNS SCHOOL, SEAFORD, SUSSEX.

Head Mistress—Miss LUCY ROBINSON, M.A.
(Late Sec and Mistress St. Felix School, Southwold).
References: The Principal of Bedford College, London, The Master of Peterhouse, &c.

COMMERCIAL EDUCATION.—The DIRECTORS of the LIVERPOOL INSTITUTE require the services of a MASTER qualified to give instruction in the Advanced Commercial Department of the High School for Boys. Subjects: Modern Languages, Commercial Geography, Economics, Commercial Science, Correspondence, &c. Preference will be given to applicants trained in Continental Schools of Commerce. Duties to commence 24th of April next. Salary, £250 per annum.

Applications, with not more than three testimonials, to be sent in to the undersigned at the Liverpool Institute, Mount Street, Liverpool, not later than February 16th.

HAROLD WHALLEY, Secretary.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY (LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms. Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.; LONDON;
And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Fully Illustrated, medium 8vo, cloth limp, 4s. 6d.

ELECTRICITY:

An Expansion of Deschanel's Natural Philosophy, Part III., on the lines of Modern Electrical Theory.

By J. D. EVERETT, D.C.L., F.R.S.,

Emeritus Professor of Natural Philosophy in the Queen's College, Belfast.

London: BLACKIE & SON, LIMITED, Old Bailey.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

BOSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, and FESTINIOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, ORICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd. The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

Thoroughly up to date in every respect, and including even the last hours of the Queen.

VICTORIA, R.I.

By W. J. WINTLE.

VICTORIA, R.I.

By W. J. WINTLE.

VICTORIA, R.I.

By W. J. WINTLE.

ILLUSTRATED with PORTRAITS and VIEWS.

London: THE SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION,
57 and 59, Ludgate Hill, E.C.THE HERO OF THE EMPIRE.

The Story of his Career from Cadet to Commander-in-Chief.

FOURTH EDITION (20th Thousand)
NOW READY.

FIELD-MARSHAL
LORD ROBERTS

V.C., K.P., G.C.B.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH. WITH PORTRAIT.

By HORACE G. GROSER,

Author of "The Kingdom of Manhood," "Oliver
Cromwell, the Hero of Puritan England," &c.

*This New Edition brings the record of Lord
Roberts's life down to the date of his return from the South African War.*

Cloth boards, price ONE SHILLING net.

Opinions of the Press.

FIELD-MARSHAL

LORD ROBERTS.

By HORACE G. GROSER.

The "MORNING POST" says:

"The author traces the military career of this famous General in an attractive manner, every care apparently having been taken to make it accurate."

The "ACADEMY" says:

"So clear a narrative of so fine a life can be welcomed as something better than a piece of bookmaking."

The "OUTLOOK" says:

"Mr. Groser's book seems to us a marvel of cheapness, and is written with great care and considerable literary effect."

FIELD-MARSHAL

LORD ROBERTS.

By HORACE G. GROSER.

The "INDIAN REVIEW" says:

"An accurate and interesting account of a crowded career."

"LITERATURE" says:

"It has reached a third edition, a good fortune which it well deserves."

The "ENGLISHMAN" (Calcutta) says:

"The busy man will find this handbook just suited to his needs."

FIELD-MARSHAL

LORD ROBERTS.

By HORACE G. GROSER.

The "EXPOSITORY TIMES" says:

"A well-written biography, likely to have a wide circulation."

The "BOOKMAN" says:

"Yet another edition of this excellent little biography."

The "ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE" says:

"Worth re-reading..... A rousing little book."

London: ANDREW MELROSE,

16, PILGRIM STREET.

AND SOLD BY ALL BOOKSELLERS.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Imperial 8vo, cloth, price 10s. net.

RUMANIA IN 1900.

By G. BENDER,

R. Rumanian Consul-General in Stuttgart.

AUTHORISED TRANSLATION.

By A. H. KEANE, F.R.G.S.,

Late Vice-President Anthropol. Inst.

14 Plates, a Map, and 26 Illustrations in Text.

SUMMARY.

Chapter I. Geography. II. History. III. Political Organisation. IV. Agriculture. V. Fisheries. VI. Mines, Petroleum. VII. Mineral Waters. Health Resorts. VIII. Forestry. IX. Industries. X. Communications—Railways, Navigation. XI. Foreign Trade—Tariff Policy. XII. Inland Trade—Currency, Retail, and Hawking Business. XIII. Finance—Revenue, Debt, Taxation, Monopolies, Public Domains. XIV. Banking and Credit Institutes. XV. Army and Armaments. XVI. Instruction, Literature, Art, Religion, Sanitation.

Thanks to the Author's official position as Rumanian Consul-General in Stuttgart, to his long personal association with the country, and to the valuable documents of all kinds placed at his disposal by the Government, the Author writes en pleine connaissance de cause. As no comprehensive English work on the subject has appeared since Mr. James Samuelson's now somewhat obsolete "Roumania, Past and Present" (1832), this English edition of Herr Bender's book, by Prof. A. H. Keane, will be gladly welcomed by the British and American public.

London: ASHER & CO., 13, Bedford Street,
Covent Garden, W.C.

Illustrated.—Price 6d.

THE NORTHERN COUNTIES MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS OF FEBRUARY ISSUE.

REMINISCENCES of the late BISHOP of LONDON. By A. FORMER. PUBL. With Portrait from a Painting by H. HARTIG BROWN.

RUSKIN MUSEUM at CONISTON. Illustrated by Portraits of Ruskin and other Photographs never before reproduced. By MISS A. M. WAKEFIELD.

A NORTHERN HEADSTONE. By SIR HEDWORTH WILLIAMSON, BART. Illustrated with Hewick Cuts.

A FELLSIDE TRAGEDY. A Story by the late HUBERT CRACKANTHORPE.

FAMOUS NORTHERN REGIMENTS.—II. The West Yorkshire (Illustrated). By WALTER WOOD.

THE LAST RISING of the NORTH, 1715. By G. M. TREVILAN.

"HIRINGS" in the DALES. By HALLIWELL STUBBS.

KING HERMAUNCE. A Yorkshire Legend by W. W. GINSON.

THE STUDY of DIALECTS. By E. W. PRESTON.

LONDON LITERARY LETTERS. By E. V. LUCAS.

A WESTMORELAND PARISH COUNCIL. By B. KIRBY.

HIGH WIND (SOLWAY to TYNE). By "ANODUS."

NORTH COUNTRY CHRONICLE.

THE LATE LORD ARMSTRONG. Memoir, Portrait, and Poem.

London: ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

Newcastle-on-Tyne: ANDREW REID & CO., LIMITED.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

FEBRUARY, 1901.—Price Sixpence.

MY LADY OF ORANGE. By H. C. BAILEY. (Continued.)

NOTES on RECONSTITUTION in SOUTH AFRICA.—BOER WAR, 1899-1900.

THE WOMEN of the SALONS.—V. Madame de Staël. By S. G. TALLENTYRE.

MY LADY. By WALTER HERBERT POLLOCK.

OWD TUESDAY. By C. L. ANTHONIS.

FISHES and their WAYS. By JOHN ISAHELL.

FYANDER'S WIDOW. By M. E. FRANCIS (Mrs. Francis Blundell). (Continued.)

AT the SIGN of the SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

UNA.

A SONG of ENGLAND in the YEAR
NINETEEN HUNDRED.

By WILLIAM GERARD.

3s. 6d. net.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., LTD.

FOURTH EDITION JUST PUBLISHED.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

FROM ALDERSHOT TO PRETORIA;

A STORY of CHRISTIAN WORK AMONG
THE TROOPS in SOUTH AFRICA.

By Rev. W. E. SELLERS.

"Deeply interesting."—Guardian.
"Stirring, touching stories of heroism and endurance."—Newsman.
"Instructive and sympathetic."—Standard.
"Full of interesting matter."—Spectator.
"Well-chosen anecdotes."—Manchester Guardian.

A COMPACT and POPULAR STORY OF
THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.

WITH OUR SOLDIERS
' AT THE FRONT.

By HENRY JOHNSON.

With 15 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

"Gives a good idea of the origin of the war, and its leading incidents."—The Times.

"A convenient record."—Spectator.

"One of the most fascinating volumes on the war."
N. B. Daily Mail.

"Stories of cool courage and heroic self-sacrifice."
Leeds Mercury.

HOW TO ATTAIN FELLOWSHIP WITH GOD.

By Rev. J. A. CLAPPERTON, M.A., Author of "Methods of Soul Culture," &c. Fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

"The author avoids unhealthy introspection and the mysticism which is too frequently the leading feature of works on personal holiness."

English Churchman.
"Minutely practical, and rich in valuable suggestions."—N. B. Daily Mail.

THE HARVEST OF A QUIET EYE.

By Prebendary J. R. VERNON, M.A., Author of "Random Truths in Common Things," &c.
With an etched Frontispiece and Title-Page by Francis Walker. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

Mr. RUSKIN wrote of the first edition of "The Harvest of a Quiet Eye," that "he had never seen anything more gracefully or rightly done."

MEDITATIONS FOR QUIET MOMENTS.

By the Rev. J. H. JOWETT, M.A., of Carr's
Lane, Birmingham. 1s. 6d, cloth boards.

"Brief expositions, each presenting forcibly and attractively an outstanding thought in the Scripture selected. Mr. Jowett writes with reverence, with grace, and with power."—Life of Faith.

UNSEAL THE BOOK.

Practical Words for Plain Readers of Holy Scripture. By Mrs. ASHLEY CARUS-WILSON
(MARY L. G. PERKINS, B.A.). Crown 8vo, 2s., cloth boards.

"Conveying a large amount of interesting instruction on such matters as careful translation, attention to the context of quotations, systematic study, storing the treasures of the Bible in the mind, the connection between prayer and Bible reading, and the duty of putting what is read into practice."—Guardian.

PUBLISHED BY
THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
INCORPORATED,
56, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1499. Established 1869.

26 January, 1901.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper]

VICTORIA.

May 24, 1819—January 22, 1901.

"God gave her peace."

—Tennyson.

Lo, she is dead,
Our noble England's noble Head,
In whom her corporate glories all might see
Summed up in single majesty,
Like sunset on a fronting face.
She has fulfilled her sovereign ways.

A woman, she
Had nations at her nurturing knee;
Mother, hers too the ampler motherhood;
Virtues, the home in her imbued,
Went forth in royalty; formed—Queen-spouse—
To rule an Empire and her house.

She is no more,
Whose sympathy stood at every door,
The woman crowned who wept all women's tears
Throughout her Britain. On her bier's
Black mantle let your eyes to-day,
Women, those queenly rains repay.

Her Empire's house
Garnished and sweet, just Heaven allows
The folding of her hands to sleep. Ah! who Would desire for her burthens new
At the task's end? This way is best;
With a world weeping her to rest.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

The Literary Week.

THE illness and death of the Queen have, during the past week, driven all other thoughts from the mind of the community, and it is difficult to concentrate the attention within the boundaries of that province of mental activity represented by the ACADEMY. But the sympathies of the beloved and august lady whose loss the nation is mourning were wide, and on many points they touched literature. An author herself, she had the interests of authors at heart, and in the great grief of her life, the death of the Prince Consort, she found her consolation in a poem written by one of the most distinguished of her subjects—Tennyson's "In Memoriam."

WE take from the present Lord Tennyson's Life of his father the following account of Tennyson's first visit to the Queen after the death of the Prince Consort: "He said that she stood pale and statue-like before him, speaking in a quiet, unutterably sad voice. 'There was a kind of stately innocence about her.' She said many kind things to him, such as 'Next to the Bible "In Memoriam" is my comfort.' She talked of the Prince and of Hallam and of Macaulay and of Goethe, and of Schiller in connexion with him, and said that the Prince was so like the picture of Arthur Hallam in 'In Memoriam,' even to his blue eyes. When A. said that he thought that the Prince would have made a great king, she answered: 'He always said that it did not signify whether he did the right thing or did not, so long as the right thing was done.'"

BETWEEN the Queen and Tennyson there was a real friendship. This is the letter she wrote to him in sending a copy of her Highland Diary:

"DEAR LORD TENNYSON,—

Though a very humble and unpretending author, I send you my new book, which perhaps you may like to glance at. Its only merit is its simplicity and truth.

What a warm winter we have had!

Hoping that you are well, and wishing to be kindly remembered to Lady Tennyson,

Ever yours truly,
V. R. I."

How the Queen's friendship with Tennyson grew and deepened may be seen in the following passage in the Queen's private Diary, written at Osborne, August 7, 1883:

"After luncheon saw the great Poet Tennyson in dearest Albert's room for nearly an hour; and most interesting it was. He is grown very old, his eyesight much impaired. But he was very kind. Asked him to sit down. He talked of the many friends he had lost, and what it would be if he did not feel and know that there was another world, where there would be no partings; and then he spoke with horror of the unbelievers and philosophers who would make you believe there was no other world, no Immortality, who tried to explain all away in a miserable manner. We agreed that, were such a thing possible, God, Who is Love, would be far more cruel than any human being. He quoted some well-known lines from Goethe, whom he so much admires. Spoke of the poor Lily of Hanover [Princess Frederica of Hanover] so kindly; asked after my Godchildren. He spoke of Ireland, and the wickedness of ill-using poor animals: 'I am afraid I think the world is darkened; I dare say it will brighten again.'

I told him what a comfort 'In Memoriam' had again been to me, which pleased him; but he said I could not believe the number of shameful letters of abuse he had received about it. Incredible! When I took leave of him, I thanked him for his kindness, and said I needed it, for I had gone thro' much; and he said: 'You are so alone on that terrible height; it is terrible. I've only a year or two to live, but I shall be happy to do anything for you I can. Send for me whenever you like.'

I thanked him warmly."

To authorship the Queen herself made no pretensions, and in publishing her private diaries of life in the Highlands she only gave to the world, under persuasion, the most artless of records. But, artless though they were, they deeply interested her subjects; and even the literary critic felt that here were two qualities which are not always found in diaries of greater literary pretensions—a most engaging candour, and absolute discretion. They revealed the secret of the Queen's love of Scotland by showing how she enjoyed—nay, revelled in—the beauties and sublimities of nature and the amenities of humble lives, lived far from the madding crowd.

MR. HEINEMANN is about to issue a new edition of the Prose Dramas of Henrik Ibsen. Mr. William Archer, who made, or supervised, all the translations, has carefully revised the diction of the plays in the light of criticism and of later convictions. While insisting that those critics are in the wrong who deny that Ibsen has any style whatever, he admits that the translations may have fostered the error by laying too much stress on the colloquialism of the poet's dialogue:

Colloquial it always is and must be; to represent it otherwise were to misrepresent it fatally. But there are in English pretty clearly marked degrees of colloquialism; and I fear I often went to the extreme when I might better have kept to the mean. For example, the contraction of auxiliary verbs was very much overdone, the pages being thickly strewn with such expressions as "I'm," "you're," "he's," "we've," "they'd." This may seem a mechanical matter, but it is far from unimportant. To exclude contractions altogether would, of course, be absurd; but it appears to me that they ought to be used only where the character or the situation renders the full form quite inadmissible. In other trifling details I have tried to soften the effect of ultra-colloquialism, making innumerable changes, too small to be recognised individually without a minute collation of the texts, yet producing, I hope, a pervasive modification for the better.

This is frank and reassuring.

On the subject of colloquial English Mr. Archer—who has a taste for such questions—makes some interesting remarks, pointing out that it is not so easy as it may appear to find out what is colloquial and what is not. We entirely agree with him that the difficulty is considerable. Many people use surprisingly formal or rhetorical expressions in ordinary talk without perceiving it. Mr. Archer says that he once blamed Mr. Sydney Grundy for making one of his characters use, in ordinary conversation, "Nor do I believe," and a day or two later he was surprised to hear it come trippingly from his own tongue. He had also habitually avoided, in translation, the expression "I can no longer do" this or that, thinking it had a bookish sound, but one day he heard a mechanic in an omnibus use the expression. It is not safe, however, to print colloquialisms because you have heard them once or twice; they must look like colloquialisms in the book, a rule which Mr. Archer fully recognises.

A LARGE composite collection of autograph letters is about to be dispersed at Sotheby's. The lots include letters from Burke, Mrs. Browning, Coleridge, Cowper, Crabbe, and Wordsworth. The following is extracted from a letter of Cowper's to Samuel Rose:

The colour of our whole life is generally such as the three or four first years, in which we are our own masters, make it. Then it is that we may be said to shape our own destiny, and to treasure up for ourselves a series of future successes or disappointments. Had I employed my time as wisely as you in a situation very similar to yours, I had never been a poet, perhaps, but I might by this time have acquired a character of more importance in society, and a situation in which my friends would have been better pleased to see me. But three years mis-spent in an attorney's office were almost of course followed by several more equally mis-spent in the Temple, and the consequence has been, as the Italian epitaph says—sto qui. The only use I can make of myself now, at least the best, is to serve in terrorism to others when occasion may happen to offer, that they may escape, so far as my admonitions can have any weight with them, my folly and my fate. When you feel yourself tempted to relax a little the strictness of your present discipline, and to indulgence in amusements incompatible with your future interests, think of your friend at Weston.

THE Rev. Lucius G. Fry writes a rather piquant letter to the Times describing—apropos of a needed fund—the present state of John Gilpin's Edmonton. John Gilpin's Edmonton means the Bell, which, we are told, has disappeared in favour of a modern public-house and a pawnbroker's establishment, while its gardens are covered by a Gilpin-grove where one hundred families live in "poverty and wretchedness." A local police-inspector, who seems to have a pretty wit, summed up the situation by remarking that when folks got "broke" in London they moved to Tottenham, and when they got "stony broke" at Tottenham they came out to Edmonton.

EDWARD FITZGERALD's devotion to Crabbe is one of the threads of individuality that run through his Letters. But to-day, as then, Crabbe is the least read of poets, and it would be rash to say that his star will again rise much above the horizon. Nevertheless, an article in the Quarterly Review will do something to revive interest in the poet of "The Borough." The writer has no difficulty in laying his finger on the causes of Crabbe's eclipse. He was like a husbandman who brings good fruit to market when the demand is satisfied and prices are low. "He wrote all his tales in the rhymed couplet of the Pope school, the recurrent see-saw of which became distasteful to a generation in whose ears the music of "Childe Harold" and "Adonais" had sounded. He was a realist, too, just when realism was going out of vogue. He studied and depicted the trials, the follies, the tragedy, of everyday human life, just when the poets of the new school were teaching their readers to regard man as a somewhat irrelevant atom in the pantheistic panorama."

AGAIN, it is probably true to say that had Crabbe been the contemporary of Pope he would have kept his place as a poet who, with far less concentration and finish, possessed qualities of pathos and sincerity which are never found in the author of "The Rape of the Lock." Coming when he did, Crabbe was something of a "guy," and critics, who should know better, still point the finger of ridicule. Yet Crabbe's power of portraying character and of giving pointed expression to natural feelings will always win him reinforcements of admirers. The following lines from "The Library" have an admirable neatness:

First let us view the form, the size, the dress,
For these the manners, nay, the mind express;
That weight of wood, with leathern coat o'erlaid;
Those ample clasps, of solid metal made;
The close press'd leaves, unclosed for many an age;
The dull red edging of the well-filled page;
On the broad back the stubborn ridges roll'd,
Where yet the title stands in tarnish'd gold;
These all a sage and labour'd work proclaim,
A painful candidate for lasting fame:
No idle wit, no trifling verse can lurk
In the deep bosom of that weighty work;
No playful thoughts degrade the solemn style,
Nor one light sentence claims a transient smile.

Hence, in these times, untouched the pages lie,
 And slumber out their immortality;
 They had their day, when, after all his toil,
 His morning study, and his midnight oil,
 At length an author's ONE great work appear'd,
 By patient hope and length of days endear'd;
 Expecting nations hail'd it from the press;
 Poetic friends prefixed each kind address;
 Princes and kings received the pond'rous gift,
 And ladies read the work they could not lift.

The Quarterly writer concludes: "What we wish to see is a reissue—with some emendations in respect of punctuation and misprints—of Murray's beautiful edition of 1834; and we are inclined to think that the time is ripe for it."

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Every dramatist is his own historian, and, if the facts of the drama do not square with the records, then Nature, not Art, is at fault. A recent illustration of this rule is given by Mr. Bernard Shaw's 'Caesar and Cleopatra.' In the play, Pothinus is slain treacherously by Ftatateeta in obedience to Cleopatra's command—an act which draws from Caesar (in the play) a fine denunciation: "'You have slain their leader; it is right that they shall slay you,'" &c. But Caesar's own words (De Bello Civili, cap. cxii.) are: 'Pothinus . . . a Cesare interfectus est.' Again, the length of the Heptastadion—the tongue of land at the end of which stood the lighthouse—was, as the name implies, not five miles, but three-quarters of a mile. Authorities, too, differ as to Cleopatra's age. Was it sixteen or nineteen or neither in 48 B.C.?"

In recognition of Mr. Samuel Gordon's novel, Sons of the Covenant, the Maccabees, the representative Jewish Club, will entertain Mr. Gordon at dinner. Mr. I. Zangwill will take the chair. After dinner there will be a discussion on the solution, suggested by Mr. Gordon's book of the problem which has long been exercising the minds of the communal leaders.

In last week's Great Thoughts Mr. Frederick Wedmore has some interesting observations on "The Needs of the New Century in Art," expressed with the neatness and felicity of diction which he never withholds from his work. Concerning painting Mr. Wedmore says:

If there is one fad in particular that it behoves the painter and the public to steer clear of at this time it is the notion that any dramatic interest in a picture is a diversion from a picture's legitimate aims; and that the first and last business of the painter is to be decorative; that it is his function to be concerned only with what they call "paint." Paint, however, the thoughtful person who is outside the studio will at once recollect, is a medium of expression—does not suffice in itself; or, rather, when it does suffice, the artist has grappled, beautifully it may be, successfully it may be, with only one of the problems with which it was his right, if he chose to exercise it, to concern himself. The truth about the introduction of dramatic incident in painting seems to me to be that it may add immensely not only to the width but to the depth of the appeal which the picture may make. At the same time, the too great reliance upon dramatic or literary interest does obviously open the door for the neglect of qualities that are a painter's alone—beauty of line for its own sake, beauty of colour for its own sake, richness or gaiety of tone for its own sake. . . . The standards of actual painting have undoubtedly been raised, and there is now, I think, little danger of any recurrence to the standards of a generation ago—although it is true, indeed, that "values" are not everything, that the square touch is not everything, albeit it was invented by the great Master, who is now approved most of all: I mean, of course, Velasquez.

Mr. Wedmore proceeds to point out the overdone admiration for Japanese art, and the consequent turning of Japanese methods to purposes which they cannot adequately serve. He would have us transfer some of this allegiance to the great French art of the eighteenth century, and he bids us remember that Watteau is one of the great painters for all time. In Architecture Mr. Wedmore sees the need, not of a style, but of the sense of proportion. Lastly, Engraving. "Engraving has to be revived. . . . The educated public cannot for ever suffer his [the engraver's] art to be in abeyance. Not only in reproduction, but in original work besides, the art of the engraver gives us something which no other art can bestow."

A FEW weeks ago we printed a "Thing Seen" in which the writer described his early impressions of the late Mr. George Augustus Sala, whose style he admired in his youth and has shunned when in his years of discretion. We are amused, in taking up a little book called Bits of Turf, by Nathaniel Gubbins, the author of Cakes and Ale, to find him achieving a style even more shunnable than Mr. Sala's, and yet in its documentary way amusing and illuminative. We will illustrate it by the opening paragraph of the paper called "Chippendale's Cesarewitch":

We gather from the writings of Mr. George Augustus Sala that he employed his one holiday in the week in sorting his correspondence and dusting his bric-à-brac. As my own correspondence consists, for the most part, of attempts on the part of the writers to obtain money by threats, and having no bric-à-brac to speak of to dust—save a plaster cast of the late Mr. William Palmer—I usually occupy myself on a Saturday, when not engaged in writing racing articles for provincial journals, or in studying character at the Trocadero, in overlooking a very fine and large collection of old newspapers, which share with an assortment of boots, harness, race-cards, and seed potatoes, the major part of the untidy, ill-furnished apartment dignified by the name of "Master's Study." It was on this very last Saturday that I happened upon an old number of the Bird o' Freedom, dated October 1st, 1879, the Wednesday before Chippendale's Cesarewitch, the race at that time being invariably run on a Tuesday. In their articles, in the number in question, it is noticeable that both "The Member for Tattersall's" and "Old Abe" were "Adamite" to the backbone, the last-named soothsayer—usually facile princeps at picking winners—giving "Parole and Bay Archer" to follow Mr. Perkins' horse home.

Chippendale's Cesarewitch! How the old time—albeit more than two decades ago—wells in upon my memory with the freshness of yesterday!

We referred recently to Mr. W. D. Howells's drastic criticism of "The New Historical Romances." His article has brought forth a strong reply from Mr. Maurice F. Egan, Professor of English Literature in the Catholic University of Washington. Mr. Egan points out that the latter half of the nineteenth century has been a period of spiritual obscurity, and contends that a reaction is at hand. He sees "an incoming wave of spiritual vibrations," and the new historical romancists are among its prophets. Mr. Egan's views are interesting enough to quote. He says:

Realism itself could not escape analysis; the newer man wanted to dry it as the chemist does alcohol. Every drop of water must disappear. And then the Darwinian movement was affecting life. Realism, after all, cannot escape being synthetical, since even the most scientific of the new school were forced to call in the aid of imagination. Here was the difficulty. Besides, Balzac—even the all-seeing Balzac—hesitated to say some things; Flaubert had his reserves. The movement of realism was hampered by prudery, and it was not sufficiently "scientific." Zola, instead of being the founder of a school, is the beginning and the end of an illogical attempt in literature to dig around the roots of animal life in search of the monstrous grubs that infest them. The naturalistic scientific movement somewhat affected Matilde Serao in Italy and the clever Spanish novelists, among whom are Galdos and Madame Pardo-Bazan. In England it touched George Moore. In Russia it influenced Tolstoi and Dostoyeffsky. It has had no permanent effect, except upon D'Annunzio, who may call himself a pathological criminologist of the scientific-naturalist school. Literature, one sees, has for some time been forging checks upon the Bank of Science just as that bank was engaged in playing the same game with the Bank of Theology.

FINALLY, we are assured :

In English-speaking countries the scientific-realistic movement has spent its force. Reverence and mysticism are coming into vogue again, and with them the romance. A man who does not to-day assume that he would like to believe, if he could, is as much out of the fashion as the man who doubted Spencer or Huxley twenty-five years ago. And the more you believe, the more you are in the current of the stream. It is the old motion of the pendulum. Therefore the romance is king. Poetry is even coming into vogue; the poets are struggling out of their twilight, and it will soon be day for them. Everybody who is rich looks around for ideals, and everybody who is not rich hopes to acquire some as soon as he can afford to keep them.

Bibliographical.

THE daily papers have taken very little notice of the death of Miss Arabella Shore, and very characteristically, for the daily papers are never very strong on the subject of the minor belles lettres. Yet the fact that Miss Shore published so recently as last year a volume of First and Last Poems might well have kept her in their recollection. To few publications could Miss Shore lay full claim. Apart from the book just mentioned, she was the sole author of only three—an Answer to John Bright, concerning the emancipation of women (1877); a translation, entitled A Daughter of the Malepieres (1885); and Dante for Beginners (1886)—the last-named being a translation of the Divina Commedia, with a biographical sketch and some criticism. All that she published besides these was in association with her sister Louisa, who, in the matter of poetry-producing, was certainly the abler worker. These two issued together—as by “A. and L.”—War Lyrics (1855), Gemma of the Isles, and other Poems (1859), Fra Dolcino, and other Poems (1870), Elegies and Memorials (1890), and Poems (1897). Miss Arabella Shore was devoted to her sister and the memory of her, and brought out, in 1897, her Poems, with a memoir, and, in 1898, her Hannibal, and other Poems, with an introduction. The two ladies’ poetical barque floats on a backwater of the river of literature—a backwater, however, which the lovers of thoughtful verse will find it well worth their while to explore for themselves.

The reprint of the poems of “Seasons” Thomson, which we are told to look for shortly in the “Canterbury Poets” series, should do something for the popularity of the poet, though I fear he is a little old-fashioned for these giddy-pacéd times. The man in the street does not know him at all—does not even know that he wrote “Rule, Britannia.” For that matter, nobody can say positively that Thomson did write it, for “Alfred,” the masque in which it figures, was announced as the result of collaboration between Thomson and David Mallet. Suppose Mallet wrote the song? One cannot say, positively, that he did not. For the rest, Thomson lives mainly in the “familiar quotations” books, for people use his sentences and phrases without knowing they are his. For the library, there is Mr. D. C. Tovey’s two-volume edition of the poems, now three or four years old. This replaced in the “Aldine” series the edition prepared by Sir H. Nicolas in 1857. Up to now, the most popular “edition” has been that superintended and “introduced” by Mr. W. M. Rossetti in 1873 (reprinted in 1880). This, probably, has been out of print for some time. Of other modern editions, mention may be made of that by George Gilfillan in 1853, and that by Robert Bell in 1855.

One of the chapters in Mr. Meredith Nicholson’s book on The Hoosiers has drawn attention to an Indiana literary worthy whose writings, I should say, have been but little read in this country. Of General Lew Wallace, Edward Eggleston, and James Whitcomb Riley, most educated Englishmen know something; but what of Maurice Thompson, of whose work Mr. Nicholson gives some appetising particulars? I note that at least a dozen of Mr. Thompson’s books have found their way to England; but only three of them have had English publishers—At Love’s Extremes (1885), A Banker of Bankersville (1887), and The King of Honey Island (1896)—all prose fiction. Among the other volumes by Mr. Thompson which have been put within the reach of our reading public are three of verse—Songs of Fair Weather (1883), Poems (1892), and Lincoln’s Grave (1894); three of essays—Byways and Bird Notes (1885), Sylvan Secrets (1887), and Ethics of Literary Art (1894); two of fiction—The Ocala Boy (1895) and Stories of the Cherokee Hills (1898); and one of history—The Story of Louisiana (1889). As poet and essayist Mr. Thompson seems to have real merit.

In Who’s Who will be found a list of publications by the late Mr. Frederic W. H. Myers, but it is not complete. It ignores, to begin with, the poem on The Distress in Lancashire which secured for the author the Chancellor’s medal at Cambridge in 1863; also, the volume of Poems (including St. Paul), issued in 1870; and, also, the monograph on Wordsworth contributed in 1878 to the “English Men of Letters” series. No doubt it was hardly necessary to refer to the prefaces which Mr. Myers wrote for his father’s Catholic Thoughts on the Church of Christ (1883) and for the little selection from Archbishop Trench’s verses called In Time of War (1900). It may be noted the Essays Classical and Modern ascribed to 1885 (it should be 1883), were in two separate volumes, not in one. I suppose it is the St. Paul which, capturing the youthful ear, has kept Mr. Myers’s memory as a poet green in the minds of those now middle-aged. It was the slow dignified melody of the verse, the smooth unbroken rhythm, which caught the fancy and held it for so many years. Re-read, the poem is found to be somewhat lacking in “fundamental brainwork.”

The prospect of a volume on the subject of Bret Harte will no doubt set some people wondering how long it is since they first became acquainted with that engaging writer. Apparently it is just a little over thirty years since Mr. Harte was introduced to the English reading public. The introduction was in 1870, and was made by means of a little book entitled The Luck of Roaring Camp, and other Sketches. In the following year came Sensation Novels Condensed, and The Heathen Chinee, and other Poems. Evidently these three whetted the appetite of appreciative John Bull, for in 1872 there was quite a flood of Bret Harte literature—Prose and Poetry, Poems and Prose, East and West Poems, Truthful James and other Poems, and Stories of the Sierras, and other Sketches. For humorous verse we do not now look to Mr. Harte, but in the department of prose-fiction he has maintained, all along, a creditably high level.

Trusting to memory, I wrote last week of the late Mr. R. C. Christie as the editor of Dryden’s Poems in the “Globe” series. I was misled by a similarity of name. It was the late Mr. W. D. Christie who edited Dryden’s verse. I was conscious of the slip directly I opened the pages of my ACADEMY on Friday. On Monday, having myself made a faux pas, I was delighted to salute a brother in distress—namely, a writer in the Daily News, who ascribed Calverley’s lines, beginning,

In clod—a piece of orange-peel—
The end of a cigar—to Haynes Bayley! There is something in the slips of others which is not altogether displeasing to us.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Mind of Gray.

The Letters of Thomas Gray. Edited by Duncan C. Tovey.
Vol. I. (Bell & Sons. 3s. 6d.)

WHEN Gray saw Versailles he wrote: "What a huge heap of littleness!" When a certain type of critic sees Mr. Tovey's foot-notes to Gray's letters he may feel disposed to exclaim: "What a huge heap of littleness!" and point to this note on Gray's exclamation as an example of the fault he indicates:

Macaulay writes (Paris, February 2nd, 1839): "I resolved to go to Versailles. The Palace is a huge heap of littleness" (Life and Letters, Popular Ed., p. 371). I suspect that he was referring to this expression of Gray's, and probably underlined it. Walpole writing to West, at the same date approximately as that of Gray's letters, jocularly says that he has resigned to Gray the task of writing the panegyric of Versailles, for "he likes it." Walpole also calls the great front "a lumber of littleness." The original expression is, of course, Pope's (Description of Timon's Villa).

Elaborate, is it not? But, for ourselves, we do not find Mr. Tovey too zealous. He sensibly pleads that no one is obliged to read all his notes. Indeed, the faculty is quickly won of using notes just as much as is necessary to the mood and hour. Some we read at once, others we glance at and murmur "Another time," and a few, altogether missed, will surprise us hereafter. Nevertheless, it is well to insist that Mr. Tovey belongs to the elaborate school of editors. Mr. Edmund Gosse is a careful editor, but his treatment of Gray's letters does not satisfy Mr. Tovey, who—to show us the difference—prints one of Gray's postscripts in Mr. Gosse's text and in his own side by side. These two versions are a curious study in the editorial conscience. Mr. Gosse printed the postscript as follows:

Trollope is in town still at his lodgings, and has been very ill. Brown wrote a month ago to Hayes and Christopher, but has had no answer, whether or no, they shall be here at the Commencement. Can you tell? Morley is going to be married to a grave and stayed Maiden of thirty years' old with much pelf, and his own relation. Poor Soul!

Mr. Tovey prints:

Trollope is in Town still at his Lodgeings, & has been very ill. Brown wrote a Month ago to Hayes and Christoph^r: but has had no Answer, whither or no, they shall be here at the Commencement. can you tell? Morley is going to be married to a grave & stayed Maiden of 30 Years old with much Pelf, & his own Relation. poor Soul!

The differences may seem microscopic, yet in the mass of the letters they stand for complexion. The use of the ampersand is characteristic in the Letters, and Mr. Tovey thinks that Gray wrote "whither" for "whether" because he so pronounced the word. In short, Mr. Tovey is sleepless in his search for the ipsissima verba. He has already applied his method with equal thoroughness—but, we fancy, with less reward—to the works of James Thomson, a poet who was, perhaps, as certain to be smothered under such attentions as Gray was to be improved and illuminated. Thomson was a dull man, Gray a man of exquisitely active mind. Gray was a personage, too; and you enjoy his letters none the less for knowing that he was difficult of access to all but his intimates. It is said that at Cambridge graduates would leave their dinners to see him cross a quadrangle. At the Rainbow Coffee-house, at Cambridge, whither he came pretty regularly to order his books from the Circulating Library, he was beset by admirers, who struggled for the honour of supplying one of the four subscribers' signatures which were necessary for the requisition of a book. But this is secondary. Gray's charm consists in his being a singularly attractive embodiment of the literary life of the eighteenth century. In him that century both lives and dies; he was of it, yet above it; his eighteenth-century-ness is flecked with a modernity to which Dr. Johnson had no pretensions. Again and again you feel this: nowhere more so than in his feeling for nature. Compare Johnson's rhetorical passage on Iona with Gray's account of the Grande Chartreuse. Better still, leave Johnson alone, and put side by side with each other Gray's descriptions of the Grande Chartreuse passage and of the meeting of the Rhone and Saône, and say whether the one does not tempt you to drag Matthew Arnold into your view, and the other Mr. Henry James. Here is the Grande Chartreuse as Gray saw it in 1739, when he was twenty-three years of age:

In our little journey up the Grande Chartreuse I do not remember to have gone ten paces without an exclamation that there was no restraining: Not a precipice, not a torrent, not a cliff, but is pregnant with religion and poetry. There are certain scenes that would awe an atheist into belief, without the help of other argument. One need not have a very fantastic imagination to see spirits there at noonday; you have Death perpetually before your eyes, only so far removed as to compose the mind without fighting it. I am well persuaded St. Bruno was a man of no common genius to choose such a situation for his retirement; and perhaps should have been a disciple of his, had I been born in his time.

And now consider the gaiety and transparency of this river piece:

I take this opportunity to tell you that we are at the ancient and celebrated Lugdunum, a city situated upon the confluence of the Rhône and Saône (Arar I should say) two people, who though of tempers extremely unlike, think fit to join hands here and make a little party to travel to the Mediterranean in company; the lady comes gliding along through the fruitful plains of Burgundy, incredibili lenitate, ita ut oculis in utram partem fluat judicari non possit; the gentleman runs all rough and roaring down from the mountains of Switzerland to meet her; and with all her soft airs she likes him never the worse; she goes through the middle of the city in state, and he passes incog. without the walls, but waits for her a little below.

Not at all the kind of writing one associates with eighteenth century Grand Touring, is it? But what will be said if we hint that Gray rattled out travel nonsense which has its nineteenth century counterpart in A Tramp Abroad? We shall hardly be blamed for the allusion if we quote a few passages from Gray's mock synopsis of The Travels of T. G. Gent. He sent them to Wharton from Florence without comment:

CHAP. 1.

The Author arrives at Dover; his conversation with the Mayor of that Corporation; sets out in the Pacquet-Boat, grows very sick; the Author spews, a very minute account of all the circumstances thereof: his arrival at Calais; how the inhabitants of that country speak French & are said to be all Papishes; the Author's reflexions thereupon.

2.

How they feed him with Soupe, and what Soupe is. how he meets with a Capucin; and what a Capucin is. how they shut him up in a Post-Chaise, and send him to Paris; he goes wondering along durement 6 days; & how there are Trees and Houses just as in England. arrives at Paris without knowing it.

5.

The Author takes unto him a Taylour; his Character. how he covers him with Silk & Fringe, & widens his figure with buckram a yard on each side; Waistcoat & Breeches so strait, he can neither breath, nor walk. how the Barber curls him en Bequille, & à la negligée, & ties a vast Solitaire about his Neck; how the Milliner lengthens his ruffles to his finger's ends & sticks his two arms into a Muff. how he cannot stir, & how they cut him in proportion to his Clothes.

12.

Arrives at Turin; goes to Genoa, & from thence to Placentia; crosses the River Trebia: the Ghost of Hannibal appears to him; & what it & he, say upon the occasion. locked out of Parma in a cold winter's night: the author by an ingenious stratagem, gains admittance. despises that City, & proceeds through Reggio to Modena. how the Duke and Duchess lie over their own Stables, and go every night to a vile Italian Comedy; despises them, & it; & proceeds to Bologna.

14.

Observations on Antiquities. the Author proves, that Bologna was the ancient Tarentum; that the battle of Salamis, contrary to the vulgar opinion, was fought by Land, and that not far from Ravenna. that the Romans were a colony of the Jews, and that Eneas was the same with Ehud.

But we must draw near to the inner charm of Gray's letters. Not the least of its various elements is the Gallic lightness of mind of the author of the Elegy Wrote in a Country Churchyard. Elegies and churchyards are not at all the images which haunt us in the Letters. Rather, we are perpetually reminded that Gray spent the most impressionable months of his life in Paris, where the whole life of elegance and caprice was open to him; where he learned, once for all, not to take himself too seriously. And so you are not to look for proprieties and punctualities of emotion in Gray. If you do, he will be very apt to give you a healthy disappointment. We will illustrate this in a remote and glancing way by a reference to the story which, of all others, has made Gray's name widely and warmly known among Englishmen. We mean, of course, Wolfe's recitation of the verse, "The boast of heraldry," &c., as he glided down the St. Lawrence to victory and death, and his declaration that he would rather have written the "Elegy" than take Quebec. Aglow once more with appreciation of that fine tribute of Mars to Apollo, you turn to Gray's letters for the response. And this is what you find him writing:

[Pitt's] second speech was a studied and puerile declamation on funeral honours (on proposing a monument for Wolfe). In the course of it he wiped his eye with one handkerchief, and Beckford (who seconded him) cried too, and wiped with two handkerchiefs at once, which was very moving.

That is all. But then the whole of Gray's attitude to the "Elegy" is delightfully saline in its unexpected carelessness. His care went into its composition. Its publication was an accident. Gray had sent the poem to Horace Walpole, who handed it about so freely that the next thing Gray heard was a letter from the proprietors of the Magazine of Magazines intimating that they proposed to print this "ingenious Poem," and craving "his indulgence and the honour of his correspondence." This woke Gray up, and he wrote at once to Walpole to say that he was not at all disposed to be so indulgent or correspondent as they desired, and to beg him at once to have the poem printed and issued by Dodsley. Five days later the "Elegy" was out, a quarto pamphlet, price sixpence, unsigned by the poet, and with an unsigned advertisement by Horace Walpole. Its success was immediate. It is surprising how little the letters tell us of that singular "boom." Turning the pages for such references, we alight on a letter to Gray from his friend and fellow-poet, Mason, dated from Hanover, which contains a delightful story. Mason had met at Hamburg a certain Mme. Belcht, a German blue-stocking, of whose conversation he gives a specimen:

She asked who was the famous Poet that writ the Nitt Toats. I replied Doctor Yonge. She beg'd leave to drink his Health, in a glass of Sweet Wine adding that he was her favourite English Author. We toasted the Doctor. Upon which, having a mind to give my Parnassian toast, I asked Madame Belcht if she had ever read La petite Elegie dan la Cimetière Rustique. C'est beaucoup jolie, je vous assure! (for I had said fort jolie very often before) Oui Monsr. replyd Madame Belch ja lu et elle est bien jolie et Melancholique, mais elle ne touche point la Cœur comme mes cheres Nitt toats.

This story throws a delightful light on the humour, modesty, and good sense of the poet to whom it was sent. These are the qualities which give life and charm and grit to all Gray's letters, and they are as evident when he writes of men and things as when he discusses points of criticism. There are fourteen years of Gray's letter-writing to be covered by Mr. Tovey's second volume, for which we shall wait with impatience. His life in London, his work at the newly opened British Museum, his travels in England and Scotland, the last of his friendships (Bonstetten), the curious extinction of his poetic impulse, which led him to forbid the very mention of his poems in his presence, and his last struggle with gout at Cambridge—these are to come. Meanwhile we cannot over-estimate the value of Mr. Tovey's quiet enthusiasm to Gray's memory and to the presentation of all that he wrote.

“Honest Old Monboddoo.”

Lord Monboddoo and some of his Contemporaries. By William Knight. (Murray. 16s.)

JAMES BURNET, Lord Monboddoo, was one of the central figures of that eighteenth-century Edinburgh which they called the modern Athens. The pictures of him show a typical Scottish lawyer, a sharp profile, a long nose, a chin nearly pointed, prominent eyes, and satire lurking about the flexible lips, the features of a man clever and brilliant rather than strong; you are sure at a glance he possessed a hobby that he loved to get astride, though the whimsicalness is kept in check by shrewd Scottish sense. Dr. Knight's brief, but adequate, biography, and a perusal of the letters—and what tremendous letters those eighteenth century wits found time to write—amply confirm this first impression. He was Pleydell's "old friend Burnet" mentioned in Guy Mannering as being famous for his coenae in the manner of which he imitated his beloved ancients, crowning the cups (which were of excellent Bordeaux) with roses, which were also strewn on the table. All the bons esprits of old Edinburgh gathered there, and we only wish that the learned host, instead of discoursing so fully on Aristotle and his philosophy and slating Locke, had set down the impressions he formed of some of the guests concerning whom we are all curious now. There was ploughman Burns, only twenty-seven, still with the glamour of the Ayrshire fields and streams in his heart, swearing in his wild way that the beauty of Lord Monboddoo's daughter, Miss Burnet, was such as to make him admire Almighty God more than ever for having made a thing so fair. Before that Rab Fergusson had been entertained at the same table, and perchance had delighted the gay old lawyers by singing the "Birks of Invermay" to them, and much later was to come limping a youth named Walter Scott, already full of the love of "mine own romantic town," and greedily assimilating his first experiences of life. But, to use a phrase of Lord Neaves, "it's a little oddo" that Lord Monboddoo ignores their existence. His taste in literature, as a matter of fact, was execrable. What he admired is precisely what this generation ridicules. Fancy a man of wit and taste at a loss for words to express his admiration of "My name is Norval, and on the Grampian M——"; but who could write out such rant now! And then, mind, it is at the expense of him whom we call our greatest. The long Number IV. letter to Harris can be put in a portmanteau phrase that holds it all: "Whaur's Wully Shakespeare noo?" Indeed, "Wully" was but a "mimographer," whatever that is; he had never studied Aristotle's art of poetry, and Lord Monboddoo despaired of the English race because they set him on a pinnacle. How it illuminates the change from the prosy formula-ridden, tradition-following, go-by-rule eighteenth century to the unconvention that is almost lawless, a love for the unstudied and natural which is nearly a mania of this later generation. Coming from Lord Monboddoo, it, of course, has the exaggerating effect of caricature, because, as far as poetry was concerned—poetry as we conceive it—he had no soul to be saved, and neither time nor learning could possibly have made the slightest difference. He was as much in outer darkness as was Wilkie, the author of "The Epigoniad," of whose singular personality we seek in vain for the slightest trace, though he, too, was of the circle.

As to style, his views were entirely in keeping; and to the readers of a critical journal they must have at least an interest that is historical. "If it be true that, as I suppose," he says, "there is an art of writing, and that the ancients are our masters in that art, as well as in statuary and painting, it is impossible in the nature of things that the writers of that age, when the ancient authors were so much more read and admired, should not be better writers than those of this age." Wherefore he regrets that he is too old to remodel his own style according to this ideal, and expresses his preference for writing full of "periods" like that of Milton and Lord Clarendon, Demosthenes and Cicero, and his contempt for what he calls the "memorandum or shorthand writing" of such botchers as Voltaire and Montesquieu. Surely from those fields whereon, as he says, grow the plants Asphodelus and Malva he looks with reproachful eyes upon his biographer who hath sinned most flagrantly, if to be easy, and natural, and simple, and clear are crimes. Sancta simplicitas he admired in no sense, not even in dress. Once he brought back from France a suit of white velvet whereof he was enormously vain, and in which he went to an Assembly; but down in the country, at his little place in Kincardineshire, where, as he grew old, much of his time was spent, he got himself up with another kind of ostentation as a simple farmer. It was as Monboddoo "of that ilk" that he entertained Boswell and Dr. Johnson. He and the lexicographer "did not love one another," says Dr. Knight, but probably the bickering mostly came from the surface, and in the "dark unconscious" there was more mutual respect than ever found expression. At any rate Monboddoo was an irreproachable host, and the two spent a royal night together in the house "with two turrets, which mark an old baron's residence," even though they nearly came to loggerheads at the gate. Monboddoo received them there most courteously, pointed to the Douglas arms upon the house, and told them his grandmother was of that family. "In such houses," quoth he, "our ancestors lived who were better than we." "No, no, my lord," said uncompromising Dr. Johnson with his natural sense, "we are as strong as they and a great deal wiser." The challenge was politely ignored, but all about the farmer's dinner, Monboddoo's rustic dress and white hat, and the talk about Homer, was set down by the unsleeping Boswell, always on the watch for copy. Evidently Dr. Knight is afraid his hero does not cut a very sublime figure, and so he quotes the high praise of Sir Walter Scott—chivalrous spirit, learning, wit, hospitality, kindness, and so forth—as a set-off. No doubt both are honest and true opinions; but whereas the novelist saw only the presiding spirit of an Edinburgh supper-room, Dr. Johnson walked into the chamber of the man's mind and found little there to his satisfaction. At this distance of time it is difficult for us to take Lord Monboddoo seriously. He is an interesting figure in a circle that will ever be attractive, and the eccentricities of any age always exercise a certain amount of fascination. They are generally, at least, true bits of life, but a study of his mental power only brings home to us the remarkably small amount of intellect required to produce a considerable lawyer. Probably Dr. Knight would retort that one consideration has so far ignored his position as a philosopher. But it was the same there as in literature. A great part of these letters is devoted to the task of pulling to bits Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, which he characterised as "no other than a hardy collection of crude, undigested thoughts by a man who thought and reasoned by himself upon subjects of the greatest difficulty and deepest speculation, without assistance of learning." Berkeley's theory was "as poor a piece of sophistry as ever I saw composed by a man who seems to be in earnest." In place of these he exalted The True Intellectual System of the Universe. Further, his biographer admits that he quite misconceived the drift and tendency of modern sciences. Of his books The Origin and Progress of Language and the Science of Universals there is this to be said in their favour, that the argument rested on a theory of evolution. He looks back to a time when man, in the words of Horace, was a mutum et turpe pecus, be his theory of the manner in which he became articulate right or wrong. The root principle of his teaching, in the words of his biographer, was the ascent and progress that was to be seen in Nature from the inorganic through the organic up to man. Only he illogically held that this progress stopped with the Greeks—Roman language and civilisation he held in contempt. For this we give him the credit Lord Neaves accorded:

Though Darwin now proclaims the law,
And spreads it far abroad O!
The man that first the secret saw
Was honest old Monboddoo.

And with all his limitations, whims and eccentricities there are few Noctes Ambrosiana at which we would have more willingly assisted than those at St. John-street, Canongate, where wine and company alike could be depended on, and the kind old host's most notable affectation lay in too much love for the Rose, a fair flower 'tis true, but one that hath been much misused in every generation.

Mr. Yeats's New Play.

The Shadowy Waters. By W. B. Yeats. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)

In this long dialogue-poem Mr. Yeats is more shadowy, more mystical, more unearthly than ever. His beautiful, insubstantial verse approaches still nearer to the ideal of a dream. His intention is less expressed than dimly discerned through it: not stated so much as overheard. How much of Mr. Yeats's mysticism is a literary attitude of mind, how much a working philosophy of life, we do not pretend to say: it is clear that he allows it a more and more exclusive domination over his poetry. The motive of The Shadowy Waters is apparently to be found in the contrast between the earthly and the mystical conception of love. The chief personages are Forgael and Dectora. Forgael is upon his galley. Mysterious messages have bidden him to

Seek

His heart's desire where the world dwindles out.

He neglects his craft of buccaneering, to the loud discontent of his men, in a dream of "a love that the gods give." His friend warns him that:

No man nor woman has loved otherwise
Than in brief longing and deceiving hope
And bodily tenderness; and he who longs
For happier love but finds unhappiness,
And falls among the dreams the drowsy gods
Breathe on the burnished mirror of the world
And then smooth out with ivory hands and sigh.

But Forgael is faithful to his dreams. Then another ship looms through the fog. The sailors board it, slay the crew and the king, whose souls hover round the mast like grey birds, and bring on to their own ship Dectora. At first Forgael will have none of her :

I wait
For an immortal woman, as I think.

But as the queen speaks, endeavouring to persuade the sailors to take her home, he becomes half-convinced that this is the love of his eternal quest. With his harp, given him on an island by the fool of the wood, he charms the sailors, who threaten to slay him, and they betake themselves to the ale. He charms Dectora, and she forgets.

I know you now, beseeching hands and eyes,
I have been waiting you. A moment since
My foster-mother sang in an old rhyme
That my true-love would come in a ship of pearl
Under a silken sail and silver yard,
And bring me where the children of Ængus wind
In happy dances, under a windy moon ;
But these waste waters and wind-beaten sails
Are wiser witchcraft, for our peace awakes
In one another's arms.

And still Forgael has to teach the woman that the love of dreams is beyond the bodily tenderness.

DECTORA.

The love I know is hidden in these hands
That I would mix with yours, and in this hair
That I would shed like twilight over you.

FORGAEL.

The love of all under the light of the sun
Is but brief longing and deceiving hope
And bodily tenderness ; but love is made
Imperishable fire under the boughs
Of chrysoberyl and beryl and chrysolite
And chrysoprase and ruby and sardonyx.

There is an ebb and flow of the spirit. Dectora is half won, and the voices of the sailors quarrelling over their ale half recall her to the light of the sun. Forgael bids her go and love his friend with the earthly love and share his happy throne. But in the end the dream triumphs over the reality, or the reality over the dream, which you will, and the lovers cut the rope that binds them to the other galley with the sailors in it, and glide away together to the music of the harp-strings.

Certainly, Mr. Yeats makes a beautiful thing of it, with his gift of level, unruffled speech. Yet it is all rather impalpable, and one has an uneasy sense that it is all rather inhuman. We turn back almost with relief to the comparative daylight of his preface, though that, too, is full of enchantment. He describes "the seven woods of Coole," where this story came to him, and invokes the shadowy beings "that cleave the waters of sleep," for whom is his song :

How shall I name you, immortal, mild, proud Shadows ?
I only know that all we know comes from you,
And that you come from Eden on flying feet.
Is Eden far away, or do you hide
From human thought, as hares and mice and conies
That run before the reaping-hook and lie
In the last ridge of the barley ? Do our woods
And winds and ponds cover more quiet woods,
More shining winds, more star-glimmering ponds ?
Is Eden out of time and out of space ?
And do you gather about us when pale light
Shining on water and fallen among leaves,
And winds blowing from flowers, and whirr of feathers
And the green quiet have uplifted the heart ?

I have made this poem for you, that men may read it
Before they read of Forgael and Dectora,
As men in the old times, before the harps began,
Poured out wine for the high invisible ones.

Well, Mr. Yeats may be inhuman and pale-blooded, but when he writes likes this he has the magic almost to draw us with him into fairy.

"The Father of the House."

Seventy Years of Westminster. With other Letters and Notes of the late Right Hon. Sir John Mowbray, Bart., M.P. Edited by his Daughter. (Blackwood. 7s. 6d.)

THIS is essentially a book for quotation. It is composed chiefly of three articles which appeared in Blackwood's Magazine, and is made up of letters which Sir John Mowbray wrote to his family, and especially to his mother. The book is edited by his daughter, who has done her work well.

Sir John Mowbray began life with the name of Cornish, and did not assume the name by which he was best known until his marriage. He was born on June 3, 1815, and was educated at Westminster, where, as a boy, he gained his first experience of Parliament, and at Christ Church. In 1847 he married, and in 1853 entered Parliament and gave up practice at the Bar. Sir John Mowbray had a great experience of men and things in the House of Commons, and gives several instances of that marvellous prescience which distinguished Disraeli. Here is an extract which is of present interest :

On the second reading [of the Oxford University Reform Act] two men, with a long Parliamentary career before them, made speeches which attracted much attention—one was Mr. Byng, afterwards Viscount Enfield and Earl of Strafford ; the other Lord Robert Cecil, now Marquess of Salisbury. The first received many compliments both in the House and from friends out of doors. Mr. Disraeli remarked to me afterwards : " You heard two speeches the other night—one by Byng, who has received so many congratulations in the House, and letters from all the duchesses and countesses in London ; the other by Robert Cecil. You will not hear much of the first ; the latter has made his mark as a real debater, and will become a considerable man." The prediction was verified. Lord Enfield was an excellent Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs. Lord Salisbury has been three times Prime Minister of England.

The date of Disraeli's prophecy was 1854. The account of how Mr. Gladstone was turned out of his seat for Oxford in 1865 by Mr. Gathorne Hardy is a valuable bit of history. Sir John was chairman of the meeting held in London which decided to oppose Mr. Gladstone. He recounts an incident which occurred when Bishop Wilberforce ("Soapy Sam") came to record his vote :

The poll opened on Thursday the 13th of July, and lasted until the 18th, the intervening Sunday excepted. On the first day of the poll, about 5 p.m., the Bishop of Oxford came into the theatre booted and spurred, about to ride to Cuddesdon Palace. The Vice-Chancellor leant forward, and in a loud voice said : " You must vote in your Academicals, you know." This occasioned a little merriment ; and on the Bishop's return Mr. Granville Somerset, who was acting as a kind of legal adviser for Mr. Hardy, called his lordship's attention to the resolution of the House of Commons that no Peer should take part in the election of a Member of the Commons' House, and asked him if he had considered it. He said he had. Sir Robert Phillimore, who appeared for Mr. Gladstone, asked if it was not held that the resolution did not apply to elections by members of Convocation. The Bishop smiled, but did not commit himself to any answer, and immediately said : " Samuel Wilberforce, Oriel ; I vote for Mr. Gladstone," and the vote was recorded.

Mr. Hardy's majority was one hundred and eighty. Sir John Mowbray occupied a peculiar position in Parliament. He did not often speak, but he was a mainstay of the Committees, and was respected by all men and by all parties. He was in Parliament for forty-six years, including eleven general elections and two re-elections on taking office, and it is a remarkable thing that he only once had to go to the poll at a contest, and that was on his first entry into Parliament, in 1853. A curious instance of the respect in which he was held occurred in 1893 at the opening of the new Parliament. There was a seat which, by courtesy, he had always occupied since he left the Front Bench in 1874. On the first day he found his seat occupied by Lord Frederick Hamilton, who, of course, gave it up directly he found out whose it was. But the strange thing was that Dr. Tanner, of all people, went up to Sir John in his blandest manner, and assured him that if any Irishman ever took the place he would see to it, and set it right.

The book is full of quotations, for Sir John Mowbray's relation with all the leading Parliamentarians were very close. It gives the idea of a most charming and lovable personality, and of a man whose unostentatious work was a loss to the nation as well as to Parliament. Sir John, who died last year, was Father of the House of Commons for the last eighteen months of his life.

Tales from the Eastern Homer.

The Story-Book of the Shah. By Ella C. Sykes. Illustrated. (Macqueen. 10s. 6d.)

THERE are no blows delivered in Persian legend quite so authentic in their clangour as those we listen to in reading the Morte d'Arthur; yet it is a drowsy spirit that nothing but battle can stir, and the spirit were drowsy indeed that did not stand bolt upright, so to speak, in the presence of Jemshid the Proud and of Rustam the Invincible. In this pleasant volume the gorgeous sins and heroisms collected by Firdausi are related with the mingled reticence and candour that befit a childish audience, and local colour and characteristic details are supplied by ingenious reference to modern Persia, with which a two years' residence has familiarised Mrs. Sykes. She may be gently reproved for writing "Rustem" for Rustam, the former being, in Burton's phrase, a "vile Turkish corruption." Nor can one refrain from adding that the best version of Rustam's duel with Sohrab, for a child as for an adult, remains Matthew Arnold's—one of the very rare examples of a poem that neither sugars nor complicates, but simply beautifies the literature from which it is derived.

Adult interest in Persian legend is damped in the usual way by the arbitrary conduct of the gods who arrange both beginnings and ends. Then we have Demons and the Simurgh—"the worthy Bird," whose blood, even when his moral character is defective, is efficacious enough to enable feet to tread unharmed on red-hot sand. Similarly the blood of the White Demon restores the sight of Kai-Kaus and his warriors. Evil in legend is often merely good behaving paradoxically. It is not very wise, or the Demon who once had Rustam in his power would not have let that hero slip through his fingers by throwing him into the sea when he might have killed him outright.

A Persian Icarus is to be found in the above-mentioned Kai-Kaus. Determining "to explore the secrets of the heavens," he set his magicians to work:

They fixed four javelins in an upright position at the corners of a light raft, and put a piece of meat on the point of each javelin, and the monarch sat in the middle. Four strong and hungry eagles were then fettered to the corners, and as each bird flew upwards to seize the meat, the Persian King was carried higher and higher into the air.

The Patent Office can protect no mechanical device more exquisite than this; and it is a little curious that the constructive talent which such an invention displays should have traffic with the supernatural in its crudest form. But one must remember the volcano Demavend which presides over Persia. The sudden violence of an eruption requires for its explanation the plodding science which Fancy has ever outrun. Demavend is enough to account for the snakes on King Zohak's shoulder, which sprang into wriggling existence at the perfidious kiss of Iblis. It is enough to account for the magician who turned himself into a rock, and the dragon that could take two mules and a takht at one gape.

Other marvels—such as the hair that Rudabeh let down over the balcony to serve as a ladder for her lover, Zal—have haunted the brain of Europe. Rapunzel has an immortal relative, that fairy tales may be recognised as history and declared to be true. Their morality, which denies the gods the great gift of passionless curiosity in order that they may pounce on presumption with the punitive swiftness that forbids misunderstanding, hails from an age when men were yet more afraid to be lonely than they were to be led by a string.

Other New Books.

CHOPIN: THE MAN AND HIS MUSIC.

BY JAMES HUNEKER.

This little book corresponds to its title with symmetrical precision. The musical section is devoted to a descriptive analysis of Chopin's chief compositions, interesting and competent, though too exclamatory. But the Man—that is, the memoir of the composer—concerns us here. It is not a mere compilation; Mr. Hunecker has taken obvious pains over it. He has boiled down and arranged the matter of Chopin's chief biographers with discretion and tact, adding whatever information he could derive by personal zeal. Would, however, that nature had given Mr. Hunecker an English style—or thereabouts. He writes terrible journalese, and writes it as one who has acquired the precious language with conscientious study, not as one born to journalese.

It is not a Chopin altogether entralling to Englishmen that comes out from his labours. Of course, since the public has conceived Chopin a somewhat feminine character, Mr. Hunecker is eager to prove him a masculine spirit. But, despite himself, he writes down the composer—psychologically—a beautiful girl. In character, as in music, we see Chopin delicate and exquisitely sentimental, capricious, fragile, passionate—with a certain kind of woman's passion, sudden, transient, uncontrolled, unconcentrated. It matters not that he was given alternately to nervous gaiety and nervous depression: so was the virile Wagner. But he was vain: at his first juvenile concert he thought the assembly was looking at his new collar; and as a "grown-up" he was vain of his graceful bow to the audience. He was vain with women, loved to make a friend jealous by vaunting favour in a quarter where he knew it would give pain. He took and parted with impressions like wax, would fall in and out of love in a night: a crumpled rose-leaf was cause enough for his changeful whims and capricious turns of dislike, as this apologist owns. An enchanting genius, but woman in his enchantment—even in that tricky sylph, his music. (Reeves.)

EXPLODED IDEAS: AND OTHER ESSAYS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"TIMES AND DAYS."

This writer does not scale the extreme heights of essay-writing. He has no immense felicities, of manner or of insight; nor does he reveal a temperament which should induce one to admit him, with Lamb or Stevenson, to the inner chambers of the spirit's intimacy. Even on a lower level he is very uneven. Often his wit is forced, his criticism cheap, his outlook commonplace. But on certain themes—in the essays entitled "A Recluse" and "The Gardener," for instance—he really has something to say which is worth saying, either for entertainment or for edification. In any case, he can turn a sentence neatly, and, unlike some essayists of our acquaintance, he does not persist unduly. He has realised that an essay may be almost anything, except strenuous. We do not know that his ideas are more "exploded" than other peoples. They are not dynamic exactly: some of them have, perhaps, exhausted the changes which once helped them to drive the world round. But we seem to have met with them often enough, in quite ordinary conversation, upon the lips of quite ordinary folk. (Longmans. 1s.)

LUCA DELLA ROBBIA. BY THE MARCHESA BURLAMACCHI.

Dr. Williamson's new series of "Great Masters" grows apace. We cannot, however, but think that Signora Burlamacchi has somewhat misinterpreted the scope and intention of it. Her volume on Luca della Robbia is carefully put together, and interesting enough from its own point of view; but a very large proportion of it is archaeology, occupied with lists and dates, and an elaborate attempt to isolate the authentic bas-reliefs of Luca himself and distinguish them from those of Andrea. The work wanted doing, but a series of "popular" handbooks was hardly the place to do it in. Dr. Williamson has done his best to restore the balance by himself adding a chapter of æsthetic criticism, which occurs to us as rather sentimental in its tone, on Luca's Work and Position in Italian Art. We have nothing but praise for the excellent reproductions with which the book is provided. Signora Burlamacchi mentions one fact which we agree with her is "not generally known." No Della Robbia work is more familiar to visitors to Florence than the long row of "bambini" in circular medallions along the façade of the Hospital of the Innocenti in the Piazza della Annunziata. Four of these "bambini" are not Della Robbia or Cinquecento at all. They are copies made from medallions of Luca's elsewhere, when the façade was lengthened about half a century ago. (Bell & Sons. 1s.)

MARKS AND MONOGRAMS
ON POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. BY WILLIAM CHAFFERS.

This monumental treatise, revised and edited by Mr. Frederick Litchfield, has long been familiar to all students of ceramics and all collectors of bric-a-brac. Mr. Litchfield, whose own work on Pottery and Porcelain we recently reviewed, spares no pains to correct and improve each successive edition. This is the ninth, and we should not have troubled to call special attention to it had it been a bare reprint. But Mr. Litchfield had the fortunate idea, while preparing it, of addressing a request for information to collectors of old china, through an advertisement in the Times. The result was a voluminous correspondence and an important revision of several sections mainly dealing with English factories. The book deserves a very high rank among works of reference. (Gibbings. 1s.)

ROBINSON CRUSOE. ED. BY J. HOWARD B. MASTERMAN.

Robinson Crusoe as a school reader with introduction and notes! The text is that of the first edition (1719), and the notes are almost all definitions of words in the text. They bear curious testimony to the simplicity and permanence of Defoe's English. True, nearly every page has its three or four "hard" words explained, but a very great proportion of these are ordinary words of to-day, which the editor seizes the opportunity of defining. Words like circumscribed, species, distracted, bungling, and comely, being used by Defoe in their present meanings, we should have thought might have been left to the teacher, if indeed such words do not introduce themselves to a boy more thoroughly in the everyday practice of speech. There was every reason to append notes to old-flavoured words like calenture, indraft, whimsies, squab, essays (attempts), grutch'd, penthouse, perspectives (telescopes), punctually (exactly), and dispositions (arrangements); and all such words are explained. Yet in a dozen pages Defoe's diction is so simple that the lexicographer-editor confesses, by the absence of notes, that his occupation is lost in the limpid stream. We do not much like Mr. Masterman's statement that "the great secret of the charm of Robinson Crusoe is that in the hero of the story we recognise those qualities of resourcefulness, activity, and practical common sense that have made Great Britain the greatest colonising power in the world." No doubt this gives the book an added charm for English boys; but Robinson Crusoe has not gone round the world for that, nor did Burton hear Defoe's tale recited at the tent doors of wandering Bedouins for that. The book is something vastly more human. It is an incomparable play on the wants and desires of man, which are focussed with no regard to outward probability, but with the nicest correspondence to the mind of the average man. The excellence of its subject cannot be overstated; it is one on which every novelist might try his hand. But Defoe brought to it a treatment so simple and sympathetic, so limited yet so reaching, that the name Robinson Crusoe became one with the idea, and will remain one so long as tales are told. (Cambridge: University Press. 1s.)

AN ELEMENTARY TREATISE BY DR. B. WILLIAMSON AND ON DYNAMICS. DR. F. A. TARLETON.

Writers of ultramundane romances like those which Mr. Wells has given us would be well-advised to keep this book at hand for inspiration, and as a repertory of facts suitable for use in appropriate places. Students using the book require a knowledge of higher mathematics to comprehend its contents, but a large number of the worked-out examples can be understood by anyone. Suppose, for instance, that a writer wishes to make the sun the place of an imaginary visit. We may leave the means of conveyance to his imagination; but he will be able to learn from Drs. Williamson and Tarleton that a man weighing ten stone on the earth would weigh 1 ton 13 cwt. if transferred to the surface of the sun. He will also find that an object falling from an indefinitely great distance would reach the surface of the sun with a velocity of 364 miles per second, whereas the same body falling towards the earth would have a velocity of only seven miles per second when it reached the surface. These results can be taken as trustworthy, and the methods by which they are arrived at may be left to the student of the motions produced by the action of force. No book contains a better treatment of dynamics—including applications to thermodynamics—than this by Drs. Williamson and Tarleton, or provides students with a more interesting collection of examples. (Longmans. 10s. 6d.)

THE ELEMENTS OF HYDROSTATICS. BY S. L. LONEY.

Archimedes founded the science of hydrostatics by the discovery of the principle that when an object is immersed in a liquid it is buoyed up with a force equal to the weight of the volume of liquid displaced. Curiously enough, his name appears to have been omitted by Mr. Loney: at any rate, in the place where the principle is utilised. Some of the simple facts concerning the properties and pressures of fluids are presented in a new light, and numerous problems are given for the student to unravel; otherwise, the book does not differ appreciably from existing volumes on the same subject. The descriptions of experiments are mostly too general to be of actual service, though they serve to give the practical appearance expected in all text-books of the present day. The description of the action of the Cartesian diver—a little figure of a man which can be made to sink in a jar of water by pressing upon a sheet of india-rubber stretched over the top—is not exactly correct. The diver sinks because the pressure compresses the air in the bulb at the top of the diver, the result being that a little water enters the space previously occupied by air. (Cambridge: University Press. 4s. 6d.)

PRIMER OF ASTRONOMY.

BY SIR ROBERT BALL.

Sir Robert Ball has managed to compress a large amount of astronomical matter into a small space, and the result is fairly satisfactory. He does not, however, excel in this kind of work, though he can entertain an audience better than any other public lecturer on scientific topics. Equipped with a slight knowledge of geometry, a reader can follow with ease every page of the book; but without it he will find it pleasanter to skip several parts. The eleven plates representing various celestial objects are as good as any we have seen, but the diagrams in the text are not so intelligible. (Cambridge: University Press. 1s. 6d.)

ART CRAFTS FOR AMATEURS.

BY FRED. MILLER.

Professional art-workers as well as amateurs will find this book of service. There are nearly two hundred illustrations, representing designs gathered from many sources, and exemplifying various tendencies. But we miss several names, including that of Mr. Lewis Day. The author's advice is good and practical, and workers at the leading art-crafts—whether as a business or a recreation—can derive from it many useful hints both in design and manipulation of tools and material. Old work should be examined wherever possible, but the imitation of it should be avoided. Nature is the true source of inspiration, and Mr. Miller does right to insist upon it. "Were I to be planning out the training of a student in the crafts," he says, "I should devote much more time to work direct from nature than seeing nature through the eyes of other folk, which is what we do when we accept others' renderings of what is seen." (Virtue.)

There is more novelty in the title of Mr. W. K.-L. Dickson's Boer War book, The Biograph in Battle (Unwin, 6s.), than in the book itself, but we can vouch for the briskness of Mr. Dickson's diary and the extreme interest of his photographs, many of which were secured in the firing line. Some surprising particulars are given of the work done by the Post Office at Cape Town, now under military rule. More than 750,000 letters are dealt with every week, besides tons of parcels. At Ladysmith more than twenty tons of letters were delivered within three days of the relief: twelve ox-waggon-loads and two mule-waggon-loads.

The Antiquary for 1900 (Stock) comes with its old motto from "Troilus and Cressida":

Instructed by the Antiquary times,
He must, he is, he cannot but be wise.

The instruction conveyed in the present volume is of the usual varied character; we note a series of articles on "King Alfred as a Man of Letters," a good paper on "Some Characteristics of Icelandic Poetry," a series of extracts from a "Diary of Journeys to London from Ireland in 1761 and 1762 by George Bowles," and a reprint of "The Ordinances of the Gild of Barber-Surgeons at Norwich." Well-digested and well-edited information abounds in the Antiquary.

Messrs. Willing's Press Guide is now in its twenty-eighth annual issue. The editor is probably right in thinking it necessary to explain that bi-weekly means every two weeks, not twice a week.

By an oversight we have omitted to notice earlier an admirable set of diaries for 1901 sent us by Messrs. Letts. Particularly good for private and literary purposes is No. 8, in which a whole page of smooth ruled paper is allotted to each day. Another diary which we can specially recommend to ladies is Letts's Housekeeper and Engagement Book. This affords a simple yet complete means of recording family expenditure under proper headings; and it is a matter of certainty that its careful use will result in the saving of many pounds in the year.

Fiction.

In the Name of a Woman. By Arthur W. Marchmont.
(Longmans. 6s.)

If Mr. Marchmont's novel has not already served a useful purpose somewhere as a "sensational serial," at least it might have advantageously done so. It has all the characteristics of a popular "thriller," except bad English. Mr. Marchmont writes rather well—without affectation and without too many clichés. His ingeniously-patterned story of intrigue between the Russian party and the Nationalist party in the Bulgarian capital owes something to The Prisoner of Zenda, a little to "Sydney Grier's" Balkan inventions, and a little less than nothing to its illustrator, who has selected, with an unflinching instinct for sheer melodrama, the very crudest episodes of the tale. In several places the plot is moved forward by contrivances which show real skill, and the greater, therefore, is the pity that Mr. Marchmont should have appropriated (the word is justifiable) incidents like this:

"It's a long distance, and the light's rather bad. Do you shoot much?"

"Well, a little. I have only had two or three shots here"; and I picked up a revolver carelessly. "I am sorry you found the light bad." I turned, then levelled the pistol, and fired half-a-dozen shots in rapid succession.

"You have missed," he cried, laughing gleefully.

"I think not. You will find the six bullets in a ring round the bull's-eye. I never miss." I spoke with intentionally boastful swagger.

He went up to the target and examined it, and then turned to me:

"By the Lord, you're a wonderful shot. Where did you learn that trick?"

And a conclusion like this:

All is warmth, peace, love, and rest in my English life now; and, as I glance at my dear ones, I thank heaven with fervent gratitude that they are not destined to aspire to the dangerous splendour and evanescent glory of a minor Throne. I get up quietly, and, stepping through the window into the sunlight, am hailed with a cry and rush of delight from my little darlings and a welcome of love-light from the eyes of my beautiful wife.

He might, at any rate, have altered the phraseology. There is no reason why a sensational serial should not be a work of literary art (not sublime art, but art). Mr. Marchmont, spasmodically, has come nearer to the goal than most of the craft, but he might have come a little nearer without offending the great sensational public.

The Pride of Race. By B. L. Farjeon.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

This novel, "in five panels," belongs to the old genial school of "cheerful optimism." Moses Mendoza, the humble, honest, kind-hearted Jew, who in a single month rises from the penury of an artisan to the millions of a Stock Exchange genius, is a figure of which Charles Dickens is certainly the grandfather. And Moses is indeed the whole book. His son Raphael, who marries an earl's daughter, is by contrast a lifeless and unexceptionable stock. There seems no connexion between Raphael the boy and Raphael the man; and even Moses is turned to gold too quickly. We can understand neither his rise nor his equally sudden fall; and the knowledge that such things do happen, have recently happened, does not assist us. That Mr. Farjeon can still practise with effectiveness the broader farcical methods of his great master may be seen from the following passage, à propos of the vicissitudes of Moses' noble father-in-law:

Her doubts not yet resolved, she went to the fire.

"Why, where's the blessed bacon?"

"The blessed bacon, 'Melia-Jane, is between the plates."

'Melia-Jane held her sides. "Ho, ho, ho! Is that the way yer cook a rasher? Well, I never did!"

With inward misgivings the Earl remarked, "I infer from your tone that it is not the way."

"You cook a rasher!" exclaimed 'Melia-Jane, with contemptuous derision. "Why, where 'ave yer been brought hup, I'd like to know! Yer can't even cut a slice of bread! Jest look at the loaf."

The Earl looked at the pyramid ruefully, and in a self-condemnatory voice observed:

"I am afraid my domestic education has been sadly neglected. I am truly ashamed. Yet I can plead in extenuation that until lately I have always had my bread cut for me, and—ha, hum!—buttered. 'Melia-Jane, may I ask you to oblige me?"

He pointed to the frying-pan, and with a courtly bow handed her a fork.

Speaking without too much precision, The Pride of Race is a neat and agreeable piece of work. As a certain novelist's hero said of the chef-d'œuvre of another novelist, "we have read it without fatigue."

A Cuirassier of Arrans. By Claude Bray.
(Sands. 6s.)

It is possible to follow this essay in a fashionable mode of fiction to its close not without interest. The narrative does not halt, and the spur and bridle note is well caught. It is a good specimen of the sort of thing which is being turned out by the score in the hope of catching a fickle popular attention which is already beginning to veer towards other breezes. Our quarrel with Mr. Bray must be that Lieutenant Gervase Scrope is really a poorer creature than the hero of a romance has any business to be. It is not absolutely necessary that a hero should be a miracle of genius and honour and chivalry, although there have been eminently successful romances in which this receipt was followed; but he must at least have wits up to the average, and indifferent honesty. Lieutenant Scrope does not seem to us to have either. He does some shady things, and neither he nor his biographer quite seem to realise how shady; and he is the merest puppet for intriguers. The mere whisk of a petticoat blinds him. The petticoats are, however, rather well put in, and the historical portraits (Lord Sunderland, Jeffreys, James the Second) are good. It is difficult to get up quite as much sympathy for King James as the scheme of the story requires.

Sarah, P.G. By Mrs. Sarah Martin Lanyon.
(Unwin. 6s.)

MRS. LANYON has not quite learnt her business. There is much good material for a novel in Sarah, P.G.—vigorous descriptive power, ready touches of social satire—but the essential constructive ability is lacking. The long spun-out story loses interest; there is no subordination of the irrelevant to the big situations: innumerable minor characters fly into the field of vision and fly out again. And in these days of countless novels and widespread technical accomplishment it ought to be useless for anyone except a writer of real genius to attempt to persuade the reading public to accept the raw material of fiction instead of the finished article.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE HEART OF THE ANCIENT WOOD. By C. G. D. ROBERTS.

An open-air tale of forest life, by an author who, in former books, has shown his sympathy for woodland men and women wise in woodcraft and beast lore. In such books animals have a place in the scheme of things, and strange, yet familiar, the intrusion seems. For example: "The old trail served the flat, shuffling tread of Kroof, the great she-bear, as she led her half-grown cub to feast on the blueberry patches far up the mountain. It caught the whim of Ten-Tine, the caribou, as he convoyed his slim cows down to occasional pasturage in the alder swamps of the slow Quah-Davic." (Gay & Bird. 6s.)

AMUSEMENT ONLY.

By RICHARD MARSH.

Last November we totted up Mr. Marsh's "output" for the year, and, finding that he had published eight volumes since the preceding January, we wondered if, by a splendid spurt, he could write four more before the end of the year, and thus make a record. That was not to be. But a new year is now upon us, and with it comes Mr. Marsh's January book. Good. It is called Amusement Only. It contains twelve tales, and the first of them, entitled "The Lost Duchess," truly amused us. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

MORALS AND MILLIONS.

By FLORENCE WARDEN.

A story of modern life, by the author of The House on the Marsh. "When he got into the hall, David Thompson found Lady Alison ready to start," and so on. "So he got into the phaeton with her, to the great indignation of Claude, who was watching them from the coffee-room window, while Lord Goring and Hamo remounted their horses," and so on. (White. 6s.)

THE COMING WATERLOO.

By CAPTAIN CAIRNES.

This is a "looking-ahead" book. The date of the story is 1903, and at the opening, Great Britain, having swept France from the seas, is preparing to land an army of invasion in France. Some episodes with submarine boats prepare the way for the advent of the British and the thunder of a European war. There is plenty of martial reading for those who like this kind of fiction—reading like this: "'We have had a most providential success,' said General Hippisley. 'To what do you attribute it, Colonel?' 'Under Heaven, sir,' said Colonel Daunt, 'to the shooting of our infantry.'" (Constable. 6s.)

THE INVADERS.

By LOUIS TRACY.

This is another "looking-ahead" story, but it is England, not France, this time that is invaded. On page 10 we learn that "Liverpool has been attacked and taken by an unknown enemy." It was accomplished in the easy way that events happen in fiction. On page 34 we are told that "Liverpool, Birkenhead, Birmingham, Derby, Sheffield, and Goole have been seized by German and French soldiers." Later Mr. Balfour, Mr. Chamberlain, and even Mr. Weir, appear as characters, and the things that happen should knock down the inexperienced novel-reader—if there be such a person left in the world—with a feather. But Mr. Tracy also has his milder moments. He ends with a marriage. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE SACK OF LONDON.

By ONE WHO SAW IT.

This is another! (White. 1s.)

We have also received Lore Has No Pity, by F. Langridge (Long, 6s.); The Minor Canon, by G. Beresford Fitzgerald (Long, 6s.); A Wheel of Fire, by Jean Middlemas (Long, 6s.); Bits of Turf, by Nathaniel Gubbins (White, 1s.); The Weird of the Silken Thomas, by R. M. Craig (Moran); Sneape's Spirit, by Cuming Walters (Griffiths, 3s. 6d.); What May Happen, by Beatrice Heron-Maxwell (Griffiths, 3s. 6d.).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)..... 17/6

„ Quarterly 5/0

„ Price for one issue /5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Domestic Novel.

An Inquiry.

The morning-room is comfortable, but so are not its occupants—only two—of whom the one has within the last five minutes sprung a mine upon the other. It must have been inside this small time-limit since the clock on the narrow eighteenth-century mantelpiece had struck the half-hour, while the footmen were carrying in the last lamp and dropping the last curtain.

*The sea of faith
Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furled.
But now I only hear
Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,
Retreating to the breath
Of the night-wind down the vast edges drear
And naked shingles of the world.*

THE appearance of a novel by Rhoda Broughton, written in her first and sprightliest manner, naturally brings up the large question of "the domestic novel"; for Miss Broughton, admired by Mr. Andrew Lang, and disdained by Mr. Swinburne in a withering chance phrase, is, perhaps, the typical novelist of our domesticity. Endowed with wit, sentiment, and a discerning eye for some aspects of character, she has during thirty and three years given a modest and refined pleasure, not only to the petites âmes conjugales, but also to the great intellects philosophic, scientific, and economic, which in hours of slipped ease graciously "unbend" themselves over a novel. It is significant, and probably no mere accident, that the opening lines of Foes in Law (Macmillan) should contain references to morning-rooms, mantelpieces, footmen, lamps, and curtains—the whole constituting a background for the fragrant cup and a proposal of marriage. "Instead of a cup of tea he has asked her for herself." And "he" is a curate, and "she" is named Lettice. All these things conspire. If Miss Broughton had purposely tried to embody the characteristics of her school in a single scene, she could not have bettered the first ten pages of Foes in Law—that novel which, without harming him, might divert an archdeacon; which is at this very moment being read by the mothers of the conquerors of the world; and which will doubtless be read by the conquerors too, when they come home.

Since most of the fiction of Balzac, Turgenev, Thackeray, Tolstoi, Meredith, d'Annunzio, Hardy and Zola is domestic, it may properly be asked what sinister or satiric import attaches to the term "domestic novel"? The answer lies in the fact that the adjective applies, not to the themes of this particular class of novel, but to its public. The domestic novel is so called because it is written for, not because it is written about, domesticity. At the same time, since it may have wit, and even humour, and may be concerned with the affairs of adult people, it is not to be confused with the "story for girls." It is part of the artistic furniture of the home, like the ballad on the piano and the water-colour on the wall. It is admitted because it respects that "sanctity of the English home" which some other things—for instance, the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill—are said to "invade." Dean Farrar once wrote a book whose sub-title is "The World of School." There is "a world of home," which preserves its qualities only by ignoring every other world. The English world of home is one of the most perfectly organised microcosms on this planet, not excepting the Indian purdah. The product of centuries of culture, it is regarded, not too absurdly, as the fairest flower of Christian civilisation. It exists chiefly, of course, for women, but it could never have been what it is had not men bound themselves to respect the code which they made for it. It is the fountain of refinement and of consolation, the nursery of affection. It has the peculiar faculty of nourishing itself, for it implicitly denies the existence of anything beyond its doorstep, save the Constitution, a bishop, a rector, the seaside, Switzerland, and the respectful poor. And its exclusiveness is equalled by its dogmatism. In the home there are no doubts, no uncertainties, no "open questions." The code, surpassing even that of Napoleon, provides for all contingencies. This is right: that is wrong—always has been, always will be. This is nice: that is not nice—always has been, always will be. The earth may spin like a fretful midge amid problems, philosophers may tremble with profound hesitations, partisans may fight till the arenas are littered with senseless mortality; but the home, wrapt in the discreet calm of its vast conservatism, remains ever stable, a refuge and a seclusion for those who will accept its standards and agree not to create a disturbance.

It is for this wonderful institution, sublime in its self-reliance, living like a besieged city round which "ignorant armies clash by night," that the domestic novel has been brought into being. It arose naturally and inevitably upon demand, and it conforms to the conditions imposed upon it as precisely as a good child. The domestic novel was born in the home, and it has never been past the porch. When its time comes it will expire of neglect in the attic. There is the home and there is the world, and sometimes on very stormy days the domestic novel goes to the window and looks out, and brings back to the fireside a mild report of the embattled sky; but that is dangerous; it is better to put a log on the fire and talk serenely of the tranquil microcosm. Therefore the domestic novel is usually occupied with domesticity, and in a domestic way—a way which avoids trouble by taking everything for granted. Can there be aught more delightful than the home? And can one imagine a more desirable home than the first-class country house, where virtue, elegance, and wealth have combined to produce an environment and a piece of machinery of ideal perfection? This is why the domestic novelist makes a parade of footmen and the apparatus of luxurious comfort: not so much from snobbery as because such things are the symbols of an ideal. "A good home"—what aspirations, narrow but intense, are in that phrase! Happily, even in the home, one is human, or the domestic novelist would be unable to extract his sedate dramas from that haunt of quietude. It is notorious, indeed, that the smaller the community and the more completely it is self-contained, the deeper will be its preoccupation with its own trilling affairs. Hence the domestic novelist is likely never to be short of material. Miss Rhoda Broughton, in Foes in Law, treats domestically of the warfare between a squire's sister and his wife, two women of opposite temperaments. No larger interest is involved, nothing but the friction of these twain in the spacious apartments of a fine country-house. Conceive the deliberate act of sitting down to compose a whole book about the tracasseries of sisters-in-law! Yet here the book is, written out in full; and clever, too, adroit, amusing, and—so far, but no further—realistic. Housekeeping, pet dogs, private theatricals, benevolent societies, visits, and a convenient final legacy of thirty thousand pounds: such are the materials of Foes in Law, in which the tragedy of passion never rises higher than a misunderstanding, nor the ecstasy of it exceeds "domestic bliss."

The significant fact is, not that a witty and talented author should have selected themes like that of Foes in Law, well assured that she would thereby give pleasure to an educated and refined public—Balzac did the same—but that she should have found success in treating them so trivially, with so absolute a detachment from the struggling world, with such a convinced air that here, concealed in this frothy mixture of jealousies and afternoon tea, was the essence of life, the one thing worthy to be talked about. Matthew Arnold in his most human poem cried :

The sea of faith
Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furl'd.
But —

There is no but in the domestic novel, nor even the but sense, the vague, troubled apprehension of buts. The sea of faith, despite Matthew Arnold and all other would-be disturbers of an ancient peace, is still and glassy as that in which the infant characters paddle once a year.

Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,

which for Matthew Arnold drowned every other noise, is not heard, nor the breath

Of the night-wind down the vast edges drear
And naked shingles of the world.

Naked shingles of the world, indeed! At the first-class country-house, when the footmen by a united effort have dropped the last curtain, and instead of a cup of tea the curate has asked her for herself, there are no naked shingles of the world; only a lawn and a well-behaved moon.

Frederic Myers.

MR. FREDERIC MYERS chose Rome for his death-place. His ill-health dated from an attack of influenza some two years ago, and, though a stay abroad seemed to set him up again, and he was seen again in Cambridge, he seemed to know when he set out to pass this winter abroad that there might be no returning for him. He loved Rome, where, thirty years ago, he had written some of his fine verses. He was "Rome-sick" when away from it; and his name must be added to the strangely long list of English poets who took their last breath in Italy—Keats, Shelley, the Brownings, Walter Savage Landor, and the rest.

For it is as a poet that Frederic Myers will surely be best remembered, though as a poet he is now, perhaps, forgotten. So one might say, now that he is gone, in reading the newspaper tributes to him, as one of her late Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, and as "a writer of several prose-works, including Essays, Modern and Classical, and Science and a Future Life." Another item: "Mr. Myers married a sister of the wife of Sir Henry M. Stanley." But where is any mention made of St. Paul? To me he lived and moved and had his being as the author of the series of strenuous religious verses, pæan on pæan, which bear that name. Late in the 'sixties they caught me up into the seventh heaven. "God, who giveth joy to my youth!" says the Psalmist. Joy of our youth! The phrase increases in significance with the increasing years. The pure delight of poetry was a large element in that joy—that joy with the time-limit. A little dread was mine, therefore, when, after a quarter of a century, I came back to my St. Paul. Inconstancy to one's early poets is among the sadnesses of maturity. But St. Paul's heart-remembered antiphones had not lost their old spell. Those moving numbers moved me still. St. Paul is the speaker :

What was their sweet desire and subtle yearning
Lovers, and ladies whom their song enrolls?
Faint to the flame which in my breast is burning,
Less than the love with which I ache for souls.

How have I knelt with arms of my aspiring
Lifted all night in irresponsible air,
Dazed and amazed with overmuch desiring,
Blank with the utter agony of prayer.

Well, let me sin, but not with my consenting,
Well, let me die, but willing to be whole:
Never, O Christ—so stay me from relenting—
Shall there be truce betwixt my flesh and soul.

Lo, as some ship, outworn and overladen,
Strains for the harbour where her sails are furled,—
Lo, as some innocent and eager maiden
Leans o'er the wistful limit of the world—

So even I, and with a heart more burning,
So even I, and with a hope more sweet,
Groan for the hour, O Christ, of Thy returning,
Faint for the flaming of Thine advent feet.

The Passion of Paul has its usual complement-compassion for others :

Never a sigh of passion or of pity,
Never a wail for weakness or for wrong,
Has not its archive in the angels' city,
Finds not an echo in the endless song.

O that Thy steps among the stars might quicken!
O that Thine ears would hear when we are dumb!
Many the hearts from which the hope shall sicken,
Many shall faint before Thy Kingdom come.

The allusions to women are general and particular :

Witness the woman, of his children sweetest—
Scarcely earth seeth them, but earth shall see—
Thou in their woe Thine agony completest,
Christ, and their solitude is nigh to Thee.

The more particular allusion is to be found in the verses about Damaris, St. Paul's own convert :

Then to her temple Damaris would clamber,
High where an idol, till the dawn was done,
Bright in a light and eminent in amber,
Caught the serene surprises of the sun.

Then the strong soul which never power can pinion
Sprang with a wail into the empty air,
Thence the wide eyes upon a hushed dominion
Looked in a fierce astonishment of prayer.

These verses are taken not wholly at random, yet they are scattered links in the chain of song with which Mr. Myers made me his slave when the years were young. The very word "young" is reminiscent of him: for they recall some lighter verses of his which I first encountered, I think, in Macmillan's Magazine in the 'sixties :

Then, like a newly-singing bird,
The child's soul in her bosom stirred;
I know not what she sung;
Because the soft wind caught her hair,
Because the golden moon was fair,
Because her heart was young.

I would her sweet soul ever may
Look thus from those glad eyes and grey;
Unfearing, undefiled,
I love her: when her face I see,
Her simple presence wakes in me
The imperishable child.

W. M.

Things Seen.

Morbidity.

It was past midnight, but the deadly punctuality of the train had not faltered. Suddenly, however, it stopped near South Kensington, and I, in the solitude of my dingy compartment, looked out mechanically. I might almost have pressed my face against the featureless wall at my right. Alien from all that is domestic and comfortable, it might, for all human meaning, have been the surface of the moon. There and then, in the stillness of that sudden stoppage, I felt impelled to know what it was made of, to feel its sepulchral emanations, to unconvince myself that it was glazed with a bodiless slime.

I stretched out my hand and touched it. There was the cold of subterranean brick, nothing more. As, half-ashamed, I withdrew my hand, I saw another hand, stretched and rigid, touching as I had touched—a hand that, for one instant, I read as I have seldom read a face, a hand that I read as few have read a book.

Authority.

It was afternoon. The omnibuses, all full inside, went slowly along the sloppy streets, and every pedestrian was well-bespattered with mud. I sat outside an omnibus, on the right-hand seat behind the driver, and after a time I began to find a miserable substitute for amusement in the evident misery of all the rest of the world. Everybody was bad-tempered, and the language used by the driver whenever any occasion for eloquence arose was saddening. He ought by his looks to have been capable of real humour; as it was he was merely abusive. So we came at last to Fleet-street, and arrived at Fetter-lane. A gaunt, tall clergyman suddenly appeared on the pavement, and for one moment looked in dismay at the mud and the crowded vehicles. Then he stepped briskly into the roadway, and raised his hand. The omnibuses stopped, and he passed briskly across the street, and disappeared into the post-office. The driver looked at me over his shoulder with all his good-temper recovered. "See that?" said he.

Brown Boots.

He was young, and beautifully dressed, and obviously happy. His frock-coat was well cut, his gloves were just at the proper remove from perfect newness, and as he passed me I observed that he wore violets in his button-hole. It was pleasant to walk behind a man so clearly happy, and to try to imagine what was the nature of his delightful errand. Then I saw suddenly that his boots, though shapely and beautifully polished, were of brown leather; and I pitied him, for it was not possible to suppose him ignorant of convention. I kept pace with him, and the pity grew: he was happy as a king, and I have not said as yet that he was radiantly good-looking. I know not what brought him the revelation; but suddenly he stopped and looked half-round, and then made a dash into a cab which, happily, chanced to be crawling past him. He spoke to the driver, who turned, and drove off rapidly in the direction from which the youth had been so gaily walking.

A Scholar's Garland.

We can imagine no prettier compliment to a veteran scholar than such a collection of essays and studies on the subjects of his own predilection as Dr. Furnivall's co-workers and admirers have put together in his honour, under the title An English Miscellany (Clarendon Press).

The "Festschrift" is hardly a recognised institution in England; in France and Germany, where different, more personal and more permanent, relations prevail between the teachers and the taught at the great seats of learning, it is not infrequent. A comparatively recent example was a volume of Études Romanes, dedicated to M. Gaston Paris; and it is pleasant to observe that the great French scholar is one of the contributors to the volume before us with a valuable notice of the romance of Amadas et Idoine. Nor is he the only writer whose name testifies at once to the international character of erudition and to the esteem which Dr. Furnivall's work has won in many lands. Side by side with such representative Englishmen as Profs. York Powell, Skeat, and Ward stand M. Jussierand, also from France; Drs. Brandt, Flügel, Kluge, Köppel, and Wülker from Germany; Prof. Lozeman from Belgium; and Prof. Gummere from America. The occasion of the "Festschrift" is Dr. Furnivall's seventy-fifth birthday, and it forms part of a more extensive memorial of the event, which includes, besides personal gifts, a substantial contribution to the funds of the Early English Text Society. Nor will anyone who is acquainted with the history of English scholarship during the last forty years, or reads the bibliography of Dr. Furnivall's work which Mr. Littlehales has compiled, hesitate to declare that the honour is as deserved as it is unusual. Dr. Furnivall's own editorial labours have been both laborious and conscientious; his services to philology and literature through the Chaucer Society, the Early English Text Society, the New Shakespeare Society, can hardly be over-estimated.

Turning to the contents of the miscellany itself, we note that they form fine mixed reading, with a wide range from the Anglo-Saxon Judith to Shelley's Alastor and Ibsen's Love's Comedy. Particular attention appears to have been paid to the history of the drama, and a list of the contributions on this subject alone may serve to give some idea of the richness of the medley before us. Thus Mr. Pierce Butler writes on "The Origin of the Liturgical Drama"; Mr. W. A. Craigie on "The Gospel of Nicodemus and the York Mystery Plays"; Dr. Flügel on "Nicholas Udall's Dialogues and Interludes," M. Jussierand on "Pageants and Scaffolds Hye"; Mr. A. F. Leach on "Some English Plays and Players"; Mr. Sidney Lee on "Shakespeare and the Elizabethan Playgoer"; Prof. Lozeman on "This too, too Solid Flesh"; Mr. M. W. McCallum on "The Authorship of the Early Hamlet"; Mr. G. C. Moor Smith on "Shakespeare's King John and the Troublesome Raigne." The variety of treatment is no less interesting than that of subject. You have all sorts, from solid chunks of philological erudition to airy arts and shreds of belles-lettres. And we do not doubt that Dr. Furnivall will relish them all. Without wishing to be invidious, we may perhaps mention as among the more important and original contributions, besides some of those already named, Prof. Napier's account of "The Franks' Casket," Prof. Gummere's essay on the ballad of "The Sister's Son," and an amusing note by Mr. W. E. Mead on "Colour in the English and Scottish Ballads." Three or four writers, by the way, betake themselves to verse. We venture to quote the clever verses of Prof. Saintsbury:

G. S. TO F. J. F.

"Partes autem mere sunt quatuor: littera, litteratura, litteratus, litterate."

Partes mere sunt quatuor—Dame Grammar saith, saith she,
In Martian of the Goatlings (full quaintly writeth he!),
Littere, Litteratura, Litteratus, Litterate!

The good gray head we honour, she gave it of the four,
And the gods, to eke that blessing, they added one thing more.

So partes ejus quinque sunt, with the wielding of the oar!

Litteræ, Litteratura. Well wot ye all, I trow,
How he wrought at the speech of the kindreds, and gave us
the same to know

In a hundred goodly volumes—they face me all of a row!

Litteratus, Litterate. And not for place or pay,
But all for the fame of the English, he wrought in the English way;

And his sheaves they follow, as his wage, at the closing of the day.

With the maids a double-scutting, his water-pomp to be;
For ever he loved the water well—more well than wis(e)ly—

Men should not drink the water, save in the barley-bree!

These are the words of a Tory, a bitter beast of bale,
Who troweth in Church, and Kings, and Peers, and eke in wine and ale—

But wisheth all love and honour to him of the Furnace-
Vale!

Martin Tupper, Playwright.

It is not, of course, with the business of playwriting that the average man associates Mr. Martin Tupper. I do not know to what extent the Proverbial Philosophy is now read, but it is as the Proverbial Philosopher, and as nothing else, that Mr. Tupper is most generally remembered. Yet we know that he was, as a matter of fact, a miscellaneous as well as fertile writer. He wrote reams of verses; he wrote tales in prose—notably, The Crock of Gold, which had the questionable distinction of being dramatised by Fitzball; and he wrote other prose things, such as Rides and Reveries of the late Mr. Æsop Smith, edited by Peter Query, F.S.A., a copy of which lies before me. Moreover, Mr. Tupper also wrote plays—three plays in all, one of which had the doubtful honour of being enacted.

With a copy of this drama—entitled “Alfred: a Patriotic Play”—Mr. Tupper was so good as to present me a few years before his death. It makes a little paper-covered pamphlet of forty-four pages, and is, I suppose, a reproduction of the “prompt” copy, inasmuch as the names of the actors are set forth at the back of the title-page. In the British Museum there is a copy of “Alfred” as printed privately in 1858. From my autograph version I gather that the play was produced at the Queen’s Theatre, Manchester, in June, 1881, with no less prominent a personage than Mr. Walter Montgomery in the title part; other roles being taken by Mr. Charles Horsman, Miss Julia Seaman, and Miss Henrietta Hodson (now Mrs. Labouchere)—all people of more or less importance in their profession.

There had been plenty of stage presentments of King Alfred—from the old Latin comedy by Drury, performed in 1619, to the “Alfred the Great” of Sheridan Knowles, brought out at Drury Lane in 1831, with Macready and Miss Faucit. There had been the masque by Thomson and Mallet, the drama by O’Keefe, the tragedy by John Home, and the musical drama by Pocock, to name no others. Nevertheless, Mr. Tupper was fain to try his hand at the theme, and did so. His play is, of necessity, in the conventional five acts, but they are short ones. As no one will be surprised to hear, they are not miracles of construction.

Of the characterisation, most pains, naturally, have been bestowed upon the hero, who is first brought before us, in the mind’s eye, as a great fighting man. One of his “headmen” thus describes his prowess in the battle which has preceded the raising of the curtain:

I saw him stand
Surrounded by a jackal pack of Danes,
The very lion at bay; they crowded on,
But still he slew and slew, heaps upon heaps;

I strove to reach him, but could not get nigh;
For, wielding his red mace and battle-axe
In either hand more terribly than Thor,
Stoutly he cleft a narrow bloody lane
Right through their opposite host.

“Heaps upon heaps” is good. Mr. Tupper’s Alfred must have been a redoubtable warrior indeed. But he is, above all things, a patriot. He has no patience with the neatherd’s wife when that unworthy woman, not knowing him, cries, in his hearing: “A plague on that quarrelsome king of ourn, says I! Why can’t he be peaceably disposed with these brave newcomers, but fights and wars with the worthy gentlemen, to the ruination of all our crops?” [Observe the “early English”!] On this hint Alfred speaks:

Heaven grant me patience! Can they sink so low
And still be counted men and Englishmen—
That liberties are nothing, good laws nothing,
Religion nothing—so they may keep peace
And hatch in shame and sin their golden eggs! . . .
But no, no, no!

My People, England—thou art not as these,
My generous, noble, dear, devoted People!
Had there been only weapons in your hands
True as the hands that should have wielded them,
These fierce sea-robbers never had set foot
Upon our sacred shore.

Altogether, Alfred is portrayed as loving England more than it loves itself, and as being, indeed, in all respects, a man before his time.

Elswitha is only a shadow—the typical good wife and mother. There is more substance in the plucky Bertha and in the impressionable viking, though the latter’s rapid falling-away from his ancient faith does more credit to his impulses than to his understanding. The remaining characters are of no account.

As regards the style and diction, the quotations given above will be some guide. For the most part the writing is simple and level. And that is just as well, for when the author does drop into metaphor he is apt to be drowned in it. For instance:

Never yet
(And for a thousand years shall this be true)
Have Englishmen or England striven against
The strong incline their Alfred sloped for them!

Every now and then we come upon examples of that perfect commonplace which made the Proverbial Philosophy so popular. As:

To know aright the blessedness of plenty
A man must once have felt how hunger gnaws.

The stage directions are sometimes very elaborate, and one wonders whether they were ever fully carried out. The suggestions as to the musical illustration to be used are not without an element of humour:

The overture to be exclusively English and national music: to commence with wailing Welsh or old British tunes, then to swell into marches and military Bardism,—thereafter to change gradually into other recognised national airs; a well-wrought cento of tunes, including (for example) “The Bay of Biscay,” “Rule Britannia,” and so forth, ending with “God Save the Queen.”

For the interval between Acts I. and II., the author advises old English airs, “with, perhaps, the modern one of ‘Hard Times, Come Again no More.’” The music between Acts II. and III. “may include hints of the tunes, ‘Home, Sweet Home,’ and ‘There’s a Good Time Coming.’” Between Acts III. and IV., “Hearts of Oak”; between Acts IV. and V., “The Land, Boys, we Live In”—nothing like local colour!

In 1866 Mr. Tupper printed an historical play called “Raleigh: his Life and Death” and he was the author, further, of a drama, called “Washington,” printed at New York in 1876. On these I need not dwell. Ex uno omnes.

Correspondence.

English Rhymed Elegiacs.

SIR,—There are earlier rhymed elegiacs in English than these of Mr. Watson, which the reviewer of Sir Lewis Morris's Harvest Tide, in the ACADEMY of January 19, seems to doubt. There are Tennyson's. At the age of seventeen I also published a piece in rhymed elegiacs, when Mr. Watson, I daresay, was unborn. May I inform the lady or gentleman who asks me to round my labours with an epic that he, or she, will find one (at least, if it is not an epic, I don't know what it is) in the list of my compositions?—I am, &c.,

A. LANG.

Blue-eyed Characters.

SIR,—Why should not Rosalind's "old religious uncle" be accepted as one of the three blue-eyed characters in Shakespeare, mentioned in the ingenious questions proposed in the ACADEMY of January 5? She says he had "a blue eye and sunken"—positively. See "As you Like It," III., ii., ll. 362 and 393.—I am, &c.,

J. PIERCE.

SIR,—With reference to the paragraphs on p. 44 of your last number, I write to say that I have always understood the "blue-eyed hag," Sycorax, to be blue under the eyes.

Not long ago an article in the Globe, on the eyes of Shakespeare's characters, attracted my attention on this point. There the writer also inferred that blue was the colour of the eyes of Shakespeare's ideal lover, from Rosalind's description: "a blue eye and a sunken, which you have not."—I am, &c.,

R. W. K. EDWARDS.

The Elision of the "E."

SIR,—A question of orthography involving arguable issues occurs in consequence of the juxtaposition of two analogously-formed words in last week's ACADEMY. Philologists can doubtless shew that the spellings of "likeable" and "unmistakable" are not irreconcilable, and that the "e" is correctly elided in the one, and properly retained in the other. At the same time, the modern tendency of "clipping" exercises its effect upon all such words, whether newly-contrived or old-established; consequently a various spelling often exists. Milton, for instance, if my edition err not, has "irreconcilable," whereas above I have used its modern spelling. That there is a complete lack of uniformity in this respect among present-day writers, the random perusal of a periodical or two, sufficiently proves. Is the point, then, so debatable that it cannot be settled whether one spelling is to be regarded as old-fashioned or its alternative as more modern, and therefore correct? Not that, as in France, the language should be officially "tinkered," or its orthography modernised by decree; but let there be among literary men a uniform practice, based upon literary principles, of avoiding the inconsistency of two ways of spelling the same word.

I suppose that when "civilisation" is everywhere spelt with an "s" instead of a "z," such a consummation will at length be reached.—I am, &c.,

ERNEST H. HARRISON.

"The Blue Boy."

SIR,—I have read both letters in your columns about "The Blue Boy" from "Audax" and "Buscador." Will the latter kindly tell me all he knows about the two pictures? Apparently he knows a good deal, and can perhaps throw some light on what happened to Gainsboro's picture or pictures between 1770 and 1802. That period of thirty years seems to be involved in darkness as to the resting-place or fate of two works of art by a famous master.—I am, &c.,

CARO MORGAN.

Shakespearean Americanism.

SIR,—In your issue of the 12th inst., a correspondent quotes Shakespeare's

Yet this shall I ne'er know, but live in doubt,
Till my bad angel fire my good one out, to show that Mr. Stephen Phillips has sinned in exceptionally good company in making use of what (according to your reviewer's judgment) is an "unintended Americanism" in Herod.

This particular quotation has done yeoman service to Americanism apologists, and has become quite a venerable "philological jocosity." The exact sense in which Shakespeare used the phrase can, however, be more clearly understood by referring to "King Lear," Act V., scene 3:

He that parts us shall bring a brand from heaven
And fire us hence like foxes.

—I am, &c.,

JUAN W. P. CHAMBERLIN.

Rice, Rice!

SIR,—In last Saturday's ACADEMY you credit me with including in the menu supplied by Perdita for the sheep-shearers a commodity called "rice." As this is rather a reflection both on Perdita and her guests, allow me to say that the article referred to was rice.—I am, &c.,

G. S.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 70 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best first and last sentences of an unwritten novel. We intended that only two sentences should be written; but most competitors have evidently considered that more than two were permissible if neither set exceeded fifty words. The difference is often only one of punctuation, and we have decided to disqualify no competitor who has not exceeded the limit of words. We award the prize to Mr. Eyre Hussey, 3, Prince's-square, W.

Humpty Dumpty sat on a wall, and don't you forget it, Norah, nor what happened to him subsequently. I daresay the fall will come; it usually does; but that great big heart of yours—so much too big for your theories—will keep watch over your natural womanhood, never fear."

There was silence, just that bar's rest which enables the tendrils of a chord to clasp the soul of a listener. "How true my words were," he said; "I knew that the rugged exterior—the reef of quartz—" "Would have its pints." Her white hand closed his lips.

Other sentences received are as follows:

After twenty years' experience of herself and of life generally, Betty decided Betty's influence over the world to be stronger than the world's influence over Betty, and the idea of reforming an indefinite and unlocated but a needy and grateful portion of the inhabited earth, appeared no very appalling task.

The sins she had thought to rebuke, she had sinned; the mercy she had dreamed to give, she had received; the courage she had burnt to inspire, she had lacked; and though the future should bring other joys, she could never realise the blessedness of work well done.

[K. J., Leeds.]

Millicent, Countess D'Orgueil, sat alone amidst her priceless Sèvres vases, her Louis Quinze furniture, her cinque-cento medallions, and her various articles of virtu: a little sad in the midst of all the Sardanapalian splendour by which she was surrounded—a little dissatisfied with the emptiness and objectlessness of modern life.

It is the old story of the two islands in the Munster lake. At first we think we shall never tire of our own island because death cannot enter it, but more and more we yearn for the other shore. How reposeful its aspect! We are ready to embark.

[A. G., Cheltenham.]

The church was crowded; the familiar question, beginning "Wilt thou have this man?" had just been asked when I was startled by Dick muttering, "By Jingo!" the bride had faced her companion, making a superb, sweeping courtesy, then, turning, she passed into the vestry, leaving both clergy and congregation petrified.

Ten years have passed, but only to-day have I understood why Veronica did not marry Sir John Stuart, and I am glad she didn't, for Dick is now one of the happiest men in the world.

[M. G. C., Ealing.]

The man and woman trudged silently along the grey, paved street, bordering the sluggish, brown waters of the canal; dusk was falling and the lamps threw their sickly light on the bride's delicate face, over which a tense, miserable expression was stealing, and on the man's set look of triumphant possession.

Jem's face expressed nothing: Susan's habitual bold stare was tempered with triumph, and fierce exultation filled his mother's heart as she drew the sheet over the white face, and the poor prettiness unkind life had done her best to destroy, kinder death had already partially replaced.

[M. W. J., Manchester.]

"High ideal!" said his wife, scornfully. "Low reality, you mean! I've nothing a handsome woman ought to have—thanks to your 'high ideal.' But money and pleasure I will have. Abrahams wants comic operas—compose them! If not, I'll go on the stage. I mean it! Abrahams would have me!"

"German paper, Arthur! Can't stay—dear Lady Jane's carriage waiting. Isn't she sweet?"

The door banged. Wearily opening the paper, he read of the immense success of Oppenheim's new opera—"an immortal work."

Oppenheim—fellow-student—and his inferior! With a heart-breaking sigh, his head sunk into his hands.

[W. S. B., London.]

"Why did you do it?" asked Edgar, his yellow moustache twitching with rage, as he looked fiercely into Oswald's eyes: the kindly eyes of Oswald, whom none could have thought capable of the "it" which had been "done." "Why, why did you do it?"

And Edgar, leaning from the window of his chambers, saw Oswald crossing the Walk; his step was brisk and alert; and from the steps of the library opposite a slender form came blithely towards him; and Edgar turned and sighed: "Yes, that is why he did it."

[A. T., Italy.]

"That is your last word?" Wynyard said slowly, "the happiness of both our lives to be sacrificed to . . . My God! if it is a question of honour I ought to answer for that. I made the mistake . . . thirteen years ago. But it is not too late; yet, if . . . Oh, Barbara!"

Barbara listened in passionate pity and remorse. They were united—she with youth and beauty, Emily in faded middle age—by their love for this man whom each had unconsciously injured. To her crude, girlish conception of loyalty and honour, three lives had been sacrificed, and, tragic futility! sacrificed in vain.

[L. G., Reigate.]

As a devout believer in the infallibility of youth and Divine right of love, I readily urged the unworldly course when bidden to a family consultation upon my friend Athalie's engagement, the which having happened away from home, I was the more inclined to impute desirableness to the affair.

Although Athalie's reticence is something finer than the mere shame of owning a mistake, I have my idea that, for all her fortitude, I shall yet hear from her one great involuntary comment upon her life, and I wonder if then she will blame anybody, and whom, and how much.

[G. W., London.]

Had we asked for the most conventional opening and closing sentences of an unwritten novel, we think we should have divided the prize equally between the senders of the following:

On a calm evening in the July of 1812, when the shadows were long on the grass, and the insects were dancing like gold-dust in the rays of the departing sun, a solitary horseman appeared upon the brow of the hill that shelters the quiet little village of Eastslope.

At such times the voice of the good Vicar would come upon him with a message of great comfort; he would smell the flowers again, and hear the words, beautiful in memory: "The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away: blessed be the name of the Lord!"

[H. A. M., London.]

On the edge of a Cornish moorland, hard by a lazy fern-embowered little stream, there is an old broken-down stile, from which, passing across two cornfields, a path leads to a small farmhouse.

"It was just here," he said, "that I first saw you, as you came across the corn-fields towards me, with the sunlight upon your hair, and love's message in your eyes."

[F. W. S., London.]

Alone, in a vast wilderness of undulating snow, stood the grim ancestral home of the Vanderoffs—one of Russia's noblest families.

Then, standing hand-in-hand at the open casement, they heard the bells of St. Isaac's peal forth their sweet melody; awakening them from their dream to the life of happiness and love before them.

[E. V. W., Birmingham.]

"Why is the sky not bluer, and the sun more radiant? My heart is singing a glad, glad tune, but the lark is trilling so sadly! Has not my love promised me her heart of hearts, and should not all the world rejoice! Ah, Love!"

The sun's rays burn me; the sky's blue mocks me; and the song of the birds clashes inharmoniously with my heart's sad cry—"My Love has flown away to the Angels. Hush!"

[I. R., Cornwall.]

Far from the haunts of men lies Grasdene, an ocean-rocked village, with its old church and glistening white cottages. Where in spring the apple-blossoms bloom in all their glory, and where violets grow, but none sweeter than those on one lonely grave in Grasdene Churchyard.

And now my tale is told. It is no morbid tragedy, no thrilling romance. Simply the story of an old-world village, whose heroine sleeps in peace in "God's Acre." All her sorrows are over; nothing breaks the stillness but the music of the sobbing waves "making their moan."

[G. H., Didsbury.]

This is the chronicle of an ancient but beautiful lady, who already oversteps her threescore and ten, telling how she outwitted her phalanx of relatives, and set up a kingdom of her own; and faith! it has as much matter to it as any love-story in the world.

And Madam is near a hundred now, and plays her mad pranks by the fireside, with unabated twinkles, only rarely remembering her one defeat, and murmuring with much hauteur—and a tear or two—"I'm going home in a few days," whereat we chorus, "Oh gran' moth, not yet—please!"

[E. R., London.]

Sentences also received from: E. U., London; J. D. W., London; G. C. P., Chelsea; R. W., Brighton; J. B. N., York; C. F. K., Eccles; R. M., Brighton; J. C. H., London; M. H. I. N., London; P. C. F., Cambridge; M. F., London; E. B., London; R. O. S., Kennington; K. M., London; O. W., Surrey; S. M. S., London; F. L. A., Ealing; Mrs. C., London; A. E. W.; E. L., Didsbury; J. R. C., Cambridge; A. M.; G. W., London; L. E. I., Ashby-de-la-Zouch; T. C., Buxted; H. A. D., London; E. A., Wangford; A. S. H., Dalkeith.

Competition No. 71 (New Series).

In our "Literary Week" columns will be found a passage from "The Library" of George Crabbe. We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best set of lines, in the same style, on some domestic incident or object, such as "The Sofa," "The Postman's Knock," "A Noise in the Night," &c. &c.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, January 30. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—The FEBRUARY CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW RE-MAINERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. BARR & SON, Library Department, 186, Strand, London, W.C.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 3 IN PREPARATION.
CATALOGUE No. 1, 1s., and CATALOGUE No. 2, 2s. 6d.,
May be had on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.
A Large Collection of Fifteenth and Sixteenth Century Books on view.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

BOOKS, RARE and OUT-OF-PRINT, SUPPLIED.—State wants. CATALOGUES free. Libraries and Small Parcels Purchased for Cash. WANTED, Gardiner's HISTORY, 2 vols., 1823.—HOLLAND CO., Book Merchants, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each offered for Ackermann's Cambridge, 2 vols., 1815; Ferguson's Serpent Worship, 1873; Carmen Seculare; an Ode (Macmillan), 1887; Shelley's St. Irvyn, 1811; Prior's Poems, 1797; Lamb's John Woodvil, 1822; Keat's Poems, 1817.—BAKERS, Great Bookshop, Birmingham.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

GRAHAM'S TYPE-WRITING OFFICE,
23, COCKSPUR STREET, PAUL MALL.—All kinds of difficult MSS. receive careful attention from experienced workers. Specimen page and references sent if desired. Over five years' experience.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

This week's issue of
THE LADIES' FIELD IS A MEMORIAL NUMBER
To our beloved Queen Victoria,
AND IS PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED WITH PHOTOGRAPHS and SKETCHES
Taken at various ages and during important periods of her life.
In addition, there are reproductions of famous Historical Pictures, and several special Articles, including—
A TRIBUTE, by Lady JEUNE; THE QUEEN as an ARTIST, by W. H. WHITLEY. Illustrated with Sketches executed by Her Majesty; and THE QUEEN as a HORSEWOMAN. Illustrated.

The number includes a BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED SUPPLEMENT, with Memoir of the Queen, and our special Fashions Artists contribute some exclusive designs for Mourning Toilettes.

100 beautifully printed pages of Art Paper, with upwards of 100 illustrations. Price 1s.

This superb number cannot be reprinted, and is already nearly sold out.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., Southampton Street, Strand.

ROYAL INSTITUTION of GREAT BRITAIN, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

THE LECTURES WILL BE RESUMED NEXT WEEK.

TUESDAY NEXT, February 5, at 3 o'clock, Professor J. A. EWING, M.A., F.R.S., M. Inst. C.E., THIRD LECTURE on "PRACTICAL MECHANICS" (Experimentally Treated): First Principles and Modern Illustrations.

WEDNESDAY, February 6, at 3 o'clock, Professor R. K. DOUGLAS, SECOND LECTURE on "THE GOVERNMENT and PEOPLE of CHINA."

THURSDAY, February 7, at 3 o'clock, The Rev. HENRY GREY GRAHAM (Author of "Social Life of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century") FIRST of THREE LECTURES on "SOCIETY in FRANCE before the REVOLUTION." Half-a-Guinea the Course.

FRIDAY, February 8, at 3 o'clock, The Rev. HENRY GREY GRAHAM, SECOND LECTURE on "SOCIETY in FRANCE before the REVOLUTION." Half-a-Guinea the Course.

FRIDAY, February 8, at 9 o'clock, Professor G. H. BRYAN, Sc.D., F.R.S., on "HISTORY and PROGRESS of AERIAL LOCOMOTION."

THE Rev. WILLIAM C. STEWART, LL.B., LECTURES on HISTORY and LITERATURE, and gives LESSONS in ELUCIDATION and in COMPOSITION (Orally or by Correspondence).—7, Spencer Road, Wandsworth Common.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

WHAT D'YE LACK?

Ask Miss MILLARD, of Teddington, Middlesex, for any Book ever issued since the advent of printing (however rare or plentiful) up to the very last work published; also for any curio or object of interest under the canopy of heaven, for she prides herself on being enabled, nine times out of ten, to supply these wants. She has the largest assemblage of Miscellaneous Bijouterie in the world, and is always a ready, willing, and liberal buyer for prompt cash.

JUST BEYOND THE LIMITATION.

The Hon. C. H. DAVIS, M.D., Ph.D., President of the Board of Education, Connecticut, U.S.A., writes: "Through my bookseller you have before supplied my wants," adding, "I have perfect confidence that if I desired the tablets upon which Moses wrote the Commandments you could procure them for me."

Miss MILLARD and her Staff have a perfect relish for difficulties. Address Teddington, Middlesex.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 1024. — FEBRUARY, 1901. — 2s. 6d.

THE CAPTIVITY OF THE PROFESSOR. By A. LINCOLN GREEN. — CRICKET REFORM. — MALADMINISTRATION OF MESSES. By COLONEL H. KNOLLYS. — A DOUBLE BUGGY AT LAHEY'S CREEK. By HENRY LAWSON. — MY HOUSE IN THE WEST INDIES. — ERISKAY AND PRINCE CHARLES. SOME UNWRITTEN MEMOIRS OF THE '45. By A. GOODRICH-FREER. — DOOM CASTLE: A ROMANCE. By NEIL MUNRO. CHAPS. XVI. XIX. — MUSINGS WITHOUT METHOD: THE RETURN OF LORD ROBERTS. — THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE CROWD. — AUSTRALIAN FEDERATION. — THE PLACE OF FRENCH AND GERMAN IN OUR EDUCATION. — THE EXCLUSIVENESS OF UNIVERSITIES. — A MASTERPIECE OF SCHOLARSHIP. — LAND PURCHASE. — FOREIGN UNDESIRABLES. — QUEEN VICTORIA. "MOST GREATLY LIVED, THIS STAR OF ENGLAND."

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

NEXT WEEK.

QUEEN VICTORIA

SCENES FROM HER LIFE AND REIGN.

By G. A. HENTY.

Fully Illustrated. Paper, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

London: BLACKIE & SON, LIMITED, Old Bailey.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER.

No. 288. — FEBRUARY, 1901.

AN EPITAPH.
VICTORIA the GOOD: a Sonnet. By Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B., K.C.V.O.
LAST MONTH—THE QUEEN. By Sir WEMYSS REID.
MY WAYS and DAYS in EUROPE and in INDIA. By His Highness the MAHARAJAH GAEKWAR of BARODA, G.C.S.I.
THE ECONOMIC OUTLOOK in the TRANSVAAL. By ARTHUR B. MARKHAM, M.P.
CLEARING NATAL. By L. OPPENHEIM.
SHAM versus REAL HOME DEFENCE. By Colonel LONSDALE HALE.
OUR ABSURD SYSTEM OF PUNISHING CRIME. By ROBERT ANDERSON, C.B., LL.D. (Assistant Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis).
A PLEA for the SOUL of the IRISH PEOPLE. By GEORGE MOORE.
THE ROMAN CATHOLIC DOCTRINE of INDULGENCES. By HERBERT PAUL.
"PI-PA-KI, or SAN-POU-TSUNG." By Professor HUTCHINSON MACAULAY FORBES, LL.D.
THE HIGHER GRADE BOARD SCHOOLS. By Sir JOSHUA FITCH.
WHAT WERE THE CHERUBIM? By the Rev. Dr. A. SMYTHE PALMER.
OFFICIAL OBSTRUCTION of ELECTRIC PROGRESS. By Professor J. A. FLEMING, D.Sc., F.R.S.
"THE SOURCES of ISLAM." (A Letter to the Editor.) By the Rev. W. St. CLAIR-TINDALL.
THE QUESTION of the NATIVE RACES in SOUTH AFRICA. By JOHN MACDONELL, C.B.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

LONDON LIBRARY, St. James's Square, S.W.

President—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P.; HERBERT SPENCER, Esq.;

The Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P., D.C.L.

Trustees—Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S.; Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBERY, K.G.;

Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I.

Committee—Rev. Canon AINGER; J. H. BRIDGES, Esq.; Professor LEWIS CAMPBELL; J. W. COURTHOPE, Esq., C.B.; EARL of CREWE; AUSTIN DOBSON, Esq.; SYDNEY GEDGE, Esq.; Sir A. GRIFFIE, F.R.S.; Sir R. GIFFEN, K.C.B., F.R.S.; EDMUND GOSSE, Esq., LL.D.; Mrs. J. R. GREEN; FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.; Sir C. P. LEBERT, K.C.S.I.; Sir C. M. KENNEDY, C.B., K.C.M.G.; SYDNEY LEE, Esq.; W. S. LILLY, Esq.; SIDNEY J. LOW, Esq.; FRANK T. MARZIALS, Esq.; Sir F. POLLOCK, Bart.; Rev. Rigg, D.D.; N. ARTHUR STRONG, Esq.; H. R. TEDDER, Esq.; Sir SPENCER WALPOLE, K.C.B.; A. W. WARD, Litt.D.

The Library contains about 200,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year; Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room open from Ten to Half-past Six. CATALOGUE, FIFTH EDITION, 2 vols., 1888, royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 18s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

JUST PUBLISHED.
A BOOK OF THE DAY.
THE CHURCH AND NEW CENTURY PROBLEMS.

By the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of DURHAM, the Revs. Canon SCOTT HOLLAND, Canon GORE, Canon BARNETT, A. CHANDLER, T. C. FRY, A. L. LILLEY, and P. DEARMER.

With Preface and Introduction by W. J. HOCKING, Vicar of All Saints', Tufnell Park.
Now ready, crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE GOBLIN: a Novel.

By CATHERINE S. and FLORENCE FOSTER.

Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

"Thoroughly wholesome and enjoyable, and well written."—Athenæum.
"This is a clever and diverting novel, crowded with what are called 'character sketches' of life in the country among the upper circles. The talent displayed is everywhere fresh and plentiful."—Academy.
The dialogues in this book are extremely clever, and it is well worth reading through from the first page to the last."—School Guardian.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

SPIRITUAL LETTERS of
the Rev. J. P. F. DAVIDSON,

Late Vicar of St. Matthias, Earl's Court.

WITH SHORT MEMOIR.

By his Son, ARTHUR F. DAVIDSON.

Crown 8vo, with Portrait, cloth boards, 6s.

The SECOND EDITION is already almost exhausted, but a THIRD will be ready shortly.

"These are the letters, and the record of the life of a good man, which many will be glad to possess," Church Times.

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

THE POWER OF WOMANHOOD; Or, MOTHERS AND SONS.

A Book for Parents and those in Loco Parentis.

By ELLICE HOPKINS.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

"It is a sincere and useful appeal for seriously meeting a great problem."—Literature.
"This volume is written with an earnestness and seriousness which must command respect, and the delicacy and moral sincerity with which a difficult subject is treated will appeal even to the most sensitive of minds. In dealing with education and the formation of character the authoress writes much that is of value."—Glasgow Herald.

London: WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & CO., 3, Paternoster Buildings, E.C., and 44, Victoria Street, S.W.

DEDICATED by PERMISSION to HER LATE MAJESTY
QUEEN VICTORIA.

THE ROYAL HOUSEHOLD.

By W. A. LINDSAY, Q.C.

(WINDSOR HERALD).

Price 25s. net.

This work is at present especially interesting, as it contains a record of all those in waiting from 1837 to 1897, and a reprint of the principal ceremonials as published in the London Gazette, some of which are now unobtainable.

THE ENGLISH REGALIA.

By CYRIL DAVENPORT, F.S.A.

With 12 Colour Plates by W. GRIGGS, and numerous Illustrations in the Text.

Only 500 Copies Printed.

Royal 4to, 21s. net.

London: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., LTD., Charing Cross Road, W.C.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE HISTORY OF THE EMPIRE
DURING THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA

Will be Narrated in upwards of 2,000 Quarto Pages, Profusely Illustrated in the CENTURY EDITION of

CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED
HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

which will be BROUGHT DOWN TO
THE PRESENT TIME.

The entire work contains upwards of 5,000 pages, and records the history of the Empire from the earliest period to the present time.

A series of SUPERB COLOURED PLATES has been prepared expressly for issue with this edition, and will form an unrivalled gallery of historical works of art.

Part I. Now on Sale, price 6d.

New Issue, in WEEKLY PARTS, price 6d. net.

Brought down to the Close of the Reign.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

The work includes a special PERSONAL MEMOIR, by Mrs. Oliphant. It is PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED throughout, and contains a series of SPLENDID REMBRANDT PHOTOGRAPHURE PLATES.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—With Part I. (ready Feb. 6) will be presented a beautiful Rembrandt Photogravure Portrait of Queen Victoria (size 17 in. by 14 in.).

Now on Sale, price 1d.

VICTORIA, QUEEN & EMPRESS
The Life Story of Britain's Greatest Ruler.

64 large pages profusely illustrated.
(Forming the Great Memorial Number of the "New Penny Magazine.")

THE BEST PERSONAL LIFE OF THE QUEEN.

JUST PUBLISHED.—3s. 6d.

QUEEN VICTORIA: A Personal Sketch.

By MRS. OLIPHANT.

With 3 Rembrandt Photogravure Plates, and 70 choice Illustrations, handsomely bound in cloth, gilt edges.

"A charmingly sympathetic and graceful account of the Queen's domestic life and personal character."
World.

JUST READY.—Bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

MICHAEL FARADAY: His Life and Work.

By Prof. SILVANUS P. THOMPSON, F.R.S.

This is a popular issue of Prof. Thompson's exceedingly interesting work published recently at 5s. It forms the First Volume of the Cheap Edition in Monthly Volumes, price 2s. 6d. each, of the celebrated CENTURY SCIENCE SERIES, Edited by Sir HENRY ROSCOE, D.C.L., F.R.S.

"The account of Faraday's researches is admirably rendered."—Nature.

"Prof. Thompson gives us a most fascinating sketch, and his book will help to deepen the interest in a character almost unique in the annals of Science."
Knowledge.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, London;
and all Booksellers.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1500. Established 1869.

2 February, 1901.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper]

The Literary Week.

WHO is to write the biography of Queen Victoria with the intimate knowledge possessed by Sir Theodore Martin when he performed that service to the memory of the Prince Consort? There are already between forty and fifty books in existence which purport to describe the life of her Majesty. But some more authoritative work will be called for. In his eighty-fifth year Sir Theodore Martin can hardly be expected to assume the task. There may possibly be substance in the rumour that the present Duke of Argyll will be the biographer. As the late Queen's son-in-law he has knowledge, and will exercise discretion.

MANY other biographies of the Queen, by authors who have gathered their material from sources open to all the world, are being prepared. We understand that at least twenty such works may be expected. But the most important will be a cheap edition of the sumptuous Life of Queen Victoria by Mr. Richard R. Holmes, which was issued by Messrs. Goupil in 1897. The whole of the text, except the last chapter, was read and approved by the Queen. The new edition will be issued by Messrs. Longmans this month.

As an author Queen Victoria enjoyed a privilege accorded to none of her subjects. The copyright in the books of the reigning monarch is perpetual. It is not often that English sovereigns have been able to take advantage of this unique privilege.

ARRANGEMENTS have been made for the publication of a Life of the late Bishop of London. It will be written by Mrs. Creighton, who will be much obliged if any persons who have letters from the Bishop will kindly lend them to her. If they are forwarded to Mrs. Creighton at Fulham Palace, she will return them in due course. Bishop Creighton had many occasional correspondents who wrote to him seeking advice or information on many subjects, and it is hoped that letters may be forthcoming from this source as well as from the Bishop's regular correspondents. A volume of Essays and Addresses on literary subjects, a volume on Church affairs, and a volume of Sermons will probably also be issued.

LAST October the editor of the American Book World offered a prize of ten dollars for the best sonnet on America. One Mr. C. H. Woodward has the ten dollars. But we fear the editor has not acquired a sonnet. The laws of the sonnet are as severe as those of Bridge, and Mr. Woodward has broken most of them. As we cannot quote the whole, we will admit there are fourteen lines, and there, at least, the author is right. Thus he begins:

America! Not wielder of a power to wrong,
But ruler of a strength to right;
Thy force almighty, calm, uplifting, yet unseen;
Thy ways are sentinelled by Peace;
Thy progress heralded by Truth.

So we jolt, looking for the sweet consolation of alternating rhymes, and finding none. Mr. Woodward may at least be congratulated on the leniency—or was it the somnolence?—of his judge.

MESSRS. METHUEN & Co. have just issued—in the well-known green cloth covers—a new edition of Stevenson's Letters. Several minor errors and misprints have been corrected, and three new letters have been added—to Mr. Austin Dobson, to Mr. Kipling, and to Mr. Meredith. In the letter to Mr. Dobson there is a charming passage wherein Stevenson imagines the kind of poetical country administered by the author of Eighteenth Century Vignettes:—

I seem to see a half-suburban land; a land of holly-hocks and country houses; a land where at night, in thorny and sequestered bypaths, you will meet masqueraders going to a ball in their sedans, and the rector steering homeward by the light of his lantern; a land of the windmill, and the west wind, and the flowering hawthorn with a little scented letter in the hollow of its trunk, and the kites flying over all in the season of kites, and the far away blue spires of a cathedral city.

The letter to Mr. Meredith is more personal, and finds Stevenson sad and introspective. The date is 1893, the year before his death:

For fourteen years I have not had a day's real health; I have wakened sick and gone to bed weary; and I have done my work unflinchingly. I have written in bed, and written out of it, written in hemorrhages, written in sickness, written torn by coughing, written when my head swam for weakness; and for so long, it seems to me I have won my wager and recovered my glove. I am better now, have been, rightly speaking, since first I came to the Pacific; and still, few are the days when I am not in some physical distress. And the battle goes on—ill or well, is a trifle; so as it goes. I was made for a contest, and the Powers have so willed that my battlefield should be this dingy, inglorious one of the bed and the physic bottle. At least I have not failed. but I would have preferred a place of trumpetings and the open air over my head.

Life and Beauty is the gay title of a little magazine which has tripped along to its ninth number. In this number it prints the answers of various eminent people who have been asked what they eat and drink to keep them alive and beautiful. Confucius, as will be learned by reference to a review on another page, "was never without ginger when he ate." But then Confucius, for all his care, is dead. Mr. Benjamin Swift, on the other hand, is alive. He never eats onions. Mr. Robert Hichens still lives, but is despondent. "Almost everything has disagreed with me at one time or another," he complains. "I find almost everything that I am really fond of disastrous to my health. I have tried vegetarianism in a monastery in Africa and found it most dangerous to internal comfort. How Mr. Shaw can be so witty on boiled cabbage and lentils I can't imagine." Mr. Hichens despairs of being free from indigestion until he ceases from eating and drinking. Miss Violet Hunt thinks that a diet of porridge darkens the eyes. So that porridge cannot be considered particularly useful to the writer. Mr. Arthur Morrison eats and drinks everything but tea. Miss Lena Ashwell prefers burgundy.

THE poets are paying their tribute to Queen Victoria in ample measure. Little of the verse which has flooded the papers is likely to survive the week. But Mr. Thomas Hardy's lines, published in the Times, have a dignity that should preserve them :

V.R.—1819-1901.

A REVERIE.

Moments the mightiest pass uncalendared ;
And when the Absolute
In Time agone outgave the deedful word,
Whereby all life is stirred :
" Let one be born and throned whose mould shall constitute The norm of every royal-rated attribute,"
No mortal knew or heard.
But in due days the purposed Life outshone,
Serene, sagacious, free ;
Its fourscore cycles beamed with deeds well done,
And the world's heart was won. . . .
Yet may the deed of hers most bright in eyes to be Lie hid from ours—as in the All-One's thought lay she—
Till ripening years have run.

YOUNGER poets twitter in the February number of the Thrush. We are assured in advance that several poems relating to the national sorrow will appear, " many of them by busy journalists." It is not clear why a journalist who is busy should write better verses than a man of leisure. But the author of Ad Astra, which was so splendidly advertised, should be able to combine his own business with the pleasure of his readers. The author of " Father O'Flynn," too, makes a reappearance with an elegy from Ireland, called " Erin's Adieu." Sixty of the late Queen's direct descendants are to receive a special edition of the Thrush.

POPE LEO has a happy knack of versification. Moreover, he is happy in his translator, Mr. Francis Thompson, who, in the current number of the Tablet, publishes his rendering of the Pope's Ode to the Nineteenth Century. That the Pope should look with unstinted approval on a generation which curbed the temporal power of the Papacy and bowed down to the doctrine of evolution is hardly to be expected.

. . . dirum in arcem Vaticanam
Mille dolis initum duellum is Pope Leo's allusion to the founding of United Italy. The following stanza sums up with admirable neatness the attitude of the Catholic Church towards Darwin and those who follow him :

Nostrae supernam gentis originem
Fastidit excors : dissociabilem,
Umbras inanes mente captans,
Stirpem hominum pecudumque miscet.

Which Mr. Thompson renders thus :

The heavenly origin of our human race,
Senseless, they scorn against ; and would abase
—Their minds with empty shadows pleased—
The strain of man to beast.

There is a pathos in the final stanza of the Pontiff's ode, a pathos which the translator preserves in a rendering astonishingly literal, yet not bald :

Cursum peregi, lustraque his novem,
Te dante, vixi. Tu cumulum adiace ;
Fac, quæso, ne incassum precantis
Vota tui recidant Leonis.

My course is run, I twice nine lustres have (So Thou hast willed it) seen. Grant now the grave :
Suff'r Thy Leo's prayers obtain
That he pray not in vain.

EVERYONE who has written verses at all, it has been said, has made at least one translation from Heine. For Heine looks easy ; whereas, indeed, he is very difficult. He has a simplicity which generally loses its flavour when decanted into English, and appears childish. From Miss Ethel Colburn Mayne we have received a rendering of three well-known poems of Heine which strike the right note :

I.

The lovely wishes blossom,
And wither then and die,
And blossom again, and wither—
And so, till life's gone by.
I know it, and it troubles
For me all love and rest !
My heart is so wise and witty,
And bleeding to death in my breast.

II.

When, in passing by, you touch me
With the waving of your gown,
All my heart in joy uprises,
Tracks you madly up and down.
Then, you turn and look upon me
With your lovely eyes so wide ;
And my heart is, oh ! so frightened
That it dares not leave my side !

III.

I love a flower, I know, but know not which it is,
And that is pain to me ;
I peer into each flower, because it may be this—
This heart for me.

The flowers breathe out their sweets into the evening sleep ;
The nightingale is singing strong ;
I seek the heart I want, the heart like mine so deep,
So deep and strong.

The nightingale sings on, and I am learning fast
His lovely song so wild :
It means, we're both so lost, we're both so lost at last,
So lost and wild.

DR. JOSEPH WRIGHT, who for ten years has been deputy-professor of Comparative Philology at Oxford, has been elected to succeed the late Prof. Max Müller. Though only six-and-forty, Dr. Wright has already a perfectly staggering record of work. Before he was brought to Oxford by Prof. Max Müller, he had spent half-a-dozen years at Heidelberg and Leipzig, obtained the degree of Ph.D., and published his translation of the first volume of Brugmann's Grundriss der vergleichenden Grammatik der indogermanischen Sprachen. Since then he has issued various primers of High German and Gothic. But it is in the study of English dialects that Dr. Wright is going to base his fame. He began with a Grammar of his native dialect of Windhill. Then, in 1895, he set about his great work, The English Dialect Dictionary, which he is issuing at his own expense. The two volumes which have already appeared contain nearly forty thousand words, illustrated by nearly a hundred thousand quotations. With Dr. Wright's amazing industry it is expected that the whole of the six volumes will be ready within five years.

In the course of his study of current speech, Dr. Wright has adopted the simple device of bringing the phonograph to the aid of philology. He is collecting phonographic specimens of English dialects in order to preserve a faithful record of the language as variously spoken at the end of the nineteenth century. So the historical novelist of the twenty-first century will have to be careful.

THE protest of Sir James Fergusson in the Spectator, and before that in the Scotsman, against the alleged libel upon his great-great-grandfather, Lord Kilkerran, in Mr. Neil Munro's "Doom Castle," now running in Blackwood, is answered with humour and point in last week's issue of the Scottish Church journal, St. Andrew, which contains week by week an unsigned literary article, headed "Books and Bookmen." Lord Kilkerran concurred in the judicial murder of "James of the Glens," at Inverary, in 1752, of which incident R. L. Stevenson remarked that Argyll, who presided over a jury of his own clansmen, had murdered the accused as surely as if he had stalked him with a fowling-piece. Mr. Munro's offence, in the eyes of Kilkerran's pious descendant, lies, however, in his attribution to that justiciar of the generous taste for port wine and sculduddery, common to most Lords of Session in the eighteenth century; and secondly, in the use of a license in depicting real people which Sir Walter Scott never permitted himself. It is on this latter point that the writer in St. Andrew, who "hopes Mr. Munro is contrite," and who admits an intimate knowledge of him, disposes most effectually of Sir James Fergusson's protest:

Sir James Fergusson apparently labours under the delusion that Sir Walter Scott "gave cleverly fancied names to his typical characters." As one closely associated with the Clan Macgregor, I may be permitted to remind him that when Rob Roy had been little more than eighty years in his grave, the author of the Waverley Novels hurt the feelings of our family very much by depicting our eminent ancestor as a person of low and dishonest habits. The reputation which Sir Walter Scott gave to Mr. Macgregor (who was extensively engaged in the cattle trade) was utterly out of accordance with the deceased gentleman's character as it was understood by his immediate relatives and friends, who were surely the best qualified to judge what manner of man he was.

The Fiery Cross—"Crisis Tara"—which issues from Cockburn-street, Edinburgh, is the latest "Legitimist" journal. The platform from which the Fiery Cross is to be exhibited includes such planks as the Restoration of Princess Ludwig of Bavaria, the lineal representative of the Stuarts, as Queen Mary III. of Scotland and IV. of England, France, and Ireland; of the Scottish Parliament; of the Royal and National Mint; of the Privy Council and Court of Admiralty; of the Scottish Coinage and the Stone of Destiny, "audaciously stolen from Scone Palace by Edward I. in 1297." These projects are supported by articles which lack neither vigour nor diplomatic blindness to inconvenient facts; and the Fiery Cross will be published "at such intervals as may seem desirable." This is a cryptic promise, leaving us in doubt whether the desires of the public or of the editor are to rule his decision.

In his preface to Three Plays for Puritans Mr. Shaw tells us that dramatic criticism broke down his health, and that then, being too weak to work, he wrote plays. Unfortunately, he does not write plays with a simple heart, and on impulse. What Mr. Shaw does is to tesselate his ideas into the form of a play, and then he takes to himself seven devils of theory and writes a preface. The preface to Three Plays for Puritans is a trying, Shawesque document of more point than weight, and of more crackle than heat. Mr. Shaw saw play after play which set out to gratify rich and poor, old and young, clever and dull people, by providing one petty type of theatrical luxury, and he asks whether this was not mad catering. Mr. Shaw says it was, and proceeds:

To interest people of divers ages, classes, and temperaments by some generally momentous subject of thought, as the politicians and preachers do, would seem to be the most obvious course in the world. And yet the theatres avoided that as a ruinous eccentricity. Their wisacres persisted in assuming that all men have the same tastes, fancies, and qualities of passion; that no two have the same interests: and that most playgoers have no interests at all. This being precisely contrary to the obvious facts, it followed that the majority of the plays produced were failures, recognisable as such before the end of the first act by the very wisacres aforementioned, who, quite incapable of understanding the lesson, would thereupon set to work to obtain and produce a play applying their theory still more strictly, with proportionately more disastrous results. The sums of money I saw thus transferred from the pockets of theatrical speculators and syndicates to those of wig-makers, costumiers, scene painters, carpenters, doorkeepers, actors, theatre landlords, and all the other people for whose exclusive benefit most London theatres seem to exist, would have kept a theatre devoted exclusively to the highest drama all the year round.

But the fact is, that no matter what plane of drama you work in, you will have success and failure. Grant that these plays were pitched on a low, a contemptible level, still they hit and missed the public taste, and made money or sank it accordingly. It would be just the same with higher plays. Some would enrich the wigmaker and the landlord and starve the author, others would enrich both. The elevation of the stage, we may be sure, is not being delayed by mere commercial stupidity on the part of managers.

We much prefer Mr. Shaw's personal statements to his fancy arguments. "I am ashamed neither of my work nor the way it is done. I like explaining its merits to the huge majority who don't know good work from bad. It does them good; and it does me good, curing me of nervousness, laziness, and snobbishness. I write prefaces as Dryden did, and treatises as Wagner, because I can; and I would give half-a-dozen of Shakespeare's plays for one of the prefaces he ought to have written. I leave the delicacies of retirement to those who are gentlemen first and literary workmen afterwards. The cart and trumpet for me." The downrightness of such passages is pleasant, and—disguises their unimportance.

THERE is one passage from the preface to Three Plays for Puritans which we think will bear detachment, and is an important clue to Mr. Shaw's real convictions and hopes concerning Drama. It is all the more interesting because it connects itself with Mr. Shaw's supposed heretical views about Shakespeare:

It does not follow that the right to criticise Shakespeare involves the power of writing better plays. And in fact—do not be surprised at my modesty—I do not profess to write better plays. The writing of practicable stage plays does not present an infinite scope to human talent; and the dramatists who magnify its difficulties are humbugs. The summit of their art has been attained again and again. No man will ever write a better tragedy than "Lear," a better comedy than "Le Festin de Pierre" or "Peer Gynt," a better opera than "Don Giovanni," a better music drama than "The Nibelung's Ring," or, for the matter of that, better fashionable plays and melodramas than are now being turned out by writers whom nobody dreams of mocking with the word immortal. It is the philosophy, the outlook on life, that changes, not the craft of the playwright. A generation that is thoroughly moralised and patriotised, that conceives virtuous indignation as spiritually nutritious, that murders the murderer and robs the thief, that grovels before all sorts of ideals, social, military, ecclesiastical, royal and divine, may be, from my point of view, steeped in error; but it need not want for as good plays as the hand of man can produce. Only, those plays will be neither written nor relished by men in whose philosophy guilt and innocence, and consequently revenge and idolatry, have no meaning. Such men must re-write all the old plays in terms of their own philosophy; and that is why, as Mr. Stuart-Glennie has pointed out, there can be no new drama without a new philosophy. To which I may add that there can be no Shakespeare or Goethe without one either, nor two Shakespeares in one philosophic epoch, since, as I have said, the first great comer in that epoch reaps the whole harvest and reduces those who come after to the rank of mere gleaners, or, worse than that, fools who go laboriously through all the motions of the reaper and binder in an empty field. What is the use of writing plays or painting frescoes if you have nothing more to say or show than was said and shown by Shakespear, Michael Angelo, and Raphael? If these had not seen things differently, for better or worse, from the dramatic poets of the Townley mysteries, or from Giotto, they could not have produced their works: no, not though their skill of pen and hand had been double what it was. After them there was no need (and need alone nerves men to face the persecution in the teeth of which new art is brought to birth) to redo the already done, until in due time, when their philosophy wore itself out, a new race of nineteenth century poets and critics, from Byron to William Morris, began, first to speak coldly of Shakespear and Raphael, and then to rediscover, in the mediæval art which these Renaissance masters had superseded, certain forgotten elements which were germinating again for the new harvest.

THE Sphere's memorial to Queen Victoria takes the form of an illustrated diary of her reign, with portraits of most of the men who have rendered it illustrious. It is a good scheme, splendidly executed. One of the most interesting things in the number is the reproduction of the Queen's first letter, written in 1825: "My dear Louis god bless you." It is signed "Vitoria." There is also a fine reproduction of Mr. Solomon J. Solomon's unfinished portrait of the Queen. With its ample page, its excellent printing, and its well-considered enterprise, the Sphere keeps the place it took at its inception in the front rank of our illustrated journalism.

THE Rev. H. R. Haweis, whose death took place very suddenly on Tuesday, was not only a remarkable and very unconventional preacher—he was all his life a prolific writer, and when one considers his frail physique and the demands of his church at Marylebone, his literary production seems enormous. For some time he was a regular contributor to the Echo, and there is scarcely a newspaper or magazine in London in which he has not signed his name. He found time, too, to edit Cassell's Magazine for a season. He wrote best upon his favourite hobby, which was music. Great musicians, old violins, and church bells gave him material for many volumes. Those who have attended his curious and sometimes startling services at St. James's, Marylebone, will remember that he occasionally illustrated his discourse by a solo upon the violin. His theory of the connexion between music and conduct was worked out in what was, perhaps, his most popular book, Music and Morals. Mr. Haweis sustained a crushing blow two years ago in the death of his wife, who was herself a well-known writer on domestic art.

Bibliographical.

It is not so very long since Robert Louis Stevenson died, and yet quite a literature has grown up around his life and work. Putting aside the two series of letters edited by Mr. Colvin, one finds that Stevenson has been the subject of no fewer than seven volumes during the last half-dozen years. Thus, in 1895, we had Prof. Walter Raleigh's little monograph; a Study of Stevenson, by Miss (or Mrs.) Alice Brown; and a book on his Home and Early Haunts, by Miss (or Mrs.) Margaret Armour. After this there was silence for three years, and then, in 1898, came The Home Country of R. L. Stevenson, by J. Geddie, The Edinburgh Days of R. L. S., by Miss (or Mrs.) Blantyre Simpson, and a monograph in the "Famous Scots" series, by Miss (or Mrs.) Margaret Moyes Black. In 1899 we had yet another monograph, by Mr. Cope Cornford, in the "Modern English Writers" series; and now we are promised R. L. S., a Life Study in Criticism, by Mr. H. Bellyse Baildon, who, it is understood, will write on the basis of a personal acquaintance with R. L. S. during his early manhood. Mr. Baildon, by the way, should not be unknown to the reading public, for he has already presented to it a book of prose called The Merry Month, &c., and a book of verse called The Rescue, &c., both of them published in 1893.

Four notable additions are about to be made to the big library of sixpenny fiction which the publishing fraternity are busily engaged in building up. The books to which I refer are Le Fanu's Uncle Silas, Ouida's Puck, Mr. Short-house's John Inglesant, and Stevenson's New Arabian Nights. I name them in the order of their original appearance. Uncle Silas dates back to 1864; it was re-issued in 1886 and 1887, and again in 1899 in two-shilling form. Its popularity of late years may owe something to the fact that it has been dramatised twice at least; of one of the versions Mr. Lawrence Irving was co-author. Puck, which came out anonymously, belongs to 1870; I am not aware that it has had any very great vogue since it was first launched upon the world. John Inglesant, as most people know, was printed privately in 1880, and issued to the public in the following year. The New Arabian Nights, of course, is the youngest of the four, as it did not come out in book shape till 1882; it was then in two volumes, and two years after it was obtainable in two cheaper editions. That four books so very different in subject and style should be coming out this season at the nimble sixpence is a tribute to the catholic tastes of the present-day novel-reader.

With reference to Mr. W. A. Dutt's promised book on Highways and Byways of East Anglia, we may be quite sure, I think, that it will be a much more elaborate and picturesque work than the opusculum which he published (at a shilling), with almost the same title, in 1899. Two other opusculum, similarly priced, stand to Mr. Dutt's credit—George Borrow in East Anglia, issued in 1896, and By Sea Marge, Marsh, and Mere, brought out in 1898. The Highways, Byways, and Waterways of East Anglia: a Collection of Prose Pastorals, was, I may note, the full title of the 1899 brochure.

It is said that we are to have a new edition of the late Henry Morley's little anthology of English verse, called The King and the Commons. This came out originally more than thirty years ago, as part and parcel (I think) of the "Bayard" series of booklets edited by Hain Friswell. The publishers of that series might do worse than reissue all the volumes that figured in it, for all were interesting, while the series as a whole no doubt suggested many that have supplanted it in public knowledge and favour.

Two books on musical subjects announced by Mr. John Murray are by American writers—Mr. W. J. Henderson and Mr. H. T. Finck. Mr. Henderson is already known in this country by his Story of Music, published by Messrs. Longman in 1889, while Mr. Finck is remembered by his Chopin, and other Musical Essays, issued by Mr. Unwin in the same year. Mr. Finck is also the author, I believe, of an elaborate work on Romantic Love and Personal Beauty—an alluring topic.

I once testified in this column to the quaint feeling which possessed me some years ago, when I read in a number of Macmillan's Magazine a new poem signed "William Wordsworth." In the February issue of the same miscellany there is, I see, a short story signed "Henry Fielding." When are we to have a new sonnet by "John Keats"?

I observe that we are to have a novel from the pen of Mr. A. R. Ropes (the "Adrian Ross" of popular "musical comedy"). This will testify at any rate to the versatility of the writer, who has already published under his own name a volume of Poems (1884) and A Sketch of the History of Europe (1889), besides doing some useful work for the Pitt Press.

Reviews.

Chinese Literature.

A History of Chinese Literature. By Herbert A. Giles.
"Short Histories of the Literatures of the World" Series.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

It is not the fault of Prof. Herbert Giles that his history of Chinese literature, the first attempt of the kind that has been made, is somewhat bewildering in the rapidity of its movement. When a writer, even a professor of Chinese in the University of Cambridge, sets out to tell, in four hundred and thirty-nine pages, the history of a literature that extends over some thousands of years, the wonder is, not that it should seem scrappy and bewildering, but that he should be able to tell it at all. Such a task would break the spirit of many men. Not so Dr. Giles's spirit. He wears his prodigious learning lightly, wending his way, on tiptoe as it were, through this labyrinth of authors, culling here and there, like a gardener picking flowers. His style is bright and easy, and not entirely academic. He can write such a sentence as: "This is how Mencius snuffed out the two heterodox philosophers." Dr. Giles is also a poet. The pages are sprinkled with his translations of Chinese versifiers. He has done for a nation what FitzGerald did for an individual. We leave to Chinese students the appraisal of the debt these Celestial poets owe to their translator.

We do not gain from his book any clear perception of the personality of these Chinese writers. Name follows name—such tongue-tripping names, hundreds of names, and they remain mere names, and little else; but gradually we become conscious of the thread that through the centuries binds sage to sage, writer to writer. They wander into by-paths, but "their common lode-star is Confucianism—elucidation of the Confucian Canon." And with the name of Confucius the western stands on dry ground. Not only was Confucius a great moral teacher, whose teaching as to the right way of living in this world, being founded on his own individual insight, and not on what another had told him, has withstood the shocks and changes of two thousand five hundred years, but he was also the founder of Chinese literature. He collected and edited documents covering a period from the twenty-fourth to the eighth century B.C. His labours resulted in the Book of History, the Book of Odes, the Book of Changes, the Book of Rites, and Spring and Autumn Annals. But no Chinaman thinks of entering upon a study of these Five Classics until he has mastered and committed to memory a shorter and simpler course known as The Four Books. The first of these is the famous Analects, from which we derive our knowledge of Confucius, born 551 years before Christ, who formulated the Golden Rule: "What you would not others should do unto you, do you not unto them."

The Tao, or Way of Confucius, was a practical system of morality for everyday use. When a disciple asked him to explain charity of heart, he answered, "Love one another." When, however, he was asked concerning the principle that good should be returned for evil, he replied: "What then will you return for good? No: return good for good; for evil justice." Wise words! Confucius never pretended to any supernatural power, but he did assert, and with modesty, that he knew the right way to live in this world—the way that leads to happiness and peace. The Chung Yung, the treatise written by his grandson, opens with the pregnant sentence: "What Heaven has confirmed is the Nature; an accordance with the nature is what is called the Path; the regulation of this path is what is called the Teaching." Confucius, Dr. Giles says, undoubtedly believed in a Power, unseen and eternal, whom he vaguely addressed as Heaven: "He who has offended against Heaven has none to whom he can pray." "I do not murmur against Heaven," and so on. His greatest commentator, however, Chu Hsi, has explained that by "Heaven" is meant "Abstract Right," and that interpretation is accepted by Confucianists at the present day. At the same time, Confucius strongly objected to discuss the supernatural, and suggested that our duties are towards the living rather than towards the dead.

The Analects give minute details of his everyday life and habits. As we read our hearts warm to the Sage across two thousand four hundred years:

Confucius, in his village, looked simple and sincere, and as if he were not able to speak. When he was in the prince's ancestral temple or in the court he spoke minutely on every point, but cautiously. . . .

He required his sleeping dress to be half as long again as his body.

He did not eat rice which had been injured by heat or damp and turned sour, nor fish or flesh which was gone. He did not eat what was discoloured, or what was of a bad flavour, nor anything which was not in season. He did not eat meat which was not cut properly, nor what was served without its proper sauce.

He was never without ginger when he ate. He did not eat much.

When eating, he did not converse. When in bed, he did not speak.

If his mat was not straight, he did not sit on it.

Ssü-ma-Ch'ien, known as the Father of History, writing four hundred years after the death of Confucius, said:

While reading the works of Confucius, I have always fancied I could see the man as he was in life; and when I went to Shantung I actually beheld his carriage, his robes, and the material parts of his ceremonial usages. There were his descendants practising the old rites in their ancestral home, and I lingered on, unable to tear myself away. Many are the princes and prophets that the world has seen in its time, glorious in life, forgotten in death. But Confucius, though only a humble member of the cotton-clothed masses, remains among us after many generations. He is the model for such as would be wise. By all, from the Son of Heaven down to the meanest student, the supremacy of his principles is fully and freely admitted. He may indeed be pronounced the divinest of men.

If we linger over the first book of Dr. Giles's history, that devoted to the Feudal Period (B.C. 600-200), over which the large, wise, personality of Confucius broods, it is because we find it hard to leave that period charged with worldly wisdom, metaphysical speculation, mysticism, and thoughts so ancient, yet intimate companions of many living to-day. Is there such a great difference between this, from Newman's Dream of Gerontius—"It is the very energy of thought that keeps thee from thy God"; and this from Chuang Tzū's Autumn Floods, written in the fourth century B.C.:

By no thoughts, by no cogitations, Tao may be known.

By resting in nothing, by according in nothing, Tao may be approached. By following nothing, by pursuing nothing, Tao may be attained.

Great as was Confucius there was another Chinese seer living in his period who has also achieved earthly immortality. That was Lao Tzū, from whom the literature of Taoism dates, "growing and flourishing alongside of, though in direct antagonism to, that which is founded upon the criteria and doctrines of Confucius." Dr. Giles does not commit himself to an explanation of the meaning of Tao. Neither did Lao Tzū himself. "Those who know do not tell; those who tell do not know" was his answer to the question. Lao Tzū taught; but the road that leads to the Way, as those who desire it know, starts from within. Much of Lao Tzū's teaching is familiar to the world, but from other lips:

Follow diligently the Way in your own heart, but make no display of it to the world.

To the good I would be good. To the not good I would also be good, in order to make them good.

Recompense injury with kindness.

Put yourself behind and you shall be put in front.

Lao Tzū had his St. Paul in Chuang Tzū, an advanced mystic who anticipated thoughts that were to find expression centuries later.

Fools think they are awake now, and flatter themselves they know if they are really princes or peasants. Confucius and you are both dreams; and I who say you are dreams—I am but a dream myself.

Again:

Once upon a time, I, Chuang Tzū, dreamt I was a butterfly, fluttering hither and thither, to all intents and purposes a butterfly. I was conscious only of following my fancies as a butterfly, and was unconscious of my individuality as a man. Suddenly, I awaked, and there I lay, myself again. Now I do not know whether I was then a man dreaming I was a butterfly, or whether I am now a butterfly dreaming I am a man.

Well may Dr. Giles speak of Chuang Tzū's chapter on "The Identity of Contraries" as "marvellous," judging from the extracts given: "From the standpoint of Tao all things are One. . . . By ignoring the distinctions of contraries we are embraced in the obliterating unity of God." Lao Tzū urged his fellow Chinamen to guard their vitality by entering into harmony with their environment. Chuang Tzū added a motive: "to pass into the realm of the Infinite and make one's final rest therein." More than a thousand years later, Ssū-K'ung, a Court official and poet, popular at court, having fallen into irremediable disgrace by dropping part of his insignia at an audience, retired to the hills, wrote a philosophical poem, and then starved himself to death through grief at the murder of the youthful Emperor. We quote one of the verses of this poem, which is "admirably adapted to exhibit the form under which pure Taoism commends itself to the mind of a cultivated scholar":

ENERGY—ABSOLUTE.

Expenditure of force leads to outward decay,
Spiritual existence means inward fulness.
Let us revert to Nothing and enter the Absolute,
Hoarding up strength for Energy.
Freighted with eternal principles,
Athwart the mighty void,
Where cloud-masses darken,
And the wind blows ceaseless around,
Beyond the range of conceptions,
Let us gain the Centre,
And there hold fast without violence,
Fed from an inexhaustible supply.

We have left ourselves small space to speak of the two thousand years of Chinese literature with which Dr. Giles deals in the remainder of his admirable history. The generations of this venerable people pass before us composing their treatises, singing their love-songs, elucidating their classics, detached and sufficient unto themselves, ignorant and contemptuous of anything the foreign devils might be doing or thinking. They went their strange way, accepting things as they were, probably quite undisturbed when, in B.C. 13, the reigning Emperor issued a decree that all existing literature was to be destroyed, with the exception of works relating to agriculture, medicine, and divination. The penalty of not surrendering their books was branding and four years' work on the Great Wall; but, fortunately, many scholars secretly defied the edict.

Poetry has always flourished in China, especially during the T'ung Dynasty, which has the honour of a collection of 48,900 poems, arranged in 900 books, and filling thirty good-sized volumes.

China's greatest poet is Li Po (A.D. 705-762). At the age of ten he wrote a "stop short" to a firefly:

Rain cannot quench thy lantern's light,
Wind makes it shine more brightly bright;
Oh why not fly to heaven afar,
And twinkle near the moon—a star?

Li Po died by drowning, through trying to embrace the reflection of the moon when drunk. His control of the "stop-short," we are told, is considered to be perfect. Here is another:

The birds have all flown to their roost in the tree,
The last cloud has just floated lazily by;
But we never tire of each other, not we,
As we sit there together,—the mountains and I.

The Chinese consider suggestion to be the essence of poetry. Here, again, Li Po is regarded as the Laureate. This is often quoted as a model in its own particular line:

A tortoise I see
on a lotus-flower resting:
A bird 'mid the reeds
and the rushes is nesting;
A light skiff propelled by some boatman's fair daughter,
Whose song dies away
o'er the fast-flowing water.

Again we must, perforce, skip a few centuries, for the Chinese novel beckons, if it does not allure. They range their fiction under four heads, dealing with (1) usurpation and plotting, (2) love and intrigue, (3) superstition, (4) brigandage. The highest point of development reached by the Chinese novel is to be found in the work called The Dream of the Red Chamber. As might be expected in a country where so many things are done on the Alice-in-Wonderland principle, the name of the author is unknown. It is published in twenty-four volumes octavo, and 400 characters meander through its pages. Novels and stories, we may add, are not classed in China as literature. Neither are the popular collections of wit and humour. Mr. Dan Leno might have invented this:

A man asked a friend to stay and have tea. Unfortunately there was no tea in the house, so a servant was sent to borrow some. Before the latter had returned the water was already boiling, and it became necessary to pour in more cold water. This happened several times, and at length the boiler was overflowing, but no tea had come. Then the man's wife said to her husband, "As we don't seem likely to get any tea, you had better offer your friend a bath!"

And this might have come from a civilian on the military staff of a weekly paper:

A general was hard pressed in battle and on the point of giving way, when suddenly a spirit soldier came to his rescue and enabled him to win a great victory. Prostrating himself on the ground, he asked the spirit's name. "I am the God of the Target," replied the spirit. "And how have I merited your godship's kind assistance?" inquired the general. "I am grateful to you," answered the spirit, "because in your days of practice you never once hit me."

Dr. Giles's volume is a tour de force in scholarship. He stands well away from the weight of his enormous subject, and by his brisk and clear exposition has earned the gratitude of the general reader. One humble student, at least, would be grateful if he would expand the first fifty-six pages of this volume into a book.

Wagner.

Life of Richard Wagner. Being an Authorised English Version, by W. Ashton Ellis, of C. F. Glasenapp's Das Leben Richard Wagners. (Kegan Paul. 16s.)

MR. ASHTON ELLIS, who has already given us translations of all Wagner's prose works, is now completing his task of love by giving us the first adequate biography of the great musician which has appeared in English. It is a revised version of Glasenapp's work, the monumental German Life of Wagner. As he explains, he has freely altered the form of the German sentences, where he judged it necessary in order to accommodate them to English style, re-writing rather than translating them. Nevertheless, as he claims, it is essentially a translation, if in parts a revised one. The book, as judged by this first volume, is excellent. It is elaborately full, yet well-proportioned, systematic.

To name Wagner is to think of stormful power and energy, in music and in life. The man, above all other musicians, above Handel, above that largely kindred spirit, Berlioz, was a fighter. It is on his countenance, as we know it when his life had inscribed its story there; in the resolute chin, the stern mouth, the aggressive nose, the eye which seems ever fixed on an object; a dominant, militant face, with nothing of the visionary softness which certain novelists love to dream of in their ideal musician. Ill would such a nature have fronted Wagner's task in life—as if you should start to hew rocks with a silver hatchet. Yet the man had visions, as we know; a visionary, like his own questers of the Sangreal, with a coat of steel, without which he would scarce have gone far; for beasts of prey were to be fought with, mainly of the hyena kind, which (as we know) hunts in troops, a laughing animal—not in reverent manner. From the simian French, and the slow German porcine kind, too, he had much trouble—an honest animal, the latter, but not over-manageable in the traces of Art. Of his contest with all these, his life is largely a record, till he found his Grail in Parsifal—and died. Withal, as was most necessary in such a destiny, he was a hearty laugh—not in the grim Carlylean fashion, but with good Teutonic mirth, and a prankishness that could wholesomely cast off dignity on occasion. Your weeping philosopher, one thinks, cannot go far, or madness must lie in his path.

A child of battle, the cannon smoke of Lutzen and Bautzen drifted towards his birth chamber on that 22nd of May, 1813, when Napoleon—the snows of Russia scarce melted from his grey redingote—led his conscripts on Dresden. Within the house where the cradled Richard lay resounded the cannon of the nations, for three days straitening their flaming girdle round the French forces, till the Saxons, abandoning their king, turned their muskets against his Gallic allies, and all was over. Under the window of that room where he was cradled fled down the Brühl the hatless emperor, vanquished at last in pitched battle. To his unheeding infant ear came the sounds of the allied entry into Leipzig. Soon after Friedrich Wagner the actuary, carried off by hospital fever, left his child an orphan. Fit birth for a fighter; and his childhood was no less fit in its surroundings for the ultimate music dramatist. His mother was re-married to the actor and painter Geyer, the family removing to Dresden, where Geyer was a leading member of the Court Theatre company. The actor was accustomed to enact puppet plays and light pieces written by himself at his own home. Richard's brother Albert, his sisters Rosalie and Clara, took to the stage by natural impulse. Rosalie, in particular, was a celebrated prima donna, and Albert became an excellent operatic singer. Geyer, moreover, contracted a friendship with the composer Weber, which had an important effect on his stepson's life. For even after Geyer's death, which occurred before little Richard began his schooldays, Weber still visited the widow when he came to Dresden. "Der Freischütz" was then in the first glow of its popularity, and Wagner's worship of it and its composer was idolatrous. He drew his little sister to him as Weber entered the house: "My! that's the greatest man alive! How great he is you haven't the weeniest notion." He never lost that worship of the man who had first made the Germanic spirit vocal in opera, the pioneer of his own more vast and revolutionary work.

Wagner the child, with all his early delicacy, was clear father of the man. The ready sensibility of his nature showed itself abundantly. His little sister Cécilie heard him laugh and cry, shout and talk in his sleep; and at all times tears were as ready to him as laughter. He feared ghosts devoutly. Yet he was no solitary moper, but full of merry mischief. Cécilie would be wakened in the night by the voice of Richard from beneath her couch: "Cile, Cile, there is a big bogey under your bed!" She was his habitual companion at home, and the two children were in endless pranks and activities. He was a fearless climber then, as he was later in ambition; and had a special genius for standing on his head, an accomplishment which he practised in mature years—on the sofa—to the solemn horror of that prig of philosophers, Nietzsche. He loved animals, then as always, with a preference for dogs; and, then as always, could not endure the infliction of pain on beasts. He kissed the horses that had taken him a journey. At the Dresden Kreuzschule he was soon the leader of a following among his schoolfellows, by reason of his wit and spirits, while the stupid hated him. A born leader! No less did his headstrong overbearing of opposition reveal itself, to the making of enemies: what he willed must be, no matter who resisted. It was the same Wagner who carried the standard of his music through a hooting Europe. Here he began to write plays on the Greek model, soon to be abandoned for a grand Shakespearean tragedy. Already, by the approach of his thirteenth year, he had studied English to translate Shakespeare. At Leipzig, whither the family removed, he neglected his studies for a while; and the discovery of his tragedy brought dismay to the family bosom. But worse was in store, for he took to music. The hearing of Beethoven's symphonies at the Gewandhaus concerts made him a musician, as the reading of Spenser made Cowley and Keats poets. He must compose. Thereto he mastered Logier's Method in a week, and did compose, after a fashion. Lessons followed, but his first master was a pedant, and he neglected these studies too. Meanwhile, he read the wonder-tales of Hoffmann, and became a fiery mystic, as he remained through life. In Hoffmann, too, he must have found suggestions of his own future philosophy of music. He read, also, Tieck's Tannhäuser—the legend which was to suggest (though in another form and from an older source) his great opera. Auber's Masaniello moved him to an enthusiasm which was lifelong, and the July revolution made him a revolutionary. And at last he had an overture performed (unsuccessfully enough) at the Court Theatre, which is said to have shown remarkable signs of his future daring. At Leipzig University a period of wild student life was followed by a return to music, and under the wise lessons of Weinlig he learned all he yet needed. It was still Beethoven, Beethoven, even when he composed his Symphony in C, afterwards performed at Prague and Leipzig. With a visit to Vienna and Prague, which inspired his first operatic attempt, begins the long struggle of his life. At one city after another he tried to earn a living. As chorus master at Wurzburg, where he had the advice of his brother Albert the singer, he composed "Die Feen," only to meet dogged recalcitrance when he endeavoured to secure its performance on his return to Leipzig. It was shunted for Bellini's "Romeo and Juliet," when Mme. Schröder-Devrient scored so splendid a success in a wretched piece as set Wagner thinking. He began to see what opera needed to be attractive. German and mystic, he nevertheless grew dissatisfied with "Germanism" and mysticism as they showed themselves in the native opera of that day. In Vienna he had already been enraptured by the joyous sensuousness of the South—for all his life there was a strong sensuous element in him. The result was an article in his friend Laube's paper, so remarkable that we quote from it. At twenty-two he had already grasped the principles (in large measure) which underlay his later work:

We have a field which belongs to us by right—and that is instrumental music; but a German opera we have not.

... We are too intellectual and much too learned to create warm human figures. In this respect the Italians have an immense advantage over us; vocal beauty with them is a second nature, and their creations are just as sensuously warm as poor, for the rest, in individual import.

And the future master of tumultuous music goes on to assail the "eternal orchestral bustle." Then he proceeds:

Not that I wish French or Italian music to oust our own; ... but we ought to recognise the true in both, and keep ourselves from all self-satisfied hypocrisy. ... Why has no German opera come to the front for so long? Because none knows how to gain the ear of the people—that is to say, because none has seized true, warm life as it is. For is it not plainly to misconstrue the present age to go on writing oratorios when no one believes any longer in either their contents or their form? What with Bach or Handel seems worshipful to us, in virtue of its truth, must necessarily sound ridiculous with Fr. Schneider of our day; for, to repeat it, no one believes him, since it cannot be his conviction. ... He will be master who writes neither Italian nor French nor even German.

Here was a manifesto! Nevertheless, for a while, in his successive posts as Kapellmeister at Magdeburg and Riga, he admired and followed the light French music he conducted. On that model he composed the "Novice of Palermo," which failed in two performances at Magdeburg. The second night it was not performed at all. One of the performers became jealous of the second tenor's proceedings with his wife. When the second tenor appeared behind the scenes, he received him with a blow in the face, and soon sent him bleeding to his dressing-room. The wife rushed on her angry husband, and was greeted in the same fashion. Then the whole company took sides, and in a general scrimmage the opera became impossible.

Before starting for Riga, Wagner had married the pretty actress, Minna Planer. But Riga offered small pickings for a struggling young married musician; and tired of semi-beggary, he at last determined to carry the war into Paris. With the score of "Rienzi" in his pocket, he started by sea, via London, and at Boulogne fell in with Meyerbeer. Meyerbeer gave him fine promises and several introductions, which were to do him small service; and thus armed he reached Paris.

He went to scale in conquest the heights of music; he remained for two and a half years of bitter disappointment, daily need, and musical drudgery on a level with the dreariest journalism. For compensation he had the intellectual élite of his day: heard Habeneck conduct the symphonies of Beethoven as he had never heard them before; dined with Heine; mixed with musicians such as his affinity, Berlioz, to whom he did justice, but who jealously railed on him; Liszt—afterwards to be his best friend—and many another great name. Amid such company he grew in musical stature; and the true outcome of Paris was "Rienzi" and the "Flying Dutchman." After long delays, "Rienzi" was accepted and produced at Dresden. He hastened home for its performance; it was a success—he was saved! True, the "Dutchman" failed; but they made him Kapellmeister at Dresden, and his troubles (he thought) were over. Here the present volume ends. We know they were not over; we know the revolutionary outbreak, the exile, the years of feverish despair and feverish work, the struggle, almost single-handed, against the scorn of Europe; till Ludwig of Bavaria appeared, and the great triumph, the vast reaction, began slowly to evolve itself. These things are for further volumes, but in outline they are all men's property. Full of paroxysmal merriment and depression, pouring forth music, controversy, criticism, satire, scorn, he worked out his life to the last. And he remains one of the indubitable Titans.

Legends of the Primitive Church.

Studia Sinaitica Nos. IX. and X.: Select Narratives of Holy Women. Edited by Agnes Smith Lewis. (Cambridge: University Press.)

THE Syriac version of the Gospels discovered by Mrs. Lewis in 1892 at the Convent of St. Katharine on Mount Sinai, and already published by her, was a palimpsest, and had been half effaced to make room for another Syriac document written over it. Of this last, Mrs. Lewis gives us here the Syriac text with an English translation, and it proves to be the acts of different Oriental saints written in the manner that Charles Kingsley successfully imitated, rather than burlesqued, in the last chapter of Hypatia. Taking them altogether, and with every allowance for the Eastern imagination, they form what is probably a life-like picture of the scenes attending the introduction of Christianity into the East.

The stories here given naturally divide themselves into those which may be believed and those which may not. Those in the first category appear to be the earlier in date, or, at all events, to be referable to a time when Christianity had not yet established itself in Egypt and Syria. They are all modelled on the story of Thecla, the noble Roman maiden who left her parents and her betrothed to dress herself in man's clothes and follow St. Paul, with whom she sate in prison "listening to his teaching and kissing his fetters." Mrs. Lewis gives us only a summary of this story, but the reader who cares to look for it can find the whole tale in the "Acts of Paul and Thecla," which are translated at length in Clark's Ante-Nicene Library. The same summary treatment has been accorded to the story of Pelagia the harlot, from which Kingsley appears to have borrowed much in the novel already mentioned. A fair specimen of this class, perhaps, is the legend of the blessed Euphrosyne, the only child of rich parents and of great beauty, who by the advice of a pious hermit enters a monastery without the consent of her family, and, to prevent them discovering her, disguises herself as a palace eunuch. Here she hides for twenty years, while her parents seek her sorrowing, and even comforts her own father, who comes to the monastery as a penitent, without revealing herself to him. At length, on her death-bed, she does so, apparently because she wishes that he and no one else may prepare her corpse for burial, and "then her father Paphnutius gave all his wealth and his possessions to the churches and to the monasteries, to the poor, the orphans and the widows. But he gave the greater part of his riches to the monastery in which his daughter Euphrosyne lay." The same story is told with such slight alterations of time and place of the blessed Eugenia (of Egypt) and the blessed Mary (of Bithynia), that one may suppose such conversions were of very frequent occurrence; and that the life-long deceit on the part of the convert, and the agony of mind to the convert's parents that they entailed, were considered by the Christian missionaries as not to be weighed against the spiritual and temporal benefits that the Church derived from them. Yet they go far to explain why good and enlightened governors like Marcus Aurelius, Diocletian, and Julian looked upon Christianity as a danger to the State, and why at a time when they were hardly pressed by the Barbarians they did violence to their own feelings by attempting to crush it by open and violent persecution. "There are found gods who prohibit men from begetting children, and if men are hindered from begetting children," says a memorial to the throne here quoted, "how will there be a renewal to Rome? And how will the army of the Romans be increased and grow, by means of which conflicts are carried on, and by which the victorious right hand of your Divinity subdues in battle the hosts of the foreign enemies which oppose us?" Such arguments appear to Mrs. Lewis herself to have a certain cogency.

A lurid light is thrown on the persecutions thus provoked by the incredible stories making up the remainder of the book. Thus, in the story of Saint Drusis of Antioch, the heroine is a daughter of Trajan unknown to history, and betrothed to his successor Hadrian, but she is so moved by the sight of the holy women coming by night to steal from the gallows the corpses of Christian martyrs that at a public execution she baptizes herself in a convenient well, and is burnt along with the other believers. So, in the story of the blessed Euphemia, the martyr is tortured in vain, for by miracle after miracle "the saws were turned about, and were scattered; also the pans of fire that were fixed amongst them were quenched, and no hurt came to her from any of these things, because the angels of God kept close to her for her assistance." Although it is rather difficult to see why pains that they did not feel, and which were, in fact, non-existent, should be counted to the victims of persecution for righteousness, we have no doubt such stories had considerable effect in inducing other confessors to offer themselves for martyrdom. That they should have done so even with the hope that such miracles would be repeated is, of course, astonishing enough; but it should not be forgotten that the Christians were one and all of them buoyed up by the constantly-repeated assertion of their teachers that the Second Advent was at hand, and that to confess Christ before men was their one chance of escaping from an eternity of far worse tortures. The curses that they are here represented as heaping upon their tormentors show that in some particulars their lower natures had remained untouched by their conversion, and contrast disagreeably with the really disinterested effort made by some of their judges to induce them to take the shortest way out of their torments by making a merely formal submission to the State faith.

Literary America.

A Literary History of America. By Barrett Wendell. (Unwin.)

THERE is very little literary history in America. To that conclusion must you come after reading Prof. Wendell's book. All the literature worth the name in this volume might be covered by the first fifty years of the last century—for living writers Prof. Wendell omits from his survey. The real literature begins with Brockden Brown, and the actual "history" ends with Walt Whitman. The earlier literature may be gauged by the fact that its greatest name is Franklin. Prof. Wendell's book is useful, painstaking, and adequate, if it cannot be called any wise brilliant. He knows his subject, as might be expected from a professor of English literature at Harvard, and he keeps much on the "permanent way" of traditional criticism. When he departs from it his remarks are not always notable for originality or insight. His criticism of Poe is a favourable example. He notes the tendency of American literature as a whole to that delicate cultivation of form in which Poe excels, to a general refinement and artistic conscience not much recognised among those who take Walt Whitman as the representative poet of America. It is quite true that American is a delicate and decadent literature (in the better sense of that adjective), having more points of contact with French than English temper of work. This, which he ascribes to national self-consciousness, might rather be assigned to the more high-tuned sensitiveness of American nerves, the quicker mobility of American character. At the same time he talks about Poe's "assumption of an unreal mood." Poe did not assume, and the mood was very real—to Poe; as Prof. Wendell afterwards recognises when he speaks of Poe's "paradoxical sincerity." Nor is "melodramatic" a true word for Poe's best work, unless you disjoin from that word the implication of insincerity, and take it to signify merely strong juxtaposition of light and shade. Even so, it ill-suits the subtle rightness of tone in Poe's tales.

About Bryant, on the other hand, Prof. Wendell keeps strictly to the rails, and will not hear of that venerable American's "delicacy" being "mistaken for commonplace." We are still hardened in that mistake. Lowell was a keener critic, whom Prof. Wendell quotes:

There is Bryant, as quiet, as cool, and as dignified,
Like a smooth, silent iceberg, that never is ignited,
Save when by reflection 'tis kindled o' nights
With a semblance of flame by the chill Northern Lights.
He may rank (Griswold says so) first bard of your nation,
(There's no doubt he stands in supreme iceolation)
Your topmost Parnassus he may set his heel on,
But no warm applauses come, peal following peal on,— He's too smooth and too polished to hang any zeal on;
Unqualified merits, I'll grant, if you choose, he has 'em,
But he lacks the one merit of kindling enthusiasm;
If he stir you at all, it is just, on my soul,
Like being stirred up with the very North Pole.

It is a comfort to hear this witty truth about the Father of American Poetry—a cross between Thomson and Wordsworth, without a spark of the power in either. It should long since have put him out of the anthologies.

On such a man as Fenimore Cooper Prof. Wendell is adequate, for, unsubtle himself, Cooper requires no subtlety in his critic. But when we take a test case like Emerson, the author is but fairly satisfactory. He has sympathy, but not penetrative sympathy; perception of faults, but not penetrative perception. He finds a contradiction in the fact that Emerson was at once Transcendentalist and shrewd Yankee. It is only a contradiction on the supposition that there is in idealism an element of moonshine, that its professor must be a little lacking in sanity. And, despite his considerable sympathy with idealism, Prof. Wendell obviously has this feeling at the back of his mind. Like most men, he supposes that common sense must pay for uncommon sense. It does in the smaller men, but not in the greatest. The book, however, in spite of shortcomings, is good and worth reading. It fills a place, though but for its time. The permanent history of American literature has yet to come.

Charm.

My First Voyage, My First Lie. Related by Alphonse Daudet to Robert H. Sherard. (Digby, Long.)

THIS book, spoken familiarly by Daudet in French, and written by Mr. Sherard in English, is much better than anyone had the right to expect; and Daudet's visit to "silent London" in 1895 was not in vain, since the idea of the volume was excogitated then at the novelist's London hotel. Yet there is nothing in it: analyse it, and you arrive at precisely naught, save charm. People of scientific temperament often demand a definition of "charm." My First Voyage is a definition of the word in a hundred and seventy-five pages. The book is a mental "reconstitution" of an episode of Daudet's Southern childhood—a childhood of Tartarin! At the age of ten or so he was dispatched, with a companion of equal maturity, by steamer from Beaucaire to Lyons, on the rapid Rhone. The boys were going to school. The recital is a history, with gaps due to defective memory, of the voyage. Alphonse invented the lies—those lies which were to supply the halo of glory demanded by the Southern temperament, and which continually resulted in the most absurd quandaries—and Léonce loyally supported the colossal structure of deceit. First they were naval cadets on a holiday, and naval cadets they remained till a spleeny Englishman exposed them at the end of the journey; but meanwhile they deviated into practised horsemen—Centauris, in fact, lovers of Turkish houris, swimmers of the Bosphorus, ravishers of married women, and so on.

What in the world made me say that? Who or what prompted me? Was it thou, great apoplectic sun, who wast clearing from thy face the pink mists of morning? Was it thou, great Mistral, who didst intoxicate me with all the perfumes of field and water, which thou bearest along, and dost scatter abroad from thy spreading pinions?

Was it the Tarasconnais and Tartarine atmosphere in which the soul of Tartarin was brooding? Who shall say?

Some of the descriptions of Rhone life are entirely delightful. Here is one:

There are no better fellows in the world than the bargees of the Rhone, with their eyes clear and sparkling like the white wine of Condrieu, a place on the banks of the Rhone, the native place of most of them. During my voyage on the Bonnardelle I used to amuse myself by watching them at their work, on the barges which, like our steamer, were going up the river. I could see them seated, bare-legged, on the leader of a string of mules, guiding through invisible fords the sturdy animals who towed huge barges laden with barrels of wine and blocks of quarried stone. Now and again the man at the tiller would command in a loud voice, according as the boats were to go to the right or to the left: "Empéri! . . . Riauxme!"—(Empire, Royaume)—which to the mariners of the Rhone signifies, Port or Starboard. These terms are derived from the ancient appellations with which in the Middle Ages they distinguished the shores of the Kingdom of Arles and of the Empire of Germany. Oh, magic sound of these provençal syllables, which for six hundred years have rung out ever the same on the winds of the Rhone. Empéri! Riauxme! Empire! Kingdom!

Even to-day, when I hear them—for these terms are still used by the mariners of the Rhone—the same emotions take me.

As may be seen, Mr. Sherard has done his share of the book with discretion and neatness. It is a pity that the proofs were not read with more care.

Other New Books.

THE ATHENIAN DRAMA. EDITED BY G. C. W. WARR.

Most of those whose classical education should have fitted them for taking an appreciative and comprehensive view of Greek literature would have to admit, if urged, that their knowledge of the Athenian drama is bounded by a delectus and a few plays which they are unable to co-ordinate or to explain in relation to the ethical and intellectual conceptions of the age out of which they grew. In fact their training has stopped short at the very point where the human interest enters in. Now the educationists who maintain that the ancient culture is the very finest instrument of mental discipline yet discovered may be entirely right; but it is much more important for us to know where this culture is acquired, and how it comes about that this invaluable instrument is so mishandled at the public schools and universities that all interest in the drama is sapped long before the special training is concluded. Only a few even of those who take a high place in classical honours ever enter the promised land, while an overwhelming majority of the mere "pass" men, being unequal to the exertion of reading the classics in the original, have just sufficient knowledge of them to disdain the "cribs" no longer necessary for pulling them through their examination. The simple truth is that the latter are worse off than the ordinary English reader whose complete ignorance of the language often proves a mild incentive to his finding out in translation something of the drama for himself. Unfortunately the inherent difficulties of the subject are so great, and the whole spirit of the art so unfamiliar, that he rarely penetrates beyond the threshold.

Those who can read between the lines of the preface to the present volume will not only learn the answers to some of the questions suggested by the above statements, but also will be tempted, Prof. Warr leading, to take the first cold plunge into Attic waters.

The three plays here translated are the "Agamemnon," "Choephoroe," and the "Eumenides," preceded by a short essay on "The Rise of Athenian Drama," and followed by a Commentary, which elucidates the difficulties of the text. The interest in the subject is further stimulated by illustrations from bronzes, votive tablets, sculptures, and vases. The present volume, we are glad to learn, is to be succeeded by others dealing with Sophocles, Euripides, and Aristophanes. It will be thus possible for the English reader, when the series is complete, to obtain as full and accurate a knowledge of the Athenian Drama as of the Elizabethan. The quotation from Hamlet, by the bye, should be: "A most instant tetter bark'd about." (Allen. Vol. I. 7s. 6d.)

THE HUMAN EAR: ITS IDENTIFICATION AND PHYSIOGNOMY.

BY MIRIAM ANNE ELLIS.

Of human features the ear has received the least attention. The mouth can smile, the nose can sneer, the eye can wink; the ear remains, but for a rare change of colour, always the same. It is less expressive of emotion than that of a dog or a horse, as it is also less sensitive. Hence the poets have been content to liken it to a shell, and so to have done with it, and artists have been content merely to indicate it. A notable exception is the Hermes of Praxiteles, of which the following description gives a general notion of what a pretty ear should look like:

The proportion is true, the length being twice the width. The helix is gently curved and tapered, whilst the inclination to mark each of the Five Divisions by a little nick inside and a slight "elbow" form outside, is very noticeable because very rare. The lobe is well curved and pendent and of medium size. The orifice is large, slightly square at the bottom and then slanting up to fit the slope of the ear.

And among painters Raphael "used to draw ears that must have belonged to the face he was painting." This aural conformity is marked first by the size: it is not generally known that the normal length of the ear exactly equals that of the nose from its junction with the forehead to the point where it merges in the upper lip. But beyond that we gather that there is no quality of phrenology but finds itself writ small upon that crinkly page. In the proportion between the five parts into which the helix or outer rim is divided, the proportions of the tragus and anti-tragus, the shape and size of the lobe are they to be discerned. For purposes of identification the author claims for the ear that between fifteen and sixteen no feature is so constant, no feature so distinctive; she assures us that the most obstinately similar of twins may with absolute assurance be distinguished. She has invented a system of ear-printing which, from the specimens reproduced in the volume, we judge to be perfectly efficient. Among the notable persons earmarked in these pages we note that Sir John Stainer is furnished like Mozart, but with left and right reversed (for ears, it should be noted, are never a pair), and that Dr. Richard Garnett's eldest daughter, Mrs. Guy Hall, "favours" on the right her father's right and on the left her mother's left, with a murmur of her mother's right. The monograph comprises valuable generalisations from very wide observations. Conscience forces us to add that the writer is afflicted with a tendency to facetiousness, and that her "literal" translations are a well-spring of amazement. (Black.)

AMOR AMORIS.

BY W. D. SCOTT-MONCRIEFF.

Mr. Moncrieff's muse is minor and largely derivative. The sonnets with which it opens are on the Shakespearean model, and carefully reminiscent in manner. But it is ill to rouse such august associations when they are belied by such dailiness of idea as forms Mr. Moncrieff's thematic material. He is better in some of his lighter and slighter lyrics, where weight of metal is not demanded. "A Song of Spring" is a favourable example. Tennyson has done the thing, of course, after Shakespeare, and done it well; Mr. Alfred Austin has followed Shakespeare and Tennyson prettily; Mr. Moncrieff follows Shakespeare and Tennyson and Mr. Alfred Austin—and 'twill serve:

When willow-wands begin to spring,
And tits and finches peck the spray,
When chattering starlings dress their wing,
And blue grows brighter on the jay,
Then Madge and Molly have a care,
And mind the latch that heads the stair.

When lilacs bud and hedges shoot,
And osier twigs are burnished gold,
When Tom begins to play his flute,
And Colin whistles from the fold,
Then Madge and Molly keep a watch,
And hold your hands against the latch.

When leaves hang brown upon the beech,
And daisies t'll the Winter's gone,
It matters naught what parsons preach,
The world will still go wagging on;
Then Madge and Molly have a care,
And bolt the latch that heads the stair.

In another lyric we may note the line, "And her eyes were as bright as a pebble that's wet," which is pretty, though not, we fancy, quite original. In fact, we remember the comparison of a woman's eyes to wet agate, which is better. But, on the whole, Mr. Moncrieff's lyrics have little beyond a pleasant lilt to keep the reader's attention. (Ingram.)

RUMANIA IN 1900.

By G. BENDER.

Mr. G. Bender, the author of this very exhaustive work on Rumania, is the Rumanian Consul-General in Stuttgart, and his book bears all over it the stamp of the Consular Report. It is accurate and painstaking and, if the truth must be told, a trifle dry. It is in no frivolous mood that Mr. Bender tackles his subject, for his aim is to demonstrate to the statesmen and public of Western Europe the astonishing material and moral progress made by the twin Danubian principalities since they ceased to form an outlying province of the Sultan's dominions some two decades ago. The kingdom of Rumania, which was constituted in the year 1881, has now become the most flourishing of the smaller states of Eastern Europe, and its social, economic, and even military position can no longer be neglected by the Great Powers who are concerned with the future settlement of the Balkan nationalities. The English edition is by Prof. A. H. Keane. The importance of Rumania consists in the fact that, with Hungary, it forms the great barrier to the spread of Pan-Slav propaganda beyond the Danube, as the two States form a broad linguistic zone which stretches between the northern and southern Slav lands from the Black Sea nearly to Vienna. When the great explosion in the Balkans does take place, the State which commands the navigable mouth of the Danube will be in a position largely to control the course of events in the interests of order, freedom, and the higher aspirations of humanity. As no comprehensive work on the country has appeared in English since Mr. James Samuelson's Rumania Past and Present, which was published in 1882, Mr. Bender's book will be welcomed by all students of Eastern politics.

Fiction.

Armageddon as She is Wrote.

The Coming Waterloo. By Captain Cairnes. (Constable. 6s.)

The Invaders. By Louis Tracy. (Pearson. 6s.)

Driscoll, King of Scouts. By A. G. Hales. (Arrowsmith. 6s.)

EVERY war produces its own fiction, and these three books are a portion of what we have got for our hundred millions spent in South Africa. It may be said—and we prefer to come to the point at once—that they are as melancholy and nearly as tedious as the war itself. The art of the war-novel has not apparently advanced since Balzac's incomparable Napoleonic recital in Le Médecin de Campagne, and the best specimens of such fiction during the last hundred years are still that same recital and Tolstoi's War and Peace. These present practisers have not even contrived to sit at the feet of Stephen Crane. Captain Cairnes may know a great deal about war—one hears that his criticisms in the Westminster Gazette have made him a reputation—but he knows very little about fiction. Mr. Louis Tracy may, and does, know something of the cruder technique and trickeries of sensational romance; but either he or Tolstoi knows nothing of war. As for Mr. Hales, he is a man with a mission and a flow of Austral metaphors. The first two novels are of the prophetic sort. Dozens of similar works have been written during the past decade, and these two are, probably, neither above nor beneath the average. They most of them spring from an inability inherent in a certain type of mind—the inability when one is on a precipice to refrain from looking over the edge and saying: "How dreadful to fall! We should be smashed into so many fragments!" (Or: "We should escape scathless, by the grace of God!" as the case might be.)

Captain Cairnes invades France, while Mr. Tracy invades England. The latter procedure is, of course, more exciting. Captain Cairnes begins with a magniloquent introduction, in which occur most of the loved Fleet-street phrases:

Growing spirit of unrest among the nations of the old world.

The burden of the maintenance of these vast armies and enormous navies under which all nations groaned alike.

Armed truce.

The great nations locked in a life-and-death struggle for existence.

And so on.

Before he gets to the end of his introduction, Captain Cairnes has England and France in full combat, and Germany and Russia have joined the game. England's navy soon "swept the seas" (cf. Campbell's "Sweep through the deep"), but the brooming did not suffice; it was indecisive. Therefore France must be invaded, or, rather, "an expeditionary force" must be "thrown" into France, while Germany entered also via Belgium. At this point the detailed narrative begins. The campaign of the new Waterloo is a brief one, initiated by a little naval "scrap" near Boulogne, and ended within about twenty miles of that haunt of destitute English. The expeditionary force is landed with ridiculous ease (though not so secretly as Mr. Tracy introduces a hundred thousand armed Germans into England). The fighting is seen through the eyes of Lieutenant Walter Desmond, a remarkable young officer who is soon attached to the general staff. On page 339 he is wounded. "With a great roaring in his ears he sank into unconsciousness." (Asterisks.) The campaign seems to be more tactical than strategic, but, despite the aid of a large scale map, it is somewhat difficult to follow. Ultimately we "whip the French all along the line," and the causes of our success are kites, suspended searchlights, plague in the Russian army, a new sort of electric launch, wireless telegraphy, and good shooting. This last above all. The book is an apotheosis of the British rifle. On the last page occurs this sentence in italics: "The highly-trained few will annihilate the half-trained multitude in the fighting of the future." Such is Captain Cairnes's message. It would have been better enforced if he had been acquainted with a few of the simpler rules of fiction, as that the characters must not talk at the reader, but among themselves. Captain Cairnes has some invention, but no imaginative power; he cannot realise a scene, and his puppets behave, as other puppets in other romances, not as in life. No amount of military knowledge will atone for that, for after all, as someone said, it is a case of "the man behind the gun."

Mr. Tracy's The Invaders is a piled-up dish of glorious horrors, concluding with a marriage announcement in the Times. The Germans don't invade England; they stealthily enter it, and before Lord Salisbury can say "Beaconsfield" they have occupied several big towns—Liverpool in particular. It is unique. But be assured, Lord Salisbury is there. The United States cable to ask if we want help, and Lord Salisbury replies, grimly, "No, not yet." Then to work. Captain the Hon. Robert Dalrymple Hamilton, of the Guards, and young Tom Pratt (urchin, afterwards V.C.)! It is useless for the German army, helped by France, to fight against these. Slowly but surely the end approaches. France is self-betrayed, "as usual," and General Mercier makes a conspicuous spectacle of himself. At length England is in a position to dictate terms of peace. The terms provide, inter alia, for the imprisonment with hard labour of all the units of the opposing armies (except high officers, who are treated as first-class misdemeanants), and for the abolition of all navies except those of England and the United States.

Such is war.

To what extent Mr. A. G. Hales is justified in labelling his characters with the names of real people, we do not know. Driscoll is a South African satire at the expense of the "society" officer—but a satire which is robbed of all effectiveness by its infantile ferocity and clumsiness. Mr. Hales sets up a dandified Colonel with an eye-glass, and calls him Colonel Glasseye! He has invented a style of writing which embodies the more exasperating characteristics of Melbourne and of New York journalism:

Driscoll's great rough voice, which only had music on its outside edges, topped every other sound, and went thundering through the ravines, knocking up against the kopjes until it split into a myriad echoes, which chased each other like a squad of cavalry out into the open country.

Mr. Hales is an able man in some directions, and he has the quality known as "horse-sense." It is a pity that his valuable disciplinary intentions have been rendered futile by the excesses of a too flamboyant individuality. Regarded as mere fiction, Driscoll does not demand criticism; it ranks with the score or so of mediocre novels which we receive every week.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final Reviews of a selection will follow.]

EBEN HOLDEN.

BY IRVING BACHELLER.

This story comes to us with the record of a huge American circulation. Over there nearly half a million copies have been sold. The author tells, in a preface, that the book has grown out of such enforced leisure as one may find in a busy life. "Chapters begun in the publicity of a Pullman car have been finished in the cheerless solitude of a hotel chamber. Some have had their beginning in a sleepless night and their end in a day of bronchitis." Uncle Eb. takes his place easily with the best of his type, and it is a type of which one does not readily tire. "Of all the people that ever went West, that expedition was the most remarkable." Of this expedition Uncle Eb. was the chief. The book has many interests of love and adventure, but the one figure shines through all—honest, sentimental, sound. "Tell ye one thing, Dave Brower," he whispered to himself as he drew off his boots, "when some folks calls ye a fool's a purty good sign ye ain't." (Richards. 3s. 6d.)

THE BISHOP'S GAMBIT.

BY THOMAS COBB.

A book of ingenious complications and bright dialogue. In the first chapter we have: "Myrtle Darbishire's child is about a month old and her husband is suing for a divorce." This from the mouth of a gentleman who is the lover of the Bishop's daughter. It is spoken in the Bishop's presence, and, on hearing it, the Bishop makes the following very proper remark: "This is an extremely unpleasant occurrence, Norman—extremely unpleasant." The unfortunate Norman, who is naturally perfectly innocent, is made co-respondent. But the story is human and pure comedy; even the guilty man is let off easily, and the Bishop is induced to change many of his opinions. His two daughters were better judges of character than he. (Richards. 6s.)

THE PRETTINESS OF FOOLS.

BY EDGAR HEWITT.

"This is the story of two men and a woman, and they all intended to be good to each other. Both men thought the woman beautiful; but a third got wrathfully excited concerning her chin alone." Thus Mr. Hewitt begins his book, and thus, more or less, he continues it. If one admits the prettiness of his ladies, one must also admit their foolishness. There is a good deal of this sort of thing: "The coils of her dark hair were against his heart; her eyes were lifted, and sparkled with victory in the luxurious gloom." (Greening. 6s.)

THE AFTERTASTE.

BY COMPTON READE.

"Never again . . . tell me there is no God. There is a God, and He has given mine enemy into my hand. Four hundred miles have I tramped in terror of that one man. That stronghold, his money, lies at my mercy." Thus soliloquises a tramp who has discovered the bleeding body of a hunting gentleman "in a plain black coat," whose pockets he has rifled, finding in them money, a Bank of England cheque-book, and a "slip of stamped paper" with a signature. The rest of the book is in the same key, though now and then less strident and more human. (Greening. 6s.)

MAYA: A STORY OF ZUCATAN. BY W. DUDLEY FOULKE.

In Maya a good deal of learning is combined with a good deal of entertainment. It is the story of two shipwrecked Spaniards, who, in the year 1512, were cast on the shores of Zucatan. One of them was beloved by an Indian Princess, to his own great peril and that of her country. He was, by the lady, imposed upon her people as a divinity. "He is the God whose coming was foretold in the books of Chilan-Balam." Hence much adventure and sentiment. (Putnams.)

MARKED WITH A CIPHER.

BY WINEFRIDE
TRAFFORD-TAUNTON.

Moves in the best social circles. "'What is he, Urith?' 'A savant, a philosopher, a genius, an enthusiast . . . he is—an artist—he is—Mirabel Fleet.'" . . . "So Isolde pestered Urith to become a professional player, to allow Mirabel Fleet to bring her out." . . . "Things are very crooked," murmured Aunt Ellinor. . . . "Let us hope, in the resolution of the great chord of creation, these things form the notes of the omniphonic harmony of heaven." Quite modern, and looks readable. (Downey. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43 Chancery-lane

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)..... 17/6

Quarterly 5/0

Price for one issue /5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

A New American Humorist.*

It is necessary to begin with definitions. Genius, as Major Pond uses the word, has not quite the meaning which we usually give it. To him it means the quality of merit possessed by persons who have successfully taken the platform or done "lyceum" work under Major Pond's management. Eccentricities are merely the personal habits of these lecturers—not necessarily odd or unconventional at all. The qualification, successful, has had to be inserted on account of poor Matthew Arnold; for this unhappy gentleman, whose intellectual gifts we are in this country disposed to look upon with some favour, comes very badly out of the Major's record. The unpardonable offence was his—he did not make himself heard, nor had he a happy lyceum manner; therein differing entirely from Sir Edwin of the same name, to whom the Major gives pages of his best praise. To sum up, then, a genius is a successful and audible client of Major Pond; and eccentricities are a genius's characteristics.

And now to the book. Major Pond had a beginning similar to that of his countryman Benjamin Franklin: he was apprenticed to a printer. He reached the lyceum platform through the aid of Brigham Young's nineteenth wife, who required an agent on her lecture tour in 1875. Major Pond left the Salt Lake Tribune in order to fill this post, and he has been an impressario ever since. In 1899 he renewed his connexion with Mormonism by placing Mr. Marion Crawford with the Brigham Young Normal College at Provo—"to place with" being a phrase in the lyceum vernacular. When the Major, whose military title at that period is not recorded—"Major Pond," said Max O'Rell, "is the only man I met in America who was not a colonel")—when the Major left his first employer in 1856 he received a piece of advice, to the observance of which he owes his present success. Our young readers will find it in the book.

Major Pond's string of scalps is certainly an imposing one, and we can but run rapidly through his history of them. Highest on his list are Mark Twain, Henry Ward Beecher, Mr. Chauncey Depew, Sir Edwin Arnold, and Ian Maclaren. In turn each of these seems to be the Major's true ideal of perfection in speaker and friend; for the Major has that gift of enthusiasm which crowns the present moment at the expense of all others. How he has heard the chimes at midnight! But his pages on these great ones do not exactly convince. Had we nothing to go by but the Major's account, Mark Twain, for example, would seem but an easily-depressed, commonplace talker who lay in bed till evening and then lectured to large houses. His lectures are not reported; and though the Major holds up his hands ecstatically at the memory of his after-lecture jokes with the pressmen, he repeats none of them, save a too elaborate comparison of Bill Nye and Whitcomb Riley to the Siamese twins. He gives us instead from his diary descriptions of railway journeys, hotels, and the humorist's ill-humours: we want more. When we come to Mr. Chauncey Depew it is the same. The Major regards him as "the peerless all-round orator of the present time," and states that General Grant remarked of one of Mr. Depew's after-dinner utterances: "That was the greatest speech that ever fell from human lips"; but we do not have the golden words. And hence we lay down the book and muse on this wonderful gift of admiration, this touching want of critical faculty and proportion, that so many Americans possess and prize.

* Eccentricities of Genius. By Major Pond. (Chatto & Windus. 12s.)

But the Major waits. His experience of English authors and public men has been extensive. He breakfasted twice with Mr. Gladstone, and was so entertaining with his stories that Mr. Gladstone asked him to come again and talk even harder, and promised that there should be a stenographer behind a screen to take them down. The Major went, talked better than ever, and said good-bye. We give the pathetic conclusion in his own words: "The reporter was concealed behind a screen very near. I have looked for the stories in print, but I never found them."

Sir Edwin Arnold and the Major are old friends. "To him," says the Major, "perhaps, as political writer and Asiatic scholar and poet, is far more due the beginning of present British Imperialism as a political condition than to either Chamberlain as statesman, or Kipling as singer of the Greater Englander." We are more disposed to believe the Major when he describes the old Telegraph leaders as "peculiarly rich and refulgent." Major Pond introduced Sir Edwin to Walt Whitman. "For an hour and a half the talk ran fast and without intermission. Walt had much to tell, and so had Sir Edwin; it was a shower of literary epigrams." (So, also, we may add, was, according to the Major, one of Mr. Zangwill's lectures.) "Americans," said Sir Edwin, "are a great people of remarkable intellect." "Arnold," said the American bard (the Major's name for Walt) "we're a lively, hustling people; and we're too practical to appreciate the full sentiment of our verse. Yes, we have not the high poetical spirit of the Japanese in this country."

Mr. Zangwill gave the Major a little trouble—so much so that his title to the epithet genius is not by any means yet absolute. For one thing, "he couldn't understand why he should come over to America and draw great crowds and I get a third of the profits." He looked the Major "right square in the eye when he talked, and whatever he said was so because he said so, although I knew better at the time." Also he showed the Major a trunk full of press-cuttings. "There must have been $500 worth." Mr. Hall Caine, also, does not quite win the superlatives we expect. Perhaps Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie has them. None the less, his "is one of the most remarkable of personalities." America did not, however, altogether please this genius. In the Major's words:

The overwhelming success of the play of "The Christian" had in some way led Mr. Caine to believe that there would be the same sort of rush of people to hear the author of "The Christian." While there were good-paying audiences—of the most select people, of course—there were not galleries and big crowds such as Mr. Caine had been accustomed to see at performances of the play. The disappointment affected him very much. I had all I could do to keep him cheered up.

In Chicago, however, he had a great success. He went to a meeting of Manxmen, where he "towered above everybody else." The Major rather spoils this by adding: "His was the only speech, as no one else there could talk."

Neither Mr. Caine nor Mr. Zangwill quite won a way into the Major's kindly heart—for kindly we are sure it is. On the contrary, Anthony Hope did—"an English gentleman in every sense that the words imply," to whom were tendered many of "the most delightful banquets that I have known any foreigner to get." We hope that Mr. Hawkins got them. The Major's diary yields the following tribute: "Jan. 15, 1898: Saw my dear friend, Anthony Hope Hawkins, on board the Umbria, bound for England. Sorry to part with him; never had a better time in any man's company for three months. He is an honour to his profession, his country, and his race. This evening I join F. Marion Crawford for a three months' tour to the Pacific coast." Mr. Crawford won the Major's heart, too, but not so completely: his habits are too precise. His method of arranging writing materials, his particular ways at hotels and on trains, his fastidiousness ("his silver monogram is on every article of his toilet and writing equipment and his travelling bags"), fascinate the Major; but Mr. Crawford did not much want to be placed with institutes, and this diffidence is against him. None the less Mr. Crawford is "always the perfect gentleman," and when he went back to Italy, the Major grieved. "I was lonesome without him, and busied myself at odd times with writing him letters, which he never answered." A reply, however, did, come at last, and all was well.

But of all recent clients, Ian Maclaren, or the Rev. John Watson, has captured most of the Major's sympathies. He has the longest chapter and some of the warmest epithets, and the Major plays the veritable Boswell to him. Thus, Mrs. Watson had been not very well and was not expected to join her husband on one of his journeys. But a message suddenly came from her saying that she was better and would meet him the next morning in Chicago:

"Astonishing," said the doctor, his face fairly beaming. "Can I send a telegram right away?" he asked.

"I'll take it," said I, for I wanted to do something.

He wrote a telegram after the English manner—as few words as possible—and this is the way it read:

"Mrs. Watson, West Hotel, Minneapolis. 'Much lifted. WATSON.'"

I made a copy of it, which I handed in at the office, retaining the original. I have never parted with a word of his or Mr. Beecher's manuscript.

Let Major Pond's faithful diary speak Ian Maclaren's final praise: "He is a noble man. My heart is too full for utterance. Our tour has been a great success. In ten weeks we have cleared 35,795 dols."

This passage illustrates to perfection the Major's curious blend of friendliness and commercial sagacity. We take leave of him with regret, for this book is a pleasant string of kindnesses and simple self-revelations, and the author comes out of it triumphantly as a very worthy man and a first-rate (if not too conscious) humorist.

"To Lallie—who is Dead."

God made you very fair;
I cannot dream He meant you to be lost;
At what tremendous cost
Could Earth supply such wealth of golden hair?
That pangsied arch above,
Nor all the shining vast of Morning skies,
Could make two wistful eyes
Like those through which I read your loan of love.
Not all the rose's heart
Nor heart of ev'ry Summer-breathing rose
That ever buds and blows
Could match those lips your laughter kissed apart.
And so I have no fear;
Your Beauty lives; I have no fear for you;
Your soul grows lovely too
In His pure light who holds all beauty dear.
God loves you, and no less;
Death leaves you as He made you—very fair;
Your beauty and His care
Shall wake your very soul to loveliness.

Things Seen.

The End of the Lecture.

THE lecturer was a buoyant personality with an enthusiasm for his subject, which was botany. His bright, keen brain had grappled triumphantly with the science which had dominated his life. And he was a materialist. Science was his final appeal. His goal of intellectual training was the scientific mind. But once, for one moment, some dormant faculty, some tentacle of his soul that had long been still, as if asleep, moved, flashed for a moment into articulate life, betrayed him, confused him, and for the first time in his career of lecturer, silenced him. It happened in this way. He was lecturing on elementary botany to an audience of board school children. The vast hall was dark, save for the stream of light that flowed from the lantern on to the white screen that rose behind him on the platform. Again and again I wondered what kind of thoughts filled the small, dim brains of those gutter children, as picture after picture flashed upon the screen, revealing to them, for the first time, the minute and boundless life of the plant kingdom, its mystery, its wonder, its progressive individual life, never resting, never in doubt, secretly steered, and moving always onward. What the dim brain of those gutter children thought I do not know, but they were very still, and the children who were nearest to me were clutching one another's hands. And as picture after picture shone upon the screen, the lecturer's clear, even voice accompanied them, explaining so patiently, so sympathetically, without hesitation, without a break, till he began to describe the cell, and the protoplasm with which it is filled, and the vital energy that gives life to the protoplasm. Because he was addressing an audience of children he lingered over this part of his lecture, and it was because he had not realised the quick intuition of the childish brain, untrammelled and unspoiled, that he lost the thread of his exposition and ended in confusion. Thus he told them that scientific men knew all about protoplasm, that it had been analysed, that Prof. Huxley had called it "the physical basis of life"; "but," he added, "we do not know what gives to protoplasm its vital energy, its power of living and growing. From it all things proceed. We know no more. The door is shut to us. Behind the door from where the impulse comes all is mystery—unfathomable mystery." Then a child's voice rang out clearly: "Please, sir, does God live behind the door?"

The Mandarin.

It was in Canton, before the War. I emerged from an eight-foot-wide street into what, for Canton, was an open space, before a large and highly-decorated building with a broad red door, the residence of a high official. A small crowd had gathered there, and almost simultaneously with my arrival came a handsome chair upon the scene, preceded and followed by a small escort of brigand-like Chinese cavalry. The little column halted, and at the same moment the red door opened like the door of a cuckoo-clock. A portly man in fine raiment issued from it and hurried down the granite steps to the side of the chair, within which sat, well-screened, a personage in sombre silk—"a great Mandarin," so my guide whispered. The man from within the door made a low obeisance, and received from the other a document in the scarlet official cover, which he pressed to his forehead as if it had been a cure for headaches. There were further salutations, and then, at a sign or a word from the Personage, the chair was suddenly raised by the bearers and whirled round in the midst of the crowd. The Mandarin caught sight of me—the only European—and as our eyes met he bowed very slightly with a courtly smile. I raised my hat; the bearers moved off at the double; the red door was closed. The whole thing passed like an incident of a play upon the stage. What struck me like a blow, and seemed entirely unnoticed by the other bystanders, was this: in swinging round the chair the bearers knocked down two small children—helpless creatures in that squalid crowd. It was impossible to see clearly, but it is my belief that they were trodden under foot like insects. Whether the horses trampled them or not I cannot say—horses are kinder than Chinese men; it may be that when the throng finally melted away, two ragged little bodies lay upon the stones. But whether that were so or not, the violence, the cruelty, the callousness of the scene made a haunting memory. Half an hour later I crossed the guarded bridge between the city and the island upon which the Europeans live. Crossing that bridge is like awakening from a nightmare: one passes from the tenth century to the nineteenth, from Gomorrah to Kensington; to the region of the clergyman, the policeman, the bicycling girl.

An American on Scott.

ALMOST every new writer of a life of Scott merely boils down, hashes up, or in other way manipulates Lockhart; and criticism is only a matter of deciding how well or ill the cookery is done. It may be taken on trust that a Californian Professor of English Literature is quite competent as far as this goes. The present point of interest lies in the view which Mr. William Henry Hudson, the Professor in question, takes of our greatest novelist. In his book, Sir Walter Scott (Sands), Mr. Hudson arrives at a verdict that, on the whole, is adverse, though he pronounces judgment so soothingly, with so many compliments to this and that and the other, that one has to think a moment before appreciating the full force of the condemnation "O great and gallant Scott"—Mr. Hudson says "Amen" devoutly to all this. That personally he was, indeed, a very noble gentleman, courageous, valiant, and so on, is cordially agreed; but does not this disclose an ideal of life now left behind us, and he quotes from the letter to Morritt: "To have lived respected and regarded by some of the best men in our age is enough for an individual like me; the rest must be as God wills, and when He wills." "A fair enough ideal," remarks his critic, "but it certainly does not go very far." Then he proceeds to dwell on Scott's "habitually leaning towards social ways and to established customs of life," his "stereotyped and worldly" ethical theory, and says he has to be "classed among those who take their ease in Zion." His advice to his son is informed with no higher wisdom than that of Polonius. The man and his books are one, and it is easy to gather from this the line that Prof. Hudson takes in his literary criticism. Why does your modern person read novels? He would answer, he does answer in effect, if not in set words—out of religion, love of poetry, soulfulness. Thus, at any rate, I interpret what he has to say about "the problems of the world," "the burden of the mystery," "the darkness of life and destiny," "the whence and why and whither"; these are the themes of prophet and poet, and Mr. Hudson is thus setting up the doctrine that the novelist is no mere conteur set to wile away the idle hours, no mere minstrel charming back some of the glories of the fray with his after-dinner song, but really and truly the poet, the interpreter of the longings and desires and fears and hopes of his age. It would be easy to toss this aside disdainfully, as I have no doubt Mr. Andrew Lang, for instance, would so toss it, and by appealing to Scott simply as pageant, bringing all that immense company of his weeping or laughing across the stage, assert that he gave all that was required of him. But to some extent Mr. Hudson, in my opinion, is in the right. The human mind at all ages has in moods demanded this sort of nourishment. It got it out of Homer, flashing indescribably vivid views of man standing against eternity as the narrator rushed on; it got it out of Shakespeare, where it seems forced out by the fire and stress of action or of grief or even of gaiety, for you have it in "As You Like It" as well as "Hamlet" and "Macbeth"; it found it epic and lyric poetry in Dante and Wordsworth and Tennyson; most of all it got it in the spiritual hymns and songs of the Church. But to a vast number these voices are dumb. A man lives in his own age, and for good or ill "the burden of the mystery" has passed out of all these points of contemporary life. The modern poet pipes so softly few can hear him; the modern dramatist avoids the "immeasurable depths" as he would avoid an abyss; and the Church has fallen behind the age. It is trying to withstand an assault of pom-poms and Krupp guns with the culverin and broadsword of three centuries ago. Thus the reader, or the best readers, for in these matters the herd need not count, really does turn for his "medicine of the soul" to the novel—indeed, he has nothing else to turn to, for whatever there is of spiritual thought in these times finds expression there; and so far as that is concerned it is impossible to withstand the finding of Mr. Hudson. Between Scott and the highest, between him, that is to say, and Homer and Dante and Shakespeare, there is a great gulf fixed.

But, then, no novelist has attained anyway near that high standard, and life would be intolerable were we for ever in intense fervour asking questions, that it is good at times to ask, though we know them unanswerable. Something is to be said even for the little minor poet blowing on his oaten reed; something for the dramatist who, avoiding the crucial, aims only at charming his audience out of themselves; something for the divine who, unable to mount on the very top of the wave, still preaches the wholesome, never-ending lessons of goodness and purity and truth. And if we take Scott on this somewhat lower plane, it is to be amazed at the wide loving sympathy that could enter into and reproduce so many, so widely different types of humanity. Take the creation of any other imaginative writer and how dwarfed it looks beside those long galleries of Scott. To wander through is to walk among your fellow-men, who also are, in a sense, and for the most part, eighteenth century, bound down to usage and custom, informed with the wisdom of Polonius, only at very long intervals indicating by a word, a glance, a gesture that they in any way feel "the burden of the mystery." But Mr. Hudson has joined himself to an intellectual parish and is afflicted with an ism, is enraged at the cloak-and-rapier school, and fails of the catholicity that says of art as of life it takes some of all sorts to make a world. His strictures on Ivanhoe, logically carried out, would obliterate not only Dumas and all the historical school, but the whole realm of fairy tale and romance of which he is a part. I cannot do that. It does not seem possible to follow Mr. Hudson when he narrows Scott down to this small compass: "To have delighted boyhood, to have given it a pure and manly taste for pure and manly things. . . . And if in later years, though we remember the old charm with a kind of subdued pleasure, we find it impossible to renew it." One can only write on a matter like this from personal experience, and that gives the statement a point-blank denial. Scott did delight my boyhood, sent it galloping through the pages in full glee after the story, but it is in mature years only that I have learned to appreciate fully the genial humour, the kindly wisdom, the well-drawn characters. My own experience is that the years have robbed Dickens of any shred of interest, have palled Thackeray, have made George Eliot unreadable, but that still to open Scott, at any place, and almost in any mood, is to unseal a fountain of pleasure, and this notwithstanding a growing and poignant sense of his limitations.

Impossible Poetry.

EDWARD FITZGERALD's Half Hours with the Worst Authors still remains under lock-and-key—(Will not Mr. Aldis Wright print at least a list of its contents?)—and the Tin Treasury of English Songs and Lyrics which is meditated by a critic of eminence, progresses no farther than its title and a few ancient examples: owing to the churlish refusal of living poets to permit their best indiscretions to be printed in it. But there is still another kind of author than the worst or the tin variety: there is the author of what we have called "Impossible Poetry"; and if anyone bitten by the anthology madness cares to devote a collection to this brand, we offer him as a nucleus Gay's ballad of "Sweet William's Farewell to Black-Ey'd Susan," the whole and sole charm of which—and it is charming—lies in its impossibility.

Beyond the ballad's first line—

All in the Downs the fleet was moor'd, and its last—

Adieu! she cries, and wav'd her lily hand,

Gay's pleasing ditty is to-day unknown. But it is splendid in its impossible way; for not a single thing could have happened as the poet records it: William was not like that, Susan was not like that, the British Fleet was not like that. They are all impossible, and we know it. This knowledge of ours is the difference between the impossibility of "Sweet William's Farewell to Black-Ey'd Susan" and the impossibility of any supernatural invention of a poet, such as "The Tempest." "The Tempest" is impossible, one may say. Yes, but we do not know it. It may have happened thus, because Prospero and Caliban, Miranda and Ariel, are credible, persuasive, proven. They are real beings in a fantastic setting; whereas Sweet William is a fantastic being in a real setting. Everything is unreal about him: his language, his sweetness, his attitudes. Such a man never climbed rigging. The ballad is a triumph of the impossible.

Let us look at this delightful, preposterous absurdity—the foundation-stone (used consciously or unconsciously) of a large part of the fabric of Mr. Gilbert's humour. Here is the opening stanza:

All in the Downs the fleet was moor'd,
The streamers waving in the wind,
When Black-ey'd Susan came aboard:
"Oh! where shall I my true love find!
Tell me, ye jovial sailors! tell me true,
If my sweet William sails among the crew."

Human nature does not change: think of the attitude those jovial sailors would take up to-day! And the very ignorance of Susan is part of the impossibility. She has boarded the ship by chance, and, behold! her William is there.

This is what happened:

William, who high upon the yard
Rock'd with the billow to and fro,
Soon as her well-known voice he heard,
He sigh'd, and cast his eyes below.
The cord slides swiftly thr.' his glowing hands,
And (quick as lightning) on the deck he stands.

"Glowing hands" is a realistic touch. Incidentally it shows how times alter; for who, writing to-day, could, in this connexion, possibly use the word "glowing." Stevenson, Pater, and Mr. Kipling have made it impossible. Even in major verse there is now some effort to fit substantive to adjective; while minor verse lives by it.

"Quick as lightning" was not simile enough for Gay; he went on to find another:

So the sweet lark high-pois'd in air,
Shuts closer his pinions to his breast
(If chance his mate's shrill call he hear),
And drops at once into her nest.
The noblest captain in the British fleet
Might envy William's lips those kisses sweet.

This—ye jovial students of Mr. Conrad and Mr. Bullen, even of Mr. Clark Russell, idealist as he can be—this is what sweet William said:

"O Susan! Susan! lovely dear,
My vows shall ever true remain;
Let me kiss off that falling tear;
We only part to meet again.
Change as ye list, ye winds! my heart shall be
The faithful compass that still points to thee.
Believe not what the landmen say,
Who tempt with doubts thy constant mind;
They'll tell thee, sailors, when away,
In ev'ry port a mistress find.
Yes, yes, believe them when they tell thee so,
For thou art present whereso'er I go.
If to far India's coast we sail,
Thy eyes are seen in diamonds bright,
Thy breath is Afric's spicy gale,
Thy skin is ivory, so white.
Thus ev'ry beauteous object that I view
Wakes in my soul some charm of lovely Sue.
Tho' battle call me from thy arms,
Let not my pretty Susan mourn;
Tho' cannons roar, yet, safe from harms
William shall to his dear return.
Love turns aside the balls that round me fly,
Lest precious tears should drop from Susan's eye."

What was happening on board ship the while we can but conjecture. Where was discipline? Had anyone taken William's place aloft? Did the other sailors leave the twain whispering room? Had Sue a roving eye for Sweet Tom or Sweet Dick? Where was the boatswain? Where he was we cannot say, but he returned very suddenly:

The boatswain gave the dreadful word.
The sails their swelling bosom spread;
No longer must she stay aboard;
They kiss'd; she sigh'd; he hung his head;
Her less'ning boat unwilling rows to land;
Adieu! she cries, and wav'd her lily hand.

More happens in that stanza than in most. One crowded stanza of nautical life, it might be called; and the ballad is over.

But isn't it a delight? The very spirit of comic opera pervades it: possibly by Gay's intention, possibly not. He may have sat down deliberately to burlesque, but we are inclined to doubt it: we should see him winking oftener. We believe this to be quite serious. But, anyway, Gay becomes thereby the true begetter of "Pinafore," for without this ballad could there have been a "Pinafore" at all? One almost thinks not. Certainly, without it Douglas Jerrold would never have chosen such names as Sweet William and Black Ey'd Susan for his famous drama. But Jerrold took no more than these names and the relationship their owners bore to each other. In Jerrold, William is a man. He does not hang his head: he knocks down his foe; he does not say, "Thy breath is Afric's spicy gale": he swears.

Correspondence.

Rhymed Elegiacs.

SIR,—Mr. Lang, I observe, states in the ACADEMY that he wrote "rhymed elegiacs" before I was born. I can well believe it; but, as I have never written any rhymed elegiacs myself, why drag me in?—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM WATSON.

The First Life of Cromwell.

SIR,—At a time when Mr. Morley's Cromwell is fresh in the public mind it would be interesting to know who wrote the first Life of Cromwell. He died on September 3, 1658, and the earliest account of his life and death with which I am acquainted is contained in a small volume entitled "The Perfect Politician; or, a Full View of the Life and Actions (Military and Civil) of O. Cromwel. Whereunto is added a compleat Catalogue of all the Honours conferred by him on several Persons. London: Printed by J. Cottrel for William Roybould and Henry Fletcher. 1660." The Preface, which is addressed "To the People of England," is signed "I. S."

A remarkable point in the book is the singular skill with which the balance is held even between the Royalists and the Cromwellians. Though Cromwell is the hero of the work, the character of Charles is sketched with a tenderness very surprising in a volume devoted to the doughty deeds of his conqueror. It is just possible that this is due to the fact that the book was composed when the Commonwealth under Richard Cromwell was tottering to its fall. Charles II. landed on May 29, 1660; and it would be interesting to know in what month of 1660 The Perfect Politician appeared. If you or any of your readers can give me information on this point, and can say whether this is the first complete life of Cromwell, I shall be grateful.—I am, &c., PERCY L. BABINGTON.

Turf Club, Cairo, Egypt: January 11, 1901.

Shakespeare's Knowledge.

SIR,—Ben Jonson's reference to Shakespeare's "small Latin and less Greek" is well known. One of your literary contemporaries has revived the subject by asking "Where does the writer of the plays show that he knew Italian or Greek?"

Here are two facts which I think conclusive. In the first place, in "A Winter's Tale" the statue of Hermione is called "a piece . . . now newly performed by that rare Italian master, Julio Romano." Now, Romano, in the days of Shakespeare, was known as a painter, not as a sculptor. True enough, in the first edition of Vasari's Lives of the Painters, published in 1550, and never translated from the original Italian, we are informed that Romano did work in sculpture. In the second edition, published in 1568, and translated into English, this information is not given. Romano is mentioned as a painter only. Unless Shakespeare had read Vasari in the original Italian, how did he come to know that Romano was also a sculptor?

As for Shakespeare's acquaintance with Greek. In 1 Henry VI. i. 6 appear the lines:

Thy promises are like Adonis' gardens,
That one day bloomed and fruitful were the next.

Commenting on this passage, Schmidt in his "Lexicon" said, "Perhaps confounded with the garden of King Alcinous in the Odyssey." While Mr. Richard Grant White concluded that "No mention of any such garden in the classic writings of Greece and Rome is known to scholars." This shows that Shakespearean commentators are not infallible. Although the reference has always been a puzzle to scholars, it is not long since that the discovery was made that the reference was to a passage in the Phaedrus of Plato, where, in Jowett's translation, we read: "Would a husbandman," said Socrates, "who is a man of sense, take the seeds, which he values and which he wishes to be fruitful, and in sober earnest plant them during the heat of summer in some Garden of Adonis, that he may rejoice when he sees them in eight days appearing in beauty? Would he not do that, if at all, to please the spectators at a festival? But the seeds about which he is in earnest he sows in fitting soil, and practises husbandry, and is satisfied if in eight months they come to perfection." Now I can find that there was no English translation of Phaedrus till 1701, so that Shakespeare must have read the work in the original Greek, or obtained it from a contemporary.

Can any of your readers suggest where otherwise the information both as regards Romano and Adonis' gardens could have been obtained?—I am, &c., G. STRONACH.

The Great Authors of the Century.

SIR,—In case you do not see the Dial—an American weekly paper published at Chicago—I am sending you a letter from a Mr. Jackson Boyd which appears in it. Now, can you or your readers help me? I have to deliver a lecture—quite a small thing—on the writers of the last century, and I want to know if Mr. Boyd's list is one that may be depended on. He is an American, and, of course, that makes a difference. Would you not substitute Hegel for Schopenhauer as the greatest philosopher? And who is Lester F. Ward? This is the letter:

One of the greatest authors of all time is Jeremy Bentham. He is the father of Utilitarianism, and to him more than to anyone else do we owe a rational system of jurisprudence. Bentham has furnished more ideas to legal writers than any other man of the century.

Arthur Schopenhauer is the greatest metaphysician that ever lived. His "World as Will and Representation" is the best solution of the World Riddle ever offered. He is the father of Wagner in music. He originated a system of philosophy—Pessimism. He was one of the greatest scholars of the century; the only man who ever made metaphysics popular.

Auguste Comte was one of the greatest men that ever lived. He originated the science of Sociology; and it is to his impetus that we owe the great social evolution now going on. His conception of Humanity is the grandest ever originated; his conception of the destiny of man the truest. He knew more about Religion than any man in the nineteenth century. He is one of the least appreciated men of his age. He did for Sociology what Darwin did for Biology.

Charles Darwin's was the most argumentative mind of the century. He discovered the most useful law ever known to science, and he proved it to an opposing public. The race will remember him as one of her great men for all time. He revolutionised the science of Biology—all science. It is to him that the true theory of things is possible in the twentieth century.

What Darwin did for Biology, Herbert Spencer did for Psychology. Besides, he has systematised all science in his Synthetic Philosophy. He is the greatest Individualist of the race, and the last great one.

Karl Marx is one of the master-minds of man. He is the father of Socialism,—the making of the race into one class, with equal rights, equal opportunities, the realisation of that better life hoped for by all, and sought after by so few. His conception of the iniquities of modern society will be used as an indictment by reformers from now on till the millennium. Of all men, he is the common man's best friend. He was one of the greatest scholars that ever lived.

Lester F. Ward is the most practical philosopher the century has produced. His Dynamic Sociology completed the science Comte began. His psychic factor in civilisation shows wherein Darwin's great law does not hold good in society. But Ward came so late that his real influence will be in the twentieth century.

The great trouble with light literature in the last century is that it is almost without exception time-serving, not serving all time. George Eliot is the only writer of light literature who has any claim to real greatness. She has attempted to apply the great concepts of Bentham, and Comte, and Spencer, to every-day life. She has been called, not inappropriately, a female Shakespeare. She will be better appreciated in the new century.

Guy de Maupassant is the most artistic story-teller the world has ever produced; Count Leo Tolstoy the most artistic novelist. Both are masters. Maupassant cared nothing for philosophy or morality. His one object was to tell his story. Tolstoy is so intent on giving his art its highest moral motive that he overlooks the intellectual, the chief merit of George Eliot. It will take the twentieth century to appreciate Tolstoy's high art.

These are the pre-eminent authors of the nineteenth century.

—I am, &c.,

ANGELA HOME.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 71 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best set of lines on some domestic incident or object, such as "The Sofa," "The Postman's Knock," "A Noise in the Night," &c., &c., in the style of "The Library" by George Crabbe. We award the prize to Miss Edith Rickert, 3, Great James-st, Bedford-row., for the following:

A CUP OF TEA.

First, draw the crimson curtains 'gainst the gloom,
And light the candles in the dusky room;
Then with the nimble bellows let us blow
The dying embers to a ruddy glow.
Soon, while the shining kettle hums and sings,
The white-capped Phyllis tray and tea-cloth brings,
Apostle-spoons, and cups of rare Belleek,
Whose flow'ry ridges tender care bespeak.
Let brown-cheek'd toast upon the fender lie,
In crispy heaps, to tempt the hungry eye.
At last, the liquid crystal pours its song,
In steamy music, straight the spout along;
Now let us drench the spicy-sweet Bohemian
That yields us fragrant, amber cups of tea.

But lo! th' impatient tribes, by Need oppress'd,
Draw near the hearth for gossip, tea, and rest.
The Nymph, whose pleasure 'tis to please, is prone,
To engage her interest in a buttered cone.
The studious Swain, with pale and fervent brow,
Forgets Herodotus and Euclid now.
The Matron gracious influence sheds around,
Until the heart and tongue are soon unbound.
Sweet discourse o'er the circle flies apace,
Of Fashion, Politics, and Means of Grace,
Of Books and Men and Manners—common ground
To stir the heart, the intellect to sound.
If we Academicus dared to invite,
Weary of treatises and poems trite,
A cup of tea behind our broodered screen
Would banish quite the sullen brood of Spleen!

Other replies are as follows:

A COOKERY BOOK.

See on her shelf, revered and priceless tome,
The Guide to Cookery for Every Home;
Those broken sides, that tattered leaves enclose,
Proclaim its merits and demand repose.
Past are the days when on the dresser laid
It gave its lore to every passing maid;
There Martha came its counsel to entreat
And left a grease-spot where she found a sweet,
Here violets marked the lines my lady conned
When wifely pride the kitchen apron donned
To roll the pie-crust, or, mistaken zeal,
With mousse and omelette dress the evening meal.
But graver themes these dog-eared leaves portray,
The household ethics of an earlier day;
Their ancient rules the secret still enshrine
Of how an Englishman should lunch and dine.
To distant lands his errant tastes may roam,
From Orient empires fetch the curry home;
Yet still, unswerving in his true belief,
He finds his aliment in British beef.
Then, faded page! though writ in sober prose
The kitchen epic of our race disclose,
The life of man from childish pap unroll
Till senile gruel shall complete the whole.

[E. U., London.]

THE DINNER-BELL.

Sweet is the bridal-bell whose music rolls
Bliss thro' the hearts of matrimonial souls;
And sweet the coronation bell which peals
The patriotic joy a nation feels.
But that to which our human bosoms swell
Above all others, is the dinner-bell.
What joy when all the sad suspense is o'er,
And each glad diner passes thro' the door;
How gaily each descends the solemn stair,
Upon his arm a not reluctant fair,
And takes his seat before the board alight
With well-cooked dishes, love, and appetite;
Feasting his eyes on beauty (when he can),
And with good cheer supports the inner man,
Nor yet neglects th' Elysian gift divine
Of goblets brimming o'er with costly wine.
And then—but vain! more peace than pen can tell
Follows thy dulcet tinkle, dinner-bell.

[F. P. S., Manchester.]

THE FAMILY CAT.

First let us see the nature of the pet
Who loves her home and takes what she can get?
In her the tigress we are very sure
(See fur and claws!) exists in miniature—
Those round green eyes—those pupils that contract
Before the light of day confirm that fact—
Those claws are sheathed in softest down indeed,
But anger Pussey and your hands will bleed!
Those stealthy movements, and that purring sound:
Are sure precursors of that sudden bound,
When mice or luckless birds will fall a prey
To Pussey, who is a gourmande in her way!
As for the rest, a scapegoat oft is she!
When milk is missed or toothsome fish may be,
The Cat is there, and on her shoulders fall
All the shortcomings of the Servants' Hall—
Still, treat her well, nor grudge of cod a slice,
She follows both your fortunes and your mice;
For when you change your quarters, 'tis her plan
To find herself a corner in the Van;
And when at your new mansion you arrive,
There you'll find Pussey very much alive!
Nor, when you close your house, forget to leave
Provision for her, or, mayhap, you'll grieve,
While you yourselves are flourishing and fat,
To find a scarecrow where you left a Cat!

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

A CHIMNEY ON FIRE.

Behold the parlour with its evening air,
The father dozing in his easy chair,
Mother and damsels at their work or games,
While friendly firelight casts around its flames;
The curtains drawn before the window wide,
All peace within, though Boreas rage outside.
When lo, a roaring in the chimney—hark!
Now see the soot come down in shower and spark.
Disturb'd, the father wakes from out his sleep,
"I told you so; you should have had the sweep."
"Oh no, my love, he came on New Year's Day,
The date I know, for dear Jack went away
To sea that self-same afternoon." Meanwhile
The blazing soot upon the grate doth pile.
The cook and maids run in with glances dire,
"O sir, Oh ma'am, the chimney is afire!"
"Well, what of that, ere ever you were born
Worse fires I've tackled; Lucy, get you gone
And fetch two pails of water—make haste now,
A shovel, Mary; I'll soon show you how
The task is done." His coat then off he flings
(While neighbours worry him with knocks and rings),
Rakes out the fire, the danger soon is o'er,
Neighbours disperse, and all is peace once more.

[H. F., Exmouth.]

Replies also received from: E. T. W., Leytonstone; H. H., Teddington; B. D., Chelsea; E. L. W., Haselmere; H. W., Yorkshire; E. W. K. E., London; E. A. M., Shoreham; C. S. O., Hove; G. M. P., Birmingham; G. S., Brentwood; C. A., London; A. S., Edinburgh; W. S. B., London; F. W., Wandsworth; H. M. G., Stroud Green; H. A. M., London; R. M., Brighton; J. G., York; K. J., Leeds; C. H. H., Brighton; J. G. H., London; S. R., Ayrshire; H. W. D., London; E. W. H., Didsbury; F. S. H., Bath; J. N., London; P. K., London; E. L., Lancashire; P. C. F., Cambridge; H. S., Edinburgh; I. S., Brighton; A. D. B., Liverpool.

Competition No. 72 (New Series).

A party of friends recently beguiled an evening by choosing in turn the historical personage, of any clime or period, man or woman, whom, if they had the power, they would recall from the grave for the pleasure or interest of a quarter of an hour's conversation.

A prize of One Guinea will be given for the most interesting reasons for any particular choice. Replies should take this form:

(Name.) Because

Replies must not exceed 150 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, February 6. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the third page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

YOUNG WRITERS of PROSE or VERSE should send stamped envelope for full Prospectus of "Literary Tuition per Post," as conducted by E. L. T. HARRIS-BUCKFORD, F.S.S. (London), Ex-President of, and Critic to, the International Literary Association; Critic to the Junior Literary Association, &c., &c. MSS. criticised, corrected, and commented on weekly, accompanied by "Practical Papers." Prizes and Payment have been won by Mr. Bickford's Pupils. Address: Thornley House, Redruth. (Please mention THE ACADEMY.)

THE DOWNS SCHOOL, SEAFOORD, SUSSEX.

Head Mistress—Miss LUCY ROBINSON, M.A.
(Late Second Mistress St. Felix School, Southwold).
References: The Principal of Bedford College, London, The Master of Peterhouse, &c.

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 3 IN PREPARATION.

CATALOGUE No. 1, 1s., and CATALOGUE
No. 2, 2s. 6d.,

May be had on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

A Large Collection of Fifteenth and Sixteenth
Century Books on view.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.

A new fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application
DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

WHAT D'YE LACK?

Ask Miss MILLARD, of Teddington, Middlesex, for any Book ever issued since the advent of printing (however rare or plentiful) up to the very last work published; also for any curio or object of interest under the canopy of heaven, for she prides herself on being enabled, nine times out of ten, to supply these wants. She has the largest assemblage of Miscellaneous Bijouterie in the world, and is always a ready, willing, and liberal buyer for prompt cash.

JUST BEYOND THE LIMITATION.

The Hon. C. H. DAVIS, M.D., Ph.D., President of the Board of Education, Connecticut, U.S.A., writes: "Through my book-seller you have before supplied my wants," adding, "I have perfect confidence that if I desired the tablets upon which Moses wrote the Commandments you could procure them for me."

Miss MILLARD and her Staff have a perfect relish for difficulties.

Address Teddington, Middlesex.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each off-red for Ackermann's Cambridge, 2 vols., 1811; Ferguson's Serpent Worship, 1873; Carmen Seculare: An Ode (Macmillan), 1877; Shelley's St. Irvyne, 1811; Prior's Poems, 1707; Lamb's John Woodvil, 1892; Keat's Poems, 1817.—BAKER'S, Great Bookshop, Birmingham.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

GRAHAM'S TYPE-WRITING OFFICE,
25, COCKSPUR STREET, PALL MALL.—All kind of difficult MSS. receive careful attention from EXPERIENCED workers. Specimen page and references sent if desired. Over five years' experience.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

DIGBY, LONG & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

LUCAS CLEEVE'S NEW NOVEL.
AS THE TWIG IS BENT. By the Author of "Lazarus," "The Woman Who Wouldn't," &c. Pictorial cloth, 6s. [Just out.]

SARAH TYTLER'S NEW NOVEL.
RIVAL CLAIMANTS. By the Author of "Citoyenne Jacqueline," &c. Cloth, 6s.

NEW NOVEL BY JEAN MIDDLEMASS.
A WHEEL OF FIRE. By the Author of "Citoyenne Jacqueline" and "The Queen Wasp," &c. Cloth gilt, 6s.

NEW BOOK BY DAUDET AND SHERARD.
MY FIRST VOYAGE. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. [Just out.]

THE CHAMPINGTON MYSTERY. By LE VOLEUR, Author of "In the Czar's Dominions." Cloth, 6s. Second Edition. Athenæum.—"A highly exciting and graphic tale...."

SHYLOCK OF THE RIVER. By FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," "The Red-Headed Man," &c. Cloth, 6s. Literary World.—"Is quite the most brilliant detective story Mr. Hume has given us since he made such a remarkable 'hit' in 'The Mystery of a Hansom Cab.'"

SECOND LOVE. By T. W. Speight, Author of "The Chains of Circumstance," &c. Cloth, 6s. Court Circular.—"A good novel with plenty of brisk dialogue in it."

NEW NOVEL BY G. BERESFORD FITZGERALD.
THE MINOR CANON. By the Author of "An Odd Career," "Beyond these Dreams," &c. Pictorial cloth, 6s. Glasgow Herald.—"The story is well written. The portrait of the Canon himself is drawn with considerable strength and skill."

GERTRUDE WARDEN'S NEW NOVEL.
A SYNDICATE OF SINNERS. By the Author of "Sentimental Sex," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Just out.]

DIGBY, LONG & CO., 18, Bouverie Street, E.C.

Mr. Herbert Spencer's Works.

FIRST PRINCIPLES. Finally Revised. 11th Thousand 10s.
PRINCIPLES OF BIOLOGY. 3 vols. Revised and Enlarged. 6th Thousand 36s.
PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY. 2 vols. 5th Thousand 36s.
PRINCIPLES OF SOCIOLOGY. Vol. I. 4th Thou. 21s. Ditto. Vol. II. 3rd Thou. 18s. Ditto. Vol. III. 2nd Thou. 16s.
PRINCIPLES OF ETHICS. 2 vols. 2nd Thou. 27s. 6d.
JUSTICE (Separately) 8s.
THE STUDY OF SOCIOLOGY. 21st Thou. 10s. 6d.
EDUCATION. Library Edition. 7th Thousand 6s. Ditto. Cheap Edition. 11st Thousand 2s. 6d.
ESSAYS. 3 vols. 5th Thousand.....Each Vol. 10s.
SOCIAL STATISTICS and MAN & STATE. 10s.
THE MAN & THE STATE. (Separately.) 14th Thousand 1s.
VARIOUS FRAGMENTS. Enlarged Edition 6s.
REASONS FOR DISSENTING FROM COMTE. 6d.
A REJOINDER TO PROF. WEISMANN 1s.
WEISMANNISM ONCE MORE 1s.

London: WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

The Clergy List FOR 1901.

The most Complete and Accurate Record published in connection with the Clergy. The List of Benefices contains BOTH GROSS and NET VALUES.

the Clergy engaged therein, Patron, Population, nearest Post Town and Railway Station. The Alphabetical List gives a Complete Record of PAST and PRESENT APPOINTMENTS.

The College, University, and, where necessary, the Private Address of every Clergyman in ENGLAND, IRELAND, and SCOTLAND.
Upwards of 1,800 pages. Price 12s. 6d.

KELLY'S DIRECTORIES (LIMITED),
182-184, High Holborn, W.C.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

In crown 4to, handsomely bound, and profusely
Illustrated, price 12s. 6d. net.

BERMONDSEY:

Its Historic Memories and Associations.

WITH A CHAPTER ON BERMONDSEY
IN MODERN TIMES.

By E. T. CLARKE.

In demy 8vo, bound in cloth and Illustrated, price 5s. net.
Large Paper copies, 21s.

THE OAK HAMLET. Being a

Short History of the Local and Personal Associations of the Village of Ockham, Surrey. By H. ST. JOHN H. BASHALL, Solicitor, First Chairman of the Parish Council, Parish Churchwarden, and Member of the Surrey Archaeological Society. With Illustrations from Photographs by the Author.

In large crown 8vo, suitably bound in cloth, price 10s. 6d.

DOMESDAY and FEUDAL

STATISTICS. With a Chapter on Agricultural Statistics.
By A. H. INMAN.

New Illustrated Work on the Nineteenth Century.

In demy 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

THE ROMANCE of a HUNDRED

YEARS. Remarkable Chapters in the Social and Public Life of the Nineteenth Century. By ALFRED KING-STON, F.R.Hist.S. Author of "East Anglia and the Great Civil War," "Fragments of Two Centuries," &c.

In demy 8vo, bound in buckram, price 7s. 6d. net.

RAILWAY RUNS in THREE

CONTINENTS. A Short Record of Actual Performances on some European, Canadian, Australian, and American Railways. By J. T. BURTON ALEXANDER.

"Railway travellers in England and the Continent, the Americas, and Australia, will find much to interest them in Mr. Burton Alexander's notes of 'speed and distance'."

Daily News.
"Will be studied by many with keen interest." Morning Post.

SECOND EDITION. REVISED AND ENLARGED.

In demy 8vo, cloth, copiously illustrated. Price 7s. 6d.

COUTTS & CO., BANKERS.

EDINBURGH and LONDON. Being the Memoirs of a Family distinguished for its public services in England and Scotland. By RALPH RICHARDSON, F.R.S.E., F.S.A. Scot., Author of "Life and Pictures of George Morland," &c.

"Mr. Richardson's book is of considerable interest."

Spectator.

"A book in which there is not a dull page."—Literature.

"An admirable history. It is one of the most interesting books of the year. Surely no more romantic story was ever written."—Sketch.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

RUDOLPH SCHOLLE. A

Tragedy in Blank Verse. By E. G.

In small crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

ALL CHANGE. Jottings at the Junction of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. By WILFRED WOOLLAM, M.A., LL.M., Camb.

"A number of good and suggestive thoughts in poetry and prose dealing with various aspects of life in a sensible and practical spirit."—The Baptist Magazine.

"We can only describe these jottings as gems of thought. Some of them are conveyed in poetry, but for the most part they are expressed in cultured prose, and every one of them contains food for reflection, while the thought ranges over every conceivable subject."—The Derby Standard.

NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

In foolscap 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

FIRESIDE POEMS. By the Rev. ST. PATTON, M.A. (Oxon.).

In foolscap 4to, bound in cloth, price 5s.

EYES IN SOLITUDE. By Rev.

W. MOORE, Author of "Nocturnes, and other Poems," "Lost Chords," &c.

In crown 8vo, paper cover, price 6d.

THE DEAD VICTORS: a Poem

of the South African War, 1900.

ELLIOT STOCK 62 Paternoster Row,
London, E.C.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S POPULAR Novel,
"ELEANOR."

OVER 100,000 COPIES SOLD IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

NOTICE.—A FIFTH IMPRESSION of ELEANOR,
by MRS. HUMPHRY WARD, is now ready. With Illustrations by ALBERT STERNER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

LATEST PRESS OPINIONS:—

REVUE DES DEUX MONDES: "Le roman contient quelques-unes des scènes les plus émouvantes qu'ait jamais écrites l'auteur de Robert Elsmere et de Bessie Costrell. . . . Peu de romanciers anglais d'à présent savent, aussi bien que l'auteur d'Eleanor, dessiner de gracieuses figures de jeunes filles; et personne, peut-être, ne sait aussi bien qu'elle peindre un paysage, donner en quelques lignes l'impression vivante d'un coin de nature. . . . Personne, parmi les romanciers anglais contemporains, n'a plus que Mme. Humphry Ward le sentiment de la nature, ou tout au moins le talent de nous faire sentir la nature."

LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW—"A real love story, steeped in Italian sunshine, and rich in glimpses of Italian life and character. . . . Mrs. Ward has never given us a book that finds its way to one's heart so completely and gives such unmixed pleasure as this."

NEW IRELAND REVIEW—"The story, told with infinite pathos, is profoundly interesting, and the studies in character are done with that insight and profound subtlety for which Mrs. Ward is famous."

BRITISH WEEKLY—"Considered purely as a love story, this is certainly the best book that Mrs. Ward has written."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

NOW READY.

QUEEN VICTORIA SCENES FROM HER LIFE AND REIGN.

By G. A. HENTY.

Fully Illustrated. Paper, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

London: BLACKIE & SON, LIMITED, Old Bailey.

In crown 8vo volumes, cloth, 2s. 6d. each.

THE VICTORIAN ERA SERIES.

The series is designed to form a record of the great movements and developments during the reign of Queen Victoria, in politics, economics, religion, industry, literature, science, and art, and of the life work of its typical and influential men.

Tennyson. A Critical Study. By STEPHEN GWYNN, B.A.

John Bright. By C. A. VINCE, M.A.

Charles Dickens. By GEORGE GISSING.

Charles Kingsley. By the Very Rev. C. W. STUBBS, D.D., Dean of Ely.

The Earl of Beaconsfield. By HAROLD E. GORST.

Victorian Novelists. By JAMES OLIPHANT, M.A.

The Science of Life. By J. ARTHUR THOMSON, M.A. (Edin.).

Recent Advances in Astronomy. By A. H. FISON, D.Sc. (Lond.).

English National Education. By H. HOLMAN, M.A.

The Anglican Revival. By the Rev Canon OVERTON, D.D.

British Foreign Missions By the Rev. WARLAW THOMPSON and the Rev. A. N. JOHNSON, M.A.

The Rise of Democracy. By J. HOLLAND ROSE, M.A.

The Free-Trade Movement. By G. ARMITAGE-SMITH, M.A.

London in the Reign of Queen Victoria. By G. LAURENCE GOMME, F.S.A.

Provident Societies and Industrial Welfare. By E. W. BRABROOK, C.B.

The Growth and Administration of the British Colonies. By the Rev. W. P. GRESWELL, M.A.

London: BLACKIE & SON, LIMITED, Old Bailey.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

A NEW AND ABRIDGED EDITION.

THE LIFE OF EDWARD WHITE BENSON

(Sometime Archbishop of Canterbury).

By His Son, A. C. BENSON

Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUME READY ON TUESDAY.

MACMILLAN'S

LIBRARY OF ENGLISH CLASSICS.

THE COMPLETE ANGLER,

AND

THE LIVES OF DONNE, WOTTON, HOOKER,
HERBERT, AND SANDERSON.

By IZAAK WALTON.

Demy 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUME of the UNIFORM EDITION of RUDYARD KIPLING'S PROSE WRITINGS

THE NAULAHKA.

By RUDYARD KIPLING and WOLOOTT
BALESTIER.

Extra crown 8vo, bound in red cloth, with gilt top, price 6s.

Highways and Byways Series.—New Vol.

EAST ANGLIA.

By WILLIAM A. DUTT.

With Illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL.

Extra crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 6s.

THE LATEST NOVELS.

Price 6s. each.

RHODA BROUGHTON.

FOES IN LAW.

W. WALDORF ASTOR.

PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER, and other stories.

FRANCES M. PEARD.

NUMBER ONE and NUMBER TWO.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

THE PRIDE OF JENNICO.

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [Read on Tuesday.]

A NEW ISSUE OF THE

WORKS OF MARION CRAWFORD.

A New and Uniform Edition, in Fortnightly Volumes
Crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d. per Volume.

Latest Volume—ZOROASTER.

THE NOVELS OF

MRS. HENRY WOOD.

The New and Cheaper Editions, each Story in One Volume, crown 8vo, red cloth, price 2s. 6d., or in green cloth, price 2s., may be obtained at all Booksellers', where a Complete List of the 37 Stories may be seen.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s.—Contents for FEBRUARY.

THE SINNER and the PROBLEM. By ERIC PARKER.
Chapters XI.—XIV.

FRENCH and ENGLISH. By GEORGE H. ELY.

RHODESIA and NORTHWARDS. By S. C. NORMIS.

THE MISSIONARY in CHINA and ELSEWHERE. By H. C. MACDONALL.

WHEN THE BIG FISH FEED.

SOMETHING ABOUT CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

THE POLICE-OFFICER'S TALE. By H. FIELDING.

VITAL STATISTICS. By BENJAMIN TAYLOR.

THE CARDINAL'S AGENT. By GERALD BRENAK.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated.—Price 1s. 4d.—Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The FEBRUARY NUMBER contains—
THE HELPING HAND in EAST LONDON. By SIR WALTER
BESANT. Drawings by JOSEPH PENNELL and L. RAVEN-HILL.

THE PEOPLE at the TOP of the WORLD. A Tour through Siberia in Search of André. By JONAS STADLING. First Paper.

AN ENGLISH PASSION PLAY. By REBECCA HARDING DAVIS.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1501. Established 1869.

9 February, 1901.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper]

The Literary Week.

It is curious that our poets are so willing to utter themselves on public occasions, and so little able to do it with distinction. It has become natural to expect that they will fail; and there is certainly no need to apply criticism to their heartfelt utterances on the nation's recent loss. Enough to say that no poem on the subject has left a deep impression. The most interesting efforts, besides Mr. Hardy's, have been those of Mr. Meredith and Mr. Henley. The question, however, comes home more and more: Why do we not obtain better poetry? Is the answer this, that we get the poetry we deserve?

MR. HENLEY's ode appeared in the Morning Post last Saturday. It is rhetorical rather than poetical, and is curiously though vaguely echoic. Its most striking lines are these:

Tears for her—tears! Tears and the mighty rites
Of an everlasting and immense farewell,
England, green heart of the world, and you,
Dear demi-Englands, far-away isles of home,
Where the old speech is native, and the old flag
Floats, and the old irresistible call,
The o'er-word of so many ages of years,
Makes men in love
With toil for the race, and pain, and peril, and death!
Tears, and the dread, tremendous dirge
Of her brooding battleships, and hosts
Processional, with trailing arm; the plaint—
Measured, enormous, terrible—of her guns:
The appalling throb of bells; the blare
Of mourning trumpets; the discomfiting pomp
Of silent crowds, black streets, and banners—royal Obsequious!

THE Empire Review is the latest considerable undertaking in Imperial literature. Edited by Mr. C. Kinloch Cooke, and issued by Messrs. Macmillan, it promises to live up to its motto from—not Mr. Kipling—but Byron:

Far as the breeze can bear, the billows foam,
Survey our empire, and behold our home.

The editor has received encouragement in high places, and his first number is as wide and practical in its interests as could be wished. The Duke of Devonshire leads off with an article on "The British Empire." The price of the review, which is very neatly produced, is a shilling net.

LAST week we remarked that there might possibly be substance in the rumour which indicated the Duke of Argyll as Queen Victoria's biographer. Of course, no official announcement has been made, but it is certain that the Duke will write a life of the Queen. The commission, we understand, is from Messrs. Harmsworth, who will issue the book in sixpenny fortnightly parts. It will be called V.R.I., Her Life and Empire.

MR. HALL CAINE's new novel, The Eternal City, progresses, with the help of several huge pictures, through the pages of the Lady's Magazine. Part II., called "The Republic of Man," has been reached, and is accompanied by a summary of the first instalment, from which we extract the following trifle:

There is one thorn in the side of the all-powerful Minister. A great Parliamentarian has arisen on the Extreme Left. His name is David Rossi, he is a journalist and he is Member for Rome. Holding that Christ is law-giver for the nation as well as for the individual, he has adopted the Lord's Prayer as a political charter, and his particular dream is the establishment of a "Republic of Man," which is not intended to take the place of existing forms of government, but to be an international organisation like that which was started by the Irish Liberator, a State within the States, designed to enlighten the people, to watch parliaments, to canvas elections, and otherwise to govern according to the precepts of the Lord's Prayer the powers that govern the world.

CHRISTOPHER SMART'S A Song to David has just been added by Mr. Elkin Mathews to his Shilling "Garland" series. This poem was described by Rossetti as "the only great accomplished of the eighteenth century." Browning, says Mr. Streatfield in his Introduction, was the great apostle of Smart in our day. He himself was never tired of declaiming the "Song to David"; and in that one of his "Parleyings with Certain People of Importance in their Day" which is consecrated to Smart, he images his author's one outburst of genuine poetry in the similitude of a chapel of radiant beauty enshrined in a commonplace house.

"Smart's life," adds Mr. Streatfield, was a tale of debt, disease, and debauchery, and his poems—all save one—were the spiritless effusions of a literary hack; yet he had his one moment of inspiration, when at the hour of his deepest affliction, in the cell of a madhouse, he wrote his "Song to David," that wonderful burst of devotional rapture which has no parallel between the days of Crashaw and of Blake. Then for a moment he cast aside the scales with which custom and education had blinded his eyes, and let the poet within him look forth.

Johnson liked the man, and treated him with unvarying kindness, but he could not stomach his poetry. When asked whether he thought Derrick or Smart the better poet, he replied, "Sir, there is no settling the point of precedence between a louse and a flea." This, be it noted, was before the day of the "Song to David."

The Song to David was written during Smart's last sojourn at Bedlam.

MR. ZANGWILL's excursions into verse are few, but they are often successful. There is dignity in the hymn, "translated from the Hebrew," which he contributes to the current Jewish Quarterly Review. We quote the last two of its five stanzas:

He is the living God to save,
My rock while sorrow's toils endure,
My banner and my stronghold sure,
The cup of life when'er I crave.

I place my soul within his palm,
Before I sleep as when I wake,
And though my body I forsake,
Rest in the Lord in fearless calm.

THE familiar question of To Cut or Not to Cut? is debated once more by the Publishers' Circular. Our own reply, uttered more in anger than in sorrow, is Cut! The virtue of uncutness is a mere superstition in all but those special cases where ceremony seems ennobling to a noble volume. But to issue a six-shilling novel in an uncut state is merely to shirk the completion of the book, and to invite wrath and evil speaking from the reader. Minor poetry, too, should always be cut. It often amuses us to find a young poet, essayist, or novelist timidly and almost tearfully appealing for a hearing in his preface and leaving his wares shut up, and impregnable to all but the strongest paper-knife and the sweetest patience. In the critic's point of view we side with Mr. W. L. Courtney, whose opinion is thus given: "There are, I believe, some persons who like to cut the pages of books while they read them. I confess I am not of that number, and to me it is a great advantage to find either a magazine, or novel, or book easily accessible." Mr. Shaylor, of Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall, says:

I am decidedly of opinion that all fiction, juveniles, popular literature generally, and all magazines should be issued with cut edges. Publications of this kind are very often bought to read when going on a journey; nothing can make you feel more inclined to throw the book you have bought out of the window than to find it uncut; to use your finger or railway-ticket or borrow a hairpin is not always convenient.

We doubt, after all, whether uncut pages can be ultimately defended even in "the book beautiful." An uncut book is an unfinished book. We are aware that pretty things can be said about cutting books, and that the strokes of the paper-knife are considered by some as equivalent to a book-lover's caresses of a new love—but how often does the love prove worthy of such attentions?

THE editor of the Windsor Magazine unquestionably knows his business, and therefore an illustrated interview with Mr. Guy Boothby must be to the taste of his readers. But one is rather sorry for readers whose liking for an author's stories leads them into curiosity about his house, his gardens, his dogs, his billiard room, his favourite pony, and his rifle practice with clay pigeons. "After the fowls we visited the pigs . . .", &c. Here is the essence of the interview:

"Can you favour me with your views on the subject of art for art's sake, as applied to the successful novelist?"

It seemed to sound all right as I said it, but Mr. Boothby looked puzzled, as he mentally repeated the sentence to himself.

"I'm afraid," he said after a pause, "I haven't exactly got the hang of it, somehow. No doubt you're quite right, and all that sort of thing; but you come down to the kennels with me, and I'll show you a dog or two worth looking at."

We like Mr. Boothby's attitude; only it is just what we should have expected, and therefore hardly interesting.

WHAT the Windsor does for Mr. Boothby Ainslie's Magazine does, in much better style, for Mr. Richard Harding Davis. The opening is distinctly smart:

The people of two continents read what he writes. Why?

I put the last question to Richard Harding Davis while walking through a dingy side street in New York before Christmas, and the answer came in the form of a question.

"See that bar-tender?" pointing across the way where a low-browed man, with close-cropped hair and protruding jaw, was perched on a step-ladder festooning the doorway of a saloon with evergreens and holly.

"Yes," I replied.

"Well, what does that suggest to you?"

Inasmuch as I had seen similar beings engaged in a like task all over the city, the incident to me appeared commonplace, and a million other persons would have agreed with me.

But what Mr. Davis saw in it was that this man, who, a few hours before had probably been in a drunken patron's face and sent him home bruised and bleeding to his miserable family, should now be engaged in so cheerful and glad some a work. Such was the first thought that occurred to him. The motives of the bar-tender interested him. Had he been assigned as a reporter to write a story about that incident he would not have told the height of the ladder or the colour of the house. We know now what he would have told.

"That's your secret, then?" I asked. "You see things."

"Well, I try to," he replied. "I never walk one city block that I do not see twenty things to interest me. I tire my friends sometimes by pointing them out. Their minds run in different channels. But this ability to see things is my greatest joy in life, incidentally my living. I cultivated it when I began reporting, and to this day, if I see a man turn in a car to look out the window, I unconsciously turn with him. He may have observed something that escaped me—something that contains an element of human interest, and I hold no effort wasted that may add to this general cargo of life's impressions."

THAT is the way to interview an author. The interviewer, Mr. Allen Sangree, got other good stuff out of Mr. Davis, whose three rules of writing are these:

I use similes that the man at home can understand; secondly, I tell the thing as it impressed me when I first saw it; thirdly, I always tell the thing that most interests me.

The third rule was formed by Mr. Davis while watching a prize-fight:

It was the first one he had ever attended, and, while deeply fascinated with the tiger-like movements of the pugilists, the painful kiss of the five-ounce glove, and the spray of red blood, what interested him more was the conduct of the mayor. This city official sat near the ring, and everybody watched him; took their cue from him. The man's collar had lost its moorings behind, and, in consequence, all dignity. With each successive round it behaved more erratically, now moving up, now down, his honour clutching madly at times to hold it in place, so that the collar fairly reflected the fight. Instead of describing the various upper cuts and straight jabs, therefore, Davis merely described the struggle 'twixt the mayor and his collar.

STEVENSON, of course, comes into Davis's literary life as into the life of almost every young Anglo-Saxon writer of imagination. In this way. Stevenson's short story, "A Lodging for the Night," inspired Davis and his fellow reporters on the Philadelphia Press to write a letter of admiration to Stevenson at Samoa. Here is the reply, published by Ainslie's for the first time:

DEAR SIR,—Why, thank you very much for your frank, agreeable, and natural letter. It is certainly very pleasant that all you young fellows should enjoy my work, and get some good out of it; and it was very kind in you to write and tell me so. The tale of the suicide is excellently droll; and your letter, you may be sure, will be preserved. If you are to escape unhurt out of your present business you must be very careful, and you must find in your heart much constancy. The swiftly-done work of the journalist, and the cheap finish and ready-made methods to which it leads, you must try to counteract in private by writing with the most considerate slowness and on the most ambitious models. And when I say "writing"—O, believe me, it is re-writing that I have chiefly in mind. If you will do this, I hope to hear of you some day.

Please excuse this sermon from

Your obliged,

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

STEVENSON yet again. In the February Temple Bar there is an amusing account of him as he appeared, twenty years ago, to the guests in the Belvedere Hotel at Davos, when he was merely "a Mr. Stevenson" to the haphazard and non-literary crowd. The writer, Mr. Horace Vallings, was struck by his un-British suavity and his very British pluck. He was visibly an artist to the marrow; he derided much of Dickens, especially Esther Summerson; and if he played billiards it was with delight in mere knockabout operations. He was at his best after dinner in argument with a certain Professor. Once the Professor discussed Englishwomen, and the rallies became brisk.

"I don't care a rap for them," he ejaculated. "They are a poor, tame-spirited lot, not worth conquering. Your milk-and-water Englishwoman falls in love with you before you've had time to say ten words to her," and so on and so forth. "Now German women," he continued, after thus demolishing those of his own country, "are very different—"

"What!" cried Stevenson, with a theatrical outfling of both hands. "Do you talk of German women? I tell you, this neck is wet with the tears of German women!"

"Well, all I can say is," the Professor grunted sulkily, "I haven't found them like that myself."

"Haven't you?" shouted Stevenson, whose opponent was far from being a beauty-man. "Then, by Jupiter Ammon, it only shows how heavily handicapped you are in the race!" And, with that, he fell back into a corner, and clasping his lean body in both arms literally hugged himself.

Stevenson read Tennyson's "Lucknow" to an audience in the hotel drawing-room. "Too theatrical," "rather stagey," were the comments.

SOME months ago we gave our readers early information of the scope and aims of the New Liberal Review. The first number, under the editorship of Mr. Cecil B. Harmsworth and Mr. Hildebrand A. Harmsworth, fulfils the high expectations we then formed of the new venture. The review is a capital shilling's worth of opinion and criticism. Naturally its definite political bias is conspicuously represented by political articles, though even here we have a pleasant attempt on the part of Mr. E. T. Cook to claim Ruskin as a New Liberal. The literary interest centres in Prof. Dowden's article on "The Poetry of Mr. Kipling," and Mr. Max Beerbohm's light paper, "A Club in Ruins." There is also "A Defence of Professional Football," and an appreciation (illustrated) of Mr. F. C. Gould's caricature work.

PROF. EDWARD DOWDEN's estimate of Mr. Kipling's poetry is at once high and moderate. Mr. Kipling's verses, he points out, have at least carried power: "they have served to evoke or guide the feelings of nations, and to determine action in great affairs." And of all explanations of this fact the one which Prof. Dowden rejects with least hesitation is that which makes of Mr. Kipling a successful music-hall singer. "He has . . . touched the solemn organ-stops; and it is precisely to such a poem as 'Recessional,' with its old prophetic strain, its warning against vain idols and folly and carnal pride, that the deepest response of our race is made." The truth is, we think, that Mr. Kipling's voice is the nation's, not his own; and it is when it is most the nation's that it is impressive. With him any running on in superfluous numbers is fatal—a mere twanging in the wind and a facile habit of rhythm. But when he is full-charged with the nation's own passion (which presupposes that the nation has a passion), then he prevails. Always Mr. Kipling succeeds best as poet-anticipator, poet-interpreter.

WHAT of Mr. Kipling's Imperialism? Has he overshot the mark? Is he in danger of becoming the mere fugleman of reckless expansion? Prof. Dowden thinks not. Mr. Kipling's feeling of Empire is solemnised by the weight of real things, and by a knowledge of the cost of Empire:

The price of admiralty is blood, and "Lord God, we ha' paid in full." But the whisper, and the vision that called the dreamers, whose dreams were prophecy, to go forth and leave their bones on the sand-driit, on the veldt-side, in the fern-scrub, still summon our gentlemen adventurers, and the dead cry to us:

Follow after, follow after! We have watered the root,
And the bud has come to blossom that ripens for fruit.

It is no lust of territory or empty pride of power that can help us to sustain the white man's burden; we bear it because this also is in the day's work appointed for us by the Master of all good workmen:

Keep ye the Law—be swift in all obedience—

Clear the land of evil, drive the road and bridge the ford.

Make ye sure to each his own

That he reap where he hath sown;

By the peace among Our peoples let men know we serve the Lord!

Such is the religious feeling for Empire. If the banjo is strummed, it seems as if a Puritan of the old Inside breed were the minstrel. Cromwell, after the victory of Dunbar, addressed the Speaker in words which go to the same manly tune.

Do you want to read a "nice" French novelist? Mr. Edmund Gosse recommends, in the Contemporary Review, the novels of M. René Bazin, whose work has lately come to the front, not exactly as a force in literature, but as a wholesome and pleasing ingredient. Mr. Gosse "places" him with great care, taking the trouble to survey the changes in French fiction since Balzac. Hence his article is something more than an introduction to Bazin. Mr. Gosse thinks it possible that the French novelists of these last five years have been trying to be a great deal too clever, that they have starved the large reading public with the extravagant intellectuality of their stories. Whether that be so or not, it is at least pleasant to have one man writing, in excellent French, refined, cheerful, and sentimental novels of the most ultra-modest kind, books that every girl may read, that every guardian of youth may safely leave about in any room of the house. I do not say—I am a thousand miles from thinking—that this is everything; but I protest—even in face of the indignant Bar of Bruges—that this is much.

M. BAZIN has been writing for fifteen years, and his best known stories are Ma Tante Giron, Une Tache d'Encre, La Sarcelle Bleue, Madame Corentine, and La Terre qui Meurt. In conclusion Mr. Gosse says:

In a very old-fashioned book, that nobody reads now, Alfred de Musset's Confession d'un Enfant du Siècle, there is a phrase which curiously prefigures the ordinary French novelists of to-day. "Voyez," says the hero of that work, "voyez comme ils parlent de tout: toujours les termes les plus crus, les plus grossiers, les plus abjects; ceux-là seulement leur paraissent vrais; toute le reste n'est que parade, convention et préjugés. Qu'ils racontent une anecdote, qu'ils rendent compte de ce qu'ils ont éprouvé,—toujours le mot sale et physique, toujours la lettre, toujours la mort." What an exact prediction; and it is to the honour of M. Bazin that all the faults of judgment and proportion which are here so vigorously stigmatised are avoided by his pure and comfortable talent.

MARK TWAIN, by all accounts, is pursuing his new rôle of social ameliorator. Irony is one of his weapons, and he has just used it with effect at a dinner given him by the St. Nicholas Society in New York. With a solemn face he praised the municipal government of New York in the following terms: ". . . Gentlemen, you have the very best municipal government in the whole world,—and the most fragrant,—and you got it by your unfaltering devotion to civic duty. By your conscientious exercise of the burdens of citizenship you have made the city what it is, and God will bless you for it, and when you die and go to Heaven the angels will shout: 'Here they come! Here they come! The model citizens of the world! Show them into the archangels' box and turn the limelight on them." Then, says the report, he sat down, and the sons of St. Nicholas began their thinking.

OUR "Things Seen" column is bombarded daily with contributions, and it is a matter of regret to us that so very few of these can be accepted. Too many of our contributors forget that it is not enough to observe and report an incident. Literary form and grace must be given to the work. Here is a "Thing Seen" that we have received this week. It has good points, but it is too much like a newspaper paragraph:

It was the morning after the Great Queen's funeral. Outside the shuttered newspaper shop a Salvation Army band was stationed. I stepped in, and my glance met the penetrating gaze of the Captain. Will he rebuke me?—and, breathing defiance, I laid down my penny. Coming out, his voice rose clear in the morning air: "Lads, let us pray!" Moved by an irresistible impulse, I stood still. "O Lord Jesus Christ, wherever a paper is sold in this road on Thine own day, bless Thou the selling of it. Amen. Now, chaps, march!" They wended their way briskly up the hill, and I, with a Sunday paper tucked into my muff, went slowly on to church.

Bibliographical.

THE late Mr. Cordy Jeaffreson did not produce, after all, so very many separate works—only some dozen novels, and about seventeen miscellaneous works, original or edited. The novels may be dismissed very briefly. The first, Crews Rise, came out in 1854; the last, Cutting for Partners, in 1890. I fear not one of them is destined to survive the author. Mr. Jeaffreson's most notable performances were in the direction of anecdotal biography—The Life of Robert Stephenson (1864), A Young Squire of the Seventeenth Century (1878), The Real Lord Byron (1883), The Real Shelley (1885), Lady Hamilton and Lord Nelson (1887, revised and augmented 1897), The Queen of Naples and Lord Nelson (1889), and Victoria, Queen and Empress (1893). Next to these in popularity came the Books "about" Doctors (1860), Lawyers (1866), the Clergy (1870), and The Table (1874), and, likewise, Brides and Bridals (1872). The Annals of Oxford appeared in 1870; the Middlesex Records and Leicester Manuscripts in 1887 and 1878 respectively. Readable and not uninteresting was his Novels and Novelists from Elizabeth to Victoria (1858); and the same description might be applied to his Recollections (1893), of which the publishers might usefully produce a new edition—though I would suggest that the work should be carefully condensed and issued in a single volume. Some of the chapters are really valuable, and the details about the writer's family and youth could easily be "cut."

In entitling his new play "War," Mr. Heinemann was, no doubt, perfectly well aware that he was following in the footsteps of an earlier dramatist. It is almost exactly thirty years since T. W. Robertson's "War" was produced at the St. James's Theatre, London. It was the author's last work, and was unlucky from the first—unlucky in the title's apparent allusion to the Franco-Prussian struggle, in the fact that Robertson had been too ill to "stage-manage" it, and in the further fact that it had not the advantage of the Bancroftian prestige. Mr. Lionel Brough and Miss Fanny Brough were both in it, but the cast, as a whole, was poor. Produced on January 16, 1871, the play was performed for the last time on February 3—the day on which its author drew his last breath. Practically, the piece does not now exist, so that, after all, Mr. Heinemann has the field to himself.

The late Mr. Haweis can hardly be said to have produced literature, but he was certainly at one time a very popular writer, whose books could be trusted to sell well. His Music and Morals reached a seventeenth edition in 1896, and we all remember the vogue of Arrows in the Air, Current Coin, Poets in the Pulpit, Speech in Season, Thoughts for the Times, and so forth. In the 'eighties came his Christ and Christianity (in five volumes, I think), his Doctrines and Practice, his Winged Words, his American Humourists, and My Musical Life, the last two of which are likely to live some time by reason of their subjects. The very last attained its fourth edition in 1896. To the 'nineties belong The Broad Church and The Dead Pulpit, Ideals for Girls, Old Violins, a biography of Sir Morell Mackenzie, and two volumes of Travel and Talk, embodying the writer's impressions of distant lands.

Messrs. Downey's illustrated edition of some of Gaboriau's stories will, of course, be welcome, but we must not forget that the French writer has already been made familiar to English readers of late years by translations of his works issued both by Routledge and by Vizetelly between 1883 and 1889. Of File 113, Marie de Brinvilliers (Amours d'une Empoisonneuse), The Mystery of Orcival, and The Widow Lerouge, the first-named firm issued cheap editions in 1894-97. It is not always easy, unhappily, to trace the original tales in the titles given to the English versions of them. Thus La Vie Infernale figures as The Count's Secret; another story is called indifferently Caught in the Net and The Slaves of Paris, while a third has been named In Deadly Peril, In Peril of His Life, and Within an Inch of His Life.

The Edinburgh Bibliographical Society has, I understand, a rule rigidly limiting the issue of printed papers to its seventy members; but this is to be broken for once in favour of a Presidential Address, on "Some Aspects of Bibliography," by Prof. Ferguson of Glasgow University. A strong desire having been expressed that bookmen outside the Society should have an opportunity of obtaining the address, a limited small-paper edition has been printed, and will be published this month by Mr. George P. Johnston, Edinburgh. Since its delivery the address has been revised, and an illustrative list of bibliographies has been appended.

The announcement of a new book of verse by Mrs. Hamilton King will recall old memories to many. Mrs. King is in her sixty-first year, and her literary productiveness has extended over a pretty long period. Her latest publication, I believe, was in 1895—a volume of poems called The Prophecy of Westminster. Her Ballads of the North, and Other Poems, belongs to 1889; her Book of Dreams to 1883. She is still best known—where known at all, in these days of multitudinous singers—by her Disciples, the outcome of her enthusiasm for Italy and Mazzini.

The volume of Elizabethan Critical Essays which the Oxford University Press is to give us will include, no doubt, such works as Sidney's Apology for Poetry, Puttenham's Art of English Poesy, and so forth. It is only fair to remember that the two treatises named, and others of a like nature, were long ago reprinted in a cheap and handy form by Mr. Arber, whose series of such texts was reissued by Messrs. Constable five or six years ago.

It is good news that we are soon to have the third volume of Mr. Gardiner's History of the Commonwealth and the Protectorate. The first volume (1649-1651) came out in 1894, the second (1651-1654) in 1897. The third volume is to carry on the narrative to 1666. It will be remembered that Mr. Gardiner's history of The Great Civil War covers the ground between 1642 and 1649.

I observe that though Mr. Wratishaw, in his new study of Mr. Swinburne's writings, gives a list of the poet's successive publications, he supplies no bibliographical details. There is, therefore, still room for a new edition, brought down to date, of the Swinburne Bibliography which appeared in 1887. Who will undertake this?

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Why Do They Do It?

Phaethon. By Henry Abbey. (New York: Styles & Kiersted.)

The Sacrifice: Redemption's Story. By A. Messenger. (Mowbray.)

Under Arms. By Charles Doughty. (Constable.)

Ode to Lord Roberts. By Philip S. Clay. (Russell.)

As the Wind Stirs. By B. G. Hoare. (Simpkin, Marshall.)

Dirge of the Year 1900. By Robert Bell. (Glasgow: Holmes.)

A Jingle of Rhymes. By Charles Morse. (Nottingham: Pallas Press.)

Irene. By W. Keppel Honywill. (South-Eastern Herald.)

Excursions. By William Griffith. (Co. Kansas: Hudson-Kimberley Company.)

The Wisdom of Nathan Gray. By Denis Davies. (Simpkin, Marshall.)

THESE ten volumes belong to the category of books that ought not to have been written. There is not one of them in which the most genial critic, if he were honest and fairly intelligent, could find anything to commend, of which the author, so far as his service to humanity goes, would not have been better occupied—we do not say in digging a garden or watching upon the veldt, but in guarding the lines of communication, balancing a ledger, or putting up sugar in blue paper. Yet here they are, ten in number, and destined, we suppose, to occupy a foot-run of space upon the shelves of the British Museum in perpetuity. They represent precisely one week's crop of such things upon our table. And they offer an interesting subject of investigation to the student of Anglo-Saxon culture. Why were they written?

This is not the old question of minor poetry. Minor poets are as God made them, and they have their uses in the world. They say a thing here, a thing there, which the great masters have missed, and so earn their scanty wages of bread and honey. The differentia between major and minor is rather one of scope and staying power than of essential poetic quality. The ACADEMY in its day has had occasion to speak kindly of much good minor poetry, and to deal gently, and let us hope faithfully, with much that was not quite so good. At the worst, the minor poets boil down some day into excellent anthologies. But these authors are not minor poets. They are not poets at all. Criticism has really nothing whatever to say to them. They do not require appreciation, for there is nothing to appreciate. They do not even require condemnation, for they are self-condemned from the egg. Their only interest is for the psychologist, curious of the psychical and social conditions under which poetry comes to be written, and those under which what is not poetry comes, by the writer or others, to be taken as poetry. It will, perhaps, be kind, both to the writers and to our readers, not to fill these columns with very many samples of what they are capable of. Indeed, the irretrievably tenth-rate and imitative, both in sentiment and phrase, hardly bears quotation even in a spirit of levity. A few of the more astounding misconceptions of what is meant by literature must suffice. What, for instance, are we to think of a man who, at the end of the nineteenth century, sits down to write the whole history of the New Testament in sixteen cantos and three thousand three hundred and ninety-nine lines of wooden blank verse?

THE PROLOGUE.

The vehicle of verse, all must allow,
Has been most nobly used by noble men,
In epic poems of immortal worth,
To set forth Pagan lore or things Divine,
Some feat of warfare ne'er to be forgot,
A valiant deed by land or sea, some theme,
Romantic, tragic, light, or beautiful.
And verse in diverse forms has ever been
In use for songs of praise and prayer to God,
But not, methinks, to teach in simple words
The truths Divine of our most holy faith,
Or to recount the life and death of Him
Who is the Champion of our fallen race.
And yet these truths concern all human kind
In a degree too great to be expressed.
I ween that verse might oft the teacher be
Of that which Christians should both know and do.
The truths thus versified might stimulate
Some docile, youthful, or awakened minds
To read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest
That which in stately prose they failed to learn.
In mediæval times, such verse was writ
To fire our youth with patriotic zeal,
To hand down facts that make our history,
And to impress great lessons on the mind.
To write a nation's ballads was esteemed
A greater work than to draw up her laws.
Though in this age of print its use is less,
Perhaps these verses may some help afford
To those who read them for the truth therein,
And for this end alone they have been penned,
A sermon, if you will, as short or long
As you have time or inclination for.

From the Sunday-school to the barrack-room. For a sure touch upon the bathetic, the three patriotic poets upon our list run even A Messenger (is it a name or a description?) hard. Mr. Charles Doughty, indeed, whose ideal of style consists in the inversion of every grammatical form that can by any possibility be inverted, seldom stops short of incoherence. As thus:

Pleasant, pitched in the field, in hostile soil,
The common canvas is which shelters soldiers,
Wherein, in aught brief daily pause of arms,
We rest, we eat, sing, discourse of this war,
Furbish our weapons, and who mend their cloth.

Or thus:

We bare our heads at an unlettered grave,
Which mark few gathered stones in land far off,
Whereunder some slain soldier glorious sleeps.
Returned his comrades, they the pit, they digged
In haste, have deckt, lo! round as maiden neat.

Mr. Robert Bell makes the year 1900 say:

I have beheld the primitive Chinese,
Pig-headed and pig-tailed monstrosity;
Cruel and cunning to the last degree,
Reap the fruit of his animosity.

Likewise:

I have heard men, without the blush of shame,
Uphold the Boer, cast obloquy on Joe;
Blaspheming justice in their country's name,
And why? that they might to St. Stephen's go.

Mr. Philip S. Clay is more ambitious, but he certainly does not escape the pitfalls that lie in wait for such as go about to write odes:

With Marlborough's wisdom, Wellington's resolve,
Distinguished Roberts did design,
Arrange, and from distraction dire evolve
The true campaign and its clear course define;
By contemplation deep, experience true,
The ancient art of war by rote he knew.

Hold! hold yon shells in check, ye gunners grim!
 Halt! halt your bold assault, ye infantry!
 Ye whirlwind horse, in the blue distance dim,
 Curb back your pawing steeds! Behold! 'tis he!
 The dark-browed tiger of dread Pocheftroom
 Comes slowly, tamely forth to meet his doom.

Probably no one reason is sufficient to explain how such things, and countless others of a similar calibre, come to be written. Doubtless, as books get cheaper and more people learn to read, the local status of a poet becomes an object of desire. Though the books reach us not by single spies, but in whole battalions, the authors are isolated. Every youth who has printed a volume wears his separate halo of romance in the eyes of the companions of his literary institute. A copious lack of critical sense comes to the rescue. The halting rhythms and borrowed sentiments are fondly deemed indistinguishable from Tennyson. Whether the truth ever dawns upon the victim of his own self-esteem, we do not know. Perhaps he has a suspicion of it, when his publisher's bill reveals the fact that precisely five copies, besides those distributed to friends and the unfortunate reviewers, have been disposed of. Perhaps the irreverence of the next generation hints it to him. But it is more probable that he goes down to his grave with a faith in posterity and a conviction that all really great writers—a Keats, a Browning—have had to wait for their recognition. Nevertheless, vanity and the ill effects of undigested reading, although they explain a good deal, are not a sufficient account of the whole matter. Strange as it may appear, some at least of these extraordinary poems seem to us to be genuinely meant. Objectively valueless, they spring from the subjective fount of all poetry, the spontaneous overflow of feelings too intense to find their appropriate expression in prose or silence. They partake of the artless nature of folk-song. But, of course, folk-song was never intended for the permanence of print.

It must be added that the incompetence of some reviewers has much to answer for in this accumulation of biblia a-biblia. If a man is persistently told, by people who ought to know better, that he is a poet, how is he ever to realise that he is not? And apparently there is no rubbish so rubbishy that it will not find laudation somewhere. Take, for instance, the author of Phaethon. The Toronto Week says that his "lips have been touched with the sacred fire." The Memphis Sunday Times considers him "an original thinker," and the Buffalo Commercial "a poet of fine attainments." The Chataquan dwells on his "melody and subtle perfection of phrase." Even our own London contemporaries join in the chorus. The Literary World finds his work "an intellectual treat," and the Spectator declares that it shows "an exceptional power of melodious composition." Mr. Abbey's earlier poems, to which these remarks immediately refer, are not before us. But open Phaethon, and you find him capable of writing thus:

For as a ship unballasted is toss'd,
 Unsteadily careening o'er the surge,
 So did the chariot leap, or swerve and sway,
 And, like an empty one, was flung about.
 Aroused thereat, the steeds rushed fiercely on;
 But not in order as they did before.
 They turned aside and left the beaten track,
 And Phaeton himself is sore alarm'd;
 For, now the way is lost, and were it found,
 He could not manage the gigantic steeds.
 He does not know their names; oh, that he did!
 For names, if kindly spoken, pacify.

We do not see how the critical banner is to be upheld when recognised authorities go out of their way to encourage Mr. Abbey.

In G Flat.

The New English Dictionary: Green to Gyzarn. Edited by Henry Bradley. (Clarendon Press. 5s.)

THIS Green to Gyzarn part of the New English Dictionary is full of interesting word-biographies. Into its wide flat pages Mr. Henry Bradley has shepherded no fewer than 4,238 words, against the 296 recognised by Dr. Johnson within the same alphabetical limits. These figures are eloquent witness to the giant reach and power of modern editing. If in these century-century years we are producing scant literary fruit and no haunting fragrances, we are at least making wood on a splendid scale. The "Series," the Introduction, the Bibliography, the Index, the Definitive Edition, the Dictionary, the Encyclopedia—these are our prize growths and our indubitable gift to those who will follow us. The New English Dictionary is the greatest, and necessarily the slowest, product of this ministering scholarship. It is vast enough in its scope and minute enough in its detail to amaze ourselves equally with posterity. As the drab-covered parts follow each other from Oxford the wonder grows that so much lore can be collected, marshalled, and made articulate. The part which lies before us, judged by Dr. Johnson's standard of achievement, ought to be the work of a scholar's life-time. But to Mr. Henry Bradley, its editor, it has been one of many such tasks achieved or contemplated.

Looking into these brilliantly constructed pages one quickly observes the several kinds of entertainment offered. There is the interest of etymology; there is the interest of sense-development; there is the interest of special cases—freaks of word-making. Take the last first. There are people, doubtless, who have still to learn the origin of Mrs. Grundy. Mr. Bradley had here no difficult task. It is beyond a doubt that this popular and useful phrase has stuck in English ears since it came across the footlights in 1798, when Tom Morton's play, "Speed the Plough," held the boards of a London theatre. Quoth Dame Ashfield: "If shame should come to the poor child [her daughter]—I say, Tummas, what would Mrs. Grundy say then?" To which Farmer Ashfield replies: "Dom Mrs. Grundy; what wou'd my poor wold heart zay?" And again: "Be quiet, woolye? Aleways ding, dinging Dame Grundy into my ears. What will Mrs. Grundy zay? What will Mrs. Grundy think?" The phrase—say, rather, the woman—was organised for long life, and nearly sixty years later Frederick Locker Lampson could write:

And many are afraid of God
 And more of Mrs. Grundy.

Grundyism, Grundified, Grundyish, Grundyist, and Grundyite are the verbal dependents of "Mrs. Grundy." Lady Burton, in her life of her husband, has this happy turn: "The usual small worries and Grundified conventions that form the cab shafts of domestic life in civilisation."

Another word, born not of ancient lineage but of apt occasion is Grog. Mr. Bradley does not dispute its derivation from Admiral Vernon's nickname, Old Grog or Grogram, bestowed on him by his sailors in consequence of his habit of wearing a cloak made of grogram, a fabric of silk mixed with mohair or other strong material. The name was transferred to the mixture of rum and water which the admiral ordered to be served out, before his victory at Portobello, in place of the neat rum to which sailors were then accustomed. Vernon's order, dated August, 1740, is still extant. One of the first questions ever addressed to Notes and Queries was "The origin of the word Grog?" and in the issue of January 12, 1850, a correspondent quoted a ballad made by Dr. Trotter "on board the Berwick, a few days before Admiral Parker's engagement with the Dutch fleet on the 5th of August, 1781." This little ballad seems to be worth putting once more on record:

'Tis sung on proud Olympus' hill,
The Muses bear record,
Ere half the gods had drank their fill
The sacred nectar sour'd.

At Neptune's toast the bumper stood,
Britannia crown'd the cup;
A thousand Nereids from the flood
Attend to serve it up.

"This nauseous juice," the monarch cries,
"Thou darling child of fame,
Tho' it each earthly clime denies,
Shall never bathe thy name.

Ye azure tribes that rule the sea,
And rise at my command,
Bid VERNON mix a draught for me
To toast his native land."

Swift o'er the waves the Nereids flew,
Where VERNON's flag appear'd;
Around the shores they sung True Blue,
And Britain's hero cheer'd.

A mighty bowl on deck he drew,
And filled it to the brink;
Such drank the Burford's gallant crew,
And such the gods shall drink.

The sacred robe which Vernon wore
Was drenched within the same;
And hence his virtues guard our shore
And GROG derives its name.

After this it is rather melancholy to consider the meanings of "groggy." Another connection with a person, real or imaginary, is that which Prof. Skeat has suggested as accounting for the word Gun. He thinks that the Middle English gunne may represent a hypocoristic form of a Scandinavian female compounded with Gunn-. Mr. Bradley approves the suggestion, of which he says: "This conjecture receives strong confirmation from the fact (communicated to us by Mr. W. H. Stevenson) that an account of munitions at Windsor Castle in 1330-1 (Exchequer Accts. Q. R. Bundle 18, no. 34, Pub. Rec. Office) mentions 'una magna balista de cornu quæ vocatur Domina Gunilda.' There are other instances of the practice of bestowing female personal names on engines of war; but there was no distinguished lady named Gunilda (= Old Norse Gunnhild-r; spelt Gunnild in Havelok) in the fourteenth century, and it seems highly probable that this use of the name may have come down from Scandinavian times, when its exceedingly appropriate etymology would be understood (both gunn-r and hild-r mean 'war'). If Gunnhild-r, as is likely, was a name frequently given to ballistæ and the like, it would naturally, on the introduction of gunpowder, be given also to cannon. Indeed, there is some appearance of evidence that an explosive engine was actually called by this name many years before the earliest recorded instance of the use of gunpowder in warfare." This is the very romance of language; and, as is rarely the case where romance creeps in, the theory has the support of scholars, including Mr. Bradley. The developed uses of the word are curious. We are not told how a person of distinction came to be called a "great gun," but instances are given of the usage from 1815 downwards. A thief, in thieves' language, is a gun. In his Tales of Mean Streets, Mr. Morrison has: "Circumstances had always been against Scuddy Lond, the gun." A flagon of ale was called a gun, and the word is used in that sense by Evelyn. A son of a gun was therefore a jovial fellow, and it may be that "great gun," as applied to a clever man, is connected with this use. All these senses seem to have been wrested from the original gun, a weapon.

Sense development without any special piquancy may be studied with advantage in the word ground. Its progress from material to immaterial applications is gradual and interesting. Slowly it came to signify that on which a system or condition of things is founded. In this sense the word is now rare. Walton has "These and the May-fly are the ground of all fly-Angling"; and, in 1870, Prof. Jevons wrote (Elements of Logic, xxvi. 219): "Upon a similar ground rests all the vast body of certain knowledge." In a sense later ground and grounds mean the fundamental principle or elements of a study. The "grounds of science," the "grounds of learning," the "grounds of the law of England," are expressions no longer heard, though the verb "to ground" (a pupil) in a science or in the laws of England survives. The word now signifies the smaller foundation or reason of an opinion or statement "often with additional implication: a valid reason."

The act of swallowing without inquiry or discrimination seems to be at the bottom of the figurative use of Gudgeon as a credulous gullible person. That Gull, in the same sense, has a similar origin is not so clear, but this may be reasonably suspected, whether we connect the word with Gull, obsolete for throat, or with Gull, an unfledged, voracious bird.

A glance under Gush reveals the fact that only as early as 1864 was the word commonly used in the sense of to act or speak effusively, and it was then considered as slang. A writer in Fraser's Magazine, November, 1864, had: "Donald did not belong to what, in the slang of translated Cockneys, is called the Gushing School"; and a year later Miss Braddon wrote: "A gushing damsel of thirty-five."

Gust, meaning savour, flavour, or relish, seems to be undeservedly neglected nowadays, as the following examples may help to indicate:

A woman who gets the command of money for the first time upon her marriage has such a gust in spending it that she throws it away with great profusion.—Dr. Johnson.

I had no gust to antiquities.—Defoe.

The whole vegetable tribe have lost their gust with me. Only I stick to asparagus.—Charles Lamb.

The discussion is not yet obsolete, and it may still offer all the gust of novelty.—l'Israeli.

To conclude. Do you write grey or gray? If you are wise you write both, giving to each its special application. Exactly what that application should be is not so easily expressed; but who does not feel that some things are grey, and others gray? Mr. Bradley tells us of an inquiry into the question of usage made by Dr. Murray in 1893. The replies showed that "in Great Britain the form grey is the more frequent in use, notwithstanding the authority of Johnson and later English lexicographers, who have all given the preference to gray. In answer to questions as to their practice, the printers of the Times stated that they always used the form gray; Messrs. Spottiswoode and Messrs. Clowes always used grey; other eminent printing firms had no fixed rule. Many correspondents said that they used the two forms with a difference of meaning or application, the distinction most generally recognised being that grey denotes a more delicate or a lighter tint than gray. Others considered the difference to be that gray is a 'warmer' colour, or that it has a mixture of red or brown. There seems to be nearly absolute unanimity as to the spelling of 'The Scots Greys,' a pair of greys." Yet grey has more of sentiment, gray more of colour.

Translation.

Anthology of French Poetry (Tenth to Nineteenth Centuries).
By Henry Carrington. (Frowde. 2s. 6d.)

DEAN CARRINGTON is already known by a volume of translations from Victor Hugo, from which some pieces are reprinted in the present volume. As he has thus had the opportunity of revising these translations, we will quote one of them as a specimen of his skill in rendering French verse into English. Perhaps no poem of Victor Hugo has tempted so many translators as the two stanzas, "A une Femme," in Les Feuilles d'Automne. It has that apparent simplicity which seems so easy, and is really so difficult, to render. We will give it first in the original:

Enfant ! si j'étais roi, je donnerais l'empire,
Et mon char, et mon sceptre, et mon peuple à genoux,
Et ma couronne d'or, et mes bains de porphyre,
Et mes flottes, à qui la mer ne peut suffire,
Pour un regard de vous !

Si j'étais Dieu, la terre et l'air avec les ondes,
Les anges, les démons courbés devant ma loi,
Et le profond chaos aux entrailles fécondes,
L'éternité, l'espace, et les cieux et les mondes,
Pour un baiser de toi !

Here is Dean Carrington's translation :

Maiden, were I a king, the monarchy
And subject millions I would all resign—
Power, pomp, and state, and purple luxury,
Armies unmatched, and fleets that sway the sea—
For one kind look of thine.

And were I Jove, I would Olympus' height
Forego, with its eternity of bliss,
My reign o'er gods and men, my thunder's might
Through earth and heaven, maiden, wouldst thou requite
My passion with a kiss.

It seems to us that these few lines contain almost every fault of which a translation is capable. It misses, to begin with, the whole significance of the "vous" of the first stanza, and the "toi" of the second, as well as the antithesis of "regard" and "baiser." Now the poem was undoubtedly written for the sake of those two lines, their balance and contrast. To lose the effect of those two lines is to lose the whole effect of the poem. But this is not all. Every significant detail has lost the main part of its meaning. How characteristic of Hugo's rhetoric is the line:

Et mes flottes, à qui la mer ne peut suffire.

How miserable in sound, how meaningless in sense, is Dean Carrington's line:

Armies unmatched, and fleets that sway the sea !

Who would recognize Hugo's "peuple à genoux" in "subject millions," or his "bains de porphyre" in "purple luxury"? How confusing is the introduction of Jove and Olympus, and how utterly the whole second stanza goes to pieces, as the translator changes every precise word into a vague word, and every definite statement into a generalised statement! Keeping, as he may think, fairly close to the original, he has produced something which is not only not a poem of even third-rate quality in English, but gives no suggestion, as even a bad rendering may sometimes give, of the author's intention. We have beside us a volume called A Century of French Verse, by William John Robertson, published in 1895, and it may be instructive to compare with Dean Carrington's translations the translation of the same poem contained in this volume. The first stanza is not very satisfactory, but the second stanza has at least something of the large sweep of Hugo's verse, and its hurrying rapture. Here it is:

If I were God, the earth and the luminous deeps that span it,
Angels and demons bowed beneath my word divine,
Chaos profound, with flanks of flaming gold and granite,
Eternity, and space, and sky and sun and planet,
All for one kiss of thine !

Something of Hugo's simplicity is gone; "flanks of gleaming gold and granite" is much more a matter of sound and much less a matter of imaginative significance than "aux entrailles fécondes"; but how different is the effect from Dean of Carrington's timid and frigid lines! Happening by chance to come across Mr. Robertson's volume, we have had the curiosity to compare many of his translations with those of Dean Carrington. They are often so good, always so sympathetic to every shade of meaning and every subtlety of metre, that we cannot help going out of our way to recommend to English readers a book which seems to us to give a better notion of modern French verse than anything with which we are acquainted. The introduction and the notices of the writers are not less capable than the translations. But to return to Dean Carrington: here is a vast labour, done, his daughter tells us, "for his own pleasure"; and, therefore, not altogether wasted, so far as he himself is concerned. But how pathetically useless are translations in verse when they are of this jog-trot kind, done to order, even if only to the order of a personal inclination! Love of translating and capacity for translation are two very different things, which seem rarely to go together. Here is a translator, who has been diligent, has done his best, has, perhaps, more or less satisfied himself; and what is the result of all his painstaking ingenuity? A book which adds no new poem to English, and does but disguise the beauty of many poems in French.

A Serious Century.

Puritan and Anglican: Studies in Literature. By Edward Dowden. (Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d.)

PURITANISM is dualistic in its philosophy: the works of the flesh are evil altogether, man's best righteousness but filthy rags, the beauty and the joy of life and the wisdom of the world a snare. Thus "its cardinal error lay in a narrow conception of God as the God of righteousness alone, and not as also the God of joy and beauty and intellectual light." Its antithesis is the catholic conception, according to which the two spheres of sense and spirit seem to melt into each other, as Dr. Martineau phrased it, "under the mediation of a kind of divine chemistry." This readiness to recognise the identity of "the good" with "that which is" makes of Catholicism a focus of art, while Puritanism unmixed is sterile.

In the England that emerged from the turmoil of the Reformation settlement, and more particularly in its ecclesiastical aspect, these notes are found in combination. No less heartily than their Continental models did the English reformers rebuke what they deemed the fetish-worship that had invaded the mediæval sanctuary; but their iconoclasm stopped short of the last excesses, and the generation that succeeded them entered into a religious heritage from which the sensuous element had not altogether been ousted. Above all, if the relics, the images, the pictures, had been thrown out or cast down they had held always to the Book. It was in the inspired pages of the Old and New Testaments that the sternest spirits still found their model and their method. Thus you have the Puritan Milton presenting a material heaven, angels who fling rocks and fire off heavy batteries of artillery, angels who dine and digest, a Messiah who, seated in His chariot, bears upon His side a bow and quiver. And Baxter, after guiding his reader among the white-robed saints and rehearsing the delights of heaven, concludes: "I would not have thee, as the Papists, draw them in pictures nor use mysterious significant ceremonies to represent them. This, as it is a course forbidden by God, so it would seduce and draw down thy heart; but get the liveliest picture of them in thy mind that possibly thou canst."

We have here indicated the line of thought pursued by Prof. Dowden in his first essay. Thereafter he proceeds to spread himself among writers of the seventeenth century, whom by personal predilection he delights to honour, and who in a greater or less measure exemplify the influence of the Puritan spirit. Here you have Sir Thomas Browne, "the mystic on whom the man of science had been grafted"; here is that apostle of sweetness and light who, in the days of Milton, the Berserker controversialist, could predict a time when "three words uttered with charity and meekness should receive a far more blessed reward than three thousand volumes written with disdainful sharpness of wit," and whose mind of wide embrace could not proceed to the justification of the wedding ring, the sign of the cross, the surplice, till he had magnificently laid down his conception of a universe subject to Law—Hooker.

Among Anglo-Catholic poets, Herbert and Vaughan, his spiritual son, are contrasted thus: Herbert is the interpreter of an ideal of beauty in order, an ideal of the spiritual life which accepts and is assisted by rule and habit; the regularity, indeed, is far from being formal or mechanical; the flowers which grow in the garden are living flowers; but Herbert thinks that they flourish best and show most comely when they are bedded in definite patterns and are watered through nicely directed channels. He is the poet of the Anglican communion. . . . Vaughan is the poet of what cannot be methodised—the incalculable beams and irradiation of the soul, the incalculable wind that blows where it listeth; his garden is watered by the sudden shower and the invisible dew.

By contrast with Vaughan, the mystic of light, Crashaw, with his "pious orgies," is the mystic of flame. The two essays on Milton conclude with this synthetical paragraph:

Critics have lamented that Milton did not embody his political experience in epic or in drama; "the epic of liberty, virtue and religion which he had it in him to write remained unwritten." If seemed at first sight as if his prose writing, devoted to the cause of freedom, and his poems were separated by a gulf that is wide and deep. But is this really the case? Or were not the prose pamphlets an attempt to give an application in detail to the one great principle which inspires masque and epic and drama? When Milton was a poet he could soar with no middle flight; he could occupy himself with none of the secondary truths which regulate conduct, private or public. One primary truth filled all his mind—acceptance of the divine rule, submission to the divine mandate; heroic patience in accepting the will of God, heroic energy in making the will of God prevail; entire obedience, and, through obedience, freedom.

Jeremy Taylor, Baxter, Bunyan ("the Holbein of spiritual England") and Butler (whose wit was "a missile hard and keen as the stones of a sling; we may name him captain of the slingers who fought under the banner of reason and common sense") bring us to the concluding essay; and, with that, to the age when in politics, the crown had given recognisances for good behaviour, and in religion, for the ease of travellers toward the New Jerusalem, the trimmer proposed "the cutting of the broad way and the narrow both into one"—the day of the philosophy of Locke and of a movement of which the best that may be said is that it was one "of concentration, of retirement within limits, intellectual and emotional."

The essays are the work of a mind moving at ease among familiar things, guided by a sane and measured judgment.

A Layman's Bishop.

Life and Letters of Phillips Brooks. By Alexander V. G. Allen. With portraits and illustrations. 2 vols. (Macmillan. 30s. net.)

THE late Bishop of Massachusetts was no stranger in this country. Though he spent but a few months in England his personality set its mark upon a host of minds at Oxford, at Cambridge, and at Westminster. That majestic figure, that massive face, those luminous eyes, once seen, might hardly be forgotten; that swift Pactolus of rhythmic words, bearing in solution so rich a treasure of golden thought out of the soil of the world's literature, echoes still in English ears. To the estimation in which he was held among his own countrymen, the proportions in which it has been thought well to set his life on record in this volume bear testimony; for them, perhaps, 1,600 packed pages, in which even the undergraduate's essays are critically examined, will not be too much.

Clearly among his contemporaries in the ministry he towered; and not only among the clergy of that strenuously respectable anomaly, the American Episcopalian Church, but among American preachers at large, between whom and himself he suffered no dogmatic differences to interpose a barrier. Indeed, it would have been strange if he had: from few can he have been set further apart by his personal opinions than his Episcopalian brethren; and, in fact, his foes were they of his own household. Foes one writes misled by verbal associations, for he had none. Opposition he met with plentifully at the hands of the timid, the lopsided; but the personal charm that came of his transparent honesty of intention, his unflinching optimism, the patience of his large heart, his mirthfulness, the purity and simplicity of his life, and the wealth of learning that he had diligently stored, disarmed in his presence the most froward.

The shackles of confessions and symbols he bore very lightly. In his childhood—a serious period by comparison with his later years—he had been brought up by his mother a member of the Episcopalian Church; his father, originally a Unitarian, conformed later to the religion of his wife; but neither to parents nor to son was that communion in any exclusive sense the true church. He was frankly gay at the expense of those who would have exalted it on the score of "any fiction of an apostolic succession." Under their hands it was fast becoming "a small fantastic sect, aping foreign ways and getting more and more out of sympathy with the country." He would steal away from the prosy debates of his episcopal brethren to write to his niece, among other trifles: "The bishops are not very wise, but they think they are, and they very much enjoy being bishops." Not quite in the same sense did he tell a little girl that it was "great fun being a minister;" it was sheer joy in the spiritual garden that he tended and watered, in the ties that bound him to so many souls. In a sense this plain American gentleman fulfilled the ideal of a Catholic bishop more nearly than many a soi-disant successor of the apostles. Women, of course, were among his friends and correspondents, but his diocese, as formerly his parish, was wife to him, and his little children those whom he begot again in the Lord.

His interest in literature, as has already been implied, was universal. In poetry his leaning was towards the great simplicities: Homer is "the world's great vernacular." Of the verses of a young poet, sent to him by a friend for his criticism, he writes:

Some of them are exquisite and delightful. Of course they are fantastic and unhealthy. Everybody is that nowadays; and they are affected, and haunted always by recollections of somebody else's poetry, and wilfully and unnecessarily obscure, and awfully afraid of being common-place. Some time somebody will just dare to sing the first great simple things as all the great poets have sung them, and then how the world will listen!

Yet after an interview with Browning he wrote of his talk: "It wasn't Sordello and it wasn't as fine as Paracelsus, but . . . I went home and slept after hearing him as one does after a fresh starlight walk with a good cool breeze on his face."

This layman's bishop died in 1893 at the age of fifty-seven. Among other memorials a window is dedicated to him in St. Margaret's, Westminster. It is inscribed with two elegiac couplets by the late Archbishop of Canterbury; and these have been tolerably rendered by Mr. Christopher Benson as follows:

Fervent with speech, most strong with sacred art,
To light, to lift the struggling human heart;
To feed the flock: Thy people's choice was given—
Required on earth, but ah! preferred to Heaven.

Other New Books.

THE ANGLO-SAXON REVIEW.

EDITED BY MRS. GEORGE
CORNWALLIS-WEST.

Magnificently clad, as usual, the Anglo-Saxon Review appears for the seventh time, and, as usual, Mr. Cyril Davenport writes a note on its clothes. Among the most interesting of the articles in an excellent number is Mr. Egerton Castle's inquiry into "The Spirit of Romance." It takes the form of a dialogue with a Lady, in which the Lady does little but pout prettily. Is love an indispensable ingredient of Romance? No. Stevenson, prince of romancers, dispensed with it almost entirely. Romance deals with any poignant passion in a large way. "In your Romance the characters reveal and explain themselves under the stress of events—action, therefore, and incidents, are its main factors; whereas in your Novel the mere dialectic of conversation (so to speak) is sufficient to shape the course of the drama." Mr. Egerton Castle works out this distinction pleasantly and convincingly from the "Troubadours" to the "Prisoner of Zenda." The "Poetry of the Campaign" makes Mr. Arthur Waugh rather sad, and he looks back with regret to the Crimean spirit which produced "Maud." Mr. Kipling gave the key, and the rest caught the tune. "No sooner was war declared than there arose an urgent necessity for providing for the wives and children of the soldiers summoned to the front, and an appeal had to be made to the public which should be poignant and far-reaching. Amid these circumstances Mr. Kipling generously threw himself into the breach. . . . He filled his lines with the nudging spirit of vulgarity, which, he knew, would open the purse-strings of the man in the villa." The worst of it was that when the "Absent-Minded Beggar" had begged successfully the rest caught the music-hall spirit, and even Mr. Henley wrote—

And yet an old mad burgher-man
Can put us on the run.

"A violence alike to the urbanity of contest and the dignity of power." Few will quarrel with this verdict. This number of the Anglo-Saxon has a remarkable variety of interest. As a record of the shifting literature of the day, striking the balance between the serious and the frivolous, it is unique. (Mrs. George Cornwallis-West. 21s.)

ABYSSINIA.

BY HERBERT VIVIAN.

We seem always on the verge of complications with Abyssinia, and yet, somehow, always sheer clear of them at last. The reason for this is explained more or less in Mr. Herbert Vivian's new book on Abyssinia, which is the narrative of a recent journey to Adis Ababa and back, with a run over to Aden, and a visit to Jibouti, the French Colony. Mr. Vivian has not produced a great work, or one which can aspire ever to be a textbook, but he has written a very pleasant and easily read account of his travels, which gives a very fair idea of the country and the people, and the characteristics of both. Mr. Vivian had an interview with Menelik, and it is interesting to learn that the Negus Negusti has always desired our friendship and support, as he knows that he can trust us. "Other people," said Menelik, "often tell me things which I find out afterwards are not true, or they promise things and do not perform them. But when an Englishman says anything to me I know that I can believe him; when he promises anything it is as good as done." This is a highly satisfactory testimonial, and incidentally shows Menelik to be a man of intelligence. Mr. Vivian does not return the compliment, for his opinion of the Abyssinians is of the poorest. Neither does he think much of the French, whom he regards from an absolutely Nelsonic point of view. There are some informing sidelights on British Somaliland, which seems well worth looking after, and, on the whole, no pleasanter book of travel has been published for some time. Mr. Vivian writes in an easy conversational style, and, as he never forgets himself, the reader comes to take quite an interest in him and his struggles with mule drivers and insects. (Pearson. 15s.)

ST. NICHOLAS I.

BY JULES ROY.

The power of the Popes, spiritual, temporal, and of the kind that lies on the wide indeterminate borderland that divides one domain from the other, has been acquired by degrees. The main outline of the historical process is matter of general knowledge. What is in dispute is the legitimacy of such development as history records. To the papist (a word which in this place we may properly use) the process is a gradual realisation of a divine purpose, the unfolding of the flower of the Petrine Privilege: "Tibi dabo claves regni ccelorum"; and the fulfilment of the injunction: "Strengthen thy brethren." To the Protestant historian—to the author, for instance, of "The Holy Roman Empire"—the exaltation of the ecclesiastical estate is a natural consequence of a centripetal tendency characteristic of the times, favoured by personal ambition, and justified to an uncritical age by a plausible array of isolated and strictly irrelevant texts.

Whichever be the view of any reader of this brief biography of the series "Les Saints" (well translated by Miss Margaret Maitland), he will find in the contests of Nicholas with Photius, the intruded patriarch of Constantinople, in his correspondence with the emperor Michael, and his dealings with recalcitrant primates and princes enough to illustrate his opinions and confirm his preconceptions. What more can anyone demand? The Pope's policy did much to prepare the way for the final realisation of the ecclesiastical monarchy of Gregory VII.:

He saw [writes M. Roy], and made others see, the triple primacy that resides, not only in the Roman Church, but in the Papacy; a primacy of priesthood, of doctrinal authority, of royalty. His generous defence of persecuted innocence in Theutberga, his calm solution of all the Bulgarian questions, his unravelling of the wily Hincmar's arguments, his authoritative reminders to kings and bishops of the duties of their state, are all in the same tone. He speaks as one whose inmost conviction is that he is God's chief representative on earth, as one who believes in himself as holding the office of supreme priest, doctor, ruler.

The monograph is to be expanded at a later time, and the condensation of its form justifies the author's purpose. (Duckworth. 3s.)

CHINA'S ONLY HOPE.

BY CHANG CHIH-TUNG.

Amid the jarring notes of foreign diplomacy and the specious protests of untruthful Chinamen it is consoling to come across so sane and straightforward a pronouncement as that contained in China's Only Hope. Its author is Viceroy of the province of Liang Hu. His work has the endorsement of the present Emperor, and the encouragement of a circulation of one million copies in China; and the reader's best thanks are due to its translator, the Rev. Mr. Woodbridge, an American missionary with long experience of China and a scholarly grasp of Chinese literature. He has attempted a paraphrase rather than a literal translation, and the result is eminently readable. The mere quotation of one of Chang Chih-Tung's dicta is enough to show the quality of his speculations. "Old custom is a bugaboo, a password to lying and deceit," he says with a frankness surely remarkable in a Chinese official. With a wealth of illustration from the classics of his country, with a literary style which scholars pronounce to be exquisite in the original, and with no inconsiderable knowledge of the history of countries other than his own, he urges that salvation can only come to his country if Confucianism is revived as a vital principle of life, and to it is added an acceptance of Western science and methods. The proposal is elaborated with considerable subtlety and strength. No one who wishes to grasp the elements of the Far Eastern puzzle should miss this book. (Oliphant.)

AT PRETORIA.

BY JULIAN RALPH.

Mr. Julian Ralph, the well-known American war correspondent of the Daily Mail, is also outspoken; but the purpose of his book is wider. While nearly every newspaper correspondent who has been at the front considers it his duty to present a volume of impressions to the public, Mr. Ralph has seen fit to issue two. His At Pretoria contains much material that has not appeared in the daily papers, and in consequence of this, as well as on its own merits of composition and arrangement, is of more lasting value than many of the war books that have issued red-hot from the press. The book is at one and the same time a brisk narrative of the march that ended in the capture of Pretoria, and a collection of clever criticisms on men and matters, made prominent by the war. In this connexion the ensuing sample is of interest as illustrating the theme on which the book is founded—viz., that thorough reform of the army is essential to secure the prosperity and safety of Great Britain:

The Colonial has very strong merits which the Regulars lack, just as the Regulars have great and necessary qualities needed by the Colonials. . . . The Colonials won deserved admiration for their individual independence and initiative, their skill in taking cover, and the adaptability by which they were quickly able to meet the Boer with something very like his own tactics. . . . They preferred to fight at ease, and if they were allowed to do so and could thus kill more Boers (or kill Boers more quickly) in their shirt-sleeves, they more than once fought without their coats. This means something to those who saw the Regulars, under a blazing tropical sun, rigged up like dray-horses, with more straps and hooks, bundles, bottles, and bags than one would think were sufficient to disable any human being except an European soldier. Poor Tommy!

(Pearson. 6s.)

Mr. Henry Frowde sends us a set of new Prayer Books, of which we can only say that they are beautifully produced, and that the prayers for "the King's Majesty" and for "the Royal Family" seem to bring home the change of reign more completely than anything else. In addition Mr. Frowde sends us The Memorial Service, being "Special forms of service in commemoration of Her Late Majesty Queen Victoria of Blessed and Glorious Memory, to be used in all Churches and Chapels in England and Wales, and in the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, either on the day of the funeral or on the most convenient day within the Octave." Neatly and variously issued in black leatherette, The Memorial Service forms a touching memento of the nation's loss.

Fiction.

Committed to his Charge. By R. and K. M. Lizars.
(Greening. 6s.)

THE gradual conquest of an old-fashioned parish by a new incumbent is a theme that promises human interest; and given, as in the present case, a Canadian setting, it adds the charm of novelty to the glamour of "the cloth." When one of Mr. Huntley's congregation had a difficulty in "finding a verse, Mrs. Lindsay advised her to turn to the Hypocrisy." Another member, "the thrifty Kippan," "considered silver coffin-plates much too good stuff to bury," and therefore adorned his best room with those that were inscribed with the names of his three deceased wives.

These two illustrations will serve to show the general aspect of the book. It exploits oddity, and here and there exploits it with an eye too eager for our smiles to be careful of our convictions. The best of the odd gallery is Dulcissima, the old maid with a passion for motherhood. Amid these folk, who focus much charity and slander in their Guild, stands the cultivated modernity of the athletic rector and his wealthy and beautiful wife. He preaches to them as much by putting on his wife's goloshes as by doctrinal sermons. He survives a disastrous attempt at a harvest thanksgiving; and when a domestic calamity reduces him to a wreck, his wish with his flock is law. It is then, however, that the rector becomes apathetic and contentedly submissive to the old order, while the congregation grows pushful and soaring.

One hardly knows why the collaborators decided on the series of painful shocks which conclude a performance that is largely controlled by the comic spirit. It may be that it is real life which is inartistic; it often is. But one feels that the book would have been better if it had avoided abysses.

Julie: a Study of a Girl. By a Man.
(Scott. 6s.)

THE author of this novel, whose well-known personality is revealed on many pages of it, would possibly despise any purely literary criticism of his book. He would probably say: "Julie is written from my heart—a heart sore and bleeding with a sense of all the wrongs done by man to his fellow-men; it is a vehement social protest—and you come to me prating about literary art!" Nevertheless, we are obliged to come to him prating about literary art. Even though the East End falls dead of starvation in its streets while the West End is drinking wine at a guinea a bottle, we should find it necessary to prate of literary art in "Merrie England." "A Man's" story is that of a poor girl of the Flowery Dean (by the "Ditch") who is found by a professor of music listening to a German band off the Strand. A glance at the child's face is sufficient to convince Mr. Guinea-gold that she has genius. He rescues her from the Flowery Dean, educates her, and transforms her into a great violinist. It is inevitable, of course, that misfortune should happen to this child of misfortune, and so, in an encounter with her drunken father, her wrist is permanently injured. No matter! It appears that she has a voice, and in five pages the "wonderful young singer" has "London at her feet. Nor was that strange." We think it was strange, and stranger still that she should then take diphtheria, and so permanently injure her throat! Julie is driven down again into the depths, but at last she happily marries "a young officer." Need we say that the crowning fault of this spasmodically clever book is its incurable sentimentality? It is as sentimental as a ballad, and nearly as false to life, though some of the author's descriptions of gin-sodden and other sorts of poverty are very exact on the surface. The strike meeting at which Julie brings tears to rude eyes is done very well, and Mr. Charles Chigwin, the labour leader, has much vitality. The writing of the book lacks both tact and distinction.

It is strange, that chilling silence of the hurrying crowd, each ego self-centred and indifferent, if not hostile, to all the rest: numbers without cohesion, neighbourhood without sympathy, society bereft of social feeling by the anarchic operation of the base lusts and unprofitable haste of a crazy civilisation.

This is mere petulance. Does "A Man" expect the wayfarers of Fleet-street to stop and chat with each other of a night? On the first page of the book there is an infantile play on words which is three centuries out of date. On the second page a piano is called an "instrument of torture." Now a person who makes a platform of the novel ought at any rate to have begun by discovering that a piano can not any longer be called an instrument of torture. The catalogue of literary peccadilloes might be continued indefinitely.

"A Man" is a witty and talented man, animated by a very sincere philanthropy; it is impossible not to sympathise with him. He even has some literary gift, but we have not been able to persuade ourselves from this book that he has a gift for fiction.

Deacon Bradbury. By Edwin Asa Dix.
(Macmillan. 6s.)

A COMMONPLACE plot, carefully worked out, and redeemed by a clever character-study. The story hinges upon the young man—only too well known in fiction—who, for no conceivable reason, allows himself to be wrongly suspected of theft. He cannot even plead the excuse that he does it to shield another. He has, in fact, no excuse to offer at all, except that of his quite abnormal pride. Of course, the case is cleared up in the end, but not before the young man's father—poor old Deacon Bradbury—has become hopelessly alienated from the Church of his baptism, by reason of his son's supposed fall. The Deacon himself is a distinct success, and by far the best thing in the book is his pathetic awakening to the consciousness of a lost faith, first in his son and then in the God he had striven to serve so faithfully. A Providence who can allow calamities to befall the good upset all Deacon Bradbury's ideas of justice. He had seen the same system at work among his friends; but, as he justly remarks, "It makes a mighty big difference whose ox is gored."

We confess to a shrinking from the Vermont dialect as given us by Mr. Dix, and we wish he would not belabour his pages with so many Americanisms. But he has humour; and, as we said before, the book is interesting by reason of Deacon Bradbury.

"Number One and Number Two." By F. M. Peard.
(Macmillan. 6s.)

"NUMBER ONE" deserves very little notice: he is, in the language of the day, a bounder. "Number Two" commands our interest and respect; both numbers refer to the lovers of Miss Bride Kennedy, a young woman who, utterly bored by English country life, and in particular by a parson brother-in-law, elects to escape to Egypt with a companion. Here, of course, she meets the inevitable "Number Two"; also, of course, "Number One" turns up, and complications ensue. The heroine's complex character is well presented, and the story runs smoothly; moreover, we meet a delightful American artist and his wife, a baronet, and a cousin; and, in company with some or all of these, we are taken up the Nile (just after Omdurman), and, later, to Greece and to Gibraltar.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE LOST LAND.

BY JULIA M. CROTTIE.

"Being the Autobiography of Miss Annita Lombard, 1780-1797." A sad, delicately-told tale of a Cromwellian-Irish town by the author of Neighbours: Annals of a Dull Town, which we found anything but dull. The present work sketches the ruin of an Irish family, beginning with the entrance of the stepfather into the home, and ending with the outlawry of the head of the house. In a preface the author remarks on the note of sadness prevailing through the work: "In these grey pages there is little gaiety, and whatever humour there is is seen through 'the mist and the rain.'" (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

THE TRAGEDY OF A PEDIGREE.

BY HUGO AMES.

The cover shows a sheeted skeleton walking on its hands down a genealogical chart. It is an acrobatic feat that compels admiration. The author, we are informed in a publisher's note, is the brother of the tallest man in the British army. A hint of the plot of the story is given on page 7: "To Elizabeth Welwyn the attenuation of the family tree, reduced as it was to one slender stem, was replete with unusual significance." A few lines before we are told that "a malevolent fate had, all too literally, upset the family cart, and blotted out for ever the two at one fell blow." (Greening. 6s.)

THE BELIEVING BISHOP.

BY HAVERGALL BATES.

The name of the author is new to us, and the method of this essay in fiction is certainly novel. It is a satire, and like most satires will either amuse or offend. The object of the satire is the opulence of bishops, and their attitude towards one of their number who, determining that he cannot remain in a position of such worldly magnificence while the poor of the slums live as they do, resigns his See, and, in the end, dies. The book opens at Oxford. "The young Warden of Muriel College sat in the college garden —." (George Allen. 6s.)

NAOMI'S EXODUS.

BY LILY H. MONTAGU.

Tells the story of a young girl brought up in a Ghetto of West London, and her religious awakenings. Incidentally the author describes vicissitudes in the lives of London working-girls. (Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.)

QUALITY CORNER.

BY C. L. ANTROBUS.

A domestic novel, passing in the country, and bearing as sub-title "A Study of Remorse." "The market-place might be called the heart of Ringway, and just where the high road turned out of it stood Quality Corner." The present volume, like Mrs. Antrobus's Wildersmoor, has strong work in it, and the character-drawing is good. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

A PATH OF THORNS.

BY ERNEST A. VIZETELLY.

A woman's autobiography. "I lost my mother when I was very young, yet I can well recall her sweet and pensive face. Her eyes beamed tenderly beneath her low, fair brow; and, whenever a sun-ray fell upon her wavy hair, she seemed to be crowned with gold." For motto Mr. Vizetelly has taken these lines from Congreve's "The Mourning Bride":

"Heaven has no rage like love to hatred turned, Nor Hell a fury like a woman scorned."

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage) 17/6

„ Quarterly 5/0

„ Price for one issue /5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

George Bernard Shaw.

An Enquiry.

UPON the conclusion of the first performance of "Arms and the Man" at the Avenue Theatre, Mr. Shaw was called before the curtain by an audience of enraptured dilettanti. At the very moment of the author's appearance a lone man in the gallery gave utterance to a loud and inimical "Boo!" Mr. Shaw nonchalantly raised his head,

And with a look made of all sweet accord, remarked, "I rather agree with you, my friend." It was an admirable instance of his impassive coolness under fire, his instantaneity of retort, and his aptitude for saying what he does not mean. To these qualities Mr. Shaw owes much, if not most, of his popular reputation. He has finer qualities, the love of justice and the hatred of shams, but a popular reputation is not to be built on such characteristics; and had it not been for his extraordinary debating skill, Mr. Shaw, despite many excellences, would have remained to this day unappreciated, instead of being, as he terms it, a "legend." Mr. Shaw is a born debater, whether in speech or in writing. The dialectical séances in which he took part at Battersea used to provide one of the prettiest entertainments in London. Far too ambitious to leave nature alone, he has assiduously perfected a natural gift until it has become a formidable and not entirely unrighteous force in the country's intellectual life. The man who measures swords with Mr. Shaw is foredoomed to defeat. His cause may be good, but he will be beaten, and probably rendered ridiculous. One may say of Mr. Shaw, as Macaulay said of Burke: "In a few scorching words he withered up the arguments of the unfortunate beings who dared to oppose him." Only Mr. Shaw's words do not scorch, for he is neither an orator nor an enthusiast; they are cold as steel and they cut. The uncontrolled use of great power is always a severe trial of moral strength, and perhaps Mr. Shaw has himself somewhat succumbed to that victorious sword of his; perhaps he is now more its slave than its master. He has developed into a sort of intellectual bravo, a notorious duellist like Paul de Cassagnac, who goes about seeking insults. "What! You contradict me? I beg you to step this way." And the victim is led off to execution. There is, in fact, only one effective way of conversing with Mr. Shaw, and that is to assert baldly, to iterate, to reiterate, and absolutely to decline any semblance of argumentative combat.

We have said that he is not an enthusiast. The enthusiast is emotional, like the artist, and neither in Mr. Shaw's speeches nor in his works have we ever observed the slightest trace of emotion. His is a case of intellect almost pure. Every man has some sentiment, but Mr. Shaw has as little as a man may have. He is the indefatigable champion of social justice, not because he has a passion for social justice, but because he has an intellectual perception of it, because his aquiline eyesight instantly sees through all delusions, deceptions, and hypocrisies. His "unquestioning faith in the power and validity of the intellect" (the phrase is Tolstoi's) is the most pathetic thing about him. Like Tolstoi's Prince Andrei, "the impossibility of expressing everything" seems never to have occurred to him, nor the doubt "whether all that he thought and all that he believed were not vanity." He has the arrogance which usually accompanies abnormal intellect. He scorns the entire human race, if not for one quality, then for another. His fellow-men will persist in feeling instead of thinking. Such fatuity is nauseous to him; it has, indeed, permanently soured him, so that he spends seven days a week in proving that he is surrounded by fools. And he is. His function—a function brilliantly and usefully fulfilled—is to depreciate human nature, to check its self-satisfactions, prick its bubbles, and drive it out of its paradises; and in this department of activity he is capable single-handed of the work of an entire epoch. One Shaw suffices. That is his métier. He thinks he has other trades. He calls himself a critic of the arts, and in particular, just now, of literature. "Produce me your best critic," he says in his apology for The Devil's Disciple, "and I will criticise his head off." Not in the least. Mr. Shaw might decapitate him with that sword, but he would not criticise his head off. The first attribute of the critic is sympathy, and Mr. Shaw has never shown sympathy with any of the arts. He has, we admit, explained with delightful and amazing skill the ideological side of certain art works which have an ideological side, such as Wagner's Nibelung's Ring and some of Ibsen's plays, but he finds nothing to say about those emotional qualities by virtue of which alone an art work can live. The august dithyrambic joy of a Berlioz in Beethoven or a Swinburne in the Elizabethans, the more sedate and intimate pleasure of a St. Beuve in George Crabbe or a Matthew Arnold in Heine: these are true criticism, but they do not argue, they state; they are the expression not of ideas but of emotions. Speaking of the immortal climax of Antony and Cleopatra, Mr. Shaw can only say: "Shakspeare finally strains all his huge command of rhetoric and stage pathos to give a theatrical sublimity to the wretched end of the business." He has the piercing vision of the young lady who on first beholding the west front of Westminster Abbey remarked that the clock had stopped. He always searches for the ignoble, never for the noble, and his gift of discovering it is preternatural. The major part of his judgments are worse than false; they are half true.

At the present time Mr. Shaw chooses to come before the world as a playwright. It is his innocuous hobby to be everything. He has been political reformer, novelist, art critic, musical critic, dramatic critic, vestryman—and still follows sundry of these vocations; but at the moment the stage looms largest in his view, and the dilettanti are excessively diverted by his Three Plays for Puritans (Grant Richards), being the third volume of his collected plays. In his rôle of Admirable Crichton Mr. Shaw succeeds as well at one thing as at another; and we have small doubt that he is as good a playwright as he has been a vestryman, or nearly so. His habit is to write elaborate prefaces, defences, and expositions for his plays. In his justification of The Devil's Disciple, the first piece in Three Plays, he states that he is a charlatan and a mountebank; but, of course, being after all human, he does not expect the reader to believe that. He also states that he is a "dramatist of genuine vocation." He proceeds to explain why he, a dramatist of genuine vocation, finds it necessary to be his own commentator. "The reason most dramatists do not publish their plays with prefaces is that they cannot write them. . . . I write prefaces as Dryden did, and treatises as Wagner did, because I can." Never was a more tragic blindness than this. The lamentable fact is that Mr. Shaw writes prefaces because he must; because he has so disdainfully neglected technique and the very rudiments of dramatic expression that he cannot say what he wants in the play itself, and is therefore obliged to botch it up with additions in the only medium which he really understands. To cover his own clumsiness he pretends that the reader or the hearer is a person of feeble or undeveloped mind who needs a guide through the marvellous subtleties of the Shaw genius. As the Clarendon Press issues a Shakespeare for Schools, so he feigns to issue a Shaw for Asylums. He talks at large of the philosophy and the tendencies of his plays when he should be employed in taking lessons from a competent dramatist—a dramatist who has learnt his business, not patronised it. In not one of Mr. Shaw's plays will the technique bear an instant's examination. A glance, for example, at "The Devil's Disciple" shows that after beginning the play in the usual manner in the first act, he begins it again in the second; the first act is wasted. The principal situation in the second act and the principal situation in the third are the tawdriest of venerable devices, disclosing absolute poverty of invention. Half the characters are useless to the action; and the whole affair, in essence, is an amorphous mass of melodrama and sheer sentimentality of the most British kind.

One might still be hopeful for Mr. Shaw's future as a dramatist, despite his present incompetence, if there was any hint in his plays of creative power. But there is no such hint. Neither a character nor a scene is realised: just as the author was never moved in writing them, so the reader is never moved in reading them. From end to end they are concoctions, in which everything is subordinated to the statement of an idea and the dazzling exchange of repartee. "The drama," he says, "can never be anything more than the play of ideas"! That depends on what you mean by an idea. The De Goncourts once remarked that ideas were the curse of modern art, and they were right. Art, including dramatic art, it cannot be too often repeated, is a business of emotion, and the intensity and grandeur of its emotion are the measure of its greatness. Ideas! Mr. Shaw has often railed at Shakespeare because his ideas are so ordinary, his philosophy so obvious. Mr. Shaw is fertile of original ideas, he is a master of dialectics; his wit is unflagging, and he can shoot out damaging retorts like a Maxim gun. It would be strange, therefore, if he could not write amusing and edifying dialogue. He can. His dialogue is a continual feast; it reminds one of the old transpontine days at Battersea. But to cut it up into lengths and call it a play is simple effrontery. The dialogue is the mere exterior of a play, the part one does last, when the hard creative work is accomplished. Mr. Shaw's stage-pieces may be genius; careful critics have said so; but they are decidedly not drama. They might more correctly be called the Joseph's coat of a non-existent Joseph; fine raiment resembling a man until you poke it where the ribs ought to be.

The relation of this brilliant and wayward intellect to the general stolid public is a curious one. The public regard him as a sort of tse-tse fly, that will not leave them alone. Buzz! Buzz! That man Shaw again, stinging us, piercing our masks, oversetting our ideals, and making us highly uncomfortable! In many quarters he is looked on as an Enemy of the British Race, who ought to be exiled to St. Helena in keeping of some literary knight. But the public, great simple souls, do not know what is good for them.

Things Seen.

The Pianist.

I KNEW nothing of the new Pianist except that she was a Greek, and that she was very young. There she sat, a note of white in the large yellow drawing-room, alone on a couch without a back—erect, self-contained, shy. Her face was small and thin, and in her eyes lurked something of the suspicion of a woodland creature. She went to the piano almost sullenly, and for a moment sat motionless, her hands hanging idly, her face expressionless as a sleep-walker's. Then she began to play, and as she played she and the piano became one. She picked the notes from the keys with the dainty precision that a woman picks blossoms from a tree. And the notes did not escape from her fingers, but passed in tremors up her arms, meeting and swaying in her body, like the movements that sweep over a field of corn under a temperate breeze. And her face? Well, I once read of a fancy in the writings of Bede—"the fancy that there is a certain 'meadow as it were,' in which the souls of holy men suffer nothing, but wait the time when they should be fit to bear the vision of God." And that look lasted till she ceased playing. We who had listened came back to earth and she went back to her couch without a back, and sat like one who had been through great tribulation, and had used up all desire. I talked to her, but she was enlisted in negation. Her body was a husk. It was as if she had just returned from a terrible journey. And as she sat there supine, nerveless, spent—suddenly I thought of Odysseus, and how (so we are told) after he was dead, he and other souls were bidden to choose the kind of life that should be theirs irrevocably. To Odysseus the last lot fell. And he chose a tame life, a lot that had been thrown contemptuously aside by the others, saying that he would have done the same had he drawn the first lot. I told her that.

The Diner.

I WAS eating with a Lucknow veteran in a place where a bountiful plate of hot meat and vegetables is to be had for sixpence. I thought I was hungry, but so dull an edge has the hunger of those who too often fare sumptuously, that I could scarcely touch the unappetising heap. Even the keen hunger of my companion failed to do justice to the enormous helping, and he left his platter not quite clean. It was the slack of the day, and we sat for nearly an hour. Our talk was of Sepoys and Boers, of the gallant young officer who, but for the snapping of a mutineer's cap, would never have marched either to Kandahar or Pretoria, of the tragic problem of daily bread for the unskilled grey-headed illiterate, of the peace of heaven in the Hospital at Chelsea. Over the low partition of our box a pair of gaunt eyes had been watching us steadily—the eyes of a man, I thought, who had got through his own meal and, having caught the drift of our words, had fallen under the spell of my old soldier. But the old soldier, though no scholar, was a better reader of men. "Here, mate!" he cried in a rough whisper, as we rose to go, and with a nod of invitation he pushed forward our unemptied plates. The gaunt eyes gleamed, there was a shuffle of eager feet, shaking hands piled the cold mass together, and in another moment a starving man was swallowing food fiercely and indiscriminately like a ravenous dog.

"Does that often happen?" I asked, as we stepped into the air. "Every day," was the answer; "there's many a poor devil jist goes in there for what's to be picked up, and, so long as they keep pretty quiet, the boss ain't the one to make any fuss."

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

FRENCH Literature has recently sustained three losses which the class here defined as "bien pensant" regard as great, and in one instance as irreparable. It may be permitted those who judge brainwork by its intellectual or artistic value, and not according to the political-religious views of the writers, to qualify these three writers—the Duke of Broglie, Henri de Bornier, and Mme. Caro—as three respectable mediocrities. The aristocratic party mourn the Duke de Broglie as the greatest statesman and historian of the age. Now I doubt if there is a single one of his admirers who have read through even three of his books. I myself tried two, and put them aside depressed by their dullness and lifelessness. If anybody else but a duke had written them, supposing their author fortunate enough to have obtained a publisher willing to give them to the light at the author's own expense, assuredly nobody would ever have heard of them. They reveal great industry, of the compilers' sort, a second-rate, futile erudition, without a hint of personality, temperament, talent, or art. The flatness of the style is such that the noble duke even succeeds in eliminating all its natural charm from the delightful tongue it was his privilege to write. As well as an eminent historian I have heard the duke lauded as an orator. Here experience bids me salute him as a still more hopeless mediocrity. True, he was then an old man, but his enunciation could never have been good, and it would be difficult to find an orator with a worse manner. He was as poor and dull a speaker as a writer, with a thin utterance and an insignificant presence; but he had the prestige of a great name and a considerable fortune, and, as well, presided in the Academy over the Reactionary Party. He is supposed to have sacrificed his political career to his principles in the famous Seize Mai business; but it is hardly likely in these complex modern hours such an old-fashioned type of French seigneur would have made any figure. His only place was at the head of a group of academical fossils, who persistently decline to see the sun in the noonday sky, and who speak with bated breath of the Duke of Orleans, that model of a gentleman and prince, as "The King."

The second departed Academician, Henri de Bornier—only a viscount he, and as such a lesser personage—I have always heard spoken of as a "raseur"—something more than a bore. He wrote a famous piece, "La Fille de Roland," which nobody to-day seems to have read or seen acted, but which, when our generation was in its youth, sentimental lads and maidens used to recite from with fervour. Since the author's death, I have asked at least four cultivated French people (two of them eminent writers) what it is all about. Nobody seems to know, and nobody seems to care. Yet at his funeral this week such men as de Vogüé, Claretie, Hervieu wept profusely, and seemed to entertain the notion that a part of the glory of France had departed with Henri de Bornier. So misleading and mendacious are funeral orations. Him, too, have I heard speak, and a dismal hour I spent. He undertook to deliver a lecture on French epic poetry. The subject is vast, and embraces a diversity of names. Well, M. de Bornier only pronounced one name, and that was his own; only discussed and quoted from two epics, and those were his own—"La Fille de Roland" and "France d'Abord." I left the lecture-hall with the distinct impression that France had produced but a single epic poet, and I was disposed to think from the sample given that it was one too many. This, however, is what the Minister of Public Instruction, M. Leygues, says: "When the professor read us the famous strophes, it was like a lightning ray tearing through our night. Our souls seemed suddenly enlarged and freed of the weight of discouragement and wretchedness that bore them down."

The old hereditary enthusiasms were awakened in us. Once more we were led to hope and to believe." And M. Claretie cries: "His plays were those which bring to flower in the heart all great thoughts. The Comédie Française owes him many superior works, and above all a masterpiece that will never perish." A great deal of the extraordinary success of "La Fille de Roland" may be explained by the opportune moment of its appearance. France was morally and physically ill, depressed by defeat, for which her vain and nervous temperament is ill-adapted, and a young man had the courage and patriotic instinct to come forward with a tonic in the shape of sonorous lines about her imperishable glories. Paris shook off the nightmares of fever and lethargy, and trumpeted the hopeful verses to the remotest provinces.

The third loss to Letters is Mme. Caro, the widow of the eminent Academician immortalised in "Le Monde où l'on s'ennuie." This lady made an anonymous début in the Revue des Deux Mondes with "Le Pêché de Madeleine," a book that instantly commanded an extraordinary vogue. I have been told that its authorship was the sole discussion of salons, and that it was attributed to nearly every living writer of note. It created something like the actual sensation of An Englishwoman's Love Letters. I remember it vaguely as a pretty story, of free and limpid style, but with nothing in it to explain its immense success. Since then I have read two other books by Mme. Caro, Pas à Pas and Romance of a Young Girl, both of a prodigious mediocrity, the blameless productions of a "lady-like" writer, without humour or depth, or any striking quality of mind or pen, who is incapable of writing a line that the virgin soul of fifteen might not read without harm, if altogether without profit, and unable to write a dramatic or enduring scene, while her psychology and interpretation of character and life are absolutely puerile.

An interesting if unpleasing study of Parisian passion in very small letters is M. Maxime Formont's "Courtisane." The style has finish and a certain evasive charm, if the whole lacks strength and conviction. M. Formont paints us a modern Mme. Marneffe without any of the haunting power of Balzac, and her victim, a weak aristocrat, a widower with a charming daughter, is a figure of singularly dull degradation. The daughter expiates her father's sin by renunciation of her own happiness, and the father, to obtain the approval of his ancestors, goes off to Africa to die.

H. L.

Table Talk.

[In the many periodicals which were started by Leigh Hunt, to shed, during their too brief lives, good humour upon the town, a more or less regular column of Table Talk was always provided—whether in the Examiner, or the Indicator, the Companion, or the London Journal. For the most part, he filled the column himself, having as ready a pen as any man in journalism; but he called on his friends too. From time to time we propose to offer similar instalments of Table Talk to the readers of the ACADEMY.]

A YEAR or so ago "S. S.," a correspondent of the ACADEMY, picked from Sir Algernon West's Recollections the following lines, which were printed in the "Contributor's Playground" under the title "Charles Lamb's Time Sheet":

From ten to eleven
Eat breakfast for seven.
From eleven to noon
Think I've come too soon.
From noon to one
Think what's to be done.
From one to two
Find nothing to do.
From two to three
Think it will be
A very great bore
To stay till four.

I remember that when I read them I had doubts as to their authenticity, one reason being the oddness of never having seen them before, and another the circumstance, which is proved by scores of Lamb's letters, that he was hard worked at the India House. We do not associate with him the pleasant aspersions of sloth that are cast upon gentlemen in Civil appointments in Whitehall and Fetter-lane. Last week I solved the mystery, for I found another and more credible version of the lines attributed to Thomas Love Peacock, in the memoir of him prefixed to the 1875 edition of his works, by Edith Nicolls. Peacock's "Time Sheet" ran thus:

From ten to eleven, ate a breakfast for seven;
From eleven to noon, to begin 'twas too soon;
From twelve to one, asked "What's to be done?"
From one to two, found nothing to do;
From two to three began to foresee
That from three to four would be a d—d bore.

Peacock, of course, was also at the India House; but in a post of less drudgery and more importance than Lamb.

WHAT has become of "The Children of the Hour"? Four or five years ago this breakfast companion was announced. It was to be supplied to subscribers by post, in a red envelope, and was to offer them morning by morning an essay, or a leading article, or a poem, or nothing at all. I forget the subscription—a guinea a year or a guinea a number. Jokes were made upon it, I remember. The yearly volume was to be called "The Minute Book," and the contributors were to be nourished on Best Seconds. But "The Children of the Hour" never reached print. I was reminded of it by the advertisement in a morning paper of 1825 of a new and alluring literary companion for the breakfast-table, called The Déjeune, which did actually appear and had a few numbers' run. I think that of all bad titles for newspapers that is the worst: The Déjeune. It smacks of Walt Whitman's excursions into French.

On the magazine page of one of the papers that have magazine pages, a little article on the change that is about to come over the Royal symbol V. R., was headed thus the other day:

V. R.

FROM HONG KONG TO HULL,
FROM SCILLY TO SINGAPORE,
FROM BELGRAVIA TO BULUWAYO,
THE FAMILIAR INITIALS MUST DISAPPEAR.

The writer may not perhaps know it, but he has provided in this picturesque title the formula of a Kipling poem. If he had been asked to do it—for an ACADEMY competition, say—he could hardly have accomplished the feat more neatly.

WHEN the point has to be made that men of genius do not always know what they can do best, it is customary for the expounder to cite the cases of Thackeray and Victor Hugo, both of whom are said to have fancied their draughtsmanship above their literary powers. And the hearer then, as a rule, laughs the superior laugh of one who would not be deluded in the same way. I have always subscribed confidently to the Thackeray part of the illustration, because I know what a feeble (albeit genial and intelligent) pencil he wielded; but not having seen any of Hugo's pictures, I had to take his folly on trust. But never again shall I do so, after the two articles on his drawings, in Harper's Magazine. Why, the man was a giant! The originals may, of course, be inferior to the reproductions; but the reproductions are colossal. Those vast mysterious castles in enchanted countries; those dark towers, as dire as that to which Child Roland fared; those wild minatory storm-skies; those distant dreamland Cities—why a man who could have made pictures like that need never have written a word and his fame would have been secure. John Martin (the Mad Martin of Belshazzar's Feast), Gustave Doré, Turner, and Blake seem to have gone to Hugo's evolution as an artist. As I have said, the originals may be poor things; but the reproductions are Titanic, and I doubt if even the wonders of the process block can graft high imagination upon a draughtsman who had none at all.

V. V. V.

Correspondence.

Lowell on Bryant.

SIR,—I think that you have taken Lowell's criticism on Bryant for more than he really intended it, and, as I happen to know, with a meaning he would have recalled. Lowell could not resist the temptation to say a witty thing, though he often regretted it when it hurt. I happened to be on intimate terms with Bryant before I knew Lowell, and I knew that the passage in the "Fable for the Critics" hurt the old man, and that the sting remained always. After becoming well acquainted with Lowell, I said to him one day that Bryant still felt sore at the criticism, and Lowell admitted that it was exaggerated, unjust, and took pains in his next lecture to call attention to certain qualities of Bryant's poetry. When Lowell next came to New York, I gave him a dinner, to which, with his old friend, I invited Bryant, whom he had never met, and I put them together at the table, and left them to each other during the entire dinner. We separated very late, and the two poets enjoyed the dinner immensely, and each other. Bryant was not of a cold nature, but, on the contrary, a very passionate one, which he had learned to control perfectly, and I always had an impression from certain expressions in his poems that he had, in the past, suffered greatly from uncontrolled passion, and had found the necessity of great restraint. But in politics, to which the greatest energies of his life and feeling were given, and in which his paper, the Evening Post, was our highest example of political dignity and purity, he was a very warm friend or enemy, hot as good manners permitted. I think that if you will read his poem, entitled "A Rain Dream," you will see that he had his tender side, that which his few intimate friends knew well. I think that the apparent coldness in his verse was really due to his having learned to avoid passionate expression as treacherous, and liable to lead to repentance. His only safety was in the most supreme self-control.—I am, &c.,

W. J. STILLMAN.

Rhymed Elegiacs and Adonis's Gardens.

SIR,—May I make two notes in one? I regret extremely that Mr. William Watson thinks I "dragged him in," as to rhymed elegiacs. I thought that your reviewer of Sir Lewis Morris's recent work named Mr. Watson as an earlier writer of rhymed elegiacs than Sir Lewis; and I wrote without collating the complete works of Mr. Watson. It is an error which I must always deplore. Perhaps your reviewer spoke of unrhymed elegiacs? Secondly, Mr. Stronach is interested in the Gardens of Adonis,

That one day bloomed and fruitful were the next.

They appear to be unknown in Greek. In the new edition of Mr. Frazer's Golden Bough, Vol. II., p. 120, and Note 1, is a large collection of authorities. Mr. Stronach may inspect them; I have not done so; but, as far as Mr. Frazer's analysis goes, they did not bloom one day and on the next bear fruit, as Shakespeare seems to have heard said. Mr. Richard Grant White was certainly not infallible—in Greek.—I am, &c.,

A. LANG.

Mr. Richard Marsh's Stories.

SIR,—Will you allow me to state that my story, The Strange Wooing of Mary Bowler, which I have just seen that Messrs. Pearson are announcing as an "important new six-shilling novel," was issued by them in 1894 at 6d., as No. 4 of "Pearson's Library"? As the work is not my copyright, I have no control over it.

I have been frequently the victim of this kind of thing. During the last year or two work of mine which appeared in print twelve years ago has been brought out as new. The impression has consequently grown up that I flood the market with books turned out by machinery. As a matter of fact, since I finished The Beetle in the spring of 1896, I have not written, on an average, one novel a year. An author can have no reasonable objection to the production of fresh editions of his books, but he has every right to protest against his old work being issued by owners of copyright as if it were new.

It is unfair to the public, to reviewers, and to the writer himself.—I am, &c.,

RICHARD MARSH.

Shakespeare and the Market.

SIR,—In your issue of December 9, your correspondent thinks a new edition of Steevens's "Twenty Quartos of Shakespeare's Plays" is needed.

I concur with him as to what he says about a reprint of the First Folio being not demanded at this time when Booth's, Stanton's, and Halliwell Phillips's (which he alludes to as "The Chatto & Windus reprint") are readily at hand.

But I am afraid there is quite as little demand for Steevens's "Twenty Quartos."

Here is "The Bankside Shakespeare," printed by the Shakespeare Society of New York, edited by Dr. Appleton Morgan, in which each of these twenty quartos is paralleled with the First Folio text—the eccentricities of the broken types; italics, capitals, and black letter all jumbled together; logotypes, &c., all scrupulously preserved. And here are the Griggs-Prætorius Quartos, issued by Quaritch, both of which can be easily procured, there being no great demand for either. Why, then, an edition of Steevens's "Twenty Quartos"?

Perhaps the "Bankside" may in time be withdrawn from the market; for, as there were but five hundred impressions made and the types distributed, they may all get into private hands. Not so with the Griggs-Prætorius, which can already—at least, here in New York—be purchased at a figure considerably less than their published prices. The fact is, that however much enthusiasts may feel like putting money into Shakespearean reprints, the demand does not justify any commercial venture of the sort. And the same can be said of Shakespeareana generally!

The only way to publish Shakespeare books with any prospect of adequate return is to mark them at almost prohibitive prices. Those who want them will take them at any price; those who want them not will not take them at any price.

Now that the great Jahr Book of the German Shakespeare Gesellschaft has ceased publication, and all the other Shakespeare serials have preceeded it to limbo, I notice that the Shakespeare Society of New York has announced the resumption of Shakespeareana, discontinued eight years ago as a quarterly. I have always understood that the old Shakespeareana died for want of support. Doubtless the resumption has been financially provided for; otherwise, to add to the deluge of magazines seems hardly worth while. I am personally delighted to see the resumption, of course, but am afraid that Shakespeare, except to his very few remaining disciples, and on the stage, is most undeservedly and lamentably dead commercially, pitiful as the fact may be!—I am, &c.,

CHARLES HENRY BRECK.

148, East 12th Street, New York: January 12, 1901.

"Hannibal."

SIR,—I find "Bookworm" tripping slightly in two places. The volume published by Miss Arabella Shore in 1898 was not Hannibal, and other Poems; it contained her sister Louisa's play of "Hannibal"—simply that, and nothing more. Nor, I think, can the page and a half of preface to the book be described as an "introduction" in the accepted sense of the word.

The editor of the "Globe" Dryden was, of course, not W. D. Cristie, but W. D. Christie. This, no doubt, is a printer's error, but it occurs curiously in a paragraph correcting a previous slip.

The unhappy young man in the "Thing Seen" entitled "Brown Boots" would have found consolation had he visited last year's Royal Academy. There he would have seen a portrait of His Majesty King Edward VII. arrayed like himself in frock-coat and brown boots. "The King can do no wrong."—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM G. HUTCHISON.

"The Perfect Politician."

SIR,—In reference to Mr. Babington's remarks as to The Perfect Politician, and the claim which he puts forward for it as being the first published biography of Cromwell, it may be of interest to point out that in the year previous to that of the publication of the Life in question there appeared: The Portraiture of his Royal Highness Oliver, late Lord Protector, &c., in his Life and Death, with a Short View of his Government; Notæ Historico-Politice in Vitam Olivarii Cromwellii. Both of these works were published in London.—I am, &c.,

F. W. ELIAS.

Simplification of Spelling.

SIR,—There is only one point on which most spelling reformers will differ from Mr. Harrison—namely, as to the substitution of s for z in words like baptize, civilize, &c. And this for the reason that, z having one distinctive sound, its use to represent that sound should be encouraged as much as possible. Etymologically, one form has as much sanction as the other, and, since consistency is the main thing to aim at, and it is out of the question to use different forms according as these verbs are derived from Latin or Greek, the phonetic argument in favour of z is unanswerable. The only difficulty is the exception perhaps necessary in the case of words like surprise, exercise; but as we already write prize, assize (although the latter, at least, entirely defies etymology), it would be no great innovation to write surprize, &c., also. Similarly the spellings artisan, partizan, cozy, tease, teazle, &c., should be preferred, and we may even hope for the eventual use of z in distinctive words such as uze, rize, houze.—I am, &c., EVACUSTES A. PHIPSON.

Underpinned.

SIR,—In your review of Miss Bates's Spanish Highways and Byways your critic, speaking of the "indiferente," says that he was "held in high honour for the scholarship that had underpinned his faith." As an engineer, a voracious reader, and an occasional scribbler, may I suggest that the critic intended the opposite to what he wrote. To underpin technically denotes to strengthen weak or undermined foundations either by replacing the weak parts or filling in the cavity with substantial work. The "indiferente" was, as the reviewer says, an unbeliever. His scholarship had, therefore, undermined his faith and not underpinned it. Critics frequently misuse technical terms, and are, I fear, very loath to admit their errors.—I am, &c., L. L.

[Your correspondent is right. Oddly enough, on the day after seeing his letter I had occasion to remark to a builder that a house-wall had subsided. "Yes," he said, "but we have underpinned it."—YOUR REVIEWER.]

"Impossible Poetry."

SIR,—In the line, "The cord slides swiftly thro' his glowing hands," a commentator in your issue for February 2, p. 110, seems to detect inappropriateness of expression. But why should not the epithet "glowing" be applied to hands heated by the friction of rapid passage over a cord?—I am, &c.,

FRANCIS H. BUTLER.

The Love-Letter Story.

SIR,—In this class of literature I think that a short story by François Coppée, called "Lettres d'Amour," perhaps bears the palm. The plot is, shortly, as follows: A young poet-egoist gains the love of a poor schoolmistress; they can only meet on Sundays: during the interval she sends him daily letters, which at the time he scarcely reads. Soon he tires of her, and breaks from her brutally. She dies almost alone in a hospital of consumption. His poems are not a success. Some years after he comes across the love-letters among his papers, reads them and sees their beauty. He copies them in his own handwriting and publishes them as his own. They are an immense success, and make him famous. He marries a rich wife, whose head had been turned by the letters. Is he repentant? Far from it, for he finds no difficulty in convincing himself "qu'inspirer un livre ou l'écrire, cela revient au même."—I am, &c.,

H.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 72 (New Series).

In setting the Competition last week we said:

"A party of friends recently beguiled an evening by choosing in turn the historical personage, of any clime or period, man or woman, whom, if they had the power, they would recall from the grave for the pleasure or interest of a quarter of an hour's conversation."

A prize of One Guinea was offered for the most interesting reasons for any particular choice.

We have awarded the prize to Mr. Herbert Jamieson, The Lothians, Hadley Wood, for—

JOAN OF ARC.—Because her outer beauty was but the image and expression of an inner beauty of mind and soul; because to the recognised feminine virtue of purity there was added in her the unrecognised feminine quality of courage, yet without the loss of a single womanly trait; because the passion of patriotism—not the cold abstraction or the imperialistic sham most of us idly worship—burned like fire in her veins; because, though she saw visions and dreamed dreams, she was that rarest of human beings, a practical mystic, incarnating religious faith into active personal duty, surrendering the quiet culture of spirituality to don armour, lead battalions, and bring about the deliverance of her country.

Other replies are as follows:—

PONTIUS PILATE.—Because he would be able to supply an unbiased account of the trial and death of the Founder of Christianity; and would, in all probability, be in a position to settle many disputes arising from the imperfect character of all existing chronicles. Favourably disposed towards Christ, he yet carried out what he considered to be his duty as an impartial administrator of justice, and this points towards a well-balanced mind and the habitude of unprejudiced consideration. His testimony would be of more value to humanity at large than that of any historical character with whom we are acquainted.

[F. P. S., Manchester.]

CHARLES DICKENS.—Because often since you left us so suddenly (thirty-one years ago, come next June), I, with others, have felt intense curiosity to know the solution of the Mystery of Edwin Drood. Richard Proctor, most genial of astronomers, in his monograph, Watched by the Dead, gave us the probable trend of that half-told tale. But his piecing together of hints was only what Dr. John Brown calls "Eustochia" or "Happy Guessing." In ten minutes' talk you could clear up for me the destiny of the morose Jasper, and the fate of the winsome Rosa. But why summon you, or any other personage of the past, from your well-earned repose to chatter about such a trifling coil? Rather would I say to you—as the Scotch lady said to her moribund husband, when he suggested that if possible he would pay her a post-mortem visit—"Nay, Charles, keep your own side."

[R. T. McC., Whitby.]

NAPOLEON I.—Because I should like to ask him why he did not crown heroism in the field with chivalry to his Empress Josephine?

How much he gained by breaking his vows and blighting her life? Are his honour and glory perpetuated in the line of descent? What has France gained? Would he now desire to stand alone like Joan of Arc, or be represented by Napoleon le Petit or Bonaparte Blenkins?

[R. C., Wexford]

HEINRICH HEINE.—Because: (1.) His conversation would probably be the most interesting that any individual could produce. (2.) Heine was made up of so many striking and extraordinary personalities; we can get so little conception of the man in his manifold aspects from the records left of him, that it would be more satisfaction to have a quarter-of-an-hour's talk with him and see (or try to see) a little way into the heart of that great mystery, than with any other human being I know of. (3.) He exercised an extraordinary spell and fascination over other "humans." I should be anxious to try to trace the source of this power.

[A. L., London.]

OLIVER CROMWELL.—Because I should like to set my mind at rest as to the sincerity of his convictions; to inquire into the peculiar state of mind of a man who can reconcile bloodshed with the peaceful and gentle doctrines of Christ, and also to get an authentic account of the detestable behaviour of his troops in Ireland. To my mind it is the height of wickedness and hypocrisy to read the Bible with bloody fingers, and to enforce the literal acceptance of figurative truths at the point of a fanatical sword. The mind of such a man as Cromwell must of necessity have been eccentric, to say the least; and I am convinced that if it were possible for him to hold a conversation with an enlightened man of to-day, he would henceforth occupy a wholly different position in English history than has hitherto been accorded him.

[H. A. M., London.]

THOMAS LOVE PEACOCK.—Because I should be most likely to find a literary historical personage congenial, and because Shelley's "English Peacock . . . turn'd into a Flamingo" is, in my opinion, the writer who best answers to the requirement desiderated in the following wise dictum of Charles Lamb (see Hazlitt's essay "Of persons one would wish to have seen"): "But what we want to see anyone bodily for is when there is something peculiar, striking in the individuals, more than we can learn from their writings, and yet are curious to know." Browne and Donne, who immediately leap to the mind in this connexion, were mentioned by Lamb. Of such as Shakespeare and Milton we have been overburdened with information and criticism. There is no sense of mystery or novelty.

[A. G., Cheltenham.]

LORD BEACONSFIELD.—To ascertain his views and opinions with regard to the South African War, Yankee Imperialism, the German Emperor's "mailed fist," the Russians in Manchuria, the death of Queen Victoria, and the decadence of British trade.

[H. B., Gartoosh]

DR. JOHNSON.—Because the greatness of other historical personages is mainly to be seen in their deeds or in their writings; but the greatness of Johnson was manifested in his talking. He has left books—which no one reads—written in a language intermediate between dog-Latin and pigeon-English. But, in conversation, his descriptive epithet or ejaculatory abuse were most intelligible Saxon. If Moses should appear before us, he would only talk a barbarous Hebrew; and if Socrates, his importunate questionings would verily be Greek to us. But Johnson could entertain or affront, with equal felicity, the sober judge and the garrulous biographer. No more charming spirit from the dead could come and talk to us for a quarter of an hour at afternoon tea—if only the teapot were big enough! And after a quarter of an hour, no doubt we should have had just enough of him.

[R. A. S. J., Oxford.]

Replies also received from: F. S. H., Bath; W. S. B., London; C., Surrey; E. L. C. R., Surrey; A. D. B., Liverpool; F. G. C., Hull; P. C. G., Cambridge; T. C., Buxted; F. B. S., Birmingham; A. S., Edinburgh; E. T., Bexhill; R. M., Brighton; A. M. C., Leicester; H. H., Teddington; B. R., Bermondsey; C. J., Hampstead; G. H., Didsbury; W. J. F., Birmingham; M. A. W., London; H., Didsbury; —, Egham; M. E. S., London; C. M. W., Yorks; M. G. C., Ealing; H. W. D., Tottenham.

Competition No. 73 (New Series).

WE offer a prize of One Guinea for the most convincing advocacy of the claims of a really neglected English book. We do not mean standard works which may be presumed to be neglected, but books whose very titles are all but forgotten. Length should not exceed 150 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, February 13. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the third page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

CATALOGUES.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT of LITERATURE.—Monthly List of fresh purchases in Secondhand Books.
No. 605, just published, for February, post free on application.

H. SOTHERAN & Co., Booksellers,
140, Strand, W.C.; and 37, Piccadilly, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
Importers of Foreign Books,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; and 7,
Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & Co., 37, Soho Square.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

THIRD LIST OF BOOKS.

Royal 8vo, pp. 279-439, and Plates XVII. to XXXVIII.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS:—

MUSIC, EARLY PRINTED BOOKS, BOOKS with WOODCUTS, AMERICANA, &c.

Price 2s. 6d. post free.

CATALOGUE No. I., 1s., and CATALOGUE
No. II., 2s. 6d., may also be had, post free, on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

IMPORTANT BOOKS
At greatly reduced prices.
CATALOGUE, No. 323, February, 1901, is
Now Ready.

An exceptionally fine list,
Containing the latest acquisitions in PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.

WILLIAM GLAISHER,
265, High Holborn, London, W.C.

BARGAINS all round. Thirty-Guinea Sideboard, nice as new, £10. Dismantling previous to retiring.—Lowe's Book Shop,
New Street, Birmingham.

BARGAINS in Books, Sermons in Stones.—
Charles Knight's Penny Encyclopædia, sound, clean set, 27 large vols., 10s., cost £10—
Encyclopædia Britannica, set of old edition, contains a mine of knowledge, 15s., cost £30—
Dickens's Novels, First Editions, 5s. each—Set of Town Crier, £3—Wanted to Purchase for cash, One or Two City or Suburban Properties.—Lowe's Book Shop, next Grammar School, New Street, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each offered for
Ackermann's Cambridge, 2 vols., 1815;
Ferguson's Serpent Worship, 1873; Carmen
Saculare: an Ode (Macmillan), 1887; Shelley's St. Irvyne, 1811; Prior's Poems, 1707;
Lamb's John Woodvil, 1802; Keat's Poems,
1817.—BAKER'S Great Book Shop, Birmingham.

BOOKS, RARE and OUT-OF-PRINT, SUP-PLIED.—State wants. CATALOGUES free. Libraries and Small Parcels Purchased for Cash. WANTED, Gardiner's HISTORY,
2 vols., 1863.—HOLLAND Co., Book Merchants,
Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to
D. C. DALLAS, 161, Strand, London, W.C.

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY

(Incorporated by Royal Charter).

President—A. W. WARD, Esq., Litt D.

THE ANNIVERSARY MEETING
Will be held at ST. MARTIN'S TOWN
HALL, Charing Cross, on THURSDAY,
February 21st, at 5 o'clock p.m.,

A humble Address to the King's Most Excellent Majesty on the sad occasion of the lamented Death of Her late
Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria
(Patron of the Society), will be Moved at the Meeting.

HUBERT HALL, Director and Hon. Sec.
115, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

PUBLISHER, with an Established and Paying Business, and an extensive connection amongst private purchasers of high-class Publications, éditions de luxe, &c., desires to meet with PARTNER with £1,000, or would be prepared to accept position where his connection and services could be utilized.
—Write "BIBLIO," Box 783, Willing's, 125,
Strand, London, W.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss
MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

GRAHAM'S TYPE-WRITING OFFICE,
23, Cockspur Street, Pall Mall.—All kinds of difficult MSS. receive careful attention from EXPERIENCED workers. Specimen page and references sent if desired. Over five years' experience.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d. post free.

CONVICTED OF HEROISM. A Tale of
John Penry, Martyr, 1559-1593. By HERBERT
M. WHITE, B.A. Illustrated by Frank H.
Simpson.

"Excellent, unusual grasp of events, nobility of ideal, vividness, and grace of style."
Rev. ARCHIBALD DUFF, D.D.

Twenty-first Thousand. Limp cloth, price 6d., post free.

OUR PRINCIPLES: a Congregationalist
Church Manual. By G. B. JOHNSON.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Limited,
21 and 22, Farnival Street, Holborn, W.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J.
PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING,
A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR.

LLANFAIRFACHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 6s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS
per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUB-
SCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.
Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY,
SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SUR-
PLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

80-84, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria

Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.

Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

GEORGE ALLEN'S NEW BOOKS.

New Six-Shilling Novels.

SON of JUDITH: a Tale of the Welsh Mining Valleys.

By JOSEPH KEATING.

TIMES.—"It is the most successful attempt yet made to represent the peculiar cadence and accent of English as she spoke in the Welsh mining districts. Mr. Keating has a knack of making technical detail clear which is almost comparable to that of Mr. Rudyard Kipling."

THE SWAY of PHILIPPA. By J. B. Patton.

SPECTATOR.—"Is well written and of more than average interest."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Mr. Patton can draw a character very firmly and clearly, and he is undoubtedly a close observer of human nature."

A TRAGEDY of ERRORS. By Geraldine Hodgson.

GLASGOW HERALD.—"Out of the common run, and recommended warmly."

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.—"A faithful and pathetic study."

A BOER of TO-DAY. By George Cossins.

The story is that of a young Boer educated in Britain, but devoted to his country, in whose service he falls.

ST. JAMES'S BUDGET.—"Enjoyable reading for those who have followed the war through its varying fortunes."

BRITISH WEEKLY.—"A splendid history."

THE BELIEVING BISHOP. By Havergall-Bates.

The ACADEMY.—"Is a satire, and like most satires will either amuse or offend."

[Just out.]

NORTHBOROUGH CROSS. By L. Cope Cornford.

[Nearly ready.]

HOME POEMS. By the Rev. W. Earle. With 12 Full-

Page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

BOOKMAN.—"Mr. Earle's treatment of classical subjects is full of fresh, luminous thought, scholarly force, and sensible application."

GLASGOW HERALD.—"Mr. Earle can fire the imagination and turn the mind to the higher and more heroic aspects of thought and action."

HELWAN and the EGYPTIAN DESERT. The Guide to the famous Health Resort of Egypt, Helwan les-Bains (near Cairo). By W. PAGE MAY, M.D., B.Sc., M.R.C.P., Prof. A. H. SAYCE, LL.D., and Prof. A. SCHWEINFURTH. With 3 Maps and 32 Full-Page Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo, cloth limp, round corners, 3s.

THE REDEMPTION of EGYPT. By W. Basil Worsfold,

M.A. With 4 Illustrations in Colour, 20 Full-Page and 70 Text Illustrations from Sketches and Photographs by the Author. Extra fcap. 4to, cloth, gilt top, 15s. net.

Among the contents are:—The Mosques, Pyramids, and Ancient Temples—Schools—Cotton and Sugar Industries—Prisons—Industrial Development of the Soudan.

VICTORIA: 1837-1901. Events of the Reign. By

FREDK. RYLAND. Including Books, Plays, Pictures, Music, and Scientific Inventions. New Edition. Crown 8vo, paper covers, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

[Just out.]

THE REIGN of WOMAN UNDER QUEEN VICTORIA.

A Special Memorial Number of THE ARGOSY.

Dealing with the ART, FASHIONS, LITERATURE, MUSIC, and PHILANTHROPY of the Reign.

FULLY ILLUSTRATED, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

[February 20.]

The "GOOD MAN" of the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

A Monograph on its Didactic Literature. By CHARLES WHITTUCK. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

[Next week.]

THE LITERARY YEAR-BOOK, 1901. Fifth Year of

Issue. Edited by HERBERT MORRAH, with Articles by Messrs. ANTHONY HOPE, EDEN PHILLPOTTS, and other well-known Writers. Considerably Enlarged. Crown 8vo, cloth limp, 3s. 6d. net.

[End of February.]

GEORGE ALLEN, 156, Charing Cross Road, London.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

NOW READY. In cloth gilt, price 3s. 6d.

STREET DUST.

By OUIDA.

THREE POPULAR NOVELS.

Price 6s. each.

MAY SILVER. By ALAN ST. AUBYN.

A SOLDIER FOR A DAY. By EMILY SPENDER.

MORALS AND MILLIONS. By FLORENCE WARDEN.

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

MRS. L. T. MEADE'S New Novel,

THE BLUE DIAMOND,

Will be ready February 21st. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

MAX THORNTON. By Ernest Glanville, Author of "The Golden Rock." With 4 Illustrations by J. SHAW CROMPTON. R.I. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

QUALITY CORNER: a Study of Remorse

By C. L. ANTROBUS, Author of "Wilderemoor." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"The present volume, like Mrs. Antrobus's 'Wilderemoor,' has strong work in it, and the character-drawing is good."

"A new novel from the author of 'Wilderemoor' constitutes a welcome oasis in the desert of fiction through which we have been passing during the last few weeks. The setting is excellent, the Lancashire rustics are delightful, and the whole story, in style, sentiment, and delicacy of touch, far above the average."—Spectator.

"Given the much too shocking occasion of the remorse, there is genuine feeling and essential humanity in the working out of this unhappy theme. The dialogue, also, is as clever as Mrs. Antrobus's dialogue has a way of being. The minor characters have each a distinct individuality, usually well-drawn and full of life. It is thoughtful and interesting."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The story will serve to show how well Mrs. Antrobus has got in touch with Lancashire humour and the quaint little touches of character in which the Northern rural districts are so prolific."—Temple.

"Quality Corner" is a book that may be read with real enjoyment, and that affords more than the passing pleasure of an interesting story... wholly original as it is. Of keen psychological interest... the book is no ordinary novel. It is a thoroughly good story, of the dramatic action, romantic situations, and stirring incidents. —Sentinel.

Interests from the beginning. —Outlook.

A MISSING HERO. By Mrs. Alexander.

SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"Mrs. Alexander's many admirers will find much that is to their taste in her latest book."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mrs. Alexander has not devised a more ingenious plot, nor can we recall one more cleverly worked out."—World.

A PATH of THORNS. By Ernest A.

VIZETELLY. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

ECCENTRICITIES of GENIUS: Memories of Famous Men and Women of the Platform and the Stage.

By M. J. B. POND. With 91 Portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s.

"One of the best anecdotal books of the past twelve months, will doubtless be the popular verdict. His pen-portraits abound with sympathetic touches."—Daily Mail.

"A book as amusing in character as it is original in design."—Illustrated London News.

"An entertaining volume."—Scotsman.

THE INIMITABLE MRS. MASSINGHAM.

By HERBERT COMPTON. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"One of the really good novels of the year."—Manchester Guardian.

"It is very long since we read so delightful a story.... Healthy, vigorous, and charming romance."—Daily Graphic.

"A very pretty and engrossing story."—Truth.

GERMINAL; or, Master and Man. By

EMILE ZOLA. Edited, with an Introduction, by ERNEST A. VIZETELLY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"As a striking picture of an important phase of the great labour question, no one can doubt its claim to high rank."—Daily Telegraph.

IN the SOUTH SEAS: being an Account of Experiences in the Marquesas, Palmyra, and Gilbert Islands in the course of Two Cruises. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

"The volume abounds in graphic pen-pictures, such as Stevenson delighted to draw, and drew so well."—Daily Telegraph.

"Full of characteristic and marvellously sympathetic pictures."—Morning Leader.

"AS a WATCH in the NIGHT": a

Drama of Waking and Dream. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"We can without hesitation congratulate Mrs. Praed upon having achieved a notable success in her new novel."—Literary World.

THE LESSER EVIL. By Iza Duffus

HARDY. Author of "A Buried Sin." &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE MAN that CORRUPTED HADLEY-

BURG, and other Stories and Sketches. By MARK TWAIN. With a Frontispiece by LEONARD HITCHCOCK. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE FOURTH GENERATION. By Walter

BESANT. Author of "Children of Gibbon." "The Orange Girl." &c. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE "PRETTY POLLY": a Voyage of Incident. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Author of "The Wreck of the Grosvenor." &c. With 12 Illustrations by G. E. ROBERTSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

THE CLOISTER and the HEARTH. By

CHARLES READE. (A LARGE-TYPE, FINE-PAPER EDITION.) Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

NEW SIXPENNY BOOKS.

NEW ARABIAN NIGHTS. By R. L. STEVENSON.

PUCK. By OUIDA.

CROWNS and CORONATIONS: a History of Regalia. By WILLIAM JONES, F.S.A., Author of "Finger-Ring Lore," &c. With 91 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON: a Life

Study in Criticism. By H. BELLYSE BAILDON. With 2 Portraits. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s. [Feb. 21.]

EAST LONDON. By Walter Besant.

With an Etched Frontispiece by F. S. WALKER, and 55 Illustrations by PHIL. MAY, L. RAYES HILL, and JOSEPH PENNELL. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 15s. [Shortly.]

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Academy

Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1502. Established 1869.

16 February, 1901.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

MR. A. C. BRADLEY has succeeded Prof. Courthope in the Chair of Poetry at Oxford. Mr. Bradley has been Professor of Modern Literature at University College, Liverpool, and at Glasgow University. Mr. Bradley now takes his place in a line of professors which includes the names of Dean Milman, John Keble, and Matthew Arnold. The chair was founded in 1703, and £170 a year is the not magnificent emolument.

MR. HENRY JAMES's devoted public will welcome a new, long novel from his pen, called The Sacred Fount. It will be published by Messrs. Methuen next week. The opening is characteristic:

It was an occasion, I felt—the prospect of a large party—to look out at the station for others, possible friends and even possible enemies, who might be going. Such premonitions, it was true, bred fears when they failed to breed hopes, though it was to be added that there were sometimes, in the case, rather happy ambiguities. One was glowered at, in the compartment, by people who on the morrow, after breakfast, were to prove charming; one was spoken to first by people whose sociability was subsequently to show as bleak; and one built with confidence on others who were never to reappear at all—who were only going to Birmingham.

APROPOS of a paragraph in V. V. V.'s "Table Talk," last week, we have received the following: "The 'Children of the Hour' are not exactly dead, as the readers of 'Table Talk' may have imagined. Still less were they still-born: 'V. V. V.' will remember that the prospectus was the preliminary number in which they reached print. It was sold at a shilling. Some numbers will certainly, if the editor be permitted to continue them, be sold at a guinea, some at a penny. But meantime, the 'Children' are waiting to be adopted: their parents are no more; they are poor orphans, of brilliant promise. Such as they are, they still go clad in purple and fine linen: white envelopes, embossed with their style and title in violet; their colours were never to have been red. The editor returns to town next month; it will always be a pleasure to him to hear of one who would take up the 'Children of the Hour' and be a second father to them."

M. JULES VERNE, friend of our boyhood, may well be called the grand old man of story-tellers. He has written seventy books. From his retreat at Amiens he has just sent this dignified letter in response to an inquiry as to his sentiments in regard to a seat in the French Academy:

I have just completed my seventy-third year, and it is not at that age that I am likely to be fired with the ambition to enter the Academy. Twenty-eight years ago Alexandre Dumas, the younger, and a few friends took up my candidature; but I understood that it was an imprudent adventure, and I returned, as you say, to my Amiens Monastery, not to leave it again. Since then fifty-nine Academicians have passed into that other world where, doubtless, they have not found a cupola of the Institute to offer them eternal shelter. That is to say, that, though the Academy may give immortality, it does not render one immortal.—Very touched at the sympathy you display towards me, dear Sir, and thanking you with all my heart, I beg you to accept the handshake of the old storyteller, JULES VERNE.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Why is it, one wonders, that Italian literature has been, and is, shamefully neglected by English writers? It cannot be because of its unimportance, for neither our own literature nor Italian art can be intellectually appreciated without some knowledge of it. If we except Dr. Garnett's very slight sketch, and Symonds's Italian Renaissance, Italian literary history is practically unknown to the English reader. A little Tasso, a little Ariosto, a few careful cuttings from the Comedy, used formerly to take their place along with the other bric-à-brac of a gentleman's education; now the fear is that Dante specialism will tend, not to make our knowledge of Dante excessive—an obvious impossibility—but to divert us from the true method of literary study—the comparative. Dr. Ollsner's translation from the German (Bohn) of Adolf Gaspary's History of Italian Literature (published in German in 1884, and later in Italian) will help the reader to place Dante accurately, as the first volume of the English translation brings the history down to 1321. Subsequent volumes are to be published from time to time, and who knows but that these volumes may be productive of others which will bring the study of Italian literature into intelligible relation with that of its art and history?"

SOMETIMES there is method in the madness of compositors. A London morning paper is made to say in a leading article:

Nor were the teachers whose services have been dispensed with, like the sages mentioned in Omar Khayyam's FitzGerald, "thrust like drunken prophets forth," and their mouths stopped with dust.

After all, Omar Khayyam is far better known by his "FitzGerald" than by his own writings.

WE find that in attributing a beautiful little poem called "A Prayer of Old Age," part of which we quoted, to Mr. Robert Bridges the English poet, we fell into error. The lines are by Mr. Robert Bridges, the assistant editor of Scribner's Magazine, the periodical from which we quoted the lines.

GUESSES at the authorship of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters continue to amuse the town. We believe the author to be Mr. Laurence Housman. On p. 149 will be found an article ingeniously supporting this choice. Mr. Laurence Housman has written many works, including The Writings of William Blake, The House of Joy, Green Arras, Gods and Their Makers, The Little Land, Rue, Weird Tales from Northern Seas, &c. He is also an art critic. It will be remembered that many of the Letters deal with the young woman's appreciation of pictures.

MISS EDITH WHARTON has been accused of writing An Englishwoman's Love-Letters. For answer she parodies the letters, and does it in right merry pin. Here are a few of her imitations :

OWNEST —, When I woke this morning my windows were covered with a thick, white frost, my bath-tub was an improvised skating-pond, and the mercury in the thermometer outside had forced a hole through the bulb at the base of the tube and disappeared. I was just dangling one timorous, creamy, magnolia white foot over the edge of the bed into the icy crackling void of circumambient cold when the door opened, and Juggins (that housemaid, Belovèd, is already pensioned against senility!) — Juggins brought me Your Letter—.

Mine exclusively! Yesterday, in your absence, I called on your mother. . . . One can see that your mother has not had many artistic advantages; the drawing-room curtains are too awful; and sooner or later that bed of red geraniums by the front door will have to go. I made no allusion to the curtains beyond saying that I could not live in a room with aniline colours; for your sake, Darling, I was patient and forbearing. . . . Dearest, my one desire is to judge her leniently; but I happened to mention Meredith in the course of our talk, and her comments were so painfully wide of the mark that I thought it kinder to change the subject.

Circumference of my Globe! This town is Pisa. . . . Surely you must have heard of the Leaning Tower of Pisa? Love, it is a melody in marble! O, how I pitied those of our party who were too ignorant and unimaginative to be thrilled by such a revelation! Don't laugh at me, Darling, and call me eccentric, original, romantic; but when Uncle asked me yesterday what I should like for a birthday present, I flung my arms about his neck and whispered, One of those little Leaning Towers in alabaster! Belovèd, I can never be thankful enough for having been born with an artistic nature. . . .

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD's health has been the subject of rather irresponsible rumour, and his admirers will welcome his own statement of the matter. Writing to Major Pond, the lecture agent, the author of The Light of Asia says:

MY DEAR OLD FRIEND,—My long silence has been due to a long illness. Three years and a half ago a mysterious affection seized me, hindering my walking, causing me much pain at intervals, with other inconveniences. After two or three months the specialists called in declared it to be "ataxia," and since then I have fought the battle of life with a broken sword. Latterly the troublesome malady has fastened on my eyes. At present my right eye is useless, and my left has very imperfect vision. I cannot read or write myself, and my doctor, in hope of arresting the mischief and preserving or amending what sight remains, is injecting into me daily strychnia. I have not, however, given up work, and finished the year with some really triumphant literary labours.

Everyone will wish Sir Edwin better days.

WE understand that the condition of Mr. Robert Buchanan is such that his return to active literary life is entirely out of the question. We shall be glad to hear that the movement to assist Mr. Buchanan suggested by a contemporary is duly organised.

GENERAL BULLER's recommendation of the historical novel as a text-book for young soldiers, leads the Daily Chronicle into some interesting remarks on Mr. George Meredith's pronouncements on the army through General Lord Ormont. "Generals of cavalry are left to whistle for an independent command; there's a jealousy of our branch," says that hero. Moreover, "there's jealousy of the name of soldier in this country. I'd have advised a son of mine to train for a jockey rather than enter it." Of men who must be soldiers Lord Ormont says: "In peace they are snubbed by the heads; in war they are abused by the country. They don't understand in England how to treat an army; how to make one either." Here are a few of Lord Ormont's more biting utterances: "A young man of military tastes should take service abroad. They're in earnest about it over there. Here they play at it; and an army's shipped to land without commissariat, ambulances, or medical stores. . . . Our men can spurt for a flick of the whip. They're expected to be constantly ready for doing prodigies—to repair the country's omissions. Our men are good beasts; they give the best in 'em, and drop. More's the scandal to a country that has grand material and overtakes it. A blazing disaster ends the chapter!" Much food for reflection in all this.

ARROPUS of the historical novel, a writer in the Dial attempts to define this literary product, but we are not sure that he illumines the subject. No doubt the historical novel needs to be defined. Mr. Howells calls Jane Austen's stories historical novels because they are faithful pictures of the past, and contends that the true historical novel is the novel of searching vision written amid present events. That is confusing; and we accept the Dial writer's definition of the historical novel as one which has to do with people who seem to have had a part in the greater events, the larger forces, that make history. But when he comes to apply his definition we find this writer belittling Scott and exalting Sienkiewicz. His contention is that Ivanhoe is peopled by moderns, living partially the mediæval life, and that the innate motif of the times is absent from the tale. "That chivalry which was only a fall of lace on the dirty clothing of society is transformed by the touch of the wizard's pen into the fabric itself." On the other hand Sienkiewicz's novels "carry out nearly to perfection the idea of a great historical novel." And we are told:

These stories oft times lack delicacy of touch and finish; they have incidents that seem needlessly brutal, and reach the limits of our indulgence; they treat of life and character so alien that, at first thought, they seem unreal. Yet we soon know that we are seeing life as men lived it, that the author is a creator of people who live and move and have being. We find characters drawn with an unerring hand; we come to understand that a master of masters is putting before us the rush and sweep of great events, the elemental passions, all the vital constituents of the life of the time of which he treats.

Taking this as it stands, and the verdict on Scott as it stands, what is it that we are judging? The accuracy of a reproduction, or the charm of a literary work? The above eulogy of Sienkiewicz would fit an historian. But what is an accuracy which appeals to the judgment compared with a part-accuracy which takes possession of the heart and intellect, and is immortal? Of course, Sienkiewicz may have Scott's magic and his own historical mastery, but of that we have yet to be convinced. What we object to is the notion that historic fidelity is the important ingredient of an historical novel. Enough there must be; but there must be much more than a dramatisation of history, more than the recapture of the past; these are but objective triumphs. There must be in the historical novel what we demand in all novels—truth to the permanent qualities of human nature, and an appeal to the reader as a living man, who reads what concerns him. There must be the charm of charm.

A CORRESPONDENT who approves our remarks last week on the barrenness of the poetic field diminishes our gratitude by proceeding to make a violent critical attack on Mr. Kipling's "Recessional." His judgment of that poem strikes us as a rather maladroit piece of criticism. Our correspondent says:

Although at the Jubilee there was an immense amount written, most of us think that Mr. Kipling's "Recessional" towered above the rest. Yet, when that comes to be examined, it is scarcely worthy of such a great empire and great occasion. If it be true that the writer made several attempts, and then with a feeling of despair put it into the waste-paper basket, it is almost a pity that it was rescued. It is lacking in sympathetic heartiness. The aim was to pay a tribute to the great Queen, render thanks to the God whom she worshipped, and portray the Christian sentiment of our nation. But with the best intention we may ask, Does it do either? If at all, it is very feebly. There is no definite reference to the Queen, no thanks to Jehovah for guidance, and not a single phrase of Christian sentiment which befits a Christian dispensation.

It refers to the God of our fathers, but why should it not refer to the God of us in a special sense by bestowing such a Queen to reign over us? And when it refers to "Lord of our far-flung battle line," the words seem to have been chosen to form a rhyme with "Dominion over palm and pine," for in neither phrase is there a thought of true Victorian progress in morals, education, or Christian virtues, which are the leading traits in the great reign. Then I would ask, What joyous feeling such as was appropriate to the occasion can be excited by the words "Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet," or the useless repetition of "Lest we forget"? Is not sense there sacrificed to sound? Such jingle is not worthy of a nation which has boasted a Shakespeare, Byron, and Tennyson. It is nothing more than a picture of Judaism, with the God of battles held before our gaze to inspire us with awe and fear; and it takes us back two or three thousand years, while it leaves the glorious present unsung. If we take it verse by verse, it is the same. We get the "tumult and shouting," captains and kings departing, but it is not jubilee sentiment. We have reference to being "drunk with sight of power," and "wild tongues that have not God in awe; but how power can make people drunk, or tongues have awe, is beyond explanation. Generally, drunkenness is caused by alcoholic stimulants; and the intellect and sentiments are the subjects of awe, not the tongue. Imagine the most joyful period in a nation's history concerning any monarch's reign being celebrated with such impoverished sentiment and words! Is it possible to think what Mr. Kipling may be referring to when he writes "Valiant dust that builds on dust"? How dust can be valiant is truly a puzzle; but to talk about it "building" is beyond the man in the street, even if that is the ideal to which poets should stoop.

In our opinion our correspondent wholly misunderstands the "Recessional." He says: "The aim was to pay a tribute to the great Queen, render thanks to the God whom she worshipped, and portray the Christian sentiment of our nation." Who told him this? The aim of the "Recessional" was not to pay tribute to the Queen. That had been done by the Jubilee; and Mr. Kipling's intention was to remind us that, having rendered to Caesar the things that were Caesar's, we should not forget to render to God the things that are God's. In a word, he wished to cool the flushed brows of the nation, and to give a solemn and effective direction to its reaction from hurrahing and boasting. This he did with force and simplicity. Our correspondent's minor criticisms hardly merit attention. That power can make people drunk, or that tongues can have awe, is certainly not "beyond explanation," though it may be beyond his own understanding.

AN Oxford-street bookseller has a grievance against his printer. In the bookseller's catalogue appears the following item:

142 CLOUGH (A. H.) Bothie of Toper-na-Fuosich, a Long Vacation Pastoral, first edition.

We fear that the misprints are symptomatic of the neglect into which Clough's poetry has fallen.

MR. RICHARD BURTON has a good article in the Forum on "The Dark in Literature." Mr. Burton, of course, distinguishes between the "dark" and the merely lugubrious. Judge Sewall's entry in his diary, "Spent the morning in the vault re-arranging the family coffins; it was a pleasant but awful treat," does not appeal to Mr. Burton, whose wish is to extol the effect of what is solemnly and severely tragic, or awful in the purest sense:

Few of those who are unfriendly to the dark literature will deny that the sad has some right there, or that pleasure may co-exist with sadness. . . . Job, superbly alone and afflicted on his ash-heap; Antigone, going smiling to her tomb; Chaucer's Griselda, patient and amazed at her ill treatment, and exclaiming, as the thought of her husband's earlier love for her overwhelmed her mind:

Oh, God, how kind and good was his visage
The day that maked was our marriage!

Lear appealing to the stormy heavens, since they were old like him; Dante listening to Francesca's piteous tale of love, strong though in hell; Gretchen in the Garden, conscious of her guilt, yet crying with that infinitely pathetic child-cry:

Yet, everything that led me here
Was oh, so good, was oh, so dear;

Beatrice Cenci, talking of her hair just before she goes out to the block; Mildred, in Browning's "A Blot on the 'Scutcheon," with those wonderful girlish words of hers:

I—I was so young!
Beside, I loved him, Thorold—and I had No mother; God forgot me: so I fell—these, I say, are the scenes, that to the lover of literature rise up in memory like southern stars in the night heavens, stars whose sombre setting is the very condition of the splendour of their shining.

THE Architectural Review does not confine itself to the merely material aspects of architecture, but opens its columns to discussion of the poetic and spiritual effect of tabernacles made with hands. Miss Ethel Wheeler has written two articles on "The Place of Architecture in Allegory." To Spenser she awards the palm as the poet who of all others can describe architecture that is at once strong and delicate. Here is the porch of the House of Temperance:

Of hewen stone the porch was fairly wrought
Stone more of value, and more smooth and fine,
Than jet or marble far from Ireland brought;
Over the which was cast a wandering vine,
Enchased with a wanton ivy-twine:
And over it a fair portecullis hong,
Which to the gates directly did incline,
With comely compass and compacture strong,
Neither unseemly short, not yet exceeding long.

"No poet since Spenser's time," says Miss Wheeler, "has been able to rear such ethereal fabrics with such appearance of solidity. Many great architectural visions have been dreamed in recent years, but they are dim with excess of light, blurred with remote suggestions. Spenser's buildings are definite and clear-drawn, yet glint with the magic unreality of Faëryland. How vague in comparison is the castle of his imitator, James Thomson! How unwieldy the palace in Dr. Johnson's Happy Valley!"

MORE interesting, perhaps, to modern minds, are Mr. A. E. Street's selections from Maupassant and Huysmans, both of whom are gifted with an intuitive appreciation of architecture. Maupassant's description of Mont St. Michel is worth knowing:

I walked towards it in the early morning across the sands, my eyes spellbound by this mighty casket, vast as a mountain, chased like a cameo, airy as muslin. The nearer I drew the more I felt lifted up with wonder, for perhaps there is nothing in the world more astonishing and more perfect. And I wandered, startled as if I had come upon the dwelling-place of a god, along chambers carried on columns light or massive, along passages pierced to the daylight, raising my eyes in rapture to bell towers which seemed to spring to the heavens like rockets, to all the incredible confusion of turret and gargoyle, of delicate and fascinating enrichment, fireworks in stone, lacework in granite, masterpiece of architecture at once colossal and refined.

MR. BARNARD GEORGE HOARE objects to our article last week (called "Why Do They Do It?") on a number of books of verse. His letter is much too long to print, but we give an extract. Mr. Hoare says: "In the booklet which bears my name, and of which (although it does not represent my views of mature work), strange as it may appear, I am not ashamed, I refer to a dead mavis, killed by early frost presumably, as follows:

Perhaps the mellow tuneful note
Went murmuring in thy liquid throat
When stung the cruel frost;
In this cold world 'tis often found
Some gentle singer's voice is drowned
And noble song is lost.

This is at least true, and a sufficient answer to 'Why do they do it?' Would Mr. Hoare, then, have poetry exempt from criticism, and sheltered from the "frost" which at present helps to secure the survival of the fittest?

ANOTHER correspondent writes on behalf of the same poets: "You have doubtless done a public service, and I should be the last to utter a protest. But I do question the method you have adopted—viz., that of picking out the weak parts and holding them up to ridicule. You may be interested in Byron's view on this very question; it was written in a letter to Mr. Moore under date April 23rd, 1820, and refers to 'Don Juan':

P.S.—You say that one half is very good; you are wrong; for if it were, it would be the finest poem in existence. Where is the poetry of which one half is good? is it the Æneid? is it Milton's? is it Dryden's? is it anyone's except Pope's and Goldsmith's of which all is good? and yet these two last are the poets your fond poets would explode. But if one half of the two new Cantos be good in your opinion, what the devil would you have more? No—no; no poetry is generally good—only by fits and starts—and you are lucky to get a sparkle here and there. You might as well want a midnight all stars as rhyme all perfect.

Again we are puzzled. We examine a number of books of verse, and we conclude that they are ridiculous. Such books pour from the press, and we decide that it is well that we should publicly deplore the fact. How are we to prove our case if not in the manner we adopted? The quotation from Byron is hardly to the point. We did not admit that half the poems in question were good. On the contrary, we said: "There is not one of them in which the most genial critic, if he were honest and fairly intelligent, could find anything to commend. . . . Why were they written?"

Bibliographical.

THE announcement that the new production at the Prince of Wales's Theatre is founded on Charles Reade's story of Peg Woffington will, no doubt, induce many theatre-goers to purchase, for the first time, a copy of that engaging work, the most recent edition of which is that which Mr. Austin Dobson "introduced," and Mr. Hugh Thomson illustrated, for Mr. George Allen. That is, undoubtedly, a volume to acquire. But there are also available two other acceptable editions—one by Messrs. Chatto & Windus, the other by Messrs. Routledge—in which cases Peg Woffington and Christie Johnstone are bound up together. Peg was published separately in 1895 by Mr. R. E. King. It seems not to be generally known that Peg came after the play, by Reade and Tom Taylor, of which the famous actress is the heroine. It was, however, the success of "Masks and Faces" which led to Reade's production of Peg Woffington, in the dedication of which, to Tom Taylor, Reade acknowledges that the story owes something to his friend's share in the play.

Sir Henry Irving's choice of Mr. Charles Willeby to compose the illustrative music for the new blank-verse drama which our actor-knight has accepted, has come upon many with a sense of surprise. So few were aware that Mr. Willeby was a musician. To the general public, I venture to think, Mr. Willeby is practically known only as the author of a couple of books on musical subjects—a monograph on Chopin, published in 1892, and a volume entitled Masters of English Music, issued in the following year. Talking of musical biography, I see Sir Hubert Parry is to undertake a new Life of Bach, for which, no doubt, there is room, though it is only three years or so since Mr. Sebastian Taylor dealt with Bach's career and work in a useful manual. Another readable and serviceable biography of Bach is that which Mr. Reginald Lane Poole contributed in 1882 to the "Great Musicians" series.

It is said that the edition of Shakespeare which Mr. W. E. Henley will supervise for Mr. Grant Richards is to be without annotation. If so, the editing must needs be confined to the text. But some of that text is so hopelessly corrupt that students ought, one would think, to have Mr. Henley's reasons for preferring this or that reading. A reprint of the 1623 folio, with variorum readings at the foot of the page, would be welcomed, I believe, by many, though to "the general," of course, it could not be expected to appeal. The best annotated one-volume edition of Shakespeare with which I am acquainted is that called "The Howard," which was originally, and no doubt still is, published by Messrs. Nelson. In that case the annotation, though sometimes original, is mainly selected and condensed from the suggestions of former editors, from Rowe downwards.

It is suggested that a collection of Lord Beaconsfield's letters may precede the official biography for which we have all been looking so long, and about which there are so many different tales extant. One does not forget that the world already possesses the text of letters written by Lord Beaconsfield between 1830 and 1852. In 1885 came the Home Letters, penned in 1830 and 1831, and in the following year came the Correspondence with his Sister between 1832 and 1852. In 1887 both series were united in a single volume, published at the small price of two shillings, and including a few letters which had not previously appeared. This is the edition to be desired, for, though not very strongly bound, it is excellent typographically. Probably, as Lord Beaconsfield grew older and had "less freedom and greater responsibility," his correspondence declined in spontaneity, frankness, and sprightliness. Still, a selection from it must needs have great interest and value.

The announced new edition of the Works of George Eliot will no doubt find a large public awaiting it. It is to be issued at two shillings, half-a-crown, and three shillings per volume, according to the binding preferred. The immediately preceding uniform edition of the Works was published in 1895 at half-a-crown per volume, and is, I suppose, still extant. Adam Bede and The Scenes of Clerical Life are obtainable for the nimble sixpence; but apart from these, I believe, no book of George Eliot's can be bought for less than two-and-sixpence. Middlemarch and Daniel Deronda cost at present seven-and-sixpence each; while Romola costs five shillings. Felix Holt and The Mill on the Floss can be purchased for three-and-sixpence each. As the books go out of copyright, they will, of course, cheapen; but the public likes to have its "classics" uniform in size and price. THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Grist for Novelists.

Life and Letters of Zachary Macaulay. By Viscountess Knutsford. (Arnold. 16s.)

THIS book is dull or amusing according as you take it. To the roving eye it is rather dull; and the obvious interest of its references to Lord Macaulay does not amount to much. There are scores of pages about Sierra Leone and the Slave Trade. There is much evangelical "shop" and musty sectarianism. A narrow phraseology smoulders along these pages of diaries and letters, and the very signature, Z. Macaulay, repeated scores of times, is somewhat forbidding. Naturally these things oppressed us when we took up the book. It was only little by little that they began to coalesce and brighten into a very interesting picture. We ended by finding Lady Knutsford's work nearly as bright as a novel, and by wishing that it might take the eye of an historical novelist who wants a period, and is more desirous to restore an atmosphere than to inject incident.

The time is surely piquant. The father of Lord Macaulay was born in 1768, and died in 1838. His life began in the depths of the eighteenth century, and ended on the smiling acclivities of the nineteenth. He was born when men were reading The Vicar of Wakefield as a new book; he died when they had finished the Waverley Novels. Byron, Shelley, Lamb, Keats, and Coleridge, lived and died within Zachary Macaulay's span; and the youth who had pored over Miss Burney's Evelina in what he was pleased to consider his dissolute youth was free to reject the Pickwick Papers in his irreproachable age. Of the social changes witnessed by Macaulay we need name but one. In his twenties he had hardened himself to see the flesh of slaves torn by whips in Jamaica. In his sixties he looked back on the abolition of slavery as a work in which he had borne a leading part. Good Quakers who had refused to take sugar in their tea when Zachary Macaulay was a clerk in the West Indies took their three lumps when he was a prophet in Clapham. It was the age of the private philanthropist; and a concentrated moral earnestness was preparing the way for the diffused altruism of to-day. Benevolence was local, sectarian, and exclusive. In 1800 it was the Clapham Sect, and of this "sect" Macaulay was a shining light.

The cream of Lady Knutsford's work is just the picture given of the wealthy, well-fed, decidedly priggish, but very genuine philanthropy which found its home around Clapham Common. There Wilberforce and Henry Thornton, while still unmarried, had taken a villa between them, that they might evolve schemes for the betterment of the human lot, and that bells might knoll them sweetly to church on Sunday. The Common was no lung of bricky London, but a rurally beautiful spot, beyond which the open country spread in smiling richness. Drawn by the place, and by each other, the friends of Abolition came one by one, or family by family, to occupy large brick houses on the edge of the Common. Here the Thorntons, the Babingtons, the Macaulays, the Grants, and the Teignmouths moved among each other in inextricable hospitality. Their children played together, and grew up in the same atmosphere of temperance and piety. Moral truths frequently stated, principles which could be produced at any moment, and aims for which no sacrifice of time or money seemed too great, dominated these good people, and made them a force while it made them also, in a mild degree, a laughing-stock. We confess that we fall under the spell of this extraordinary circle, in which comfort and self-sacrifice, riches and the Kingdom of Heaven, were reconciled under the sanctions of an evangelical Anglicanism the most unswerving, the most jealous. Lady Knutsford speaks, not without unction, of the "beautiful villas round Clapham Common," in which these people gathered for "the hallowed repose of Sunday." They were business men, bankers, barristers, legislators, but they brought their wits and wealth to the same crusades. By such people, and in such surroundings, millions of negroes in the West Indies and in West Africa were lifted from slavery to freedom. But then these Abolitionists of Clapham were no mere distant theorists. Their agents, of whom Zachary Macaulay was chief, were continually passing between England and Sierra Leone, or Jamaica, where they studied the traffic in human beings at first hand. Macaulay took a voyage from Sierra Leone to Barbadoes in a slave ship solely to see things for himself. Members of Parliament were hustled down to the docks and shown over slave ships, that they might understand what infamous cruelty the traffic involved. In Clapham enchained Africa was represented by thirty negro boys, brought over by the sect to be trained as missionaries. When one evening the new arrivals were led across the golden furze of the Common, their number grew mysteriously less in the brief walk; and at Henry Thornton's gate it was found that several future missionaries had disappeared from the procession. It turned out that the Claphamites, seated at dinner, had seen the sable line, and had sent out their footmen to catch some of the boys and bring them to table for their amusement; and the Africans, thinking, very simply, that Clapham was peopled by their friends, went willingly. Our novelist ought to make something of that scene.

In these admirable circles there grew up ways of thought and speech so typical as to be their own burlesque. In Macaulay's, Babington's, Thornton's, and Hannah More's letters we alight on turns of expression which are the very mintage of the Sect. Dickens would hardly have troubled to alter the following sentences in a letter of Macaulay's to Hannah More. It was after the detection of the Cato-street conspiracy:

At the Bible Society Meeting Lord Harrowby came into the hall unexpectedly. One feeling seemed to pervade the meeting on his being recognised. The thought which seemed to strike every mind was this, that, but for the special interference of Providence, he would have been a murdered corpse. The image which presented itself irresistibly to my mind was that of Ings the butcher plunging the dagger into the Christian statesman's breast.

Again, how self-critical the scene of joy and congratulation in Wilberforce's house after the passing of the Bill for the Abolition of Slavery. When the storms of congratulation had subsided, Wilberforce turned to Thornton in an ecstasy of relief, and said, laughing: "What shall we abolish next?" "The Lottery, I think," was the monumental answer. It is from the phraseology of these people's letters and talk that one sucks the quality of their lives. Accustomed to the sonorities of debate and aspiration, they are amusing when they descend to common life. In her old age Hannah More was not well served by her household at Barley Wood, near Bristol, and her servants' delinquencies became common knowledge before she herself had any suspicion of them. It was Zachary Macaulay who broke to her, by letter, the terrible tales that had reached Clapham. Observe his language, his tread:

The communication to which I allude is to this effect—that an impression has gone abroad that your servants at Barley Wood were acting in a way that was very discreditable in itself, and very injurious to your interests; that their habits were those of intemperance and profusion; that not only were practices carried on in your kitchen which were highly objectionable and indecorous, but that your servants were sometimes engaged in night revelries in the village, in which they induced even Louisa [a girl in whom Hannah More took special interest] to take a part; leaving you and your house to their fate; that their system was one of pillage; and that in particular Charles took advantage of your state of health to turn your farming concerns into a source of gain to him—self. I give you the mere outline, omitting various circumstances which have been mentioned of what has been stated as matter of common rumour and belief.

To do this letter justice, it took instant effect. Although the venerable lady was unconscious of the rapine and dissipation going on under her feet, she promptly broke up the home in which she had expected to die in peace and stepping into the carriage that was to convey her from it for ever said: "I am driven like Eve out of Paradise, but not like Eve by angels."

Hannah More's letters show amusing variations of temper and piety. A lady who could hold her own in the Garricks' circle must have governed herself with some care when she came to Clapham, and inspired the sect with her idea of Cheap Repository Tracts. With Zachary Macaulay Hannah kept up a highly edifying correspondence. She writes piously from Barley Wood in 1828:

I had half a mind to send you a letter from our Princess Elizabeth, now Princess of Hesse-Homburg, but it is so flattering to me that I could not do it. It is gratifying, however, as to the piety of her own mind. I have also a very pious letter from Princess Sophia Matilda.

So much for the humanities. Our novelist must needs have local colour. This is supplied freely by Macaulay, whose letters are those of an observant man with his own sense of humour. We could scarcely wish for a more photographic scene of London life, and of the conditions of travel in 1811, than is supplied in a letter to his wife, dated from Cambridge. He had made a hurried journey thither to attend the installation of his friend and helper, the Duke of Gloucester, as Chancellor of the University. We quote only the first part of a letter that is all racy and fluent:

You shall hear my adventures, which were singular enough. I went off at four o'clock on Friday afternoon to the inn at Bishopsgate-street from which the coach set off, and after waiting some time it made its appearance, but full, quite full. My name, however, had been regularly booked and the money paid, and I insisted on having a place. The coachman, guard, and clerks all began an inquiry, which ended in the discovery that a lady had got into the coach and placed herself bodkin, who had no right to be there. She was requested to come out, but refused. Entreaty was used in vain. "Who is she?" was echoed on all sides. "She is," said the guard, "Mrs. Green, who keeps the oil-shop in Holborn, who is going down to Cambridge to sell her oils and pickles." Near an hour was employed in labouring to convince this lady that she ought to come out. It was all to no purpose, and the coach at last drove off, leaving me behind. I the more regretted this, because Prof. Christian and Reginald Heber were both passengers in the same coach, and I had promised myself much enjoyment. There would, however, have been a drawback. There would have been another woman still in the coach. Now you must know I have no particular objection to coming into contact with women, nor with children either. But this woman had in her arms a child who did not once cease squalling during the whole dialogue with the oilman's wife, and this may have affected her nervous system and made her more pertinacious in resistance.

In another letter we find Macaulay describing the first gaslights, "by which it is proposed to produce immense savings in the article of candles." Alike in what it contains and what it does not contain, this biography—on which Lady Knutsford has expended manifest care—is a document. It portrays a man, and it recalls an age and a region in that age. We are grateful for it. And, as we have said, it suggests a novel in which that old, earnest Clapham life, with its sweet surroundings and harmless priggeries and old-fashioned sanctities, might live as it does not live in The Newcomes.

Mr. Davidson's Drama.

Self's the Man: a Tragi-Comedy. By John Davidson.
(Richards. 5s. net.)

ON the acting capacities of Mr. John Davidson's play we do not venture to pronounce—in some respects we should rather think it would fall short—but he has certainly produced an able drama, which holds the reader's interest. At the same time, we question if it always holds that interest by the higher means. Mr. Davidson (it is an individual trait in him) is obviously steeped in the Elizabethan drama, less of Shakespeare than of Shakespeare's contemporaries; to the extent of copying their weaker mannerisms and such of their methods as are not in the best taste. In this play he reminds us particularly of Marston, between whom and Mr. Davidson there is more than a little resemblance—in a certain robustness which runs a peril of becoming robustiousness, in a grim humour which is at times ungainly and forced in both poets. There is a strong fantastic element, too, in Self's the Man, which likewise recalls to us Marston. Both are lacking in the lighter graces, and their sportiveness is unconvincing of mirth. Another defect which the author shares with rough John Marston is a tendency to rely on devices—on trick, in fact—rather than true evolution of plot. The device may be clever and effective, but it remains trick; and this arbitrary cutting of the dramatic knot is continual throughout the play. Trick secures the opening election of Urban as Lombard King; it is trick by which he tries to stave off his own death at the hands of his enemies; trick, again, later brings his rival, Lucian, and the conspirators to the palace at the "psychological moment" for his final overthrow. The sense of cleverness grows too pervasive; we come to look for the requisite ruse at the requisite turn of the cards. It is just in this respect that we hesitate as to its effectiveness on the stage, where too much ruserie is apt to fatigue an audience. But Mr. Davidson has the qualities of his defects: strength seldom fails him where he needs it, and beauty of the graver kind is his. Listen to Urban in the close of the first act.

I, who shall rule, adore
This envied land, in purple vintages
And golden harvests clad; adorned and veiled
With braided rivers; thickly studded o'er
With hearths that glow; with famous cities zoned
From sea to sea, from Alp to Apennine.
I am become this land, this Lombardy;
Its azure waters seem to me my blood;
Its snowy crest my crown; and in my heart
The Lombards have their home—the quick, the dead.

He is weak in character: none of the personages—the megalomaniac Urban; the dutiful Queen Osmunda; the mistress Saturnia; the half-hearted rival Lucian; or the crafty plotter Hildebrand—emerge on us from the realm of labelled stage-shadows. Thrasimund seems a violent impossibility, passing instantly from the most dotting senility to the astutest subtlety of direction. After his direct vigour of dialogue it is on situation that Mr. Davidson depends. His best achievement in this way is certainly the final act, for there the situation arises naturally out of the plot and its development. It is a very effective piece of sardonic irony—broad, and nowise thrown in the reader's face, but suffered to make itself quietly felt. Urban returns from exile, poor, old, and unrecognised, to find his queen and his rival both dead, and his daughter, Sybil, proclaimed Queen of the Lombards. She is in the act of unveiling a statue to him, for he has become a national hero during his absence and supposed death. The man whom the Lombards drove forth in ignominy stands beneath his own statue, and hears his own praises pronounced by his own daughter, while the fickle people acclaim Urban the Great. The unguessed-at king stands forth and bitterly combats his own praises :

For his head, 'twas warped
With waste ambition : and he saw the world
Mis-shapen like a semblance in a pool
The wind perturbs. He that was struck by chance
A flaunting feather in the age's cap,
Essayed to be the sword of destiny,
And with the dust and straw was swept aside,
A bitten quill used once to write a name.

The angry crowd tear and trample their Urban the Great in the dust, whence he is rescued in a dying state by his former mistress, Saturnia (now a nun); while Sybil and the royal cortège pass on. He dies on Saturnia's shoulder, with the blasts of his daughter's triumph sounding in his ear. By a happy touch, Mr. Davidson makes the old king regain his wonted self-complacency in the last moments—the native man flaring up at the ending :

Where is that lying fellow on the porch ?

[meaning himself].

Urban was noble—do you hear?—and great.

Take this from me—learn to forgive yourself ;

Though you were Judas, learn to forgive yourself.

The note of grim humour is prominent throughout the play—for it is characteristic of Mr. Davidson. An interesting drama, if not all equal or successful, and quite worthy of the author's acknowledged powers.

The Poet as Historian.

Reflections on the Origins and Destiny of Imperial Britain.

By J. A. Cramb. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS book has both an extrinsic and an intrinsic interest. It consists of lectures delivered at Queen's College in the course of 1900, and surely it is good to know what words a professor of modern history was addressing to his plastic young students while the Boer war was still going on. Dr. Dryasdust would have pursued the even tenor of his way regardless of it; but our professor is modern in more senses than one; he seems to have felt as much compelled to treat of passing events as if he were a popular preacher, a politician, or a journalist on the Daily Mail; and he is more disdainful of common everyday fact than any of them, but directs his pronouncements according to the teaching of those whom he esteems the prophets of his time. We by no means blame him for that, holding as we do that the highest wisdom, let it come from poet or seer, is either for everyday wear or worthless. Yet if politics are to be judged by poetry, it is essential that the latter should stand on firm earth, voices that sing in the ether only are out of place here. And that is where we somewhat mistrust Prof. Cramb; he appears to us too much of a bookman, and, therefore, somewhat given to exaggerate the importance of his favourites. Shelley's is the most recurring name with him, but we fail to see the connexion between this ineffectual angel and South Africa. He treats Carlyle, too (not quite accurately in matters of fact) as the great exponent of his age, while every day it becomes more apparent that Carlyle misunderstood his time; he was too self-concentrated, too greatly lacking in the broad, brotherly human sympathy that distinguishes the really great Chaucer and Shakespeare and Scott, for instance, to do anything else. As we have begun by finding fault, it may be just as well to complete the process before addressing ourselves to the more agreeable task of pointing out what is splendidly fine and beautiful in a book full of suggestiveness even where we differ from it. First of all, then, a protest must be entered against this hasty judgment of a war not yet completed. Nothing as yet can be rightly chronicled except the facts. It is much too early to assume, as our author does, that here we have a conflict between Nationalism and Imperialism. But Mr. Cramb, whose work savours greatly of the class-room and the study, and who does not shine as an exponent of the characters and motives of men, ever seeks the pomp of opposing ideas where there may be no more than the clash of characters. It is the same with his writing, much of which is extremely beautiful, but often the note is pitched too high, and the rhetoric is false. An example may be quoted from the somewhat pretentious account of the youths who have died in South Africa. After a sentimental passage he goes on :

See through the mists of time, Valhalla, its towers and battlements, uplift themselves, and from their places the phantoms of the mighty heroes of all ages rise to greet the English youths who enter smiling, the blood yet trickling from their wounds! Behold Achilles turns, unbending from his deep disdain; Rustum, Timoleon, Hannibal, &c., &c.

This is mere fine writing and perfectly unreal. What is of importance is that at a time when all England was apparently sinking into sloth, luxury, and frivolity, the very flower of her youth were suddenly transported to the Veldt, there to be brought into contact with the hard realities of life—pain, suffering, want, death. And the whole nation was made sterner and stronger, more fitted for a great destiny by the experience; those who died for their country throwing back on their homes a new glory and dignity; those who returned leavening the whole nation with a manhood that had faced death and peril and suffering. Mr. Cramb has far too many of these purple patches, wherein—led astray by a vision that is spurious because not based on reality—he produces abundantly the semi-poetic that is not poetic at all, if the truth be told. That is one effect of keeping himself at concert pitch all the time—it makes his pages feverish. This in an historian does not beget confidence. And, after all, the plain truth of the matter is that England owes her greatness largely to traders, who, with no loftier motive than a desire to make themselves rich, built ship and factory and pushed their commerce to the ends of the earth.

Yet when all that is said, the students are fortunate who have such a professor to listen to. His is evidently one of those rich, beautiful, stimulating, brilliant minds, ever dwelling on high, unworldly thoughts, that impart what is of far more value than correct habits of reasoning—viz., the impulse to feel and know. Let a few extracts show better than description can the nature of his teaching. The first deals with the characteristics of our age :

This revolution in our conception of history, this boundless industry . . . is neither accident, nor transient caprice, nor antiquarian frenzy, but a phase of the guiding impulse, the supreme instinct of the age—the ardour to know all, to experience all, to be all, to suffer all—in a word, to know the truth of things, if haply there come with it immortal life, even if there come with it silence and utter death.

With this pregnant glance at the time there may be set this concerning the race :

Thus, then, as Beauty is impersonated in Hellas, Mystery in Egypt, so this attribute which we may name Reverie is impersonated in the Teutonic race.

Naturally, beside these comes the message which he bears to England—long and elaborate, the gist of it is this :

There is an Arab fable, of the white steed of Destiny with the thunder mane and the hoofs of lightning, that to every man, as to every people, comes once. Glory to that man, to that race, who dared to mount it; and that steed, is it not nearing England now? Hark! The ringing of its hoofs is borne to our ears on the blast.

One longer quotation we have reserved for the end, and it come near the end of the book wherein the author seems to grow calm and solemn, his very style changing till it reminds one of Sir Thomas Browne, and the passage in the opinion of at least one reader is one that carries with it truth, wisdom and comfort:

In Time, misery is the soul's familiar, anguish is the gate of truth, and the highest moments of bliss are as the Socrates of Plato affirms negative. They are the moments of oblivion, when the manacles of Time fall off, whether from stress of agony or delight in mere weariness. Therefore with stammering lips man congratulates joy, but the response of grief to grief is quick and from the heart, sanctioned by the Unconscious; therefore in the portraiture of Heaven art fails, but in that of Hell succeeds. It is not in Time that the eternal can find rest, nor in space that the infinite can find repose; and as illusion follows lost illusion the soul of man does but the more completely realise the wonder ineffable of the only reality, the Eternal Now.

A lovely and pregnant passage, though it might tempt a scoffer to shout, Hurrah for misery.

"Like a Tea-Tray in the Sky."

By Land and Sky. By the Rev. John M. Bacon. (Isbister.)

IN a book lately reviewed in these columns a police-court missionary tells of a cracksmen whose account of the fascination of his business exalted it far above a combination of horse-racing and several other popular pursuits. Mr. Holmes, if he desired this criminal's cure, should have turned him over to Mr. Bacon. For from his hearty pages one comes back convinced that for sheer devilry the maddest of automobiles, the crankiest of colts, is not in it with the balloon. Not that the burglar's is the only temperament to which it might well appeal. It is conceivable that, in fact, that element may not dominate Mr. Bacon's character, though there can be little doubt that, if such had been his calling, he would have done it credit; for courage and presence of mind and the spirit of adventure must tell in every walk.

One great charm of the aeronaut's art is that, whereas from start to finish it is dangerous, the most perilous moment lies always before you—it is still something to look forward to. But besides this there is the magnificent sense of aloofness, of detachment, of emancipation, and withal the consciousness of a power of synopsis most like to that of the Eye of the Lord as it is triangularly depicted in ancient prayer-books. Passing beneath the car is London, and the Thames shows as a little slender stream, its waters pure as silver, and running between fairest banks. The stream is crossed by slender threads—the bridges named Westminster, Waterloo, Blackfriars, and the rest. Woolwich, Blackwall, Deptford, Greenwich, at night, were a starry spectacle of excellent brilliancy; the roadway of Oxford-street was dark, "while either pavement, reflecting the illumination of the shop-fronts, shone like frosted silver."

It is with acoustics that Mr. Bacon is principally concerned. In the greater altitudes the silence was the strangest phenomenon: on earth our ears are never truly at rest. But each time as we descended from higher levels the familiar sounds of earth would return in a definite and striking sequence. There were voices of many kinds, the shriller pipes always leading; the crow of cocks unseen, and, indeed, invisible from distance; the bark of a dog; next the cries of human beings; but the shouts of children always first. Again, the absence of all echoes from sounds below contrasted strangely with the full return of our own voice off the earth as we came down to shorter range.

Still more striking an example of this last surprise was the effect of the explosion, during "the bombardment of London," of a gun-cotton cartridge:

As far as I can learn it was the first time that modern high explosives had ever been experimented with in this way. . . . We nerved ourselves for a stunning shock so soon as the cartridge, hanging only 120 feet below us, was exploded. . . . Our astonishment, then, may be conceived when, on revolving the dynamo, a mere modest report followed, not greatly louder than that of a pistol. . . . We remarked on the futility of our signal. But once again we were mistaken, for our exclamations were rebuked with a startling sternness. With a mighty burst the earth spoke back, returning the sound waves with a peal of thunder. True thunder it was, of the loudest description, and flung back from objects far afield, causing loud and long reverberation.

The voyage in which this experiment was made ended within measurable distance of disaster. The ship lay becalmed, its buoyancy almost spent, above the grounds of the Earl's Court Exhibition, wherein the big wheel showed like a toy. The evening was closing in; already the curves of the streets were embroidered with gas-jets; the descent of so many thousand feet of carburetted hydrogen among them spelt evaporation for the voyagers. Not an ounce of ballast remained. In this strait their eye fell upon the costly (borrowed) dynamo. But even a balloon has a conscience, of a sort; and seemingly this one repented of a prank that must be frustrated at such a sacrifice. At any rate, tardily, and with many a look back, it began to crawl away; and finally, following the course of the river, flopped down in open ground at Wimbledon.

But Mr. Bacon's most exciting expedition was in quest of those Leonids. Of them, naturally, he saw little; but, sailing above a pearly ocean of cloud that suggested a solid arctic sea, he had the moon to himself:

The moon was fast getting down in the west, and shone gloomily, through moisture-laden beds, the colour of deep copper. And presently a curious sight was afforded us. For she went down, disappearing with a strange, unearthly—I mean unmoonly—visage, and with one last forbidding look, as though warning us to mind what we were about. And then . . . presently, on turning about, we found the moon was up again, having risen once more entirely on our account; after which she quickly set as before, and with the same sort of look, as much as to say, "I told you so!"

And this was followed by a dawn of pale green. Yet they were not frightened—Mr. Bacon and his admirable daughter. With an escape-valve that could be opened only once for all—and that necessarily only within touch of earth—they found themselves speeding towards the sea at a desperate height. So they dropped several hundred telegram forms for the coastguards, reminded each other that on the sea were ships, rejoiced in the sun, and munched sandwiches. The balloon was softened. It landed them on the solid side of the sad sea waves, and, for the rest, was content playfully to smash Miss Bacon's forearm.

If we have said next to nothing of Mr. Bacon's acoustic experiments, it is not that they are uninteresting: they are interesting, and of great value; but it is as contributions to a branch of science that awaits many more such data before it can present established conclusions. The isolated results are delightful mainly for the sake of their apparent incompatibility with a good many favoured hypotheses, and, it may be added, with each other. His book, as it stands, is an exhilarating record of adventure on earth and in the air.

The Best Abused Man in Modern History.

Jean-Paul Marat: the People's Friend. By Ernest Belfort Bax. (Richards.)

MARAT has shared with most of the great figures of the French Revolution the dishonour of being "the best abused man in modern history"; and, while we do not agree with Mr. Belfort Bax's hysterical dictum, it is a fairly safe plan to ascertain what "most people think," and then assume the opposite to be true, it must be admitted that modern research has done much to modify the legend of "Marat the Monster." But there is a wide gulf fixed between a devil and a demi-god, and Mr. Bax's "noble-hearted man and a single-minded friend of the disinherited and the oppressed," his hero sans peur et sans reproche, is not Marat. You have only to glance at the portraits scattered through the volume to realise how far Mr. Bax's picture flatters the original; but if you prefer to believe that physiognomy deliberately lies, and that a brutal and sensual face was the outward and visible sign of a tender and noble heart, you have only to read Mr. Bax's defence of his hero's part in the September massacres. That Marat was in no small way responsible for that horror every serious student of history must be convinced. Indeed, Mr. Belfort Bax, ardent apologist though he be, is compelled to admit that Marat's Committee of Supervision appointed by the Commune to deal with conspirators and conspiracies did to "some extent direct and make itself responsible for" the movement that culminated in the shambles of September 2 and 3. To some extent! Well, it is beyond question that Marat distinctly instigated the massacre at the Abbaye. Here is the quotation from his Ami du Peuple, the clearest proof possible of his guilt:

What is the duty of the people? The last thing it has to do, and the safest and wisest, is to present itself in arms before the Abbaye, snatch out the traitors, especially the Swiss officers and their accomplices, and put them to the sword. What folly to wish to give them a trial! It is all done: you have taken them in arms against the country, you have massacred the soldiers, why would you spare their officers, incomparably more culpable? The folly is to have listened to the smooth-talkers, who counselled to make of them only prisoners of war. They are traitors whom it is necessary to sacrifice immediately, since they can never be considered in any other light.

The only justification of such a direct incitement to murder offered by Mr. Bax is an elaborate attack on what he calls "the endeavour of prejudiced historians to excite the sympathy of subsequent generations." His argument is worth quoting, for it is typical of his point of view, and to summarise it would be merely to court the charge of exaggeration, for it will, we are certain, come as a surprise to most readers that in these days a writer of Mr. Bax's position and reputation should seriously and deliberately make an apology—not, you will see, an explanation or excuse—for the unspeakable horror of the September massacres.

The number of persons killed in the massacre is usually estimated at 1,089, though other statements made it 969; putting it at the highest figure it can hardly in any case have reached 1,200. It was an application of Marat's principle of striking 500 guilty heads to save 5,000 innocent ones. But who were these, at most a thousand odd, "victims" of popular justice? On this point hinges nine-tenths of the horror which the September massacres have excited. They were the noble and the wealthy, and the hangers-on of the noble and the wealthy; most if not all of them had been, directly or indirectly, conspiring to re-estate the deposed King with the aid of an invading army; prepared avowedly not merely to destroy the newly-won liberty, but to take the lives of all who advocated popular freedom, and who deprecated a return to the old oppression and corruption. Such as these it was for whom it has been the endeavour of prejudiced historians to excite the sympathy of subsequent generations.

Much in the same strain, but more exaggerated and excited still, is Mr. Bax's extraordinary appeal to his readers to execrate the memory of Charlotte Corday:

Oh, exponents of a class of public opinion, satellites of privileged power and wealth, whose top of indignation and gassy horror is always turned on to the full whenever a representative of privileged class-interest is smitten down—you, who can slaver a slain monarch or statesman with undeserved adulation, who can fulminate against the author of his death at the top of your voices, when will you find your cant no longer profitable? What has been your attitude towards the "People's Friend" and the dastardly wretch who murdered him—her sick and helpless victim?

Here you do not talk at large of "the sacredness of human life," as when a Carnot sinks beneath the dagger of a crazy fanatic, or a Canovas falls before the pistol of an illicit avenger of innocent blood. It is quite right that Marat, the eternal enemy of the crimes of place and power, the man whose only arm and only authority lay in his pen and the truths it expressed, should be murdered. It is a shocking thing, an event calculated to awaken in all respectable persons "a thrill of horror," when a real live statesman or public functionary, who, armed with all his authority, has perhaps used it to destroy a nation, or to oppress the helpless, meets with a similar doom.

Such passages call for no comment. They are the utterances of a special pleader defending a bad case, and making vigorous denunciation cloak the weakness of argument. They dispose of Mr. Belfort Bax's claim to be considered an unprejudiced historian, and place him among the class of writers he vehemently condemns. It is certainly curious that such writing should find a place in a book which is prefaced by the suggestion that extravagance of abuse is probably proof of an exceptionally noble and disinterested character. We can only infer that long study of the Ami du Peuple has warped Mr. Bax's judgment and moulded his style.

It must not, however, be imagined for a moment that Mr. Belfort Bax has written a book of little value. Of its interest the above quotations are proof. While we often dissent from Mr. Bax's theories and judgments, we always find them stimulating and refreshingly suggestive. The purely historical portion of the book is excellent. Based, as it is, upon the researches of the late M. Bougeart and M. Chevrement, it affords by far the fullest and best life we possess of the great journalist of the Revolution, of the extraordinary man against whom Lafayette marched an army of six thousand men—the man whose only arm was his pen, at a stroke from which a vast host rose from the earth and the peoples of the world trembled.

Other New Books.

A VAGABOND IN ASIA.

BY EDMUND CANDLER.

Hardly a rival, but certainly a warm admirer of Mr. Cunninghame Graham we take our author to be. He has the same personal note, the same eye for form, the same distrust of the nineteenth (or is it the twentieth?) century, with its "progress," "civilisation," and other euphemisms. Mr. Candler has practically crossed Asia; not on a bicycle, like Mr. Foster Fraser; or, by way of the house-tops, like Dr. Sven Hedin; or in a paper suit, like the American gentleman who made a wager that is duly chronicled. Mr. Candler has gone from Darjeeling to Saigon, and that mostly afoot; he has evidently crossed India—or how did he get to Baghdad?—and, coming out at Damascus, he gives us a good many pages of very lively narrative, some thumb-nails, and a few reflections, to say nothing of a decidedly gratifying expression of awe. He is sportsman, naturalist, botanist, vagabond, poet, and (mainly) dilettante. We like him; for, when he wanders, he sticks to the country, and does not read the Pink 'Un in the face of a dozen hoary civilisations.

His book opens with a walking tour, begun in Lower Burmah, and extending to Siam, Cambodia, and Cochin China—enough for any volume. But this man seems hardly in search of "copy." He visits Angkor Wat, the finest ruin of a temple in the world, and agrees with Mouhot: "A la vue de ce temple, l'esprit se sent écrasé, l'imagination surpassée; on regarde, on admire, et saisi de respect on reste silencieux," &c. On reste silencieux! That is it. Mr. Candler rests silencieux where others would choke up Paternoster-row. We admire his restraint. Later, he visits Bers Nimrud, the site of the ancient Tower of Babel, and rightly frowns on an American gentleman who does not reste silencieux. "Reckon I've had to scrape gravel to see this pra-arie," observes this pilgrim, and our author flees, followed by disjointed items of ingratiating small talk—e.g., "Philippines . . . dropped into our hat. . . . Admiral Dewey's orders were. . . . And destroyed it. That's Dewey." "So the drama of Babel was played again," observes Mr. Candler, to whose deft handling of his medium these excerpts do no justice. For he writes well, public-school-and-'Varsity well, with an apt classical allusion from time to time and a good deal of pleasantness for flavouring. Of exceptional interest is the glimpse into the Buddhist world afforded by the paper on "Milarapa," a saint whose life and writings are treated of at length, and afford our author an opportunity for some exceptionally clever and skilful translations. (Greening. 6s.)

GIORGIONE.

BY HERBERT COOK.

Mr. Williamson is editing the "Great Masters" series, of which the above volume is the latest example, with singular success and good fortune. Giorgione is, perhaps, the rarest of the great masters—rare in every sense of the epithet—and no one but a writer sensitive to the elusive, yet impressive, qualities of his brief activity could venture without capers over the dangerous ground that Mr. Cook has negotiated uninjured. This new volume escapes the dry-as-dust, and is yet full of those delightful theories that art-critics propose with such defiant temerity. For, be it understood, there are only three surviving paintings by the master that stand unattacked. The rest is surmise. Excellent grounds exist for much of this surmise; and Mr. Cook, with keen insight and as keen a sympathy, examines each case and decides it for us. He also adds to the number—six portraits and about as many subject pieces, to be exact—and willingly we break new ground with him; for if these new Giorgiones are not Giorgiones, they are clearly of his date and school. Coleridge declared that his acquaintance with Shakespeare's thought and verse was such that, should he be called upon to edit the plays, he could not only "detect the spurious, but supply the genuine word." He left Shakespeare to Mr. Bowdler, however. Mr. Cook undertakes a similar office, and supplies the genuine word with an invigorating display of scholarship, research, and adroitness. To these qualities add devotion—but who is so devoted as the art-critic!—and our account is run.

A few observations of our own we may add. A calm, stay-at-home, uneventful life produces a Giorgione; an important and diversified career, a Titian. May not the two conditions be held to account for the higher plane and scope of the greater Venetian—indeed, mark the difference between the creative artist of the first and second rank, and this generally? We are, of course, acquainted with the vastly differing lifetimes accorded to our examples. Mr. Cook writes an excellent English, and we particularly underlined his appreciative reference to Morelli's beautiful description of a portrait: "He (the sitter) seems about to confide to us the secret of his life." And, by the bye, may not the signature "V. V." stand for "Vecellio Veneziano"? Why not? The theory would upset various other theories (and those terribly complicated); we ourselves rather admire the noble simplicity of it. We also feel that Mr. Cook could easily prove that the Richmond now at the New Gallery—(No. 250) "The Sisters: Daughters of the late Dean Liddell"—is really a Holman Hunt. Concluding, we are very grateful to Mr. Cook for a pleasant two hours and a volume that fills a distinct want. (Bell. 5s. net.)

AUSTRALIA AT THE FRONT.

BY FRANK WILKINSON.

Mr. Wilkinson, who represented the Sydney Daily Telegraph during ten of the most stirring months of the war, is well worthy of a hearing. He has set himself the useful and interesting task of recording especially the doings of the various Australian contingents, keeping his eyes wide open the while for the other Colonial corps. He admits the difficulty of one writer worthily chronicling the exploits of bodies of men so widely separated as were the Australian contingents, and contents himself with the incidents of the march from Modder River to Pretoria. His style is colloquial without being commonplace, and less flamboyant than Mr. Hales's. The following sentences are typical of Mr. Wilkinson's tone:

Of Kitchener I know comparatively little, and should hesitate to talk about his work, even if I knew considerably more. To my mind, he is chiefly remarkable on account of his unlikeness to his published portraits. He is tall, slightly stooping, and quite fair as to complexion—not the jet-black moustached person one sees in shop-window photographs. He looks out at you from under prominent eyebrows with a now-then-none-of-your-nonsense sort of expression which is sometimes a trifle disconcerting. Altogether, he is the type of man you would go out of your way to avoid in a narrow passage if he had a grudge against you.

The book is illustrated from Mr. Wilkinson's own sketches and photographs. (John Long. 6s.)

BRET HARTE: A TREATISE AND A TRIBUTE

BY T. EDGAR PEMBERTON.

After reading this book our impulse was to do anything, however emotional, to indicate the sympathy we feel for Mr. Bret Harte. That he, after all he has done for two generations of readers, should be thus wounded in the house of his friends . . .! Not intentionally: on the contrary, with the kindest, most affectionate, and admiring motives; but wounded none the less. And the joke of it is that, as we are told in Mr. Bret Harte's letter to the author, which stands for preface, the book was undertaken and sanctioned only because an unauthorised vivisection was threatened. We should like to see that other book.

Mr. Pemberton—as we have said, with the best intentions in the world—has no qualification for his task. He is not a good critic, and he is not a good writer. It is no kindness to Mr. Bret Harte to say that he draws—that is, "limns"—character with "minuteness and skill worthy of Fielding or Smollett, Thackeray or Dickens"; and it conveys less than nothing to say that he is a "believer in science." Were it not that the book recalls old thrills, it would be wholly fatuous. As it is, it makes a further authorised work necessary. We ought to add that it forms one of a series entitled "English Writers of To-Day." (Greening. 3s. 6d.)

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN EAST ANGLIA.

BY W. A. DUTT.

This very charming series maintains its character well; indeed, Mr. Dutt, to whom Norfolk and Suffolk have been offered as a happy hunting ground, perhaps understands the theory as well as any of the contributors. To loiter with busy eyes and a good memory—that is the "Highway and Byway" ideal; and East Anglia is as rich a loitering land as there is in the country. Not only are there the historic and natural treasures, but such fascinating literary names as Sir Thomas Browne, Borrow, and Edward FitzGerald, and a wealth of ballad and folk-lore. Mr. Dutt, by the way, once again sets up Norfolk's claim to "The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington"—Islington being a hamlet in that county. He may be right, but it is hard to lose the illusion that our nearer Islington is the hallowed spot. As Mr. Whitten wrote in the notes to the ballad in his London in Song: "It is true that the distance between Islington and the City hardly accounts for the seven years' separation of the lovers. But they may have been watched and thwarted." Also, it might be added, there may have been good reasons for the squire's son to keep his distance. Squires' sons and bailiffs have ever been at enmity. To return to Mr. Dutt, his book is extremely well done and makes capital desultory reading. Mr. Pennell, who illustrates the book, is very unequal, sometimes even suggesting the efforts of a careless tyro; but at his best he is superb. (Macmillan. 6s.)

Mr. Shuckburgh's brilliant translation of The Letters of Cicero (Bell & Sons) is in its fourth and last volume, and dip where you will, the whole life of Rome runs like a stream through the pages. There is all that mixture of great and small things that never deserts life for a day. "Try and get scent of what Antony's disposition is. Yet I am inclined to think that he is more occupied with his bouquets than with any mischievous designs. If you have any news of practical importance, write and tell me: if not, at any rate tell me whom the people cheered in the theatre, and the latest bon mots of the mimes. Love to Pilia and Attica."

Dr. Hugh Macmillan and Mr. A. Scott Rankin were born in the same village on the banks of the Highland Tay. They have united their literary and artistic powers to produce an illustrated topography of that river. The Highland Tay from Tyndrum to Dunkeld (Virtue) is a noble volume, and its dedication to the Marchioness of Breadalbane, "who owns the beautiful scenes through which the Highland Tay flows by a twofold tenure of material possession and ideal enjoyment" is felicitous. Dr. Macmillan is equally at home in the historical associations and natural features of the river and its lovely watershed. His long memory supplies many an interesting detail, as when he recalls the village cowherd of Aberfeldy whom the boys envied every time he blew his horn. This is the book of the Tay, final and adequate. Mr. Rankin's pictures are charming.

"An Ex-Lieutenant of General de Villebois-Mareuil" is the author of an interesting war book called Ten Months in the Field with the Boers (Heinemann). He is fair to our side, and easily grasps the difficulty of subduing adversaries who cannot be drawn into a battle:

Are they [the Boers] closely pressed by the enemy? Each man goes off as he chooses in a different direction, and the commando of 500 men which attacked a little convoy yesterday has melted away before the column of 2,000 sent in pursuit of it. . . . If one of these men should have been too closely engaged in the English lines, the first farm he comes to offers him an asylum. His rifle is thrust under a plank in the flooring, his horse turned out to graze, the white flag floats over the house, and His Majesty has no more inoffensive subject than my Burgher—for the next twenty-four hours.

The author gives an extraordinary account of the corruption and swindling that prevailed in Pretoria before the surrender of that city.

The Elements of Statistics, by Mr. Arthur L. Bowley, is a helpful text-book. Based on lectures given at the London School of Economics and Political Science in the five years following its foundation in 1895, it is apparently the first text-book dealing with the ordinary methods of statistics. Mr. Bowley draws illustrations from the Population Census, the Wages Census of 1886, the operations of the Labour Department, and other sources. The significance of Thackeray's Book of Snobs seems outdone by the statement—here made—that so many subordinates return themselves on the Census forms as employers instead of employed, that in certain occupations the returns have actually shown more masters than men! But statisticians are not thwarted by lies, they allow for them.

Fiction.

Son of Judith. By Joseph Keating.
(Allen. 6s.)

ALTHOUGH this "tale of the Welsh mining valleys" has barbaric faults, it has also the incommunicable breath of life, and for that we give thanks. The theme is melodramatic. Now melodrama, when it is handled with sufficient power and sincerity, seems to lose its baser characteristics, seems almost to cease to be melodrama; and Mr. Keating decidedly has both power and sincerity. Save at the end, where he annihilates the stricken sinners of his tale in a fatality which is somewhat too timely, he purifies from all staginess this story of an illegitimate son who swears before his mother to kill his father. The barbaric faults to which we have referred lie chiefly in Mr. Keating's conceptions of character. To "dig down to the roots of human nature" is very well, but the process can be conducted with too much zest and too little regard for less radical matters. Neither Howel Morris nor his mother is quite a convincing figure; their conversations are unreal, and some of their acts incredible. Such creatures belong to the early passionate simplicities of a Saga, not to the last century. Mr. Keating describes mining life admirably, and his account of a journey into a coal-pit is the most truthful that we have read, in fiction or out of it—and we know something of pits. The book reminds one at once of the late William Tirebuck's memorable novel, Miss Grace of All Souls. It is less detailed than that, less tender and refined, less wide in its knowledge of human nature, less moving in its catastrophe; but it undeniably has a primitive and authentic force which in certain ways puts it on a level with its forerunner, and it is better written. Mr. Keating has considerable talent. If in his next novel he will choose the lower path, the path of discretion, and imitate Æschylus not so much, and, say, Flaubert a little more, he may come nearer to an absolute success. The advice may appear shocking to the purist who abhors compromises; but it is correct advice for Mr. Keating, since his courageous tendency (singular enough in these days) towards stark situations needs some restraint.

The Bishop's Gambit. By Thomas Cobb.
(Richards. 6s.)

MR. COBB's books succeed each other with disturbing frequency—this is his eighth; but it may be said that they are all very short. Either Dumas père or Theophile Gautier would have written the lot in a couple of months; and, even in the present less fertile era, we see no reason why a man should not "throw off" a trifle like The Bishop's Gambit in a month or so, and still do it rather well. The Bishop's Gambit, one of Mr. Cobb's accustomed comedies of polite life, is well done. Indeed, in a technical sense, we deem it superior to any of its predecessors. The Bishop of Bonchester had two daughters: one of them was in love with a co-respondent (innocent) and the other with a draper's son (a genius), and, though the Bishop was a bumptious, bland, and ridiculous person, one cannot but sympathise with him. Mr. Cobb excels in those scenes wherein the Bishop, all the while writing himself down an ass, invariably gets the best of the argument:

"Of course."

"It does not appear to be a matter of course that my daughter should be acquainted with the son of one of our local shopkeepers," the Bishop exclaimed. "Where did you meet him?"

"At Lady Milward's—the first time," was the answer.

"In what capacity was he acting at Lady Milward's house?" demanded the Bishop.

"He was one of her guests," said Rickenda with a smile. "Mr. Burton is very clever and very popular. He goes everywhere. People make an immense fuss with him."

"Nobody is likely to make a fuss with him in Bonchester," answered the Bishop.

"But, father," cried Rickenda, "I don't think you quite understand."

"Possibly not, my dear, possibly not."

"I beg your pardon," said Rickenda, "I only meant that people who really understand art—"

"Apparently I do not understand," answered the Bishop majestically. "It is true that I have visited all the principal galleries in Europe."

The Bishop's Gambit has none of the little constructional or stylistic gaucheries of Mr. Cobb's previous books. It shows rather the easy and polished assurance of the work of Mr. W. E. Norris, which, in fact, it somewhat resembles. We hope that Mr. Cobb will not permit himself to fall into a perfunctory habit, but we have a dim fear that he is in peril of that lapse.

The Romance of a Vocation. By Aleydis Inglesant.
(Burns & Oates.)

THE heart-breaking story of religious difficulty is not so prevalent as once it was. The younger generation does not, we fancy, grow haggard over the precocious Christians of Miss Wetherell. The muzzling order has not gone out to dogmas in fiction, but dogmas are less fretful—less convinced of their importance than of yore. The effect on even frankly religious books is evidently beneficial. Here, for instance, is the story of a girl who ultimately takes the veil. Her worldly, Protestant mother gives her notice to quit her roof. Her lover is too earthly to apprehend the charm of being merely hers fraternally, and he turns out to have a disgraceful past; but the reader is never saddened in the old, dreary way. The reason is that Camilla Valery has the temperament of the ideal nun. She is not tugged this way and that unceasingly. She is amazingly deficient in physical passion, but glows all over with an ethereal altruism. She remains a girl, however, and one is happy to find her on one occasion "desperately hungry."

We quote a passage which shows the author in a fanciful mood. It precedes the account of Camilla's reception into the Roman Catholic Church:

Her gaze was unblinkingly riveted upon the little altar and its throne. It had become to her nothing but one blaze of light interspersed with black dots that showed a tendency to run into one another. . . . She . . . could not have convicted herself, had she tried, of one coherent thought. The constant repetition of the response to the Litany was sounding in her ears like the splashing of little waves against the shingle on the beach . . . in the short rush of the cra, the plash of the pro, and the slight hiss of the nobis, spoken in unison.

So far, so good; but, when the rendering of the Tantum ergo by a "defective little harmonium" reminds Camilla of waves "pulsing tumultuously round some rocky point on the Guernsey coast," we cry: "Hold!"

Our author must learn to conceal his machinery and to develop his subsidiary characters in addition to describing them.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE MONSTER.

By STEPHEN CRANE.

Seven stories which were appearing serially in a magazine at the time of the author's death. They illustrate two sides of Mr. Crane's temperament—his interest in the psychology of war, and his interest in child life. "The Monster" is the longest of the stories. (Harpers. 6s.)

ACCORDING TO PLATO.

By F. FRANKFORT MOORE.

Mr. Moore writes his novels reclining in an armchair. He has confessed to it. What more can we say of According to Plato than that it is bright, and gay after its kind? Those who liked I Forbid the Bands will like this. The strenuous folk who are eager for the work, say, of Zack and Miss Wharton, may look askance at this "new novel of society," so up-to-date. When Amber and Josephine leave Sir Creighton Severn's house in Kensington Palace Gardens, of course it is in a "dainty little motor-car victoria." But Mr. Moore has his readers; long may he keep them! They like his epigrammatic sayings, such as: "Platonic affection is the penalty which one pays in old age for Procrastination in one's youth. . . . It is the Egg-shell that is treasured by a man when someone else is eating the omelette." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE MAN WHO FORGOT.

By JOHN MACKIE.

The picture on the cover cries "Melodrama!" The frontispiece shows the author in his uniform as a sergeant-major in Brabant's Horse. He is handsomer than most authors. The story has for sub-title the words "A Strange Experience," and it deals with a remarkable case of lost memory. The principal characters are taken to the Island of Java, and as the year is 1883, they are present at the appalling eruption of Krakatoa. "I can vouch," says the martial author, "for the correctness of the brief description of the catastrophe given in these pages." (Jarrold. 6s.)

A LITTLE GREY SHEEP.

By MRS. HUGH FRASER.

A story of the present day, pathetic in parts, and passing on the Upper Thames and in Devonshire, by the author of many stories and of a work on Japan. Mrs. Fraser's method is sometimes a little old-fashioned. She begins Chapter VI. thus: "Dear reader, I am asking you to travel along my road for a good distance yet: let me make a small personal apology for the contents of this chapter." There are schoolboys in the book who talk like this: "'Let's make a row,' said the angel Francey. 'Let's split up a dead crow and put it inside the harmonium.' 'He couldn't stink like that pie to-day,' said Claude. 'My nose is quite sore still.'" (Hutchinson. 6s.)

DUKE RODNEY'S SECRET.

By PERRINGTON PRIMM.

His real name was Marmaduke Rodney. His club friends called him familiarly Duke Rodney. His complexion was brick-red, and looked almost vermilion against his closely-cropped moustache. He was not a pleasant man, and his secret, we gather, had to do with estates. The end of this story of modern life is: "And for her, who shall say what the Future may bring? In the Present there is peace, while the 'Daddy' of long ago stands beside her, looking down upon her with eyes shining with the old infinite tenderness and love." (Jarrold. 6s.)

THE TAPU OF BANDERAH.

By LOUIS BECKE AND W. JEFFREY.

Fifteen tales of doings in distant lands and seas, written in collaboration. "The Tapu of Banderah" is the longest. "A small, white-painted schooner was bearing down upon the low, densely wooded island of Mayou, which lies between the coast of south-east New Guinea and the murderous Solomon Group—the grave of the white man in Melanesia." (Pearson. 6s.)

We have also received The Strange Wooing of Mary Bowler, by Richard Marsh (Pearson, 6s.), a reissue of a story which was published in 1894.

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage) 17/6

„ Quarterly 5/0

„ Price for one issue /5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

B. B. B.

WHAT more is to be said of Byron? Views about him—bewilderingly contradictory—strew Literature. We ourselves have written enough during the last three years to fill a number of the ACADEMY, and still we write. The man compels it. Touch Byron anywhere and you find him bumpiously alive. And yet how many nowadays read his verse? It is the multitudinous man himself that lives—his capability, his vanity, his virility, his splendid insolence, his bonfire imagination, and that innate something that struggled through the man's hide, and sent him to his death, with banners flying, at Missolonghi. The very designer of the cover of this volume has succumbed to his insistence. It is showered with B's and coronets, proclaiming the "splendid and puissant personality" of the man whom Goethe described as "the greatest talent of our century." Poets are not the popular idols of these days. The fighting men have taken their place; but sentimental hearts once beat furiously, and pulses once raced at the thought of the wicked lord, who rattled off the Bride in four days, and the Corsair in ten; who wrote Lara "while undressing after coming home from balls and masquerades," and who could scrawl "there is a most rattling thunder-storm pelting away at this present writing; so that I write neither by day, nor by candle, nor by torch-light, but by lightning-light." Can you not see him? And so writing, he did poetry great service. He drew all men unto it. Thousands declaimed stanzas from Childe Harold while they dressed, thousands bade the deep and dark blue ocean roll on at Margate.

Lady Blessington remarked of Byron: "His great defect is flippancy and a total want of self-possession." True, but that is just what gives life to his letters. What he felt at the moment that he said, especially in his letters to Mr. Murray, who stands like a cliff against which a foaming, impetuous sea snarls and beats:

I have sent you a warehouse of trash within the last month, and you have no sort of feeling about you: a pastry-cook would have had twice the gratitude, and thanked me at least for the quantity. . . . You sometimes take the liberty of omitting what I send for publication: if you do so in this instance I will never speak to you again as long as I breathe . . .

And so on.

This is Byron the man, the Byron that is perdurably interesting. On Byron the poet the dust is settling. But they thought differently a few generations ago—even Matthew Arnold. Hear him: "Wordsworth and Byron stand out by themselves. When the year 1900 is turned, and our nation comes to recount her poetic glories in the century which has then just ended, the first names with her will be these." When prophecies come home to roost, it is sometimes well that the prophet is not there to receive them.

The present volume is No. 5 of the Letters and Journals, the penultimate volume in Mr. Murray's definitive edition. Byron is thirty-two, living at Ravenna in "splendid apartments in the palace of his mistress's husband," soon to be in the thick of the Italian revolution, soon to follow the fortunes of the exiled Gambas. His surroundings, his habits, are all that the most exacting enthusiast for melodrama could desire. Shelley, who visited him, and on the night of his arrival sat talking with the exiled lord till two in the morning, has left on record a description of the establishment. It consisted, besides servants, of ten horses, eight enormous dogs, three monkeys, five cats, an eagle, a crow, and a falcon. One day, too, Shelley met on the grand staircase five peacocks, two guinea hens, and an Egyptian crane. Shelley adapted his mode of life to Byron's. He rose at two. After breakfast they sat talking till six. From six till eight they galloped through the pine woods which divide Ravenna from the sea. After dinner they talked till six in the morning. But for the most part Byron was alone pursuing what some years before, in a letter to Miss Millbanke, he had called the great object of life: "sensation—to feel that we exist, even though in pain." Vindictive, arrogant, selfish, he went his way rough-shod, often miserable, but always eager for sensation. He cannot understand Keats's "yielding sensitiveness." All he feels when thwarted, or ground under the critical heel, is "an immense rage for eight and forty hours." Then he must mount a horse to quiet himself. Yet he could take attacks with grim humour. Witness the famous bludgeoning letter by "John Bull," who calls Byron the prince of humbugs:

You thought it would be a fine interesting thing for a handsome young Lord to depict himself as a dark-souled, melancholy, morbid being, and you have done so, it must be admitted with exceeding cleverness. In spite of all your pranks (Beppo, &c., Don Juan included), every boarding-school in the Empire still contains many devout believers in the amazing misery of the black-haired, high-browed, blue-eyed, bare-throated Lord Byron. How melancholy you look in the prints! Stick to Don Juan: it is the only sincere thing you have ever written; and it will live many years after all your humbug Harolds have ceased to be, in your own words, "a schoolgirl's tale—the wonder of an hour."

Here is Byron's comment on "John Bull's" letter:

It is diabolically well written, and full of fun and ferocity. I must forgive the dog, whoever he is. I suspect three people: one is Hobhouse, the other Mr. Peacock (a very clever fellow), and lastly Israeli; there are parts very like Israeli, and he has a present grudge with Bowles and Southey, &c. There is something, too, of the author of the Sketch-book in the Style. Find him out.

Such an attack pleased him because it ministered to his vanity. Anything rather than to slip out of the focus of the world's eye, even though the gaze should be that of the basilisk. Contempt was his armour. "All the fools in London are the chief purchasers of your publication," he wrote to Mr. Murray. But he wanted all those "fools" to know what a wonder he was. Lest any detail should escape them, early in January, 1821, he begins a Journal once more. Although that Journal is well known, we are tempted to cull a few extracts:

Dined versus six o' the clock. Forgot that there was a plum-pudding (I have added, lately, eating to my "family of vices"), and had dined before I knew it. Drank half a bottle of some sort of spirits—probably spirits of wine; for what they call brandy, rum, &c., &c., here is nothing but spirits of wine, coloured accordingly.

Clock strikes—going out to make love. Somewhat perilous, but not disagreeable. Memorandum—a new screen put up to-day. It is rather antique, but will do with a little repair.

Ordered Fletcher (at four o'clock this afternoon) to copy out seven or eight apophthegms of Bacon, in which I have detected such blunders as a schoolboy might detect rather than commit. Such are the sages! What must they be, when such as I can stumble on their mistakes or mis-statements? I will go to bed, for I find that I grow cynical.

What is the reason that I have been, all my lifetime, more or less ennuyé? and that, if anything, I am rather less so now than I was at twenty, as far as my recollection serves?

Dined. Tried on a new coat. Letter to Murray, with corrections of Bacon's Apophthegms and an epigram—the latter not for publication. At eight went to Teresa, Countess G.

Day fine—rained only in the morning. Looked over accounts. Read Campbell's Poets—marked errors of Tom (the author) for correction. Dined—went out—music—Tyrolean air, with variations. Sustained the cause of the original simple air against the variations of the Italian school.

Turned over Seneca's tragedies. Wrote the opening lines of the intended tragedy of Sardanapalus. Rode out some miles into the forest. Misty and rainy. Returned—dined—wrote some more of my tragedy.

Weather fine. Received visit. Rode out into the forest—fired pistols. Returned home—dined—dipped into a volume of Mitford's Greece—wrote part of a scene of Sardanapalus.

Read—rode—fired pistols—returned—dined—wrote—visited—heard music—talked nonsense—and went home.

I have drank as many as fifteen bottles of soda-water in one night, after going to bed, and been still thirsty—calculating, however, some lost from the bursting out and effervescence and overflowing of the soda-water, in drawing the corks, or striking off the necks of the bottles from mere thirsty impatience.

His intellect never rusted. What he read he wrestled with, and the books that ministered to his active brain during this period show the range of his intelligence. His feelings entered into his criticism. Of a fellow poet, Keats, he could write:

Of the praises of that little dirty blackguard Keates in the Edinburgh, I shall observe as Johnson did when Sheridan the actor got a pension: "What! has he got a pension? Then it is time that I should give up mine!" Nobody could be prouder of the praises of the Edinburgh than I was, or more alive to their censure, as I showed in E[nglish] B[ar]ts and S[cotch] R[eviewers]. At present all the men they have ever praised are degraded by that insane article. Why don't they review and praise "Solomon's Guide to Health"? it is better sense and as much poetry as Johnny Keates.

Of Dante, a dead poet, he could write with this wisdom and insight:

He [Schlegel] says also that Dante's chief defect is a want, in a word, of gentle feelings. Of gentle feelings!—and Francesca of Rimini—and the father's feelings in Ugolino—and Beatrice—and "La Pia!" Why, there is gentleness in Dante beyond all gentleness, when he is tender. It is true that, treating of the Christian Hades, or Hell, there is not much scope or site for gentleness—but who but Dante could have introduced any "gentleness" at all into Hell? Is there any in Milton's? No—and Dante's Heaven is all love, and glory and majesty.

Goethe said of Byron, "the moment he reflects he is a child," and the sixty-odd pages of "Detached Thoughts," which are included in their entirety, for the first time, in this volume, amply support that criticism. He writes on anything that comes into his mind, from a Sheridan story to remarks on the Immortality of the Soul, and a University Extension youth could have written any of them.

Here is No. 99 Thought:

I am always most religious upon a sun-shiny day; as if there was some association between an internal approach to greater light and purity, and the kindler of this dark lantern of our external existence.

In another passage he strikes a deeper note, but the Thought is still obvious:

Man is born passionate of body, but with an innate though secret tendency to the love of Good in his Main-spring of Mind. But God help us all. It is at present a sad jar of atoms.

There we will leave him for the present—him and his furious rides, his pistol-shooting, his loves, his tooth-powder and tincture, his fifteen bottles of soda-water, and his chatter about "My first dash into poetry." Dash was the word. He dashed through life, he dashed out of it, and he still has the power to dash into our lives.

Things Seen.

Smiles.

As I walked through the City a crowd outside the Mansion House arrested me. It was a silent crowd, clad in sombre garments; a grave crowd, for Death had lately called one to her rest, and her passing had shaken the Empire. But no shock, however sudden and dynamic, can allay curiosity, and, in the days that followed, the streets were full of men and women whose chief desire was to see. And yet there was little to see on walls or in streets, for the Proclamation of the King's accession even had served its purpose, and been removed. But the avid curiosity of the people remained, and, walking among them, I came to the Mansion House. There my way was stopped by a congestion of black-coated citizens. Rumour had called them—the rumour of a new placard on the grey walls of the Mansion House, and the crowd swelled as I stood watching. There it was, a little, staring, piece of print fixed to the grey walls; and the assembled citizens, mindful that any exhibition of haste or excitement did not suit with those sorrowing days, formed themselves into a queue, walked slowly, one by one, to the placard, peered, and smiled—that was the strange part of it. Every man who looked smiled—not a joyous smile, but a smile that vanished before it had time to illumine the face, but still a smile. Never have I seen so many smiles in such orderly progression. I counted one hundred and fifty of them, and then, with curiosity, took my place at the end of the queue. By this time the waiting citizens reached nearly to Cannon-street. Their faces were touched with grave expectancy, as they slowly moved towards the placard; grave, for they did not know, as I knew, that those who had seen the placard—smiled. Slowly I advanced nearer and nearer to the grey walls till I was but three paces from the placard. My turn came! I perused and smiled. It was the weather report for the day. "Squally to fair" it said. And still the citizens, like sheep, continued to take their places at the end of the queue. And to each in due time came his turn, and his smile—hundreds and hundreds of smiles.

Hats.

THEY had waited very patiently from nine o'clock, or earlier, opposite Grosvenor Gate, and it seemed as if they might have a tolerable view of the mournful pageant. Judge therefore of their emotions when, at the approach of the procession, there started up from the serried mass a row of shop-girls to the incredible stature of a pantomime giant, and effectually blocked out the view from several thousand chilly persons.

To furious remonstrances the intrepid damsels turned over their shoulders anæmic faces of resolute scorn. One of them even was brilliantly inspired to take out of the mouths of the malcontents their most plausible remonstrance. "Think nobody wants to see but you?" And while, stunned by the flagrant unfairness of the taunt, they remained speechless, "Wonder they didn't hire a winder?" she added, addressing her companion with a scornful giggle.

A timid suggestion that to remove their hats would be, on the part of the ladies on the railing, a graceful concession to popular opinion, was at first stiffly resented as a renewal of the previous discourtesy. In the event, however, one of milder temper than the rest (and with prettier hair) did uncover. A chorus of "Thank you, miss!" rewarded her complaisance, and encouraged others to follow her example. Soon only one hat was left. The crowd searched its imagination for injurious reasons for the wearer's obstinacy, and hazarded the most discouraging forecasts of her matrimonial prospects. At last one fellow of the basest sort "found a way." "Very well, miss," he sighed, like a brave man who has done his best and failed to avert a catastrophe; "you'll be in the cinematograph—and me a'talkin' t'yer!"

The Poet.

He was a middle-aged 'bus driver. The elements had warred upon his face, a red handkerchief was knotted about his neck, and he looked anything but a poet. As I clambered upon the vehicle, a newsboy came running down the Strand flaunting a placard on which was printed in big black letters—THE KING THANKS LONDON! The driver made a three-quarter turn to where I was sitting. "I 'ope that includes me!" he said, motioning with his whip towards the placard. "Certainly," I answered. A pause. Presently he spoke again over his shoulder. "Not many 'as been thanked by him personally, as it were, like I have." "How was that?" I asked. He did not reply immediately, and when he spoke his eyes had dropped to his horses. "When the Queen died——. Poor old lady, I see her many a time driving in and out of the Park. I saw her well at the Jubilee with those Ethiopians guarding her. My word! couldn't they ride. They were like eels on their horses." "But how did the King thank you?" I interposed. "I wrote a poem when she died and sent it to him at Osborne, and in three days I had a reply from Marlborough House, I did, thanking me for the poem." He rubbed the off horse with the top of his whip. "I shall get that letter framed," he said. "Some of our chaps wanted me to send my poem to the papers." "No!" he shook his head. "You see I didn't want to make myself—er—popular, as it were. And I'm sure a man like 'im wouldn't like it." "Did it take you long to write?" I asked. "No! I thought about it for three days going up and down the road, and then wrote it out at night. I didn't make it harrowing. People have quite enough sorrow at home, and they don't want a lot of Scripture chucked into their poetry. It wasn't more than ten lines. The last two of them was:

Not gone from memory, not gone from love,
But gone to our Father's home above.

"And what did you call your poem?" I asked.
"Oh, just 'The Queen of Queens.'"

Who?

"Who wrote An Englishwoman's Love-Letters?" I had heard this question many times before the book itself came in my way, but I felt only a languid interest in its discussion. It was one of those literary problems over which much time need not be expended, for, if left alone, they solve themselves. Some struggling, hope-sick author had scored at last, or some new runner for fame had made a brilliant start—what more could be added, save congratulations on his luck? And yet was it not singular to what an extent the volume had captured the public? What was its secret? Was there anything in its style or thought to explain so sudden and widespread a popularity? It was with such feelings I took up the book for the first time, but had not proceeded far when I began to be interested on other grounds. Life, according to the theosophist, is a huge series of reincarnations. I am to-day because I was yesterday, and in the sounds of to-day I hear the echoes of yesterday. So with these Love-Letters. They were new to me and yet old, something I had never seen before, something with which I was already familiar. Scanning the pages musingly I read: "I wonder if there can enter into us a joy that has no shadow anywhere? The joy of having you has behind it the shadow of parting; is there no way of loving that would make parting no sorrow at all?"

Where had I met this shadow before? Was it not in a poem I had read a few months previously, and some stanzas of which still lingered in my memory?

A day ago, an hour, and how
I longed to find you near;
Now round me grow your arms, and now
My heart has died for fear!
And ghastlier thought takes shape behind,
Lest, if I love you more,
I some dark morning wake to find
You dead against my door!

Was the author of these love-letters a plagiarist then? It seemed probable; and, recollecting where the stanzas occurred, I took a volume of verse from my shelves, and began to compare it carefully with the dainty book before me. Once more I read: "You, actually, the last time you came, looking a day older than the day before. What was it? Had old age blown you a kiss, or given you a wrinkle in the art of dying? or had you turned over some new leaf, and found it withered on the other side?" To this my sympathetic volume responded, surely with something more than a literary coincidence:

For while you tell me of your grief,
Such sorrow finds me old:
Your breath has stirred a withered leaf,
And cast it to the mould.

Surely, again, the atmosphere of the following passages is the same: "If I hold my breath for a moment wickedly (for I can't do it breathing), and try to look at the world with you out of it, I seem to have fallen over a precipice; or, rather, the solid earth has slipped from under my feet, and I am off into vacuum."

That falling off the earth bears a suspicious resemblance to this sliding into the deep:

Fathom on fathom under foot
The folded seas were deep:
Where day drew forth its mandrake root,
There under us lay sleep.
Your dear arms faltered: your young eyes
Caught half the daylight down:
And "Quick," you sobbed, in broken sighs,
"Quick! help me, or I drown!"
Help you? The sea lay full below
Fathom on fathom deep,
It was but one straight road to go;
And in the sea lay sleep.

Again, what is to be made of these remarkable correspondences: "Is it not strange how often to test our happiness we harp on sorrow. I do: don't let it weary you. I know I have read somewhere that great love always entails pain"? Surely that is akin to this:

I, too, hear how the lover sings
Love like a flower unfurled;
I hear the viols, the flutes, and strings
Of this great moaning world.

I, too, could sing had I not this
To bind upon my brain,
That all these myriad notes of bliss
Make one great voice of pain:
That, though I lay all sorrow by
And make glad songs my own,
They will not lessen as they die
The universal moan.

See how spring touches the one soul in the two books:
"You have given me a spring day before the buds begin —the weather I have been longing for." . . . "And so back to my spring weather: all in a moment you gave me a whole week of the weather I had longed after."

Out of the earth that holds you bound
All spring comes back to me:
The honeyed world awakes at sound
Of life the quickening bee.
Spring comes with silent rush of leaf
Across the earth and cries
"Lo, Love is risen!"

How similarly is separation dwelt upon—the struggle to part and yet to remain one: "I have not said—I never could say it—'Let the day perish wherein Love was born!' I forget nothing of you: you are clear to me—all but one thing: why we have become as we are now, one whole, parted and sent different ways. And yet so near!"

Now day by day my love is set
To make the severance grow;
By speech to hold you fast, and yet
Mutely to bid you go.
By all I will to all I would,
I to our parting press,
And seek by signs half understood
To make you love me less.
And while you stay and trust me still,
Fear leaps upon my heart,—
Lest, in the dark ways of His will,
God means us not to part!

Note, again, how the poetry and the prose strike the same chord in regard to death: "No healthy body, or body with power of enjoyment in it, wishes to die, I think: and no heart with any desire still living out of the past. We know nothing at all really: we only think we believe, and hope we know; and how thin that sort of conviction gets when in our extremity we come face to face with the one immovable fact of our own death waiting for us!"

The ramparts of the house of Death
Love cannot pierce or scale,
To tell with what a thirst for breath
The silent captives ail.
In that fixed prison-house of form,
All locked and barred about,
Perchance your living will is warm
And battles to be out.

In this manner did I proceed for hours, discovering parallels of thought and phrase in these two remarkable volumes—parallels even more striking than those already quoted, until the conviction was borne in upon me that if the author of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters was a plagiarist, he was a plagiarist from himself—that, indeed, the poetry and the prose derived from the same pen. This conviction was deepened by the fact that in the poem there is a tragedy of love strikingly similar in its vague, elusive, wayward development to that of the Letters. There could be no doubt, it seemed to me, that Mr. Laurence Housman, the author of Rue, from which I have quoted in this article, was the man who had written An Englishwoman's Love-Letters, and that if the British public were not altogether unaccountable in its idiosyncrasies it would have granted him some taste in 1899 of the favour with which it has inundated him in 1901; for, though differing in method, the two volumes are one in spirit, and much of what is best in the Letters exists in germ in the poems.

J. D.

The Poetic Famine.

LAST week we remarked on the seeming inability of our poets to distinguish themselves on great occasions. It is not the lack of poetry that surprises, but the plentifulness of inferior poetry. What this state of things denotes we will not venture to suggest. The inquiry would have to go deep, and strange things might have to be said. Meanwhile it will hardly be disputed that poetry has almost ceased to bear a working part in literature. It is a mere snapper up of unconsidered trifles. The best verse now being written is the emptiest. Poems are caught out of the air with dexterity, and shaped with rapidity and skill; but they are read to-day, and to-morrow are cast into the oven. We may depend upon it that poetry is in a bad way when it fails so miserably as of late to reach the nation's heart in crises of that heart. Here, however, controversy raises its finger. Is the nation's heart in a sound and sensitive condition? Are we in earnest? Are we true? Or do we fritter ourselves on many things and grow careless? It seems strange that no haunting line, no glorious cadence, falls on the ear in these great days.

This week we receive the second number of the Thrush, filled with poems of the nation's sorrow. We do not, of course, take these poems so seriously as those on which we commented briefly last week, yet they serve as an extension of our text. They are only less accomplished than those; their essential spirit and shortcomings are the same. They are laboured, literary, unmajestic. They toil with words, and bring them to naught:

Her reign: how shall we reckon it!
By years, or by achievement?
Her loss: how shall we season it—
By tears of sad bereavement?

So queries Mr. Charles Whitworth Wynne, author of Ad Astra; and the poem ends:

To God she bow'd: and from His Hand she took
The grievous chastisement of later years.
Her faith in His GREAT PURPOSE never shook,
'Mid shattering hopes and fears.

And now, she waits the Angel of His Peace,
With happy eyes turn'd towards a happier morn,
For never Soul long'd more for its release
Than hers, so bravely borne!

We are reminded of the routine verse of a village epitaph-maker. Yet Mr. Wynne can blow you poetic soap-bubbles that float and burst prettily. What he cannot do is to mourn worthily the death of a Queen.

Mr. Mackenzie Bell seeks dignity in blank verse, and achieves this:

Once we remembered that thou wert for us
The mighty Personage whose reign hath seen
A grandeur greater even than the days
Of Shakespeare and of Raleigh; that to thee
We owed wise counsel, fruit of toilsome hours
Of patient thought, and converse with the men
Of genius who have graced our commonwealth
For three and sixty years; a queen whose realms,
Rich with the spoils of Science, had grown strong
With valiant Colonies which girt the world.

One can only say of this that it is of no account, and that with slight manipulation certain leading articles written on the death of the Queen might be cut up into better blank verse. Mr. Alfred Percival Graves essays to express the feelings of Ireland in "Erin's Adieu." Ireland was overjoyed by the Queen's visit,

Because thou hadst thy home of homes
Where Heaven endomes the Highland hills,
And ever mingling mirth with pain
The authentic strain of Gaeldom thrills;
But most because, their graves above
Who for thy love and Erin's fell,
Thy breast and hers in mournful pride
Beat side by side with sister swell.

The image of two hearts beating with "sister swell" is a little too much for us. In "Their Shrine" Mr. Keble Howard tries the effect of an italic refrain, decently spaced away from the verses it follows:

Lay her down lovingly:
Our Queen—so pure, so true, so strong:
Whose love of right, whose scorn of wrong
Ensweetened all the paths she trod:
God, grant her name be honoured long!

Lay her down lovingly 'neath her shrine.

Close the doors rev'rently:
For, waiting her with outstretched hands,
Her love, her well-beloved, stands—
Her love, whose name she ne'er forgot:
They meet again in sweeter lands!

Close the doors rev'rently on their shrine.

This is dandy-'prentice verse. What shall we say of "The Watchword," by the Editor, who, by the way, turns out to be Mr. Mullett Ellis? He fills two pages with a poem of which these are specimen stanzas:

Unto the grieving Peoples comes the word—
Watchword for hearts afflicted, minds distressed.
The Son of Her who was, His people heard—
"Duty! In duty shall our grief find rest."

Thus spake He. He, the heaviest-stricken one,
Swore "to devote His strength whilst life shall last
To do the arduous duty" now his own,
And emulate the Glory that is past.

So the great Admiral of All the Seas,
Hands on his signal watchword through the years,
E'en when the People sorrow on their knees;
E'en when the Crown is suffering in tears.

The budget closes with some banjo verses, "Kitchener of Khartoum," by Mr. Harold Begbie, who cherishes the singular idea that General Kitchener is left in loneliness in South Africa.

O the dashing work is over and the drums and flags retire,
And our city-ways are thronging with a populace afire,
And the heroes have been greeted and the laurel has been twined,
But, they haven't all turned homeward—there's a man who's left behind.

There are several men, we fancy, left behind; and thirty thousand more are about to join them. But, indeed, the poem reeks of that inaccuracy which has cankered and nullified our recent war songs. If our poets would only be patriots and face facts, they might inspire us. Mr. Begbie writes of stamping out "rebellion," but why not face the fact that the "rebellion" is subsidiary and technical, and that so long as De Wet leads his thousands up and down the veldt there is war—difficult war, and worthy to be called such? Why belittle England by belittling her task?

It may be said that the verses we have quoted are unworthy of notice. But they help to explain the poetic famine. Poetry is emotion, whatever else it be, and the emotion must be real; it must rise in the breast, whereas our poets seem to draw theirs from the newspapers that print their woolly elegies.

Correspondence.

Recent Linguistic Barbarisms.

SIR,—It is, surely, more than the proverbial "high time" that strong protest be made—and nowhere more fittingly can the protest appear than in the columns of the ACADEMY—against the introduction, or attempted introduction, into the English vocabulary of certain atrociously barbarous words and expressions.

Nearly two centuries ago Swift (in "A Proposal for Correcting, Improving, and Ascertaining the English Tongue," as well as in the Tatler) denounced the introduction of the "monstrous productions," as he termed them, "which have overrun us for some years past"—to wit, trips, mob, bamboozle, kidney (in the sense of sort or kind), spies, amusement, &c., &c. But, with the exception of the frightful kidney, those importations may be deemed quite innocent by comparison with some of the latest additions to the vocabulary. Two instances will suffice, one of which may be stigmatised especially as a grammatical the other as an aesthetic solecism. If they have not come in with the South African War, at all events they have received large impetus therefrom. These two special monstrosities, to which I beg to call attention, are negotiating (in the sense of "achieving" or "attempting," as, e.g., negotiating a passage of a river) and spoiling (in the sense of "fretting"?) for the fight. Quousque tandem?

Shades of Swift and Voltaire! How, one may imagine, they would be consumed with the indignatio seva, were such violations of the laws of reason and of language to reach them in their retirement—placid but for echoes of unreason and bad taste from the upper world—in the Elysian fields! The worst of the mischief is, that these horrible barbarisms are being adopted and made current by those who might be expected to be superior to such vulgarisms. Only this morning I read, in one of your leading daily contemporaries, of a General in South Africa "negotiating a passage" (of a river). But that is mild by comparison with "spoiling for the fight," introduced in a leader in another journal of pretensions some months ago. Horresco referens.—I am, &c., H. W.

The Word "Gun," a Thief.

SIR,—In your interesting review of the latest parts of the New English Dictionary you say: "The developed uses of the word [gun] are curious. . . . A thief, in thieves' language, is a gun. . . . All these senses seem to have been wrested from the original gun, a weapon." Your reviewer has been misled by the Dictionary, which ought not to have classed gun, a thief, under gun, a weapon, as the former is of entirely different etymology. It is a Yiddish word, an abbreviation of the variously written gonoph, gonoff, gonaff, gonnof, gunneff, a thief, familiar to every reader of Dickens. The reduction of Yiddish slang words to their first syllables is not uncommon. Other examples of it are case (i.e., caser, a crown-piece), kye (i.e., kibosh, eighteenpence), noff (i.e., noffigur, an unsteady woman), &c.—I am, &c., JAS. PLATT, JUN.

SIR,—In his interesting notice of the latest part of Dr. Murray's New English Dictionary your reviewer commits himself to a rather questionable statement. He includes the cant word gun, in the sense of thief, with the other slang words derived from gun, a weapon. Slang is not seldom hard to trace etymologically, but the source of gun is as clear as can be. It is simply a contraction of gonof (also spelt gonoph or gnof), a word of Hebrew origin meaning a thief, specifically a pickpocket.

With regard to gushing, I think an earlier reference to it than that in Fraser's Magazine for 1961 can be found in Artemus Ward: His Book. In the chapter on the "Shakers" I read:

As I was goin threw the entry to the room where the vittles was, I cum across the Elder and the old female I'd met the night before, and what d'ye spose they was up to? Huggin and kissin like young lovers in their gushingist state. Sez I, "My Shaker friends, I reckon you'd better suspend the rules, and git marrid!"

When, in a later chapter, Artemus meets representatives of the Bunkumville Female Moral Reforming and Women's Rights Association who wish free admission to his show, one of the ladies observes:

"O, please let my darter in—shee's a sweet gushin child of natur."

"Let her gush!" roared I, as mad as I cood stick at their tarnal nonsense; "let her gush!" Whereupon they all sprung back with the simultaneous observashun that I was a Beest.

The first English edition of Artemus Ward, which lies before me, was published early in 1865; but it appeared in America a year or two earlier—the exact date I cannot give offhand. That gushing was in colloquial use before 1864 also seems to me established by the pseudonym "Impulsia Gushington" adopted by the late Lady Dufferin for her book of Egyptian travel, Lispings from Low Latitudes, published in 1863.—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM G. HUTCHISON.

"Rhymed Elegiacs and Adonis's Gardens."

SIR,—Does Mr. A. Lang, in his letter in the Academy of February 9, under the above heading, mean to imply that Plato's Phædrus is not Greek? The reference is to be found in Phædrus, 276 B.—I am, &c., C. S. H.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 73 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the most interesting suggestion of a neglected book. The suggestions sent in are of considerable and rather equal interest. We award the prize to Mr. Henry Hanford, Eastlea, Teddington, for the following:

JOSEPH AND HIS BRETHREN: A DRAMATIC POEM. BY CHARLES WELLS. REPUBLISHED ABOUT 1876.

Let every lover of dramatic blank verse try to pick up a copy of this noble poem.

From Mr. Swinburne's preface:

"Published first quarter of 19th century, unnoticed save for Rossetti's eloquent praise. Chas. Wells is elsewhere mentioned only in an early sonnet of Keats', but should be one of the memorable names of the second great period of our poetry.

He has triumphantly succeeded where Coleridge failed in imitating the style of Shakespeare. Thus, of the setting sun:

A god gigantic, habited in gold,
Stepping from off a mount into the sea.—P. 7.

Pure dramatic quality is shown abundantly, and nearly half the lines are worthy of quotation. The scene between Joseph and Phraxanor (Potiphar's wife) has been approached in Shakespeare's "Cleopatra" alone. Every scene in the life of Joseph is done into words with admirable and equal vigour."

Other replies are as follows:

DREAMTHORP. BY ALEXANDER SMITH.

These essays were written in the country, and it is in some secluded backwater of civilisation where the big bone that convulses the world is unheeded, and life's importunate utilities disregarded, that the literary man and the lover of nature should let Smith's rounded periods open up the folds of their floating, richly-brocaded robes, and envelop him in a fond embrace. No man understood the literary character better—its potencies, its limitations, its velleities, the undeserved scorn and injustice its patient merit takes, its indispensability to the world. The "practical man" of to-day will never read Dreamthorp, though twenty Cuthbert Haddens sought to repopularise it. It says nothing on the Eastern Question, and offers no statistics. Besides, Smith, airily indifferent to Gradgrind, remarks that "Fine phrases he values more than bank-notes." But let the unpractical, mercurial man realise he is made "heir in full,"

[A. G., Cheltenham.]

A SUMMER IN SKYE. BY ALEXANDER SMITH.

I first made acquaintance with the pages of Stevenson, weather-bound in a Skye bothy on the western shore of Sleat. His style greeted me like an old friend, and I said to myself: "Here is a disciple of Alexander Smith, though with the whimsical twist of an unknown dimension!" Now, Stevenson's fame waxes—but Smith's? who reads his book "A Summer in Skye," though it is at least as fine as "Travels with a Donkey"! The work has pathos, humour, and, above all, humanity. It gives pictures like those of a camera obscura, in which living figures move against a background of most ancient nature. Smith, like Stevenson, finds the elect world and straightway, you see what he saw and as he saw it—not only that, you feel as he felt, for the book would not be the real one it is did not the author seem yet alive in its pages, though his hand has dwindled to dust this thirty years. Why, then, is he consigned to the waste-basket of forgetfulness?

[F. B., Milton-next-Gravesend.]

THE PURSUITS OF LITERATURE: A SATIRICAL POEM, IN FOUR DIALOGUES WITH NOTES.

This once-popular work was, I believe, written by J. J. Matthias. The fourteenth edition, with the citations translated, and with a complete index, was issued in London; printed for T. Becket, 81, Pall Mall, 1808. It forms one volume octavo, pp. xxiv., 579, and index, pp. 68. This striking poem is written in smoothly flowing and carefully rhymed lines of ten syllables, and in many cases there is but one line of poetry on a page, the remainder being occupied by the very copious notes, which are of considerable interest on account of their scathing references to well-known literary men of the time, among others Pitt, Burke, Godwin, Bishop Horsley, Cowper, Dr. Johnson, "Monk" Lewis, Dr. Parr, Sheridan, Dr. Joseph Walton, and Wilberforce. Shakespeare and his editors, Robert Burns, Locke, Bacon, and various classical writers are also referred to in this noteworthy composition.

[A. S., Edinburgh.]

A NARRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF MRS. CHARLOTTE CHARKE. WRITTEN BY HERSELF.

A writer who, in telling her own tragic story, can laugh, and make laugh, is worth knowing. She touches our sympathies from the side of humour and of pathos. When, moreover, she is a feminine picaro (though "mad-cap" rather than rogue), whose life has been a tangle of strange experiences, of wild escapades, of short-lived triumphs and unsuccessful ventures, of extravagance and "gaping for a crust," of whimsical masquerading, of toiling and pawning and begging for "her poor little wench," of penniless tramping, the chances are that she has something to say. When, finally, she has a spark of originality, a lively imagination, a turn for quaint and apt expression, the sum of these qualities ought surely to entitle her to a place on our bookshelves. Such a woman was Charlotte, daughter of Colley Cibber; hence her autobiography, by an unfortunate chance long neglected, is vital. Resurgat!

[E. R., London.]

VIEWS AND OPINIONS. BY MATTHEW BROWNE.

A great man once said that a book should teach us either to endure life or to enjoy it. Views and Opinions, by Matthew Browne, helps me to do both. Published thirty-five years ago, and now out of print, it still convinces by reason of its very humanness. The titles of the thoughtful, original essays it contains are singularly attractive: "The Table-Lands of Life," "One's Own Cocoon," "On Being Sentimental," "On Giving Way." This last might be expected to preach the duty of unselfishness, but the subject is much less trite. In it Browne sets forth "the humours and absurdities of vulgar acquiescence." Both idealist and humourist, he has a cheering faith in the lessons of the years, concluding quaintly: "The soul is greater than the almanac, and to grow backwards is no disqualification for entering even the kingdom of heaven."

[L. L., Ashby-de-la-Zouch.]

Other interesting replies received from: G. R. G. C., Aberdeen; G. H., Didsbury; F. M. R., Faversham; F. B. D., Torquay; E. W. H., Didsbury; F. P. S., Manchester; E. M. G., London; H. A. E., Oxford; F. B. L., Dulwich; M. J. S., Edinburgh; J. R., St. Ives; C. C. B., Exmouth; J. D. A., Ealing; F. A., Leeds; R. F. McC., Whitby.

Competition No. 74 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best original poem of three four-line stanzas.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, February 20. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the third page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

MARCH NUMBER. THE
PALL MALL MAGAZINE.
 Edited by GEORGE R. HALKETT.

The March number of the Pall Mall Magazine is now ready, and contains:—

AN INTERVIEW WITH EX-PRESIDENT KRUGER.

This interview and character study will be found of great interest at the moment, and gives Mr. Kruger's views of the war and his hopes for the future.

Other important subjects are dealt with as follows:—
 "THE SECOND OF FEBRUARY, 1901." A Poem on the Funeral of the late Queen. By the DUKE OF ARGYLL.
 POPE LEO XII. An important Contribution to Papal History. By the Vicomte de Vogue, of L'Académie Française.

SIGNALING to MARS. Sir ROBERT BALL, F.R.S.
 MEN'S DRESS. Lieut.-Colonel NEWSHAM DAVIS.
 MR. PINERO and MR. ARCHER. A Real Conversation. Recorded by WILLIAM ARCHER.

TWO SONGS. By the writer of "AN ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE-LETTERS."

THE ENGLISH and FRENCH in ABYSSINIA. HERBERT VIVIAN.

CASTLE HOWARD. Lord RONALD S. GOWER.

VICTORIA THE WELL-BELOVED.

By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT E. MAXWELL, M.P.
 Other Articles, Stories, and Poems by A. T. QUILLER-COUCH, FREDERICK WIDMORF, EDEN PHILLIPPS, G. STANLEY ELLIS, HAROLD BEECHIE, ALFRED KINSMAN, &c.
 Many exquisite Illustrations and Caricatures, and 2 Full-Page Plates are included.

Price ONE SHILLING
 18, CHARING CROSS ROAD, W.C.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

A NEW NOVEL OF GENTLE LIFE.
NAOMI'S EXODUS. By Lily H. Montagu.
 Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

BY RITA.
THE ENDING OF MY DAY. By the Author of "Vanity: the Confessions of a Court Modiste," &c. (Unwin's Copyright Novels Series). Cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE IRISH AS THEY ARE.
THE LOST LAND: a Tale of a Cromwellian
 Irish Town. By JULIA M. CROTTIE, Author of "Neighbours," &c. Cloth, 6s.

"A picturesque and moving story."—Outlook.
 A FASCINATING NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER.
TREWERN: a Welsh Tale of the Thirties.
 By R. M. THOMAS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

MODERN ENGLAND UNDER QUEEN VICTORIA. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY. (Story of the Nations Series.) Illustrated, 3s.

THE MIND OF THE CENTURY. Paper, 1s.; cloth, 2s.

Contributors: LOUISE JOHNSON, WILLIAM ARCHER, ARTHUR WAGNER, HENRY W. NEVINSON, JOSEPH PENNELL, G. C. ASHTON-JONES, J. A. NICKLIN, MAJOR MARTIN-HUGO, REV. A. W. HUTT, TOS. W. P. ALEXANDER, A. HOBSON, FRANCIS SPURR, DR. W. A. TILMER, DR. H. J. CAMPBELL, EDWARD GORDON, and W. A. PRICE.

SECOND IMPRESSION.
PAGES from a JOURNAL: Essays, Notes, and Tales from a Journal of the last Thirty Years. By MARK RUTHERFORD, Author of "Clara Hoggood," &c. Cloth, 6s.

FALAISE: the Story of the Town of the Conqueror. By A. BOWMAN DODD. Profusely Illustrated. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

ENGLAND'S NEGLECT OF SCIENCE. By Professor PERRY, of the Royal College of Science, South Kensington. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

CANADIAN CAMP LIFE. By FRANCES E. HERRING. With 8 Full-Page Illustrations. Cloth, 6s.
 London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

to

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
 Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS
 on the minimum monthly balances,
 when not drawn below £100. 2%.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
 on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%.

STOCKS AND SHARES.
 Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.
 The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.
 Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
 Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

Order your Copy at once.

NEW LIBERAL REVIEW

No. 2 for MARCH.

READY FEBRUARY 27.

ONE SHILLING MONTHLY.

EDITED BY

CECIL B. HARMSWORTH AND HILDEBRAND A. HARMSWORTH.

SPECIAL CONTENTS.

A BOY'S REMINISCENCES of QUEEN VICTORIA.

LIBERAL PRINCIPLES in NEW ZEALAND ... The Right Hon. the EARL OF ABERDEEN, P.C., G.C.M.G.

THE MAKING of a MODERN UNIVERSITY ... W. MACNEIL DIXON, Litt.D.

LIBERAL or WHIG? ... The Hon. LIONEL HOLLAND

ON FIGHTING AGAINST ODDS ... E. V. LUCAS.

QUEEN VICTORIA ... The Right Hon. VISCOUNT MOUNTMORRES.

GOLFING for PLEASURE ... HORACE G. HUTCHINSON.

THE REFORMATION BISHOPS and their CATHOLIC PRIESTS ... FREDERIC GREENWOOD.

WOMEN as LAWYERS ... MARGARET S. HALL.

ABE of the SEA FENS ... SYDNEY GOWING.

THE POLITICAL ASPECTS of CHURCH UNION in SCOTLAND ... W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, LL.D.

INSET LIFE in WINTER ... The Rev. THEODORE WOOD, F.E.S.

BOOKS WORTH BUYING.

And an Important Symposium entitled:
 OUR COMMERCIAL SUPREMACY: HOW TO MAINTAIN IT. Contributed by KENNETH B. MURRAY (Secretary of the London Chamber of Commerce), J. KEIR HARRIE, M.P., Sir NEVILLE LUBBOCK, K.C.M.G., Colonel Sir HOWARD VINCENT, K.C.M.G., M.P., ERNEST E. WILLIAMS (Author of "Made in Germany"), W. H. LEVER, THOS. F. BLACKWELL, A. L. JONES (Director of the Elder Dempster Line), and A. J. WILSON (of "The Investors' Review"), &c., &c.

NEXT WEEK.—In 1 vol., demy 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, price 10s. 6d. net.
FIRST ON THE ANTARCTIC CONTINENT.
 Being an Account of the British Antarctic Expedition,
 1898—1900.

By C. E. BORCHGREVINK, F.R.G.S., Commander of the Expedition.
WITH PORTRAITS, MAPS, AND 188 ILLUSTRATIONS.

London: GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED

JUST PUBLISHED.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, price 3s. 6d. net.

French Life in Town and Country.

By HANNAH LYNCH.

WITH 12 FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS.

London: GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED

MUDIE'S LIBRARY
 (LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months, and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE
 (Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
 241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 49, Queen Victoria
 Street, E.C., LONDON;
 And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

ARCHITECTURAL EYESORES; the Wallace Collection; Walter Crane—a Hungarian Appreciation; Old Brentford Town (with Illustrations).—See the "ART JOURNAL" for March, price 1s. 6d.; by post, 1s. 9d. Through any bookseller, or direct from the Publisher, H. VIRTUE & Co., Ltd., 26, Ivy Lane, London, E.C.

An American Transport
 in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War..... The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece. 193 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

NEW BOOKS FROM MR. MELROSE'S LIST.

At 5s.
THE MAGIC MIST,
And other Dartmoor Legends.
By EVA C. ROGERS.
Profusely Illustrated. Imp. 16mo, cloth boards.
"Of intense interest... The volume is beautifully got up, and will form a choice present."—Perthshire Advertiser.

At 1s. net.
FOURTH EDITION. 20th THOUSAND.
FIELD-MARSHAL

LORD ROBERTS, V.C., K.P., G.C.B.
A Biographical Sketch.
By HORACE G. GROSER.
Author of "The Kingdom of Manhood," &c.

The Morning Post says: "The author traces the military career of this famous General in an attractive manner, every care apparently having been taken to make it accurate."
The Academy says: "So clear a narrative of so fine a life can be welcomed as something better than a piece of book-making."

JOHN RUSKIN
A Biographical Sketch.
By R. ED. PENGELLY.

With a reproduction from a Water-Colour Portrait of Ruskin, by himself, and with Original and hitherto Unpublished Letters.

The Sword and Trowel says: "Modestly described as a sketch. But, though only a sketch, a very graphic one, giving us an admirable idea of the great master of art criticism and English prose, from the inside. Everywhere it breathes the warm sympathy that alone can interpret any man's life and ideals. The writer keeps a sane and sound judgment, he does not worship his hero; but, all the more he commands our respect as he attempts to depict him, and expound his teachings. We have much enjoyed every page of the sketch, even the orderly discipline with which it is planned. It deserves to run into many editions."

At 3s. 6d.
WESTWARD HO!
By CHARLES KINGSLEY.
Imp. 16mo, cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top.
Illustrated by Ayton Symington.

At 3s. 6d.
FROM THE SCOURGE OF THE TONGUE

By BESSIE MARCHANT (Mrs. J. A. COMFORT).
Imp. 16mo, cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top.
"It is refreshing to come across so healthy a book, in which there is, moreover, a pure religious tone."—Western Mercury.

At 2s. 6d.
BARFIELD'S BLAZER,
And other School Stories.

By W. E. CULE.
"A splendid collection of school stories... The book deserves a place in every school library."—South Devon Journal.

At 2s.
THE SCHOOL'S HONOUR
And other Stories
By HAROLD AVERY.
New and Enlarged Edition.

At 2s. 6d.
BOOKS FOR THE HEART

Edited, and with an Introduction, by ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A.
Fcap. 8vo, printed on antique wove paper, cloth boards, gilt top, price 2s. 6d. each volume.

NEW VOLUME.
THE HEIDELBERG CATECHISM.

A NEW TRANSLATION.
"We rejoice in the possession of the little book... Most catechisms are for the head, but this is really 'a book for the heart.'"—Expository Times.

Uniform with "Books for the Heart."

QUIET HOURS
SECOND SERIES.
By JOHN PULSFORD, D.D.
Price 2s. 6d.

THE SUPREMACY OF MAN.

By JOHN PULSFORD, D.D.,
Author of "Quiet Hours," &c. Price 2s. 6d.
"It is a wonderful little volume, written in numbered paragraphs, every paragraph being packed with thoughts and suggestions."—Guardian.

16, PILGRIM STREET, LONDON, E.C.

HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS.

THE LIFE OF THE EMPEROR FREDERICK.

From the German of MARGARETHA VON POSCHINGER.
Edited, with an Introduction, by SIDNEY WHITMAN.
With Introduction, Portrait, and Index.
Demy 8vo, cloth, extra gilt, 16s.

"The volume is one of exceptional historical importance and value, while at the same time it conveys a very pleasing impression of the home life of 'Our Fritz.'"—Scotsman.
"A book that adds much to our knowledge of a memorable period, and to our admiration of a great and noble personality."—Daily Telegraph.
"A welcome account of one of the noblest monarchs who ever occupied a throne."—St. James's Gazette.

THE STORY OF NINETEENTH CENTURY SCIENCE.

By Dr. HENRY SMITH WILLIAMS.
Demy 8vo, 475 pp., with Index, cloth, illustrated, 9s.
A comprehensive and popular history of the progress of Science during the last century by an eminent American Scientist.

The Contents include: Science at the Beginning of the Century—The Century's Progress in Astronomy—Geology—Meteorology—Physics—Chemistry—Organic Evolution—Anatomy—Medicine—Psychology, &c., together with a résumé of unsolved problems.

FICTION.

JUST PUBLISHED. A BICYCLE OF CATHAY.

By FRANK R. STOCKTON,
Author of "Rudder Grange."
Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

THE MONSTER.

By STEPHEN CRANE,
Author of "The Red Badge of Courage" and
"The Open Boat."
Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 5s.

These Stories illustrate the writer's two distinct styles—that of trenchant and vivid pictures of war and tragedy, and whimsical but none the less exact study of child life and character.

"Mr. Crane describes the working of the youthful mind with exceeding care, scrupulously free from exaggeration, and aiming at absolute fidelity."—Daily Telegraph.

SECOND EDITION. THE SLAVES OF SOCIETY. A Satire on Social Life and Usages.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Publishers beg to call special attention to this book, which, although published anonymously, is from the pen of a well-known and brilliant writer.

"It is so good, indeed, in form and style, that we are convinced the author is no new comer into the field of literature."—Glasgow Herald.
"Clever in its delineation of character, and sparkling in its dialogue, painting the fashionable people of the moment in vivid, graceful lines; and no one will read it without a keen and hearty enjoyment."—Scotsman.

SECOND EDITION. THE INNER SHRINE.

By Mrs. ALFRED SIDGWICK (Mrs. ANDREW DEAN), Author of "The Grasshoppers."
Crown 8vo, 6s.

"One of the prettiest and brightest stories we have met with for a long time."—Daily Chronicle.
"Mrs. Sidgwick has done nothing better than the rout of the Clatworthy's and its tragic sequel."—Spectator.
"Excellent in tone and feeling throughout, and deserves to be widely read."—Daily News.

A NEW ROMANCE BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE PRINCESS XENIA." CHLORIS OF THE ISLAND.

By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON,
Author of "The Princess Xenia," "Galloping Dick."
Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A well-told tale of the old smuggling days, with plenty of character and incident."—Athens.
"An admirable and exciting story."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"The story bristles with incident, the plot is well conceived, and there is not an uninteresting page from first to last."—Glasgow Herald.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Albemarle Street, W.

All Interested In FOREIGN MISSIONS

Should read the Two Volumes, just published, on

THE ECUMENICAL MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

Held in New York, from April 21 to May 2, 1900.

NOW READY.

2 vols., 8vo, cloth boards, 6s. net.

One of the best Missionary Books of Reference yet Printed.

FOURTH EDITION JUST PUBLISHED.
Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

FROM ALDERSHOT TO PRETORIA;

A Story of Christian Work among the Troops in South Africa.

By W. E. SELLERS.

With 15 Illustrations.

"Instructive and sympathetic."—Standard.
"It gives a vivid impression of the work amongst the soldiery on the stricken field, in camp, and in hospital."—Field.
"Full of interesting matter."—Spectator.
"Reliable and attractive."—United Service Magazine.
"Well chosen anecdotes of a kind that would be useful to speakers at religious meetings."—Manchester Guardian.

A COMPACT AND POPULAR STORY
OF THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.

WITH OUR SOLDIERS AT THE FRONT.

By HENRY JOHNSON.

With 15 Illustrations.

Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

Dr. PARKER has recently said: "The tangled web of the Boer war has so far muddled our memory that we welcome cordially a satisfactory résumé of its origin and progress. This Mr. Johnson has given us with admirable lucidity. The book will afford interesting and instructive reading for many firesides, and he may be felicitated on having written an account of the war which will please all and offend none."

"Gives a good idea of the origin of the war, and its leading incidents."—Times.
"A convenient record of the great operations of the war, put together in a way that will make the general course of events readily apprehended by the reader."—Spectator.

PUBLISHED BY
THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
INCORPORATED,
25, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON.

The Academy

Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1503. Established 1869.

23 February, 1901.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

Mrs. MAX MÜLLER has undertaken to write a life of her husband, Prof. Max Müller, and would be much indebted to any of Prof. Max Müller's correspondents if they would lend her any letters they may have in their possession. They should be sent to Mrs. Max Müller, at 7, Norham Gardens, Oxford, and they will be returned when done with. Messrs. Longmans will be the publishers of the Life.

THE autobiography of Max Müller is also, we understand, in preparation, and may be expected this year. He had a ready pen, a naïve way of enlarging upon his preferences, and a keen interest in the personalities of the illustrious people he met—as the volumes called Auld Lang Syne bear witness. The Autobiography will be prefaced by an introduction, from which the following is an extract:

People wished to know how a boy, born and educated in a small and almost unknown town in the centre of Germany, should have come to England, should have been chosen there to edit the old-st book of the world, The Veda of Brahmas, never published before, whether in India or in Europe, should have passed the best part of his life as a professor in the most famous and, as it was thought, the most exclusive University in England, and should actually have ended his days as a member of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council. I confess myself it seems a very strange career, yet everything came about most naturally, not by my own effort, but owing again to those circumstances or to that environment of which we have heard so much of late.

THE third volume of Prof. Gardiner's History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate, 1649-1660, is issued this week by Messrs. Longmans. In the Preface Prof. Gardiner regrets that his work makes rather slower progress than he had hoped for, but points out that the period dealt with in this third volume, namely that which separated the Parliamentary elections of 1654 and 1656, was worthy of especial care. "The story of these two years reveals to us the real character of the Protectorate, as no other part of its history can do." It includes the Protector's relations with his first Parliament, the Royalist insurrection of 1655, the institution and action of the Major Generals, the settlement of Ireland, the expeditions of Penn and Blake, and the cultivation of new relations with the Continental powers. Concerning many matters Prof. Gardiner thinks there has been much misunderstanding of points of the highest importance.

It is a gratifying thought that scattered over this country are a number of men and women, not differing, possibly, in appearance from other people, but possessed inwardly with an unslumbering passion to keep the language pure. We applaud them, and print two letters we have received this morning. An Engineer's Wife writes:

Is not the frequent remark that "I have put a spoke in his wheel" another instance of misuse of terms? Should it not be sprag? And does not the Spectator's reviewer mean sprag when he says that "Mr. Compton Reade has . . . put a spoke in the wheel of the humanitarians who denounce the cruelty of fox-hunting"?

May I record a protest against another vulgarity that too often defaces colloquial and newspaper English? I read, in a contemporary, concerning Lord Frederick Blackwood, that "the doctors have recommended him stopping either at Madeira or Tangier." It is against the use of "stop" as implying continuous instead of momentary action that I wish to protest. I stop at Trafalgar-square supposing that my business takes me no further, but if I were to pitch a tent (the police being absent!) in the shade of Nelson's Column, and there take up my abode, I should not stop, but stay there.—E. E. T.

THE North American Review contains an admirable article by Mr. W. D. Howells on Mark Twain. It is called "An Inquiry." This analysis of Mark Twain's method is excellent:

So far as I know Mr. Clemens is the first writer to use in extended writing the fashion we all use in thinking, and to set down the thing that comes into his mind without fear or favour of the thing that went before, or the thing that may be about to follow. I, for instance, in putting this paper together, am anxious to observe some sort of logical order, to discipline such impressions and notions as I have of the subject into a coherent body which shall march column-wise to a conclusion obvious if not inevitable from the start. But Mr. Clemens, if he were writing it, would not be anxious to do any such thing. He would take whatever offered itself to his hand out of that mystical chaos, that divine ragbag, which we call the mind, and leave the reader to look after relevancies and sequences for himself.

Good, too, are these remarks on Mark Twain's use of words:

One of the characteristics I observe in him is his single-minded use of words, which he employs as Grant did to express the plain, straight meaning their common acceptance has given them, with no regard to their structural significance or their philological implications. He writes English as if it were a primitive and not a derivative language, without Gothic or Latin or Greek behind it, or German and French beside it. The result is the English in which the most vital works of English literature are cast, rather than the English of Milton, and Thackeray, and Mr. Henry James. I do not say that the English of the authors last named is less than vital, but only that it is not the most vital. It is scholarly and conscious; it knows who its grandfather was; it has the refinement and subtlety of an old patriciate. You will not have with it the widest suggestion, the largest human feeling, or perhaps the loftiest reach of imagination, but you will have the keen joy that exquisite artistry in words can alone impart, and that you will not have in Mark Twain.

MR. WILLIAM ARCHER's new edition of Ibsen's plays, to which we referred some weeks ago, is in active preparation, and the first three volumes, containing "The League of Youth," "Pillars of Society," and "A Doll's House," will be issued shortly by Mr. Walter Scott.

WE have received two more reproachful letters concerning our review of nine volumes of poetry under the title of "Why Do They Do It?" Mr. Arthur Whate complains that we lumped together books of varying degrees of merit, and contends that one, at least, Mr. Charles Morse's "A Jingle of Rhymes," "contains much that is of sterling quality." Another correspondent chides us for treating the work of a deceased poet with some severity in face of a preface by his mother, stating that she published the poems not as the finished work of a literary artist, but in order to place them in the hands of those who knew and loved her son. With regard to Mr. Whate's objection, we have only to say that variations in the merit of a number of books of the same kind cannot always be nicely distinguished. It was only by grouping the nine volumes that we could have found space to review any one of them, and we consider that the title under which the grouping was done was justified both by the group and by each of its components. With regard to the poems of the late Mr. Denis Davies, we can only reply that no book ought to be sent to a public journal unless criticism is freely challenged.

WE have been requested to publish the titles of those "neglected books" for which there was not space on our Competition page last week. We publish the following with pleasure:

The Works of Mrs. Hester Chapone.
Fair Virtue, the Mistress of Philarete. By George Wither. 1622.
Tom Cringle's Log.
The Spiritual Quixote. By Rev. Richard Graves. 1722.
Mademoiselle Mathilde. By Henry Kingsley.
Pen Sketches by a Vanished Hand. By Mortimer Collins.
Friends in Council. By Sir Arthur Helps.
Thomas Beddoes' Poems.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "The writer of the paragraph on Clough's Bothie, in your last week's issue, has overlooked the circumstance that the title of the first edition was The Bothie of Toper-na-Fuosich. In subsequent editions this was altered to the present title."

THE Delegates of the Clarendon Press have appointed Mr. W. A. Craigie to be a third editor of their New English Dictionary. New and larger quarters near the Bodleian Library are to be provided for Mr. Craigie and Mr. Bradley and their staff. The editors will then be able to work in one large room, to their mutual advantage.

It is time, we fancy, to take a census of Oxford papers and periodicals. Three reach us by one post. Number one, the Quad, a shilling magazine, is in its fourth issue, and skittish in parts. There is a firework dialogue between one Harry Jones, a Philistine, and one Percy ("whose surname is not Jones"), an artist. "As I am not a Philistine," says the author, "Jones is naturally going to have the worst of it." It is certain that he has the least of it, Percy monopolising the carpet and raising the echoes in fine style. Among the people he holds cheap is Tennyson:

Percy. "In Memoriam" is perpetually referred to as the final word on religion, on ethics, on morals, on personal immortality and most other serious problems; it is hailed as typical of the nineteenth century. It is. And can one say a worst thing for it? Characterised by the vapid hesitation of knock-kneed Agnosticism, and the strange helplessness of scientific ignorance, it is a pitiful illustration of the truth that, if the blind lead the blind they both fall into the ditch of Darwin.

Jones. But, hang it all, it is a beautiful work of art.

Percy. It is; but so is the Satyricon of Petronius Arbiter; but I would give neither to the young person; yet, better Petronius than Tennyson, as moral miasma is less deadly than spiritual paralysis.

O youth, youth! We turn to Prof. York Powell's pretty rendering of a ballade from the French of Paul Fort. May we quote it?

The pretty maid she died, she died, in love-bed as she lay;
 They took her to the churchyard, all at the break of day;
 They laid her all alone there, all in her white array;
 They laid her all alone there, a-coffined in the clay;
 And they came back so merrily, all at the dawn of day;
 A-singing, all so merrily, "The dog must have his day!"
 The pretty maid is dead, is dead, in love-bed as she lay:
 And they went off afield to work, as they do every day.

NUMBER two, the 'Varsity', is a weekly, published every Tuesday during Term, and controlled by undergraduates. The little sketch "Of Dons" has a rather pleasing foolishness. The Pipe expresses its own and the others' hopeful spirit in these prefatory lines:

Lo, we have packed our Pipe again,
 For better or for worse:
 The labours of our modest pen
 We thrust upon your purse.
 And we shall be contented men
 If you, in language terse,
 Thus criticise our efforts—when
 You after lunch converse,
 Or gather eight or nine or ten,
 Ere you to bed disperse—
 "The prose is not pedestrian,
 The poems are not 'verse.'"

MR. MEREDITH has expressed his dislike of "Atkins" as the sobriquet of the British soldier with characteristic pith and energy. We take leave to quote his views as contained in these two stanzas contributed to the Westminster Gazette:

ATKINS.

Yonder's the man with his life in his hand,
 Legs on the march for whatever the land,
 Or to the slaughter or to the maiming,
 Getting the dole of a dog for pay.
 Laurels he clasps in the words "Duty done,"
 England his heart under every sun—
 Exquisite humour! that gives him a naming
 Base to the ear as an ass's bray.

Let it not be forgotten, however, that the "exquisite humour" displayed in the name Tommy Atkins belongs rather to the War Office than to the public. That institution used to issue little pocket manuals, in which each soldier's name, age, date of enlistment, length of service, &c., were entered, and the method of filling in the form was explained by the use of a hypothetical name, not the John Doe of the legal profession, but—Thomas Atkins. The books were first so called, and then the soldiers.

NOTHING that Stevenson regretted writing is likely to go unpublished. His most occasional, his most tentative efforts are solemnly printed and collected by admirers who, one suspects, think a great deal more of these comparatively inaccessible trifles than of Treasure Island and Across the Plains. Messrs. Dodd, Mead & Co. have recently issued, in an edition limited to 110 copies, such a morsel of Stevensoniana. Stevenson says in one of his letters: "A Ouida romance we have been secretly writing, in which Haggard was the hero, and each one of the authors had to draw a portrait of him or herself in a Ouida light. Leigh, Lady J., Fanny, R. L. S., Belle, and Graham were the authors." And, again: "Most amusingly, varied by a visit from Lady Jersey, I took her over mysteriously (under the pseudonym of my cousin, Miss Amelia Balfour) to visit Mataafa, our rebel, and we had great fun, and wrote a Ouida novel on our life here, in which every author had to describe himself in the Ouida glamour, and of which—for the Jerseys intend printing it—I must let you have a copy."

THE five chapters are written by Captain Leigh, Lady Jersey, Mrs. R. L. Stevenson, R. L. S. and Mrs. Strong. Stevenson's contribution is distinctly amusing if we may judge by the following piece of Ouidaesque self-portraiture:

He of the name which brought a light to the eye of the Canadian Book Agent, and a flush to the cheek of the Chicago pirate. He who had earned fame only to despise it, luxury only to discard it; who had fled from the splendours of a suburban residence to toss in the rude trading schooner among uncharted reefs; who had left the pastoral pleasures of the Athenæum to become a dweller in the Bush and the councillor of rebel sovereigns, crouching at night with them about the draughty lamp on the bare cabin floor; whose pen was of gold, and his bed a mat upon a chest, who loved but three things: women, adventure, art—and art the least of these three, and, as men whispered, adventure the most—was he, even he, at ease? I trow not. His slender fingers plucked at his long moustache: his dark eyes glittered in his narrow, sanguine face; in his mind—the mind of a poet—the oaths of stevedores and coal-porters hurtled.

Blackwood's Muser Without Method pleads for, or, rather, insists on, the retention of Greek and Latin at the Universities against those who would place modern languages side by side with them, and ultimately, he fears, oust the dead languages altogether. We are quite in sympathy with the Muser, who points out, with epigrammatic candour and truth, that "the highest quality of our universities should be their uselessness." He says:

This attack upon Greek is but a part of the democratisation of our universities, and as such should be repelled with energy. The universities, says the practical man, can only justify their existence on the ground of utility. The rich merchant who sends his son to Oxford or Cambridge complains, when the boy comes home, that he is useless in the counting-house; and instead of blaming himself for his own vain folly, he declares that the university has not given him his money's worth. With as much justice he might grumble that Sandhurst was not a proper avenue for the Church, or that barristers did not come forth from Cooper's Hill fully equipped. And the dissatisfied merchant forgets this other truth, that the universities do not seek to please their customers; on the contrary, they are the councils which should make the laws of education and exact obedience to those laws. The greedy parent combines with the anxious reformer to demand that our universities should instruct the young in French and bookkeeping. The universities can only make one reply to the greedy parent, Send your son elsewhere, and leave us to do our duty in peace.

AN interesting light is thrown on the rapidity with which novels are "devoured" in these days by a report from the Bradford Public Library printed in the Library World. At Bradford the time allowed for reading a novel is only seven days, but the loan may be renewed by the borrower on application. The following table shows the proportion of novels returned following the issue on a specific date:

Of 693 books issued on the 19th (Saturday),
93	were returned on the	21st (Monday).
62	"	22nd (Tuesday).
52	"	23rd (Wednesday).
51	"	24th (Thursday).
57	"	25th (Friday).
296	"	26th (Saturday).

611 Total

Bradford does not enforce the seven-days' limit in the case of very solid books, for which ten or fourteen days are allowed. The most usual time limit in free libraries is fourteen days for all books.

MR. C. HUBERT LETTS has attempted to answer the question, "What are the Hundred Best Pictures?" in a practical way. Having made his choice, he is issuing the reproductions, through his publishers (Messrs. Charles Letts & Co.), in a series of brown paper portfolios, each containing six examples. Opinions must, of course, differ as to which are the "hundred best," but as to excellence of the presentation of these photogravures there cannot be two opinions. They are produced from negatives taken direct from the originals, and are so mounted that they can be removed and placed in an album. The part under notice contains Raphael's "Ansidei Madonna"; Greuze's "La Lactière"; Walker's "Harvest of Refuge"; Reynolds's "Age of Innocence"; Rosa Bonheur's "The Horse Fair"; and Moore's "Dreamers."

Harper's Weekly has a neat journalistic effect. Across two pages stretches the large-type question: "Is the Philippine Policy of the Administration Just?" "No," says Mark Twain on the left-hand page. "Yes," says Mr. John Kendrick Bangs on the right-hand page, and the portraits and arguments of the two men face each other in symmetry.

MARK is ironical in this wise:

Extending the Blessings of Civilisation to our Brother who Sits in Darkness has been a good trade and has paid well, on the whole. . . . But Christendom has been playing it badly of late years, and must certainly suffer by it, in my opinion. She has been so eager to get every stake that appeared on the green cloth, that the People who Sit in Darkness have noticed it. They have become suspicious of the Blessings of Civilisation. More—they have begun to examine them. This is not well.

THE literary gossip of the Morning Post got into conversation the other day with "the editor of one of the very few magazines which can be called distinguished," and did some good listening work. The editor complained that, though there is plenty of writing talent about, it nearly all runs to gloom. "He did not say, but he was on the verge of declaring, that anybody can write without effort a little masterpiece of the depressingly tragic kind. He was absolutely contemptuous with regard to these, and said they were as common as blackberries. But the person who was wanted and could not be found was the man who had brains, could write, and could sometimes be happy. Such an author might be assured that his work would be gladly accepted and paid for, and that he would in addition be looked on as a benefactor of the public."

MESSRS. METHUEN'S "Little Library" edition of Pride and Prejudice, with an introduction and notes by Mr. E. V. Lucas, is very dainty and satisfactory. To those who have read the novels Mr. Lucas will seem a sound critic; to those who have not read them he will seem a good leader. Here is a passage from his introduction in point:

Mr. Bennet never fails us. His name is a sure guarantee that something agreeably saturnine will follow. It is Mr. Bennet who contrives that Chapter xx. contains perhaps one of the most satisfactory moments in any book. It is when Elizabeth, having refused Mr. Collins, is summoned to the library to hear her father's views on the situation. The stranger to Miss Austen may approach this interview with apprehension. "Can she make Mr. Bennet's comments really worthy of the occasion?" is the half-expressed thought. But those proficient in the novels know that there is no cause for doubting her. "An unhappy alternative is before you, Elizabeth," says the caustic gentleman. "From this day you must be a stranger to one of your parents. Your mother will never see you again if you do not marry Mr. Collins, and—surely there came a long pause—"I will never see you again if you do."

MR. JAMES CLEGG, of Rochdale, is projecting an edition of the works of the well-known Rochdale dialect writer, the late Mr. Oliver Ormerod, who, in his young days, was much associated with John Bright. Ormerod's principal works are O Felley fro Rachde's Visit to th' Greyt Eggshibishun e Lundun, 1851; Impressions of a Rachde Felley un his Woife's Visit to th' Eggshibishun, 1862, and The Yeomanry Papers. The Felley fro Rachde had a huge sale in Lancashire, "sowd like winkin," as Ormerod had it. Mr. Clegg may be trusted to give Ormerod's books every advantage of type and dress, and the specimen illustrations in the prospectus are excellent. His wonder and delight at the Exhibition of 1851 are expressed in a passage of which this is a specimen:

Its no mak o use me troyin fur to insens yo hinto O us aw seed, aw's nevur hawse, aw shud be o foo iv aw did.
Aw seed o maks o wat they coen shandealers un lamps, un grand boxus un jewilury, un then aw kooome to o grayt rook o carrigus, gradely honsum uns us ever o mon clapt his een on; two on um ud wudden orses in. Eh! heaw natteruble they loukt, un aw'm shure us ony boddi, uth furst seet, mut ha thaut us they'rn wick. Ut last ov O, wen aw wor gettin wele tyert, aw kooome O ut wonst hinto
o plaze ful o heyten stuf as they coed 'freshment reawm, un th' furst thyng us aw seed wor sum veyle pyes; thynks aw to mesel those ur the jokeys fur me, un aw keawert me deawn omung o greyt rook o foke, un aw seed too o chap us wor waytin on. Ol thank yo fur won o those pyes, iv yo plez, un we that E brant me won in o minnit, un aw pade im for it furst goo hoff, un sum noice it wor, raythur o smo pese too fur sixpunze.

Personally we had rather go to the galleys than read Ormerod.

MR. A. L. HUMPHREYS has issued a penny reprint, in pamphlet form, of Lord Rosebery's fine speech at Glasgow on "Questions of Empire."

Bibliographical.

So Mr. Fergus Hume has written a blank-verse play on a classical subject, and Sir Henry Irving has accepted it. Mr. Hume is scarcely a writer whom one would suspect of desiring to produce a play on a classical subject, and in blank verse. He first became known to the English reading world in 1888 (was it not?), when his Mystery of a Hansom Cab had a very considerable vogue. After that, I think, came his Madame Midas (1888), with its sequel, Miss Mephistopheles (1890). The Piccadilly Puzzle is dated 1889, and The Gentleman who Vanished, 1890. From that point Mr. Hume's industry as a romancist has been prodigious. I find ascribed to him four stories in 1891, six in 1892, three in 1893, five in 1894, three in 1895, five in 1896, only one (!) in 1897, six in 1898, three in 1899, and seven in 1900—in all, forty-eight stories in twelve years, a yearly average of four. No doubt the tales vary in length; with very few am I personally acquainted. Meanwhile, it seems certain that if Mr. Hume ever has a bibliographer, that worthy will have some work to do.

When Mr. Hume's classical blank-verse play is produced—and such plays are apt to lie long in a manager's drawer—it will have, we may be sure, the effect of drawing attention anew to his labours as a producer of prose fiction. That is what has just happened to Mr. Charles Hannan, the author of the new play at the Court Theatre (an adaptation of Mr. Marion Crawford's A Cigarette-Maker's Romance). People are asking, "What has Mr. Hannan done before this?" and the reply has been that, in addition to writing a good many plays (some of them published in the Acting Editions of Mr. French and Mr. Lynn), Mr. Hannan has also put forth some novels and romances. The first of these was called A Swallow's Wing, and came out in 1888. Nine years later it was reproduced under the title of The Captive of Peking; or, A Swallow's Wing. That was in 1897, when much interest was being taken in this country in Chinese men and things. Mr. Hannan had himself, when only nineteen, paid a visit to Peking and the Great Wall, unaccompanied save by a Chinese guide. Mr. Hannan's remaining books comprise Chin-Chin-Wa (a volume of short stories, issued in 1896), The Wooing of Aris Grayle (1897), The Betrothal of James (1898), and Castle Oriol; or, the King's Secret (1898).

Messrs. Gowans & Gray announce as forthcoming The Complete Works of Charles Lamb in nine volumes (uniform, I suppose, with those of their Keats). But can they guarantee that the edition will include, in addition to all the essays and all the verses, all the available Correspondence? That, could it be got together, would be a boon indeed. We have, of course, the two delightful volumes edited by Canon Ainger, and I do not know that anything much better is to be expected, seeing that the latest edition includes, I believe, the letters to the Lloyds which Mr. E. V. Lucas recently unearthed. Still, Messrs. Gowans & Gray's editor may conceivably have some new matter "up his sleeve," for which devoted Lambites may be grateful. Sincerely glad am I that Mr. Hutchinson will adopt for the Letters the chronological arrangement which makes Mr. Ainger's volumes so valuable. Groups of letters should be anathema to all students of biography.

Meanwhile, I understand that Mr. E. V. Lucas is himself hard at work upon that complete edition of Lamb's prose and verse which was announced originally a year or two ago. He is, indeed, so far advanced with the enterprise that his first volume may be looked for in the spring of next year. In his case, as in Mr. Hutchinson's, the edition will be in nine volumes, but in a more sumptuous and substantial format than that of Messrs. Gowans & Gray's "Complete Library." Messrs. Methuen will be Mr. Lucas's publishers; and as regards Lamb's Correspondence, Mr. Lucas will consult all the available originals, so as to give us a wholly accurate text.

A certain number of editors received last week a copy of a story called The Ending of My Day, by "Rita." An accompanying note stated that the day of publication was February 18, "till when it is requested that any criticism may be withheld." It is to be hoped that the book has not fallen into the hands of very youthful reviewers, who, on the strength of this "request," might be tempted to regard the novel as new to the world. As a matter of fact, The Ending of My Day, now issued at half-a-crown, was brought out in 1895 at two shillings. Now, if every new edition of a book contained, by law, bibliographical details of its career, what a lot of blunders might be obviated!

Though Miss Bessie Hatton, always so interesting on the stage, is little seen there now, she appears to be still active with her pen. Her inherited gift as a story-teller was first made public in a two-volume novel called Enid Lyle, which appeared in 1894. In the following year came a book of fairy tales, entitled The Villages of Youth. Now we are promised a story named Her Master Passion. It is a little surprising that the young lady has not before now entered the ranks of the playwrights. Miss Florence Marryat, by the way, wrote a novel called The Master Passion.

The compiler of the daily "Birthday" quotations in the Daily Chronicle should make a point of verifying the extracts. The other morning, Johnson's "Survey mankind from China to Peru" was assigned to Goldsmith, whose sense of humour would in itself have prevented his writing so egregious a couplet as that of which the above line forms a part.

Mr. Frank Stockton's next volume is to be entitled A Bicycle of Cathay. This is a very happy adaptation of one of Tennyson's most sounding phrases.

Reviews.

In the House of My Friends.

Encyclopædia Biblica. Vol. II., E to K. Edited by the Rev. T. K. Cheyne and J. Sutherland Black. (Black. 20s. net.)

THE articles in this volume may with great propriety be divided into those which are inspired by the Higher Criticism, and those which are not. Falling under the last-named category are several learned and valuable articles, among which are conspicuous a careful and moderately written essay upon "Egypt" from the pen of Prof. W. Max Müller (Philadelphia); one, rather less satisfying, upon "Hittites," by Prof. Jastrow (Pennsylvania), wherein Jensen's theories are accepted, and perhaps rather too much prominence is attached to the Semitic or quasi-Semitic affinities of the race; and one on "Jerusalem," by Col. Conder, the late Robertson Smith, and Prof. G. A. Smith (Glasgow), combining in very readable and pleasant fashion the expert knowledge of the distinguished explorer with the historical information and critical insight of the learned commentators. Other articles, of less note but of much merit, in this division are: "The Family of Herod," by Mr. W. J. Woodhouse (St. Andrews), which possesses an almost topical interest at the present time; an excellent study on "Ecclesiasticus," by Prof. Toy (Harvard); and a well-condensed history of "Israel," by Prof. Guthe (Leipzig). We were in some doubt whether Prof. Charles's (Dublin) full and masterly article on "Eschatology" could properly be referred to under this head, but on reading it through again we are unable to discover any passages which could (in our view) justly offend the most conservative of critics. On the other hand, the short articles on "Essenes" and "Gnosis," by Prof. Jülicher (Marburg), seem to us distinguished neither by special information nor by grasp of subject. The maps and plans, to which a publisher's note draws our attention, may be mentioned in connexion with the articles already noticed as being clear, well executed, and, so far as we have been able to check them, accurate.

Turning now to those articles that we have before grouped together as dictated by the tenets of the Higher Criticism, we may say at the outset that we can take no exception to them on the ground of want of frankness. In our review of the first volume of the Encyclopædia (see ACADEMY for December 2, 1899) we drew attention to the assertions therein made as to the "unhistorical" nature of the Genesis creation-story, the profane and trivial origin of the Song of Solomon, the vileness of the character of David, and also to the doubts cast by Canon Cheyne's contributors upon the credibility of many of the facts recorded in the Book of Samuel, the Book of Chronicles, and even in the Gospels. Hence we did not expect to find the present volume tender towards those parts of the Bible that have hitherto borne the weight of the attacks of the opponents of inspiration. Nor were we disappointed. Ecclesiastes, says Prof. Davidson (Edinburgh), was probably written "in the latter part of the third century B.C.," when "the religious spirit of Israel is seen to be completely exhausted," and it is "able only to offer a few practical rules for ordinary life." The Book of Esther, says Prof. Nöldeke (Strasburg), was written "to encourage the observance of the feast of Purim among the Jews"; it is perfectly "unhistorical," and, under a thin disguise, shows two Babylonian deities (Marduk and Ishtar) conquering the Elamite god Hamman, and his consort Vashti. "The laws in Exodus xxxiv. 10-20" [God's name is jealous, &c.], says Prof. Moore (Andover, Mass.), "are the earliest attempt with which we are acquainted to embody . . . as Divine commands the essential observances of the religion of Yahwé. They were made at a Judean sanctuary . . . and represent the ancient usage of the region." Ezekiel, says Prof. Toy, "used the vision as a mere literary form" in most cases, and "doubt must be cast upon the psychological reality of the vision of dry bones." Some portions of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah, say Canon Cheyne and the late Prof. Koster (Leyden), "have great historical value; but the redactor's own contributions are largely inventions." So, the Book known as Habakkuk's could not possibly have been written by him; the "original historical Hosea" contained "no assurance of a final triumph of the Divine love, or of a penitent return of the nation"; while the "original story" of the legendary Job is to be found in the Babylonian tale of Eabani, the friend of the solar hero Gilgamesh, and the Book of Jonah is "an imaginative development of a thought suggested by Scripture." As for mere history, the author of the Book of Chronicles is accused by Robertson Smith and Canon Cheyne (art. "Elhanan") of deliberately altering the name of Goliath into that of an imaginary "Lahmi," his brother, in order to conceal the tradition that Elhanan and not David was the slayer of that giant; while of the conquest of Canaan it is said by Prof. Moore (art. "Book of Joshua") that "even the oldest account of the invasion cannot be accepted without question as embodying without question a sound historical tradition." Did any of the opponents of Christianity, from Voltaire to Ingersoll, ever go further?

This wholesale method of dealing with the Old Testament is, however, mild compared with the drastic way in which the Encyclopædists deal with the New, and particularly with those parts of it that narrate the life of the Founder. The article "Gospels," which is by far the longest in the volume, and may be taken as typical of the rest, is divided into two parts, of which the first, headed "Descriptive and Analytical," is assigned to Dr. E. A. Abbott. He thinks that Matthew's account of the Resurrection has been modified by later writers "so as to soften some of its improbabilities," and that "in course of time sceptics and enemies detected and exposed 'stumbling-blocks,' and subsequent Evangelists adopted traditions that sprang up to remove or diminish them." He further claims that the omission by the other Evangelists of the healing of Malchus' ear recorded by Luke is "almost fatal to its authenticity," and he explains it by a corruption of the text which transforms the replacing of the sword into a replacing of the ear. In like manner he thinks that many of the numerous miracles connected with the raising of the dead are to be explained as "very early exaggerations arising from misunderstood metaphor," "death" being sometimes used by patristic writers in the sense of mortal sin or death to God. The raising of the widow's son at Nain, however, he finds himself obliged to reject as "non-historical," and he asserts that the narrative of the raising of Lazarus was "mainly allegorical"; while he points out that the silence of the Synoptists on the point has "never been explained." But in all such points he is left behind by his colleague, Prof. Schmiedel (Zurich) to whom falls the remainder of the article under the rubric, "Historical and Synthetical." Prof. Schmiedel speaks with some contempt of those who "still think themselves entitled to accept as historically true everything written in the Gospels which cannot be shown by explicit testimony to be false," and describes their view as a "fallacy." He disclaims starting with "the postulate or axiom that miracles are impossible," but opines that "some doubts as to the accuracy of the narratives cannot fail to arise in the mind of even the stoutest believer in miracles," when he sees "how contradictory they are." Of these contradictions he gives a long list, and then claims that these facts "show only too clearly with what lack of concern for historical precision the Evangelists wrote." He thinks "the most credible statement in the Synoptics" as to the Resurrection is that "the first appearances were in Galilee," and that the statements that the risen Jesus was touched or that He ate are "seen to be incredible"; and he points out that St. Paul saw no difference between any of the post-resurrection appearances to others and that to himself on the road to Damascus, the inference being that all alike were "visions." By this and similar roads he is led to consider whether there are any "credible elements to be found in the Gospels at all," and he comes to the conclusion that there are five passages which are authentic. These five are the: "Why callest thou Me good? none is good save God only," of Mark; the statement that blasphemy against the Son of Man can be forgiven, in Matthew; those in Mark that the relations of Jesus held Him to be beside Himself, and that "of that day and that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels of God, neither the Son, but the Father"; and, finally, the cry from the Cross of "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" He defends himself against the charge that these passages have been sought out with partial intent as proofs of "the human as against the Divine character of Jesus," but asserts, notwithstanding, that they "prove not only that in the person of Jesus we have to do with a completely human being, and that the Divine is to be sought in Him only in the form in which it is capable of being found in a man; they also prove that He really did exist, and that the Gospels contain at least some absolutely trustworthy facts concerning Him."

Now it must be patent to everyone that the correctness or incorrectness of these very plainly-expressed views cannot be discussed in these columns. In some cases they are supported by arguments drawn from the comparison of certain texts. In others, the only authority that is adduced for them is the view of some (generally a German) critic. In yet others, they seem to be merely the personal opinions of the writer advancing them formed after a more or less long study of the Biblical writings. But the attempt to discuss any of these alleged proofs seriously would occupy an amount of space that is not at our disposal, and would be in form a review of the whole position taken up by the Higher Criticism. Yet it may be permitted to us to point out that if these views, or even any considerable part of them, ever come to be generally accepted, the doctrinal position of those reformed Churches which avowedly look to the Bible as at once their guide and their warrant will be practically at an end. Especially is this the case with the Church of England, who declares in her XXth Article that "although the Church be a witness and a keeper of Holy Writ, yet, as it ought not to decree anything against the same, so besides the same ought it not to enforce anything to be believed for necessity of Salvation." But if her method of "keeping" Holy Writ ever comes to be that of suggesting, with the Encyclopædia, that there is none but a shred of historical truth to be found in the canon, it is difficult to see how she can ever again arrogate to herself the right of "enforcing anything to be believed for necessity of salvation." The argument that this is a mere question of interpretation will not avail here, because the same Article in another place forbids her so to expound "one place of Scripture that it be repugnant to another." It is therefore with some astonishment that we notice that one of the editors of this Encyclopædia is not only Professor of the Interpretation of Holy Scripture at Oxford, but also Canon of Rochester, and that at least one other Church dignitary of high position has contributed to its columns. Undignified as the simile may be, the position of the man who sits on the branch of a tree while he saws it off next the trunk seems to exactly correspond to theirs.

With regard to other Churches existing for the propagation of Trinitarian Christianity the results of accepting the Encyclopædia's position, though not so easily defined, would be quite as serious, and, as far as we can see, they are now put to the election between rejecting the conclusions of the Higher Criticism altogether and effecting the most radical changes possible in the creeds they profess. If, as seems most likely to be the case, they choose the first-named horn of the dilemma—and this applies to the Church of England as well as to Nonconformist bodies—they will henceforth have to reckon with a flank attack, which, from the learning of the adversaries and the care with which they have prepared their ground, cannot but be very formidable. Looking at the whole situation, we are much mistaken if the publication of this volume does not prove to be the most serious blow yet struck at Protestant Christianity.

A Fine Old English Gentleman.

Lord Lilford, F.Z.S. By his Sister. (Smith, Elder. 10s.)

To outsiders Lord Lilford was known as the friend of wild creatures, a man who spoke with authority about them, and the author of a quiet, sensible, and beautifully illustrated book of birds. Only to comparatively few was it given to understand the pathetic circumstances under which so much kindly interest and activity was manifested: that he was a helpless cripple, who had to be lifted into and out of his bath-chair on a blanket, and wheeled hither and thither when he wished, as occurred daily, to go the round of his feathered pets and captives; and that he who had been a very Nimrod had his sport limited to a little fishing from a barge on his favourite Nene, that flows past Lilford Hall, the gray and time-mellowed residence of his family. His biography was, therefore, well worth writing, though his life was not distinguished by any great achievement. As the late Bishop of London reminds us in his Introduction, Lord Lilford was first of all an English gentleman, and it was one of his few weaknesses to believe that he ought to distinguish between his functions and those of an author. This is not an opinion held by many aristocrats; the majority would probably laugh at it, and quite rightly; but to state the fact is necessary to an understanding of the man. But for his reluctance to work for wages, it is probable that some more enduring monument would have been left behind. Not that we think under any circumstances he could have produced literature. A fine old English gentleman—to be that is something in itself, but it takes much more to be a great author, and Lord Lilford had no literary gift whatever; or, at any rate, not a trace is discernible either in his numerous letters or in the homely bits of verse wherewith he occasionally delighted his household. It is always the fact he is after, never the emotion it gives rise to, never the light of setting suns, the feeling and poetry of nature. We say this in no spirit of disparagement, but merely to get Lord Lilford into his right place, and to remove a painful impression that might be produced from what we cannot help regarding as an unfortunate sentence in the Introduction, drawing a line between "the functions of a gentleman and those of an author."

Lord Lilford knew that he himself was no more, scientifically or intellectually, than an observant amateur; morally he was a great deal more—a kindly and generous patron of those engaged in his favourite study, an encourager of art as far as the correct drawing of birds went, and an example of patience, courage, and hope under prolonged suffering. His taste for natural history seems to have been born with him, as at five we find him observing the brown owl go by. After school he spent many happy years visiting in various parts of the country, shooting and collecting. In the summer of 1856 he started on a yachting cruise in Southern Europe, visiting the Balearic Islands, Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily, Tunis, and the Ionian Islands. There are no adventures to chronicle, the serene, equable young man taking his enjoyment quietly, just as might have been expected from the tranquil invalid of later years. The chief incidents are set forth in a correspondence with his life-long friend, Prof. Newton, the first letter being dated 1852, and the last 1859. He tells how he found a great number of spotted crake near Barcelona, that he was the discoverer of chamois in the Acroceraunian Mountains, near Corfu, that he is seeking the eggs of the Lämmergeyer in Sardinia, and various items of similar import. Honestly, one does not find these letters very enthralling now, but they help to complete the picture of Lord Lilford, or Tom Powys, as he was then.

In 1859 he married the beautiful Miss Emma Brandling, of Low Gosforth, in Northumberland, with whom he led a happy life till her death in 1884—an event probably hastened by the loss of her eldest son. He succeeded to the title in 1861, and at the same time found himself in possession of a less desirable family inheritance in the shape of gout; and from henceforth he was not to enjoy a year of continuous good health. The only literary reminiscence of the book dates from this period. In the Isle of Wight, in 1860, Lord Lilford had smoked many pipes and engaged in much discussion with the late Poet Laureate, and in 1863 the two went together on a walking tour in the New Forest. It is rather pleasantly described:

I remember distinctly [he wrote to the present Lord Tennyson] that your father carried with him a little Homer and I a Don Quixote. I well remember, too, that he took a great interest in several of the rarer birds to which I called his attention—i.e., the buzzard, pied woodpecker, and black game. Besides the charm of his every-day conversation, he told me endless good stories; but what delighted me more than anything else was his ever ready sympathy with everyone and everything, not only nihil humanum . . . alienum, but every beast, bird, insect tree, and flower seemed to be full of interest for him as for me.

But Lord Lilford does not seem to have much cared for literary celebrities, or, at any rate, none beyond this figures in his biography. He had great aviaries built at Lilford Hall, and his correspondence was mostly with those who were conspicuous as ornithologists. He had taken up falconry as his amusement, and many letters are about his hawks. This period may be said to have lasted till 1885, when Lord Lilford—now, at the age of fifty-two, a confirmed invalid—married Clementina, eldest daughter of Mr. Ker Baillie Hamilton, who proved a tender nurse during the eleven years of pain allotted to him. His interests during this period could almost be guessed from a mere mention of his correspondents, among whom are Mr. G. E. Lodge and Mr. Thorburn, accomplished artists both of them in bird-drawing, Canon Tristram, with whom Lord Lilford had many common interests, Lord Walsingham, Dr. Drewitt, and Dr. Albert Günther, all of them very "birdie" men, and others of kindred tastes.

And so we pass on to the end, the story of the last few years being taken from his private diary, where we find him in true county gentleman style bemoaning—this was in 1893—the depression of agriculture, the coal strike, and the progress of socialism and anarchy—not a decade ago, and yet how like ancient history it reads! Almost in the midst of his rejoicing over the birth of a grandson, he was seized, in June 1896, with the illness of which he died. He counted his life no unhappy one, and the picture of it presented by his sister does not contradict his own version. It was not a life with much high emotion or stirring events in it, it was not a life of brilliant success or of pathetic failure, and, of course, these make the stuff of which interesting books are composed. We feel in some doubt about admitting this to that category. It is conscientiously but not very skilfully written—witness the fact that forty pages are taken up with quite unessential preliminaries before we come to the birth of Lord Lilford. Many letters are printed that we cannot imagine to have the slightest interest for the ordinary reader, whether he be ornithologically inclined or not. Otherwise the book is very well qualified to satisfy the curiosity of those who would like to know more about a good and kindly man, who was also a student of birds.

A New Play.

War: a Play in Three Acts. By William Heinemann. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

HERE is another result of the South African guerilla; for, although War is the second part of a trilogy of which the first, Summer Moths, was probably conceived long before the war began, we may be fairly sure that this second part owes its form to the accident of Mr. Kruger's regrettable obstinacy. War moves some Englishmen to howl for conscription; it has moved Mr. Heinemann to write a play. His drama passes on the south coast of England; it was necessary to the action that war should be brought to the very doors; and so the author has made the Dutch invade this inviolate isle out of sympathy with their Boer cousins. Captain George Vansittart (the sporting military ass of the piece) gets wounded by the Dutch, and Major Hitchcock (the base-born but intrinsically noble hero) clothes himself with glory by driving the Dutch into the sea and elsewhere. All this raises the question, How far may an author change history? We hold that he may change history to almost any extent, provided the history is old enough. If a dramatist chose to put Rameses XXXIX. upon the stage, he might safely ignore all cuneiform inscriptions, inventing his own facts, and no one would be a penny the worse. But when you are dealing with the history of last year the case is different. In Mr. Heinemann's first act the characters are reading the Times' account of the capture and abandonment of Spion Kop: factual realism, which imbues the reader with a sense of confidence, gives him, so to speak, a platform. Then, in the next breath, the successors of Van Tromp are on our beaches. Now the reader who knows about Spion Kop knows that the Dutch never dreamt of anything so perfectly fatuous as an invasion; and when he is asked to pretend to himself that they did, he simply can't. The illusion of reality is utterly lost, and the play fails of its effectiveness through an indiscretion of construction.

Although War has certain virtues of austerity and quietude, which are grateful enough to the reviewer, the author weakens further the illusion of reality (essential, of course, to a realistic play) by ignoring, one might say disdaining, naturalism of dialogue. After Major Hitchcock has asked the Hon. Lucy Vansittart for her hand and heart, the following scene occurs:

LADY FULLER: The young man had no opportunity of speaking to me on the subject. If he had done so, I should have found no difficulty in convincing him of the impossibility of such a step, and of the impropriety on his part of allowing the thought to cross his mind.

FRED: That isn't the idea he's gone away with, I can tell you. Uncle told him in so many words that if he killed enough Dutchmen, and didn't get himself killed, he would do all in his power to induce you to give him Lucy.

LADY FULLER [To LUCY]: Has he ever dared to speak to you so disrespectfully as to hint at what he would venture to call his affection for you?

LUCY: Major Hitchcock has convinced me that he is deeply attached to me, and he has honoured me by asking me to become his wife.

GEORGE: The brute!

LADY FULLER: I only hope you put him very unmistakably into his place.

LUCY: I did—I promised Major Hitchcock to be his wife.

FRED: Bravo, Lucy! Don't let them frighten you.

LUCY: And I have this very minute, since he left you, repeated my promise, and have sworn by all that is holy that no power on earth shall keep us apart.

It is quite conceivable that people might behave as these behave, but no one except members of "the" profession ever talked as these talked.

In the last act the Honourable Lucy goes forth alone to nurse the wounded, and comes home dead on a bier as the curtain falls. What the thesis of the play is we have not discovered, nor how Lucy's death is to be differentiated from a mere accident unconnected with the dramatic union of the piece. Some of the scenes are well written, and the opening of the third act is genuinely moving, and the play as a whole shows that the author is steeped in the best modern dramatic literature.

Modern Astronomy.

Modern Astronomy: being Some Account of the Revolution of the Last Quarter of a Century. By Herbert Hall Turner. (Constable. 6s.)

It will be news to most people that the science of the stars has undergone during the last twenty-five years any such change as is implied in the word revolution; but in these pages the Oxford Professor makes it good. He writes with the clearness of a mathematician and the warmth of an apostle, desirous, above all things, in the interest of the science he loves, to enlist labourers for his vineyard and winepress. For whereas a quarter of a century since it seemed as though as much had already been discovered as it was humanly possible to learn, it is felt at the present moment that the regular army of investigators is wholly inadequate to the task of coping with the mass of materials awaiting examination and co-ordination.

This comes principally of the improvements in photography, and particularly the invention of the dry plate, which makes possible an exposure of indefinite duration, so that the faintest spark may have time to register its presence; mounted with cunning clockwork, the camera-telescope can bear upon it night after night for weeks—nay, months. At Harvard Observatory the whole sky is photographed once a month, and, with a smaller instrument, capable of recording every star above the sixth magnitude, every fine night. It is impossible minutely to examine the thousands of plates taken. The planet Eros, for instance, which at this time is paying us a visit, though it cannot be seen except through a powerful telescope, was discovered in 1898.

Professor Pickering [of Harvard, to whom the Royal Astronomical Society has lately awarded its gold medal for his work on variable stars during the last year] turned over his vast store of photographs . . . and after a little trouble . . . he found it on several plates taken in 1894, and on others taken in 1896. . . . On one of them, especially, the planet is shown by a conspicuous trail. . . . It must be remembered that the existence of a trail on a plate, though it means a planet, does not always mean a new planet. There are more than four hundred already known, and it is necessary first to make sure that it is none of these—in itself a laborious piece of work.

The interest of the astronomic world is at present mainly fixed upon this speck: it is to furnish the best correction of the Sun's distance that may be expected for the next thirty years.

The wit of man, which in historic times may be reckoned a constant quantity, has in this science generally, by reasoning a priori, anticipated visual demonstration. Copernicus divined the Moon to be a satellite of the Earth, and people would not believe it, for such a thing as a satellite was unknown. Then Galileo looked through his optic tube at Jupiter and saw his satellites and, by analogy, the hypothesis was verified. Similarly Laplace conjectured that the stars with their planets had coalesced from nebulae, passing through the stage represented by Saturn and his ring; the camera was turned upon the nebula in Andromeda, and sure enough the rifts, which Trouvelot had drawn straight, were seen in the picture to be "slightly but sensibly curved." Already two planets have been formed, and others are seen in process of coalescing. But the reasoning of the scientist that anticipates the demonstration of the instrument is itself sometimes outstript by the imagination of the poet. The following lines were mercilessly excised by Tennyson from his "Palace of Art," on the ground that the poem was "too full." At the centre of the four quadrangles of the palace is a tower, and

Hither, when all the deep, unsounded skies,
Shuddered with silent stars, she clomb,
And as with optic glasses her keen eyes
Pierced through the mystic dome.

Regions of lucid matter taking forms,
Brushes of fire, hazy gleams,
Clusters and beds of worlds, and bee-like swarms
Of suns and starry streams.

She saw the snowy poles and moons of Mars,
That mystic field of drifted light
In mid Orion, and the married stars.

The significance of its weary canals as evidence of intelligent occupation of that much paragraphed planet, Mars, is discounted by a consideration of its position and the inadequacy of the means at our disposal for examining its surface.

To realise the value of our information, consider first how much farther away Mars is than the moon—about two hundred times at least, and generally much more. Now two hundred is about the magnifying power of a good telescope, that is to say, the magnifying power which can be used with advantage. It follows, then, that whatever a fair telescope enables us to see on Mars could be seen on the moon with the naked eye. . . . Hence let anyone look on the moon with the naked eye for traces of canals or other signs of life of any kind and he will begin to understand the caution that must be exercised in drawing conclusions, however attractive, as to the habitability of the planets. We want, in fact, an increase of our optical resources by a thousand times at least to get any satisfactory intelligence of this kind, whereas the advances of the last century would be represented by a factor not greater than ten. . . .

Prof. Turner manages happily to strike the mean between the pedantry of the specialist and the condescension of the popular lecturer.

A Genealogical Berserk.

Studies in Peerage and Family History. By J. H. Round. (Constable. 12s. 6d.)

It would be difficult to over-estimate the services that are being rendered by Mr. Round to the cause of scientific accuracy in historical research, whether in respect of the light he has himself thrown upon many obscure points in English history, or in respect of the wholesome dread wherewith he has inspired the less scrupulous or the more careless of the workers in that department of learning. Indeed, it may be said that in the latter connexion the fear of Mr. Round is the beginning of wisdom. In this volume the author appears in his dual capacity of student and critic. Some of the articles, of which that on "Henry VIII. and the Peers" is perhaps the most valuable, are pacific but highly important contributions to historical knowledge, others are unsparing exposures of the methods of the "Peerage-makers" and of the officials of the College of Arms. The latter hapless functionaries are smitten hip and thigh, while still reeling from the effects of the castigation they recently received in the Contemporary Review at the hands of Mr. Hutton. The polemical chapters form the bulk of the work, and naturally it is here that, as usual, Mr. Round is, in more than one sense, most striking. In them he deals with such cases as the baseless claim of the modern Earls of Warwick to connexion with the house of the king-maker, the fabulous Norman origin of the titled families of Stourton, Annesley, Carrington, and Russell, and the fictitious pedigrees of Spencer and Mountmorres. In touching upon one great and increasing peril of our times Mr. Round rises far above these merely vulgar and comparatively trifling abuses to utter an eloquent warning as to the results that must follow the persistent prostitution of dignities in the sale of titles that accompanies the political wire-pulling of the day. After reminding us that "in England a simple country gentleman can still look down in calm disdain, from the heights of immemorial noblesse, on the scramble for the newest of peerage dignities or for those baronetcies which are fast becoming the peculiar perquisite of the nouveau riche," he writes:

That the highest honours which the Crown has it in its power to bestow should at all times be granted with jealous care, if their value and their dignity are to be maintained, is a self-evident proposition; but the point that is apt to be overlooked, the now growing danger, is the risk that "the trail of finance" should sully the honour of the Peerage, should hasten the ever-increasing tendency to substitute a plutocratic for an aristocratic class. That this country has been saved from much that is, beyond dispute, deplorable in the public life of the United States is, it may be confidently and boldly asserted, due to the existence of a social standard other than that of mere wealth. This is a matter not of prejudice, but of observation and of fact. The social standard of this country may, like others, have its faults, but it has at least saved us thus far from making the accumulation of wealth, however acquired, the sole national ideal. . . . It is, and always has been, easy to sneer at the claims of birth; but, if English political and social life is not to be degraded to the level reached in the United States, if great abilities are still to be attracted to the service of the public and the State rather than to that of mammon, there is absolutely no means by which this can be effected other than that of maintaining barriers which wealth alone cannot overleap, of rewarding service by distinctions which money cannot buy, of upholding a social standard based on something else than the dollars a man has acquired by fair means or foul.

It is, however, the aggressive and larger portion of the book which to many persons will doubtless prove the most entertaining. This is one long revel of bloodthirst and slaughter. The field of controversy is heaped with the carcasses of expiring pedigree-mongers and butchered heralds; and here we leave our genealogical berserk, doubtless supremely happy, up to the neck in crure et visceribus victimarum.

Nineteenth Centuryana.

The Romance of a Hundred Years. By Alfred Kingston. (Stock. 4s. 6d.)

A book of this kind, well done, is always interesting. The chief factors of success are wide reading, tactful arrangement of the results of that reading, and a thread of amiable comment. Mr. Kingston has brought these to his task of displaying what we now regard as the more curious and romantic features of the nineteenth century. Dr. Alfred Russell Wallace has named thirteen triumphs of science and invention as glories of that century; they are: railways, steam navigation, the telegraph, the telephone, friction matches, gas, the electric light, photography, the phonograph, the Röntgen rays, the spectrum analysis, anaesthetics, and antiseptics. A wonderful list. Many, if not all of these discoveries, are dealt with entertainingly by Mr. Kingston; whose book, however, takes a wider range and contains chapters on "The Romance of Invasion," "The Romance of Old Country Life," "The Romance of Education," &c. Virtually these 200 pages form an historical museum, in which the quaint and the curious are given the prominence which the general reader has a right to demand. Perhaps nothing in the book is better than Mr. Kingston's account of the terror and the fever of preparation into which the country was thrown by the fear of an invasion by Napoleon. We fancy that not one reader in a thousand will escape a feeling of astonishment at the particulars of what was done to organise defensive forces in remote country villages. The most exact preparations were made for sending non-combatants and farm stock inland at the first alarm, men being told off to conduct waggons, to drive cattle and sheep, and to cut down trees for the obstruction of roads against the French troops. The number of waggons and horses and the precise amount of foodstuff in each district were scheduled and known to the Government. And of nights, round the tavern fire, the yokels sang songs which, compared to the music-hall songs of last year, were as wine unto water, if we may judge them by a chorus so stirring and direct as this:

Shall Frenchmen rule o'er us? King Edward said No!
And No said King Harry, and Queen Bess she said No!
And No said old England, and No she says still!
They will never rule o'er us, let them try if they will!

The miscellaneous character of Mr. Kingston's pages is seen in the fact that, under the heading "The Romance of Old Country Life," he permits himself to write about parish constables, the hair-powder tax, the speed of eighteenth-century coaches and goods waggons, and London sedan chairs, not to mention life-histories of a famous highwayman and an infamous body-snatcher. In his last chapter, "Then and Now," Mr. Kingston indulges in some easy and striking contrasts. The inhuman severity of the law was such that it overshot itself. Mercy crept in at every chink. This is well illustrated by the story of the Old Bailey judge, who, in passing sentence of death on a woman for some trivial offence, sought to stop her screams of terror by remarking, as he looked round the Court: "Will no one tell the poor woman that she will not be hanged?"

Mr. Kingston's style might be more finished. To begin a paragraph, "Here is how the romance of revolution began in the Fens," is casual and inelegant; and he often quotes words of such little originality that he might well appropriate or improve on them. But he is to be thanked for an entertaining book that is well worth a perusal and a niche.

Other New Books.

THE PAINTERS OF FLORENCE.

BY JULIA CARTWRIGHT (MRS. ADY).

Trecento—Quattrocento—Cinquecento. There is magic still in the slow evolution, through three centuries of Florentine life, of the world's second great artistic period. The tale begins with the birth of Cimabue in 1240, and it ends with the death of Michelangelo in 1564. Florentine art has not been neglected during recent years. The impetus given by the studies of Ruskin and the new methods of Morelli has started a flood of literature—enlightened, if not always patient in its critical spirit—in almost every European country. But there is room—at any rate, from the point of view of the general reader—for just such a book as Mrs. Ady has written. Her series of biographical sketches (twenty-seven in number), while evidently based on a careful survey of recent research, is written in a pleasant and popular manner, and without the absorption in technique and dread of "literature" which the more high-flown critic is apt to display. It is a valuable supplement to the Lives of Vasari, whose atmosphere of the Italian studio and personal knowledge of those of whom he writes makes him the one essential guide to even the merest dabbler in the subject. Nevertheless, it is not to be denied that Vasari had no pedantic regard for accuracy; and, although his reputation in this respect, like that of Herodotus, whom some have called the "father of lies," does not at this moment look quite so black as it once did, still there are points enough in which the industrious archivist, and even the Morellian measurer of ears, have been able to correct him. Without any disrespect to one who must always rank with Plutarch and with Walton among the few biographers of genius, Mrs. Ady has incorporated these necessary corrections, and has also utilised the skill of the modern photographer in the provision of seventeen charming and typical illustrations. How many lovers of London know where to find the magnificent cartoon of Lionardo da Vinci, from which the beautiful head of her frontispiece is taken? (Murray. 5s. net.)

THE STORY OF ROME.

BY NORWOOD YOUNG.

To write at once briefly and adequately of Rome is an impossibility; for the story of Rome is the epitome of half a dozen civilisations, whose relics are huddled in strange promiscuity upon those seven hills that are not hills. The early and later Empire, the Christianity of the Catacombs, the triumphant Christianity of Gregory the Great, the struggle between Pope and Emperor, Guelph and Ghibelline, the artistic glories and moral chaos of the Renaissance: each by itself requires its volumes of exposition. As if this were not enough, the archaeologists are beginning to disinter the traces of an earlier Rome still, the pastoral city of the Latin League. Nor, as Mr. Young points out, has one any right to forget that Rome is, after all, not a mere museum for the curious of Europe, but has, since 1870 at least, its own ardent civic life, with its aspirations and disappointments. He is rather amusing on the Forum, known until recently as the Campo Vaccino, in which "were always to be found picturesque peasants with their cattle, and the attendant circle of artists in ecstasies." It is now a battle ground for warring interests:

The archaeologist has converted this beautiful spot into a huge pit, covered with pieces of stone and mounds of earth. He excuses himself by informing us that he has exposed the cradle of modern civilisation, and opened a new chapter in history. While artist and archaeologist are disputing, the municipality brushes them both aside. It brings from the Via Cavour a line of tram rails, and carries them right across both Campo Vaccino and Forum Romanum. The artist flies in horror to the Palatine, while the archaeologist bends his energies to the task of getting the whole area declared an archaeological preserve.

Mr. Young's own view of the situation is clear enough. The history of Rome has been a unique record of revolutionary struggles for independence. And now that Rome at last is free, the echo of the long conflict is still heard in the growls of foreign artists, who would deny to the citizens the right to make their home a pleasant and healthy place in which to earn their livelihood.

It will be gathered that Mr. Young approaches his subject rather from the side of politics and history than from that of æsthetics. He gives us a careful study of the place of Rome in civilisation rather than the kind of inspired guide-book which has been the ideal of previous contributors to the "Mediaeval Towns" series. The personality of Rome, its air and bearing amongst the great cities, hardly emerge. But every man has a right to his own point of view, and Mr. Young has brought much pains and erudition to his difficult task. After all, the story of Rome might be told in as many ways as the story of Pompilia. (Dent. 4s. 6d.)

DOMESDAY AND FEUDAL STATISTICS.

BY A. H. INMAN.

There is something in the study of "Scutage," "Carucates," "Subinfeudation," "Sokemen," and the like, which infallibly tends to sharpen the edge of polemic. Mr. Inman's controversies are conducted in the best manner of Mr. J. H. Round, and one can hardly say more. Prof. York Powell is thoroughly able to take care of himself, so we venture to point out that, according to Mr. Inman, the "profundity of the erudite mind" is best discovered in his statement that a "plow" making a furrow of eleven inches broad can traverse a perch in four or four and a-half rounds. Mr. Inman's own view is that a "plough" does it in nine rounds, and he adds:

It is to be hoped that the promoters of the Agricultural Education Extension System from our fountains of learning may commence at home by giving those pioneers who are to enlighten the supposed darkness of the rural mind such an elementary knowledge of arithmetic as to place them on somewhat more even terms with the average carucarius in matters of simple addition, division, &c.

This is, to say the least of it, acerb. But though we can criticise Mr. Inman's temper, and could, if needs were, his punctuation, the extremely technical matter with which he deals is beyond us. His tables and discussions are evidently the fruit of most laborious investigations, and we do not doubt that they will be of the highest interest and value to Prof. Maitland and the few other experts in Domesday and feudal economics who are competent to appreciate them. (Eliot Stock.)

CHINA.

BY E. H. PARKER.

The full title of this book is China: her History, Diplomacy, and Commerce, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day, and the greater part of the book has, says Mr. Parker, been compiled from Chinese records, and its contents based on a personal acquaintance with China. The recent events in the Celestial Empire have caused a multiplicity of books to be written, some of them by persons who have never seen the country; but all of them have had to be read. The present volume stands by itself: it is written in a conversational style, and with considerable force, and contains a quantity of information that is not to be found elsewhere. Moreover, it differs from other volumes in that it contains eighteen maps of China and its neighbours, has a full table of contents, a sufficient index, and very little writing for the sake of making words. Mr. Parker sketches the geography, history, early trade notions and trade routes of China, and has chapters on the arrival of Europeans in the country, the government, the population, the revenue, the army, religion, personal characteristics, the calendar, and so on. From this it will be seen that the book is comprehensive; and as Mr. Parker has his own way of looking at things, and has drawn freely upon native works, he is always worth reading. There is no one book on China which covers the whole subject; each volume needs to be read in conjunction with half a dozen others or a very one-sided idea of the Celestial Empire would be the result. Mr. Parker's book fills up many gaps left by those who have preceded him on the subject; he is, as it were, the mortar which will bind the stones laid by other writers. His qualification is the fact that he was formerly H.M. Consul at Kiungchow, and adviser on Chinese affairs to the Burma Government, and his knowledge of his subject is apparent on every page. (Murray. 8s. net.)

MRS. GASKELL AND KNUTSFORD.

BY REV. G. A. PAYNE.

Knutsford has been identified by some critics with the Cranford of the book of that name, and with Hollingford in Wives and Daughters. Mr. Payne dislikes this theory, but the connexion between the town of Mrs. Gaskell has prompted him to record its characteristics, and to examine the suggested parallels between it and the towns of his stories. He has made a pleasant little book, with an excellent portrait of Mrs. Gaskell as frontispiece. We do not agree with him in brushing aside Cranford's indebtedness to Knutsford so firmly, but the matter is one on which opinions may very amicably differ. (Gay & Bird.)

GLIMPSES OF ENGLISH HISTORY.

BY F. M. ALLEN.

This book of intentional, resolute funniness has depressed us wofully. Probably small schoolboys will enjoy it to the full, but for us the humour of calling Alfred the Great "Young Alf" (as if he were a Hooligan!) is no longer operative. Nor do we find it amusing to read that William Rufus was called Carrots, Blazes, Ginger, and Danger Signal. The comic ballad of William the Conqueror is by far the best thing in the book, and it is a pity that Mr. Allen did not rhyme it all. Mr. J. F. Sullivan's drawings have grotesque appropriateness. (Downey.)

Mr. Murray's new issue of George Borrow's works now includes The Zincali: An Account of the Gypsies in Spain, his first book. The prefaces to the first and second editions are included. The second was written in 1843, when, encouraged by his success, he had written and published The Bible in Spain. His racy account of the reception of that book is worth quoting:

The world, both learned and unlearned, was delighted with The Bible in Spain, and the highest authority [Quarterly Review, December, 1842] said, "This is a much better book than the Gypsies; and the next great authority [Edinburgh Review, February, 1843] said: "Something betwixt Le Sag- and Bunyan." "A far more entertaining work than Don Quixote," exclaimed a literary lady. "Another Gil Blas," said the cleverest writer in Europe [Examiner, December 17, 1842]. "Yes," exclaimed the cool, sensible Spectator, "a Gil Blas in water colours."

Messrs. Macmillan's abridgment of The Life of Edward White Benson is admirable in size, and equal to the larger work in get-up. Prof. Silvanus P. Thompson's life of Michael Faraday is re-issued by Cassell as the first volume in a cheaper issue of their "Century Science" series—the volumes of which are now priced at 2s. 6d. instead of 5s. The selection of this book as pioneer was wise, for it is a most sympathetic narrative.

In Heroines of the Bible in Art (Nutt, 3s. 6d. net) we have a somewhat "made" subject, but the author, Miss Clara Erskine Clement, brings to her task a genuine love of her work and much insight. The book is very pleasantly illustrated from Rubens, Murillo, Veronese, Raphael, Botticelli, and other masters, and it takes its place in the "Art Lovers'" series.

Madame Hoskier was one of the victims of the terrible fire at the Bazar de la Charité on May 4, 1897. A pious woman and a good mother, she had written her prayers and thoughts for her own and her children's comfort. These have been published, and Miss Constance White has made an English translation under the title of Thoughts, Memories, and Meditations of Madame Hoskier (Skeffington). The book may be described as the spiritual history of a woman to whom the joys and consolations of religion were real.

Lancashire Humour (Dent) is a collection of racy dialect anecdotes, with a pleasant critical commentary, by Thomas Newbigging. Here is a story which rather coarsely illustrates the heckling propensities of Lancashire electors. A Socialist candidate denounced the cost of keeping up royalty, and amongst other items enumerated the quantities of oats, beans, hay, and other fodder consumed every week by the royal horses, pointing out, of course, how many poor families might be maintained with the money. When questions were invited an old farmer rose and said:

Maister Chairman, Aw have been very much interested wi' the speech o' th' candidate, and moor especially wi' that part on't where he tow'd us abeaut th' royal horses, an' th' greyt quantity ov oats, beans and hay ut they aiten every week, an' th' heavy taxes we have to pay for th' uphewd o' those. But there's one thing, Maister Chairman ut he has missed out o' his speech, an' Aw wish to put a question. Aw wud like if th' candidate wud now tell us heaw much they gettin every week for th' horse mook!

It is still uncertain whether the question was put in irony or simplicity. There are good and feeble stories in Mr. Newbigging's book, but the Lancashire flavour is strong everywhere.

Fiction.

The Sacred Fount. By Henry James.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

HAD anyone but Mr. James written this book, his admirers might well have cried: "Oh, 'tis sacrilege." But since Mr. James himself is the author, what can we say but that he has, in his own brilliantly tedious way, with his own inimitable art, and with his own occult knowledge of what the lifting of an eyebrow or the movement of a back may mean—succeeded triumphantly in an elaborate satire on himself—that is, on his own obsession? Everybody knows what Mr. James's obsession is, and, after achieving the last page of this volume, it is evident to us that Mr. James also knows. With him, as with the character without a name who tells the story, the vision of life is an obsession. To him, for real excitement, "there are no such adventures as the intellectual ones"; in every word or action of his fellow-creatures he perceives motives that, like the lines on a railway siding, have no beginning and no end. Mr. James has never carried his analysis of the daintily unimportant further than in The Sacred Fount, and never before, to our knowledge, has he, after incredible labour with bricks of gossamer and mortar of sunbeams, blown down the dainty edifice with such a good-humoured series of puffs. The last page brings a vision of Mr. Henry James stepping forward, and saying with a profound obeisance: "You perceive how prodigiously I know myself."

The Sacred Fount, we may say without more ado, is youth. The theme of the book is the hypothesis that youth has the power to rejuvenate and vivify age, but at the cost of the oozing away of the sap of youth from itself. But Mr. James is not a believer in his own theory; or only to a certain extent. He turns tail, he allows his speculations to be derided, and the end is more smoke than fire; or perhaps it would be fairer to say that he uses his hypothesis merely as a means of showing to what prodigious lengths the analytical mind can go. It is as if the Princess in the fairy tale, from the suggestion of the presence of the pea beneath her mattress, had created a market garden of flowering shrubs. The pea represents the cell from which Mr. James, as master nurseryman, has produced his garden of exotics. A day and an evening cover the period of the story, which passes at Newmarch, a country house of "liberal ease" and delightful appurtenances. There a few choice guests are gathered. Among them is the narrator, with his passion for embroidering "on things" and his genius for seeing a hundred complex reasons behind a cursory remark or a chance movement. "The way you get hold of things," says Mrs. Brissenden (sometimes she is called Mrs. Briss), "is positively uncanny." It is. Here is an example of just how much the nameless narrator (we must restrain ourselves from the temptation of identifying him with Mr. James) sees in a glance:

Something further had befallen me. Poor Briss had met my eyes just previous to my flight, and it was then I satisfied myself of what had happened to him at the house. He had met his wife; she had in some way dealt with him; he had been with her, however briefly, alone; and the intimacy of their union had been afresh impressed upon him.

We have not space to quote the many things this Röntgen-ray-eyed guest saw in Mrs. Brissenden's back, but we can assure the reader that a page of the book does not cover them. His awakening is due to Mrs. Brissenden. She patiently refuses to play the part of a pretty fly, refuses to walk into the parlour to put a pretty coping-stone to his palace of gossamer. Instead she fires her bright artillery at him, and the concussion shakes down the palace of gossamer. He has been elaborating his theories at infinite length, and her comments are: "How can I tell, please, what you consider you're talking about?" . . . "You see too much." . . . "You talk too much." . . . "You over-estimate the penetration of others. . . ."

"You're carried away—you're abused by a fine fancy: so that, with your art of putting things, one doesn't know where one is—nor, if you'll allow me to say so, do I quite think you always do. Of course I don't deny you're awfully clever. But you build up—you build up houses of cards."

Are we extravagant in suggesting that this is Mr. Henry James, in a grimly humorous mood, turning his analytical mind on himself.

The skill of the story is enormous; the triumph of its artistic presentment is indisputable: only Mr. James could have written it. So much we grant willingly; but since an author's power of being able to interest his reader in his story, as story, must depend on the temperament and predilection of the reader, we will give our personal verdict by slightly modifying one of Mr. James's own locations. The narrator, in the pause that follows some remarks he has made to Mrs. Brissenden, thus soliloquises: Oh, how intensely she didn't like such a tone! If she hadn't looked so handsome, I would say she made a wry face over it." We would say—the transposition is slight: Oh, how intensely we didn't like having to read our way to the very end of The Sacred Fount! If Mr. James hadn't so handsomely put into it all his delicate talent, and thus illumined the tediousness of the story, we should not only have made a wry face, but yawned ourselves away to the company of—well, of John Silver or Captain Kettle.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

STREET DUST.

BY OUIDA.

Five short stories, not by the Ouida who captivated us in youth, but by the Ouida of later days, with her protest against oppression, and her sympathy for the poor. The first story, "Street Dust," is sheer misery, and not over pleasant with its reference to the "torpid flies . . . gathering together in black dots upon her as the day advanced." It was the mother's body. The children die on the last page. Some of the stories have an Italian setting, and all are not so painful as "Street Dust." (F. V. White. 6s.)

ANNE MAINWARING.

BY LADY RIDLEY.

Anne Mainwaring would be a suitable reply to that oft-repeated question: "Now tell me the name of a nice, interesting, new novel?" It is modern, it moves in polite circles (portraits of ancestors, Ascot, &c.), and it is all about Anne: her struggles, her lovers, and her friendship for another woman. When we say that whereas the other Mainwarings were fair, Anne was dark, and also clever and odd, and a thorn in her pretty, selfish mother's side, we have said enough to show that Anne's life will interest the novel reader. It is so easy to believe oneself to be another Anne. (Longmans. 6s.)

TREWERN.

BY R. M. THOMAS.

A story of Welsh life, narrated in the first person, by a new author. The period is seventy years ago, and the story tells how a young Welsh squire, sportsman and recluse, fell under the influence of John Gwyn, the Radical. Country life, sport, and politics come into the tale, which is soberly and carefully written. The narrator's "active interest in politics died, as it began, with John Gwyn." (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

MAX THORNTON.

BY ERNEST GLANVILLE.

Max was Colonel Thornton's (Thornton's Horse) younger son, and when the Colonel went to the front with his other son he ordered Max, he being a youngster, home to look after his mother and sisters. But the tug missed the steamer and put back to Durban. Then Max had his chance. He went through some of the South African campaign after all, and was of service to his country and his father. A vigorous, well-written story of the war, dealing with a side of the fighting that may be called unhackneyed. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

THE GOLDEN WANG-HO.

BY FERGUS HUME.

The author of The Mystery of a Hansom Cab rightly calls this a sensational story. When, after many happenings, Eli opened the box he found a series of golden images exactly like the one in his pocket. "There were twenty-four, and the golden Wang-Ho made the twenty-fifth." But the operation killed Eli. "One great quiver shook his frame. Then with a stifled cry he reeled and fell." Mr. Hume is no niggard with his murders. In Chapter III. it is Leonard "dead—dead—murdered"; in Chapter X. it is General Burnley "robbed and murdered," and so on. (John Long. 6s.)

THE BLACK TORTOISE.

BY F. VILLER.

A brisk, sensational tale, "being the strange story of old Frick's diamond." It is told to a friend by Monk, a private detective, who adopted the profession "out of love"—strange being. The friend who has obligingly written Monk's story out regrets that he has not been able to give it in Monk's "own clear language and striking words." (Heinemann.)

THE MASTER SINNER.

BY A WELL-KNOWN AUTHOR.

This small book, which is intended to make the flesh creep, consists mainly of a series of letters written from Hell by a deceased crony of one Anthony Grigg, who lived in a tumble-down garret in the neighbourhood of Drury-lane. We doubt if the reader will share Anthony's horror, or feel anything more than mild amusement at the announcement which rounds off the volume, "Then he [the Pope, if you please] paused and mused, ultimately stretching forth his thin right hand. 'Nevertheless,' said he, 'I decree that the reprint of these letters shall be placed upon the Index.'" (John Long.)

A SOLDIER FOR A DAY.

BY EMILY SPENDER.

A story of the Italian War of Independence, with this motto on the title-page: "Italy, our mother, who promises us one only joy—but that suffices us—the lofty joy of having loved and served her." It begins thus: "Venice, in a summer twilight, one can compare only to the visionary city of the Apocalypse, and can describe only in similar metaphors of precious gems." (White. 6s.)

We have also received: May Silver, by Alan St. Aubyn. "May Silver was nineteen. She was pretty enough to have been the belle of one season, and she was engaged to be married." (White, 6s.) His Lordship's Whim, by G. C. Whadcoat. It is accompanied by a note from his publisher, Mr. Effingham Wilson, who begs "respectfully to remind the reviewer that he was the first publisher of Tennyson and Browning, but that the accompanying novel is the first he has published for about twenty-five years, having devoted himself almost exclusively during that period to the publication of works for business men." We have also received another reprint of Eben Holden, published this time by Mr. Fisher Unwin, and marked "authorised edition."

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)..... 17/6

.. Quarterly 5/0

.. Price for one issue /5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Concerning Biography.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN have added to their excellent "Library of English Classics" a volume containing Izaak Walton's Complete Angler and his Lives. The Lives fill 317 pages out of the 497 composing the volume, and it is of these biographical classics that we have a word to say. The Lives, as everyone knows, but may not remember, are those of Dr. Donne, Sir Henry Wotton, Richard Hooker, George Herbert, and Dr. Sanderson. The language has nothing better in their kind. Their grace and wisdom of portraiture, their modest touches of personal remembrance, and their angelic wit are but part of their charm, which one may liken to a sweet smell caught from old college gardens and old books, bringing to memory the clean and decent and holy things of old England. They must be well satisfied with their own age, and with the actions and motives of its leaders, who do not dwell with wonder and profit on these strong, quiet, consistent lives. But our concern here is more local and literary. When we consider what is accomplished in these 317 pages, we are once more out of love with latter-day biography. Five men are portrayed to their contemporaries with grace and fidelity in this small compass, and their portraits are undying literature. Five men of equal note in this age would be made the subjects of five biographies, each as big as the whole of the volume before us, and these books would be neglected in five years' time. A proposition, this, not a statement; but, as a proposition, is it not justified by what we know and have seen? That biography has become artless, cumbrous, and indiscreet is the experience of those who have to do with it as critics or critical readers. It is a thousand pities.

Whatever be the cause of this decline, it is not indifference on the part of readers to the pleasures of curiosity. There was never an age in which men were more interested in their neighbours, or more addicted, in speech and print, to personal gossip. A dozen or more weekly publications live and thrive on their mission of disseminating news of the daily sayings and doings of interesting people and groups of people. Biography, in short, is found to be so very entertaining that it has been compressed from a noble food that was wont to be served on state occasions, into a sauce piquante for the flavouring of every-day life. True, formal and complete biographies are written in numbers. But under what usual conditions? Would any experienced publisher care to deny that, next to fiction, biography is the most commercialised branch of literature? There is something of the serenity of the undertaker in the promptitude with which biographies are arranged for in these days. The mere promptitude, to be sure, is nothing; call it a virtue. But one knows so well what to expect. The market has to be caught, and this means haste. It means, also, a general vulgarity of design, a commonness of atmosphere, an all-welcoming hospitality to trivial matter, and a dozen other things that make for success at Mudie's, and nothing thereafter. We have seen it often; and sometimes one feels very hotly the way in which choice lives are bundled into print, read, found to be turbid, and forgotten. Take an instance of this skurry. If ever there was a man who deserved a short and perfectly-written biography, such as could be treasured for the facts it preserved and for the grace of its style and feeling, that man was Charles Samuel Keene, the Punch artist. A more quaint, lovable, and retiring man of genius did not live in the nineteenth century. It was most desirable that any record of his life should be, like himself, choice, modest, and savoursome. But what happened? Keene died on January 4, 1891. A biography was felt to be a want of the market; and within one year, or perhaps it was eighteen months, a volume weighing 3½ lbs. avoirdupois was written, delivered, and Mudied. The whole thing had been placed in the hands of a gentleman who would be (justly) called a "practised literary man," and this practised literary man had done his level best for Keene's memory, and for the wishes and personal vanities of Keene's friends and correspondents. The result, in our judgment, was a sad failure. The mere size and weight of the book could not be associated with Keene. No single clear impression was conveyed, for the book was virtually written by many hands, and it reproduced and repeated many casually written impressions. The effect was that of the arrival of a handsome block of marble, entirely covered with Keene's epitaph, but effectually concealing Keene. Nor did the practised literary man improve his case when, in a final chapter, called "Last Words," he confessed that he had never set eyes upon Keene in his life, and proceeded to argue with more ingenuity than force that the stranger-biographer has advantages over the friend-biographer. An apologetic allusion to "the space of time at my disposal" completed the reader's desolation. Keene's case is serious enough to be raised, even at this date, with some earnestness. Is it still too late for a skilled and sympathetic writer to give us a small book in which Keene, the man and artist, will live in modest breathing pages, in a harbourage of choice reading and unfading smiles? For in his way and degree the man was a humane genius not less surely than Shakespeare.

But Keene's misfortune is that of many a good man who has died in these latter years. The truth is, that of the biographies published, nearly all are written too soon, many ought not to be written at all, and the majority of the remainder could be of value only if they were half as long and twice as well done. Izaak Walton did not produce his masterly portraits in any "space of time at my disposal." In the cases of Dr. Donne and Sir Henry Wotton he found himself a biographer rather by accident than design, and then he lay quiet for twenty years before he was prevailed upon by Bishop Gilbert to write the life of Hooker. Four years later he wrote his George Herbert, which was more of a "free-will offering" than any of the other lives; and lastly, after another eight years, he wrote the life of Bishop Sanderson. The five short lives were spread over a period of forty-eight years, and into them Walton breathed his best. Their brevity and perfection lend a rare cogency to his plea for more biography. "Who would not be content to have the like account of Dr. Field, that great schoolman, and others of noted learning?" he asks, when his own pen has spent its force. And who, nowadays, would not be glad if biographies were many and small and good? It is the insatiate curiosity of the age which will neither wait patiently nor taste nicely, it is, in a word, the journalising of a literary art, that is the cause of the blight.

Meanwhile it is consoling to know that good models of Plutarch's art are not scarce in a well-stocked library. As for Plutarch, he is the model of models, and no one reads him half enough. You have only to open his Lives to alight on brevity within brevity, on parts so characteristic that they seem to anticipate the work of the whole. Take the familiar story of Antony's follies at Alexandria. "He was fishing one day with Cleopatra, and had ill-success, which, in the presence of his mistress, he looked upon as a disgrace; he, therefore, ordered one of his assistants to dive and put on the hook such as he had taken before. This scheme he put in practice three or four times, and Cleopatra perceived it. She affected, however, to be surprised at his success; expressed her wonder to the people about her; and, the day following, invited them to see fresh proofs of it. When the day following came, the vessel was crowded with people; and as soon as Antony had let down his line she ordered one of her divers immediately to put a salt fish on the hook. When Antony found he had caught his fish, he drew up his line; and this, as may be supposed, occasioned no small mirth amongst the spectators. 'Go General!' said Cleopatra, 'leave fishing to us petty princes of Pharos and Canopus; your game is cities, kingdoms, and provinces.'" From Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets the biographer may learn the dignity of his art, and the enduring value of a reverent and sagacious handling of delicate subjects: as for instance where, in discussing Dryden's suspiciously timely conversion to Roman Catholicism, he puts the matter by: "It is natural to hope that a comprehensive is likewise an elevated soul, and that whoever is wise is also honest. I am willing to believe that Dryden, having employed his mind, active as it was, upon different studies, and filled it, capacious as it was, with other materials, came unprovided to the controversy, and wanted rather skill to discover the right than virtue to maintain it. But inquiries into the heart are not for man; we must now leave him to his Judge."

The biography of a father by a son finds an exquisite model in the life of the poet Crabbe, where the relationship is pure gain, all the loyalties to the subject and the reader being kept. What an instinct for biography and what a delicate freedom do we not find in this mention of a chance meeting between father and son after two years' separation: "Calling, one day, at Mr. Hatchard's in Piccadilly, the bookseller said 'Look round,' and pointed to his inner room; and there stood my father, reading intently, as his manner was—with his knees somewhat bent, insensible to all around him. How homelike was the sight of that venerable white head among a world of strangers!"

The student of miniature biography will not neglect Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age, though he will feel more certain of the writer's penetration than of his charity. The essay on Cobbett is as good as any; Hazlitt sticks to him until he can wring from him not another characteristic. Of his powers in controversy he says: "He throws his head into his adversary's stomach, and takes away from him all inclination for the fight; hits fair or foul; strikes at everything; and as you come up to his aid, or stand ready to pursue his advantage, trips up your heels or lays you sprawling, and pummels you when down as much to his heart's content as ever the Yanguesian carriers belaboured Rosinante with their pack staves. 'He has the back-trick simply the best of any man in Illyria.'"

To conclude pell-mell, let the biographer of tomorrow read to-day Macaulay's short lives of Johnson, Bunyan, and Atterbury, contributed to the Encyclopædia Britannica; Scott's Biographical Memoirs of Richardson, Fielding, Smollett, and others, and his lives of Swift and Dryden, written for editions of their works; Carlyle's life of John Sterling, and Carlyle's sketch-portraits, wherever they be (let him count these inimitable); Walter Bagehot's Biographical Studies; Edward Fitzgerald's memoir of Bernard Barton; Dr. John Brown's essay on Chalmers; Anthony Froude's Julius Caesar; Talfourd's Lamb; M. Leon Daudet's life of his father; and Renan's memoir of his sister. Mr. Clodd's memoir of Grant Allen, published last year, was a successful essay in sympathetic, clear-sighted biography, such as knows what to say, and what not to say, and where to stop.

Things Seen.

Reflex Action.

THE King had passed, and his subjects surged out into the roadway, which was still lined by soldiers. These stood at attention, like bronzes, unmoved by the capering, out-of-school sight-seers. It was discipline confronting waywardness, and the wayward stared at Mars on duty with curiosity and veneration. Presently came along a band of coster girls, bright of eye and fresh of cheek. Open-air life, and the saucy freedom of their vocation, had kept the free animal in them unbridled and untrammelled. They sported down the roadway like so many colts, giving and taking chaff with the ease of long habit. But badinage with their fellow-citizens in the crowd was vieux jeu with them. There was more attractive metal in those adamant warriors, who moved not a lash, who raised not a finger, who regarded the antics of the girls with the high indifference of the gods on Olympus watching the gambols of mortals. The gods can choose, and they prefer to pick their moment of condescension. They had had relations with so many young women, had those warriors, and no doubt they knew well enough that the girls' intrepidity was not individual, but sprang from the consciousness of strength in numbers. So they received the advances of the girls with a cold indifference. They were superior even to tentative ticklings with feathers, and they allowed confetti to stay on their swelling bosoms as if such was a detail of the military regulations. The girls became more daring, till they came to the point of pushing one another towards the warriors, and soon one of them was propelled straight on to a breast. Even then Mars did not forget that he was on duty; but the instinct bred of a hundred amatory experiences in his crowded past would not be denied. As the girl touched his breast his huge arms opened, described a semi-circle, musket and all, folded her for an instant, and then, with mechanical precision, returned to his side. He did not move. He did not quaver. He showed no pleasure. I believe the movement was entirely sub-conscious. It was an example of reflex action, produced by stimulus, physiologists would tell you, without the necessary intervention of consciousness.

The Marquis.

It was on the Boulevard des Italiens that I was introduced to the Marquis. The night was balmy, and we sat quietly sipping our coffee. My companion knew everything and everybody. He knew the Marquis. It was—need I say?—my first visit to Paris, and I was in the frame of mind of the traveller on the threshold, in which he expects anything to happen at any moment; therefore, I was not surprised to observe that the Marquis was dressed in rags, that his hands were not of the cleanest, that he had apparently forgotten to put on his collar, and that he was engaged in the groping performance of picking up cigarette and cigar ends and consigning them to a slit in his coat. My companion introduced us: "Mr. So-and-so, Le Marquis de —." I bowed low, as was fitting. It was pathetic to notice that this concession to nobility was utterly lost on the Marquis. I tried some desultory conversation, feeling, if the truth be told, something of a fool. There was no doubt of the fellow's blood. He had, when the dirt was penetrated, one of the most aristocratic types of face I had ever seen. An idea struck me. I offered him a cognac. He accepted, and gulped it down eagerly. He looked so utterly depraved, so hopelessly oblivious of his former position, that I suddenly experienced a sensation of repugnance so strong as almost to swallow up my first feeling of respectful pity. I rose and departed hastily, leaving I knew not what tragedy of blight, what miserable spectre of loss, behind me. I had placed a coin on the table close to his hand. I looked round when I had gone some distance and saw him biting it.

A Doss-House Poet.

POETS are to be found everywhere, and so why not in a doss-house? It is, nevertheless, a little curious to find a dosser issuing poetical works from his temple of repose. One would imagine that the purchasing power of a pathetic number of cups of coffee must be sacrificed ere a dosser could flutter so much as one sheet upon this stony world.

That, however, is what Mr. G. Frost, of "The Wave," Victoria Dock-road, has done twice at least to our certain knowledge. The utterances before us are dated 1893 and 1894 respectively. They have not lacked appreciation, for "The Wave" is under the direct control of Mansfield House, whence Oxford scholarship and Christian sympathy radiate upon that mortared Essex marsh whose name is Canning Town. Mr. Frost has had perhaps half-a-dozen readers whom a popular novelist might woo in vain. But he is unknown to the Press and to the world, despite his flutterings.

We do not, in breaking the shell of his obscurity, purpose to cry "Hats off! A genius." What we shall endeavour to show is that through all the drollery of Mr. Frost's ignorance the man-of-letters emerges, individual and fastidious, with tunes beating in his blood and honesty shining on his forehead.

His sense of rhyme is peculiar. "Blurred" and "world" obviously rhyme only on the Celtic system of vowel assonance demonstrated by Dr. Hyde. "Horse" and "port," "fate" and "cape," "gloom" and "tune" are rhymes which may with greater probability be referred to that defective ear for terminals condoned by filial piety in Mother Goose. His interruptions, in the shape of redundant syllables, are obviously due to a dogged determination to say what he means at whatever risk to the muse.

Our first quotations shall be from "A Voyage Round the World." This is the tune:

See, the wind is changing, for scarce a day had sped,
When the wind began to haul and then came dead ahead;
It's freshening to a breeze, reef top sails, snug her down,
And jam her to the wind however fortune frown.
Luff! luff! my hearty, keep her full and bye
Send her through the seas, make the water fly.
Ease her when she plunges, as through the seas she's hurled.

Take it as it comes, boys, travelling round the world.

Neptune is soon lashed to storm in a cacophony of bad rhymes, and with "flying kites all furled" the ship goes "on through the pitchy darkness" while "out upon her yardarms the ghastly blue lights burn."

She's racing with the seas, boys, her water a streak of fire.

In the ensuing section of the poem we See the long green hills of water, their white caps gleam like teeth,

And thunder down upon her deck full twenty feet beneath.

Night falls again, dark and black

—yet the phosphor flashes bright
Beneath her keel the sea's ablaze and sparkling without light,
The sky and sea are closing in as if the two were one,
There is but a ship's length or so to bound the horizon.

Alas! for the false accent. But the effect of these passages is striking, mixed up as they are with shrewd and seaman-like observations such as:

Keep the wind upon the quarter, just a point or so to port,
And mind your weather helm, she'll turn turtle if she's caught,

And bits of humour like this:

Hold on, here comes a comber; it goes sweeping over all,
There go the pots and kettles, the galley's overboard.

Finally the ship nears home, "her masts like coach whips bending." All is vigorous. She is like "an arrow from a well strung bow"; she "throws the water from her sides";

The sou'-west wind is blowing fresh as she cuts the seas in two.

One is exhilarated; the man moves to the rhythm of the living machine which is both house and wife to him.

The extraordinary title "Sphinx, Cleopatra's Needle, Pyramids and Tower Bridge, Taboo" suggests hysteria; and in the poem itself it is clear that emotion has preceded thought and denied it coherence in its anxiety to give shape to its own music. Here is a verse on one of the Pyramids which, in its quasi-Scotch austerity, its mixture of anger and awe and smouldering iconoclasm, deserves attention:

It stands there in all its glory, mute and inscrutable, a goodly show,
The sand has gathered round its base; the foundation's down below.
One man alone designed its form, 'twas the myriads that reared
It stone by stone; as from the earth it rose, the builders disappeared
And never left a single trace of house, or home, or name,
To hand down to posterity a vain man's wretched fame.
In the Empire their forefathers built above encroaching sand
Stands that Pyramid of wickedness, a curse to Fatherland.

One has a vision of the impressionable mariner taking off his hat with one hand and shaking the fist of the other.

The exalted wisdom of the Bhagavad Gita would certainly strike him as nonsense. Witness the admirable dogmatism of this couplet:

All may differ on the meaning of the two words God and Devil,
But the most ignorant must know that there is good and evil.

Ah, Mr. Frost, it is only the ignorant who know—know in such capital letters as the Tent-maker uses when he writes:

The Ball no Question makes of Ayes and Noes,
But Right or Left as strikes the Player goes;
And He that toss'd Thee down into the Field
He knows about it all—He knows—HE knows!

Yet Mr. Frost is no stern theologian. His is a splendid heterodoxy:

That is the new religion: live and work for Motherland.

The line seizes him on the Tower Bridge, where also he learns that

The power of all the Church combined gives no life to one dead bone.

Therefore the Tower Bridge is sermon enough for him:

It's finished, and preaches to the world;
go try and build a better.

Mr. Frost's muse is not easily dislodged from the hardest fact, and whirls in screaming animadversion round the Board of Trade:

From narrow-minded party Politics,
From shuffling, bribing, dirty tricks,
From Board of Trade Certificates,
We pray the Lord protect us.

"Certificates!" He has mastered the secret of successful street-poetry—a concrete expression for a general wrong. Why are our cities infested with a multitudinous throng of no fixed occupation? The political economist says of a section of them: "Because they have omitted or failed to qualify financially and otherwise for the licence or certificate needed to carry on various kinds of business." Dosser Frost says: "Because they have not a certificate." "Certificate" to dosser minds is not the sign of a qualification, but the qualification itself. Down, then, with certificates! Stamp on the Red Tape Worm! Mr. Frost has instantly their faith and their enthusiasm, if once they hear him. He has shown them the adversary.

But Mr. Frost deserves a more dignified elevation than an inverted tub. It is not poetry that we will cite in support of the contention; it is a piece of haunting doggerel:

There's Tit-Bits, Rare-Bits, Funny Cuts, and Joker;
There's Tip-Top Tea to Pick-me-Up and Tee-to-Tums;
There's Answers, Pearson's Weekly, Moonshine, Ally Sloper;
And immortal souls are saved by beating kettle-drums. . . .
And the World grinds on like Vested Interests; the ponderous pistons jar
Upon the nerves. The pirate's scissors click all night and day unceasing,
And schoolgirls read, and learn, and teach their dear old Grandmamma
The scientific art of sucking eggs, but cultivate the power of pleasing.

Who would not shrink from casting obloquy on most of the papers named in this catalogue? But, altogether, how forcibly they conjure up the hopeless wallowing of raw minds among scraps and snatches; how significantly they direct attention to the voluminous voice, glib even when raucous, of the world's Press crying down all subtle utterances, disturbing all connected views, marring all beauty, and forbidding all finality of expression.

Mr. Frost is not a great man—one is not great simply because he publishes from a doss-house; but he would be far from an ordinary man even if he published in Pater-noster-row. His travels have solemnised him within. Fresh from gleaming tropical seas and dreaming tropical lands, he is on the edge of London as one brutally awakened from a delicate slumber. Yet it is the grimmest of all paradoxes, from Carlyle to Mr. Frost, that a great noise extorts contributions from the protestant against it.

The Halfpenny Feuilletton.

In Four Stages.

I.

TO-MORROW will commence a new serial of transcendent interest, which by those critics who have been privileged to see it in MS. has been pronounced to be the most powerful and absorbing romance of modern times. Under the title THE ANNIHILATION CLUB the author paints with terrible and fascinating realism the total destruction of the human race and the pulverisation of the planet on which we dwell into an insignificant powder. Needless to say, this awful calamity is the result of jealousy, the love element in the story being singularly prominent.

To describe THE ANNIHILATION CLUB in a phrase, it is by far the most important and alluring contribution to that group of stories which by prevision Mr. Wells so successfully imitated in THE WAR OF THE WORLDS.

To begin to-morrow the great serial, THE ANNIHILATION CLUB!

Order early. See that you get it.

II. (Four weeks later.)

THE ANNIHILATION CLUB.

Chapter XXX.

SYNOPSIS.

Mephisto De Trafford, the famous chemist and electrician, balked of his love for Anastasia Montmorency, determines upon revenge, not only upon his successful rival Dr. Majolica, but upon the world. He builds a secret laboratory a mile beneath the surface of the earth, and immediately under the Houses of Parliament, access to this mysterious workroom being gained by long underground passages, the entrance to which is in a wood near Box Hill, the property of De Trafford. Deep in this deadly fastness De Trafford mixes an explosive of a nature more terribly destructive than anything yet imagined. One day by accident he leaves open the door of the passage, which is discovered by Michael Dorn-ton, a butterfly collector who has gone to Box Hill in search of the silver-washed fritillary. Michael enters, the narrative at this point passing into his hands.

After a few paces, the seriousness of the enterprise dawned upon me and I stealthily tip-toed back and secured the door against any other investigator. Then, after folding up my butterfly net and grasping the stick as a weapon, I began the descent.

The passage was scrupulously clean and was lit brightly by electric light. Here and there were little recesses. —(To be continued.)

III. (The next day.)

Chapter XXXI.

SYNOPSIS.

Mephisto De Trafford, the famous chemist and electrician, balked of his love for Anastasia Montmorency, determines upon revenge, not only upon his successful rival Dr. Majolica, but upon the world. He builds a secret laboratory a mile beneath the surface of the earth, and immediately under the Houses of Parliament, access to this mysterious workroom being gained by long underground passages, the entrance to which is in a wood near Box Hill, the property of De Trafford. Deep in this deadly fastness De Trafford mixes an explosive of a nature more terribly destructive than anything yet imagined. One day by accident he leaves open the door of the passage, which is discovered by Michael Dorn-ton, a butterfly collector who has gone to Box Hill in search of the silver-washed fritillary. Michael enters, the narrative at this point passing into his hands. Michael begins his perilous journey down the passage. The description of the passage.

After walking some ten miles and stopping now and again to refresh myself with the sandwiches I had brought with me—done up, as I observed, by my good landlady, in a piece of the Morning Leader—I sat down in one of the recesses to rest. Suddenly I heard a curious rumbling sound as of an approaching vehicle. Peering out I was conscious of a swiftly moving body drawing nearer and nearer. In a moment it had passed, but not before I had seen it to be, as I afterwards discovered, De Trafford himself, in his electric motor-car, dashing from the laboratory to the opening.

Never shall I forget the deathly pallor of his face and the enormity of anti-social hatred that beamed in his eye.—(To be continued.)

IV. (Two months later.)

THE BLOOD-STAINED PRIMA DONNA.

To-morrow will be commenced a new great serial of absorbing interest, which, by all who have had the good fortune to read it in MS., is pronounced quite the most transcendently exciting and brilliant romance of modern times . . . (and so forth).

Correspondence.

B. B. B.

SIR,—What more is to be said of Byron? Why no more truly in our day of "Poetic Famine." A generation that can discuss in earnest the authenticity of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters can never have much to say or think of the "finest letters in the language." But, indeed, with Byron as with Milton, it is all a question of personality. Byron is read for love, Milton for learning, the reason being one, as I have said, of personality. Byron had personality above all things. It was, as the Prayer-Book would say, "for the glory of his name" that Greece was made free. While Milton's personality was such that it permitted him, after marrying a child of seventeen years, immediately to set to work and write a burning pamphlet on "Divorce"! It is the most characteristic thing we hear of him. We are not surprised at anything he does afterwards, for his Personality has made a slave of his reputation. Byron, too, is the slave of his Personality; but non-moral rather than immoral as he is, he is never ignoble or vulgar or narrow. Even his slang is immortal. No one but he could have so perfectly defined Switzerland: a "Curst, selfish, swinish country of brutes, placed in the most romantic region of the world," he says. The words live.

If Milton has triumphed because of his literature and in spite of his character, Byron has triumphed for both these things, but chiefly because of the latter. That he was generous we know; witness his praise of Shelley's verse and character, his letters to Sir Walter, and his monetary help to the Greeks, to which he added at last his life and the glory of his name. That he was indifferent to danger or petty inconvenience we know; witness his answer when he overhears his servant Fletcher saying of Greece: "It's a land of lies and lice and fleas and thieves. What my lord is going there for the Lord only knows, I don't." Then seeing his master was looking, he said: "And my master can't deny what I have said is true." "No," said Byron, "to those that look at things with hog's eyes and can see nothing else; what Fletcher says may be true, but I didn't note it." From a test of character, personality—call it what you will—such as that, how, for instance, would Carlyle emerge, or Milton with his timid seventeen-year-old wife and his burning pamphlet on Divorce?

If you charge us with forgetfulness of Byron it is, as Mr. Swinburne says, "not a light charge." And on what do you base your charge? The year 1900 is turned, and we are recounting our poetic glories of the Victorian era. Well, Mr. Murray is issuing a most sumptuous edition of Byron's works, and I suppose there must be a sale for it. Mr. Henley has so much faith in him that he, too, is devoting his time to the production of an edition worthy of Byron. What other poet is receiving the like attention—or half of it? But I forget. Some firm in Glasgow is issuing a complete Keats in one-shilling volumes. I wonder if the poor and needy buy them, for it is for such, I suppose, they are intended? No, Byron is one of the first names with us in 1901. What is the other? Is it Shelley, or Keats, or Wordsworth, or Coleridge? Perhaps it may be Kipling. (Hush!) But where is the city that is issuing a "definitive" edition of their work? Where are the monuments more enduring than brass that have received their names? Greece emerged from the last war chiefly because of Byron; even to-day it is flushed with the glory of his name. May I ask would the names of Shelley, Keats, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Browning, and W. B. Yeats, all together, call three Englishmen anywhere to-day to risk their lives for the glory of a name?—I am, &c.,

EDWARD HUTTON.

"The Impulse to Feel and Know."

SIR,—Your reviewer, in his article on Mr. Cramb's Origins and Destiny of Imperial Britain, says: "Surely it is good to know what words a professor of modern history was addressing to his plastic young students while the Boer War was still going on." And later: "Holding as we do that the highest wisdom, let it come from poet or seer, is either for everyday wear, or worthless." This opinion of your reviewer, given in a criticism of the book of a Queen's College professor, pays a profounder compliment to that dear old college than perhaps your reviewer guessed. For Queen's College, alone of girls' colleges (let us away with the hateful term of "ladies'" colleges), has steadily refused to adapt its teaching and its traditions to the mercenary and commercial skurry of up-to-date education.

It is not only Mr. Cramb, the Modern History Professor, who, in the words of your reviewer, "is more disdainful of common every-day fact than any of them, but directs his pronouncements according to the teaching of those whom he esteems the prophets of his time." This is the spirit of the education given at Queen's College; this is the spirit I and my comrades of fifteen years ago learned of Henry Morley, of Canon Ainger, and of F. S. Pulling, before Mr. Cramb knew the threshold of the college.

In the dear old library, where the eyes of Frederick Maurice seem to gaze kindly on the bending young shoulders in their college gowns, "this attribute which we may name Reverie," to quote Mr. Cramb, was born in many of us. That grave room, with its well-stocked shelves, taught us to love literature—it even taught some of us to dream of being poets. But, above all, it taught us that instruction for examination, which is the whole spirit of girls' education nowadays, is as far from real education as a shilling shocker from a page of Swift.

Fifteen years have passed since Henry Morley broke down over "Lycidas" before his reverent class. He is gone, and F. S. Pulling is gone, and we have all fared far in the stress and storm of life. But I am glad to see from Mr. Cramb's lectures that, in spite of ardent reviling, and pecuniary loss, Queen's College keeps on the good way, and believes Education to be, not a grinding machine capable of producing so much material, for an Intermediate or a B.A., but a goddess to be wooed by long service and reverent devotion, and whose soul is the soul of poetry. I am glad the dear old college doors still open on " . . . rich, beautiful, stimulating, brilliant minds, ever dwelling on high, unworldly thoughts, that impart what is of far more value than correct habits of reasoning—viz., the impulse to feel and know." Above all, I am glad there is a paper like the ACADEMY to appreciate and applaud such teaching.—I am, &c., L. M. (AN OLD QUEEN'S COLLEGER).

Mr. Davidson's Drama.

SIR,—In the notice of my play in to-day's ACADEMY the following occurs: "Mr. Davidson (it is an individual trait in him) is obviously steeped in the Elizabethan drama, less of Shakespeare than of Shakespeare's contemporaries, to the extent of copying their weaker mannerisms and such of their methods as are not in the best taste."

I doubt neither the honesty nor the timid, sub-conscious malice of this assertion; but I think it is not altogether to the credit of contemporary criticism that I should have to contradict it again: it is entirely without foundation.

Your reviewer seems to be the victim of the analogic fallacy which, sooner or later, vitiates the judgment of almost every professional critic.—I am, &c.,

Digitized by JOHN DAVIDSON.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 74 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best original poem of three four-line stanzas. After careful perusal of the 115 poems sent in we have decided to award the prize to Mrs. P. H. Lulham, 6, Chandos Place, Broadstairs, for the following :

O wild south-wester whose strong beat
My little one loves best,
From whose salt-stinging kiss my sweet
Goes ruddy to her rest;
Blow ! and her brave young spirit raise,
Stirred by your splendid strife,
To range with you your wider ways,
And live your larger life :
Beat ! till she thinks how, safe apart,
Love trims a haven-light ;
Tell her that here, too, in my heart
The tides run high to-night.

Among the best poems sent in are these :

THE HILL PATH.

A low grey sky, brief sunshine breaking through
The faint blue reaches of the distant plain,
Scant silver glancing on a mist of rain,
Brief sunshine gilding you,
And gleaming on wet rowan-trees that slow
Their bright round berries dropped upon the sod
Till all the path was reddened, as with blood,
By which you chose to go.

Oh, had the ending of the way but been
Another than a life-time's long goodbye,
How fair the earth, how tender the low sky
The circling hills between !

[S. M., Scotland.]

THE SORROW OF SONG.

Oh, delicate songs of my sorrow, conceived in sin and in shame,
What have you of good or of worth so shamefully wrought out
Of wrong ?
Must ever the soul in me sink, and the heart dwell on deeds without name.

Or ever a whisper of beauty embroiders the edge of my song ?

Who shall strive, when in striving a song has gone down in the depths of strife ?

'Tis sorrow alone can wring from the poet a word of real worth ;
For he sees in the sin of the world each separate sin of his life,
And the day of his sorrow and shame is the day of a sweet song's birth.

If sorrow be born of sin, and only in sorrow lies song,
Then surely the singer shall 'scape the doom on the last great day ?

Unless—is it truth ?—we climb clear of the desperate days of wrong.

And from sin through sorrow we win to the joy of a fairer way.

[F. W. W., Camberwell.]

THE GARDEN OF MEMORY.

There is a garden in this heart of mine,
Roses and rue adorn its secret ways,
A twilight haunt whose hush is quite divine,
Illumined with the light of other days !

And here are graves—among the rue do lie
The old, old sorrows buried long ago ;
Beneath the roses hopes but born to die,
With vanished joys together rest. And lo !

Fair Memory muses here for evermore,
The gracious guardian of this dim domain ;
And at his will the blighted hopes of yore
Rise from their graves with buried joy and pain !

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

A GOLDEN DAY (CANDLEMAS SERVICES).

My golden day no golden month encloses,
No honied June's remembrance lends it charm :
Nor gleam of mid-July's chrysopic roses,
Nor boon September's amber-sleeved arm.

My golden day saw clouds all livid-lead
O'er moaning seas stabbed with a dagger blast :
I knelt in prayer, where blazoned windows deaden
The sob of churchyard elms that gride aghast.

A golden day ! for mortal touched immortal
From festal eucharist to vespers bright :
And the lit altar showed thro' flaming portal
Salute the Golden to Faith's raptured sight.

[R. F. McC., Whitby.]

A DAY IN LATE AUTUMN.

The earth is stilled, as though in some deep pain ;
The wind draws drearily each sobbing breath ;
And Nature's every feature mirrors plain
The grey reflex of death.

She spreads her dusky pall for the passing year,
Leaves strown aground, the dying on the dead ;
Each tree some silent sorrow seems to bear,
And veils in mist its head.

And I am one with Nature ; hope can bring
No comfort to this pain all pain above :
And softly fall the raindrops, murmuring
A dirge for passing love.

[R. W., Swansea.]

OLD AND NEW.

What may this latest-born of the long ages
Bestow on hearts that mourn the past in vain ?
Who can smooth out anew life's crumpled pages,
Or make the blotted record clean again ?

We—willing captives of old hope undying—
How should new cycles give us or withhold ?
Youth claims the New, what time our souls are crying
For the supreme enchantment of the Old.

The old love clamours loudly : "Ye must heed me
And take my gifts of rosemary and rue" ;
The old Faith whispers : "Surely ye will need me Until the day when God makes all things new."

[M. G. W., Shanklin.]

TO AN INTRUDER ON THE MARGIN OF AN OLD MANUSCRIPT.

Thou errant lad with pointed hood and wind-blown bags,
What dost thou piping here,
Where sleepy sermon, ancient discourse, endless drags
And lags, through year and year ?

Some patient toiling monk who wrote the gnarled text,
Set here as comment—thou,
With sudden quirk of brain by dusty learning vexed,
Thou madcap sprite of glee.

In thee he wrought with cell-dimmed eyes and cramped hand
His early shrivelled joy ;
In thee, old melodies of vanished summer-land,
Thou little piping boy !

[E. R., London.]

Poems also received from : H. R. B., London ; R. B. W., Sudbury ; S. W., Merrylee ; K. E. B., Edgbaston ; A. C. A., London ; P. C. F., Cambridge ; S. B., London ; E. C. M. D., Crediton ; M. A. W., London ; W. Bath ; M. L. M., London ; E. B. B., Sheffield ; J. D., London ; E. G. B., Liverpool ; W. R., Manchester ; E. S., London ; L. J., Ashby-de-la-Zouch ; E. W. H., West Didsbury ; E. K. P., Wadhurst ; F. L. W., Bradford ; C. S. O., Hove ; A. E. W., Inverness ; M. I., Cheltenham ; W. A., Glasgow ; H. F., Exmouth ; E. H., Peasehall ; L. G., Hornsey ; F. B. B., London ; G. L. C., Surrey ; H. H., Teddington ; S. H., Birmingham ; C. O. O., London ; P. B. K. S., London ; J. B., London ; F. G. S., Edinburgh ; A. B., Edinburgh ; G. S., Brentwood ; J. P. B. B., Liverpool ; A. D. B., Liverpool ; C. F. M., Bath ; L. M. S., London ; L. S., Leytonstone ; H. J., London ; R. E. P., Oxford ; H. J., Hadley Wood ; Miss L., Harpenden ; Mrs. W., Richmond ; A. S., Edinburgh ; F. B., Cheltenham ; H. M. G., London ; E. R. L., Kensington ; M. G., Kingston ; E. T. W., Leytonstone ; E. F. H., Birmingham ; A. J. E., London ; E. F. W., Leytonstone ; M. F., London ; H. F. B., Strathfield ; G. S., Bristol ; E. C., — ; A. F., Bangor ; H. W. D., South Tottenham ; H. R. S., Newcastle ; S. B. M., Nottingham ; G. W., Hull ; T. B. S., Birmingham ; H. P. W., Otterburn ; T. W. M., Newcastle ; S. H., Manchester ; M. C. S., London ; F. P. S., Manchester ; F. B., Milton ; F. W. H., Penarth ; P. R. D., Brighton ; J. J., Bristol ; C. W., Edinburgh ; F. H. B., Sutton ; W. S. B., Blackheath ; J. H., Edinburgh ; J. B. W., London ; R. U. F. M., Hurlford ; J. E. A. S., Dundee ; V. E. J., London.

Competition No. 75 (New Series).

WE offer a prize of One Guinea for the best comprehensive literary portrait of a man or woman, not exceeding 250 words, taken from a biographical work or a history. The prize will be awarded for the selection which is most vividly suggestive of a complete character.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, February 27. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the third page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.

JUST PUBLISHED. 8vo, 1s. 6d.

YEOMANRY CAVALRY: or MOUNTED INFANTRY?

By LANCELOT ROLLESTON,

Lieut.-Col. and Hon. Col. South Notts Hussars Yeomanry Cavalry.

JUST PUBLISHED, NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION.
Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.HANDBOOK OF THE ADMINISTRATIONS OF GREAT BRITAIN DURING THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, 1801-1900.

By FRANCIS CULLING CARR-GOMM,

Late of H.M. Madras Civil Service, and of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

A NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

LOVE AND HONOUR.

By M. E. CARR.

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For MARCH.—Price ONE SHILLING.—CONTENTS.

The Sick and Wounded in the Great Civil War. By C. H.
FIRTH.Sir Arthur Sullivan. By J. A.
FULLER MAITLAND.A College Cat. By A. D. GON-
LEY.Some Boer War Bulletins.
By BASIL WILLIAMS.The Results of Wild Bird
Protection. By C. J. CORNISH.A Londoner's Log-Book.—II.
Anthony Trollope. By G. S.
STREET.Napoleon in Corsica: an Episode of 1799. By W. B. DEFFIELD.My Mother's Diary. By MARY WESTENHOLZ.The Christian Scientist. By FRANK RICHARDSON.The Tale of the Great Mutiny.
—II. Stamping Out Mutiny.
By the Rev. W. H. FITCHETT, LL.D.Provincial Letters.—II. From Manchester. By URBANUS
SYLVAN.Count Hannibal. Chaps. VII.
IX. By STANLEY J. WEYMAN.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place.

BY SIR HENRY CRAIK, K.C.B.

NOW READY.

A CENTURY OF
SCOTTISH HISTORY.From the Days before the '45 to those within Living Memory.

BY

Sir HENRY CRAIK, K.C.B., M.A. Oxon.,
Hon. LL.D. Glasgow.

2 vols., demy 8vo, 30s. net.

TIMES.—"Sir Henry Craik's work is marked by wide research, judicial thought, and much philosophical insight.... Sir Henry Craik is always fair and dispassionate.... He has wisely confined himself to a period—the most important and interesting in Scottish history—so within his limits he can be comprehensive and exhaustive."

STANDARD.—"Sir Henry Craik has made one of the most important contributions to the history of Scottish affairs.... The author is a keen and well-equipped critic of men and movements.... We are presented with a chronological narrative of all the chief incidents—political, ecclesiastical, and legislative, no less than literary, social, and commercial—which have shaped the national annals in the period under review."

LITERATURE.—"Perhaps the ablest chapter in this very able work, and that which bears most evidence of the author's insight into his subject, is that in which he reviews the Scottish school of philosophy. It may be heartily commended to the study of those who love to trace the growth of a nation's inner life.... Sir Henry Craik has made a very notable contribution to the history of the United Kingdom."

SCOTSMAN.—"Sir Henry Craik has made a special study of the progress of Scotland as an individual nationality since it became constitutionally an incorporate part of a wider nationality. The result is a book which gives an intelligent insight into the currents of Scottish life and progress, and is full of valuable information which has hitherto been obtainable only by a wide course of reading.... He has produced an instructive and stimulating book—all the more stimulating, perhaps, because some of its views and opinions may provoke dissent."

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

FROM MR. MURRAY'S LIST OF NEW BOOKS

CHINA:

Her History, Diplomacy, and Commerce, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By E. H. PARKER, Consul-General in Corea, 1886-7; Consul-General in Kiung Chow, 1891; and in 1892-3, Adviser in Chinese Affairs to the Burma Government. With 19 Maps, &c. Large crown 8vo, 8s. net.

"Mr. Parker may be congratulated upon his lucid exposition of the system of government. It conveys a more vivid impression of the ins and outs of Chinese administration than almost anything on the subject that has yet appeared in print.... The author's method is excellent."—Standard.

OUR NAVAL HEROES. By Various Writers.

Edited by G. E. MARINDIN, M.A. With a Preface by Rear-Admiral Lord CHARLES HEREFORD. Containing Short Lives of Twenty of our most Famous Admirals, related in nearly every case by one of their Descendants, and when possible by the Head of the Family. With Photogravure of Lord Nelson, and Half-Tone Portraits of the other Admirals, demy 8vo, 16s.

"Well-conceived and well-executed volume."—Globe.

"One of great interest and value."—Literature.

IN TUSCANY. Tuscan Towns—Tuscan Types—The

Tuscan Tongue, &c. By MONTGOMERY CARMICHAEL, British Vice-Consul for West Tuscany. With numerous Illustrations, large crown 8vo, 9s. net.

"A delightful volume."—Outlook.

"The whole book is out of the beaten track of travel books, as well as charming and most sympathetically written."—DOUGLAS SLADEN, in the Queen.

SHIFTING SCENES: Recollections of Many Men in Many Lands. By the Right Hon. Sir EDWARD MALET, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., Sometime H.B.M. Ambassador to Germany. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE PAINTERS of FLORENCE. From the Thirteenth to the Sixteenth Century.

A Handy Book for Travellers in Italy and Students of Art. By JULIA CARTWRIGHT (Mrs. Ady). With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE COMPLETE AUTHORITATIVE EDITION OF GEORGE BORROW'S WORKS.

Large crown 8vo, 6s. each.

NEW VOLUME JUST PUBLISHED.

THE GYPSIES of SPAIN: their Manners, Customs,

Religion, and Language. With a Photogravure and 8 Full-Page Illustrations. By A. WALLIS MILLS.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED.

THE BIBLE IN SPAIN.

LAVENGRO.

THE ROMANY RYE.

MR. MURRAY'S MUSICAL SERIES.

TWO NEW VOLUMES.

SONGS and SONG-WRITERS. By Henry T. Finck,

Author of "Wagner and his Works," "Chopin, and other Musical Essays," &c. With 8 Portraits, crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"A good and valuable book."—Saturday Review.

THE ORCHESTRA and ORCHESTRAL MUSIC. By

W. J. HENDERSON. Author of "What is Good Music?" &c. With 8 Portraits and other Illustrations, crown 8vo, 5s. net.

ALREADY PUBLISHED.

HOW MUSIC DEVELOPED. By W. J. Henderson.

WHAT IS GOOD MUSIC? By W. J. Henderson.

MUSIC: How It Came to Be What It Is. By Hannah SMITH.

HOW to LISTEN to MUSIC. By Henry Ed. Krehbiel.
With Illustrations.

A NEW WORK BY PROFESSOR R. C. MOBERLY.

ATONEMENT and PERSONALITY. Demy 8vo, 14s.

SERMONS BY BENJAMIN JOWETT.

Edited by the Very Rev. the Hon. W. H. FREMANTLE, D.D., Dean of Ripon.
Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. each.

NEW VOLUME.—JUST PUBLISHED.

SERMONS on FAITH and DOCTRINE.

THE EVOLUTION of the ENGLISH BIBLE, being an Historical Sketch of the Successive Versions. By H. W. HOARE, late of Balliol College, Oxford, now an Assistant-Secretary to the Board of Education, Whitehall. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW VOLUME OF MR. S. R. GARDINER'S
"COMMONWEALTH."

HISTORY of the COMMONWEALTH and PROTECTORATE, 1649-1660.

By SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER, M.A., Hon.
D.C.L. Oxford, Litt.D. Cambridge, &c.
Vol. III. 1654-1656. With 6 Maps. 8vo, 21s.

EGYPT and the HINTERLAND.

By FREDERIC WALTER FULLER.

With Frontispiece and Map of Egypt and the Sudan.
8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

* * This work contains a résumé of the political question; a Coptic section; a complete sketch of the military operations ending with the death of the Khalifa; and indication of the excursion route to Khartum by the Sudan Military Railway.

CHARLES WILLIAM FERDINAND, DUKE of BRUNSWICK:

An Historical Study, 1735-1806.
By LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE.
With Map and 2 Portraits. 8vo, 6s. net.
[On Monday next.]

* * The subject of this study is the famous German General and Statesman. In 1806 he was appointed leader of the Prussian army, and was mortally wounded at the battle of Auerstedt in the same year. He was the father of the Duke of Brunswick, killed at Quatre Bras, and also of Queen Caroline, the wife of George IV.

THE EUCHARISTIC SACRIFICE:

An Historical and Theological Investigation of the Sacrificial Conception of the Holy Eucharist in the Christian Church.

By the Rev. ALFRED G. MORTIMER, D.D.,
Rector of St. Mark's, Philadelphia.
Author of "Catholic Faith and Practice," &c.
With an Introduction by the Rev. T. T. CARTER,
Hon. Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, and Warden of the House of Mercy, Clower.
Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.
[On Monday next.]

VOLUME FOR 1901.

THE ANNUAL CHARITIES REGISTER and DIGEST:

Being a Classified Register of Charities in or available for the Metropolis, together with a Digest of Information respecting the Legal, Voluntary, and other Means for the Prevention and Relief of Distress and the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor, and an Elaborate Index.

With an Introduction by C. S. LOCH,
Secretary to the Council of the Charity Organisation Society, London.
8vo, 4s. [On Monday next.]

NEW NOVEL BY LADY RIDLEY.

ANNE MAINWARING.

By ALICE RIDLEY.
Author of "The Story of Alice." Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Anne Mainwaring" would be a suitable reply to that oft-repeated question: Now, tell me the name of a nice, interesting, new novel."—Academy.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

No. 221. MARCH, 1901. 8vo, price 6d.

MY LADY of ORANGE: an Historical Romance.
By H. C. BAILEY. Chapters XII.-XIV.

THE FIRST of the HUNDRED DAYS. By Miss DEMESTEE.

A RIGHT-AND-LEFT. By F. WHITSHAW.
CONCERNING TOD and PETER. By Mrs. HARKER.
BACTERIA and SALT. By Mrs. PERCY FRANKLAND.
FYANDER'S WIDOW. By M. E. FRANCIS (Mrs. FRANCIS BLUNDELL). Chapters VI.-IX.
AT THE SIGN of the SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
London, New York, and Bombay.

ARCHITECTURAL EYESORES; the Wallace Collection; Walter Crane—a Hungarian Appreciation; Old Brentford Town (with Illustrations).—See the "ART JOURNAL" for March, price 1s. 6d.; by post, 1s. 9d. Through any Bookseller, or direct from the Publisher, H. VIRTUE & Co., Ltd, 26, Ivy Lane, London, E.C.

"TALENT," 3d.; Agents; free, 4d. Perfectly Original. Dramatic, Musical, Literary, Artistic, Journalistic, Platform. Ten Skill Prizes. Illustrated. Published 9th each month. Universally obtainable.—EDWIN DREW, "Talent" Office, 37, Caversham Road, London, N.W.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 1025. — MARCH, 1901. — 2s. 6d.

THE MAKING OF MODERN SCOTLAND.—BRIDGE.—ARMY SHOOTING, AND ITS IMPROVEMENT.—OXFORD IN THE VICTORIAN AGE.—DOOM CASTLE: A ROMANCE. By NEIL MUNRO. CHAPS. XX.-XXIV.—"A WANDERER AND A GATHERER." By H. G. PARSONS.—THE SICK AND WOUNDED IN SOUTH AFRICA.—IN HEBRIDEAN WATERS. By HAMISH STUART.—THE PAGEANT OF SEAMEN. By MAY BYRON.—THE WAR DESPATCHES.—FEBRUARY 1-4.—MUSINGS WITHOUT METHOD: VICTORIA THE GREAT—THE TRADE OF KINGSHIP—THE WORLD'S MOC KING.—KING EDWARD VII.—VICTORIA R ET I.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

The Strand Magazine

Dr. A. CONAN DOYLE

"Strange Studies from Life."

See MARCH Issue. JUST PUBLISHED.

NEXT WEEK.—In 1 vol., demy 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, price 10s. 6d. net.

FIRST ON THE ANTARCTIC CONTINENT.

Being an Account of the British Antarctic Expedition,
1898-1900.

By C. E. BORCHGREVINK, F.R.G.S., Commander of the Expedition.
WITH PORTRAITS, MAPS, AND 188 ILLUSTRATIONS.

London: GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, price 3s. 6d. net.

French Life in Town and Country.

By HANNAH LYNCH.

WITH 12 FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS.

London: GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER.

No. 289. — MARCH, 1901.

THE CIVIL LIST. By EDWARD ROBERTSON, K.C., M.P.
CHURCH REFORM—WHY NOT BEGIN WITH THE PARISH? By the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Hereford.
THE SOUTH AFRICAN HOSPITALS COMMISSION. By FREDERICK TREVES.
SHAM versus REAL HOME DEFENCE. By Dr. A. CONAN DOYLE.
THE ADMIRALTY versus the NAVY. By H. W. WILSON.
THE DRAMA in the ENGLISH PROVINCES. By HENRY ARTHUR JONES.
IMPERIAL CIVIL SERVICE: a Suggestion from Australia. By Professor EDWARD E. MORRIS.
VERDI. By EDWARD GELLES.
THE BRITISH WORKMAN and his COMPETITORS. By WILLIAM WOODWARD, A.R.I.B.A.
STRATA in the ROMAN FORUM. By GIACOMO BONI.
SOME AMERICAN IMPRESSIONS of EUROPE. By PHILIP ALEXANDER BRUCE.
MONARCHY in the NINETEENTH CENTURY. By SIDNEY LOW.
MARIA HOLROYD. By Mrs. MARGARET L. WOODS.
LEADERS of OPPOSITION—BEFORE and AFTER 1832. By T. F. KEBBEL.
ROMNEY'S PORTRAITS at the GRAFTON GALLERY. By ROBERT C. WITT.
LAST MONTH. By Sir WENDELL RAIN.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE “Contemporary Review”

Every Month.

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

THE BRIGHTEST AND MOST INTERESTING
MONTHLY REVIEW PUBLISHED.

Articles by all the Leading Writers of the Day, on subjects of Public and Professional Interest, appear from time to time.

THE BEST MEDIUM FOR . . .
PUBLISHERS' ADVERTISEMENTS.

The “Contemporary Review”
CIRCULATES ALL OVER THE WORLD.

To be obtained of all Booksellers, or direct from

THE COLUMBUS COMPANY, Ltd.,

Printers and Publishers,

43 and 43a, FETTER LANE, E.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS, Publishers.

MISS IZA DUFFUS HARDY'S new novel, THE LESSER EVIL, is now ready. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE CHURCH of HUMANITY, the new novel by D. CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "Joseph's Coat," will be ready March 7. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

EAST LONDON. By Walter Besant. Author of "London," "Westminster," and "South London." With an Etched Frontispiece by P. S. WALKER, and 55 Illustrations by PHIL MAY, I. RAVEN HILL, and JOSEPH PENNELL. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 18s. Immediately.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. By H. BELLYSE BALDON. With 2 Portraits. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

THE PROPHET of the GREAT SMOKY MOUNTAINS. By C. EGBERT CRADDOCK. Author of "His Vanished Star," &c. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

THE BLUE DIAMOND. By L. T. MEADE. Author of "The Voice of the Charnier," &c.

QUALITY CORNER. By C. L. ANTOBUS. Author of "Wildersmoor," &c. "A curious and interesting novel, stamped with a character all its own."—Pilot. "The story, in its character-drawing, in its wit, and in its light and airy fancies, touches a very high level."—Glasgow Herald.

"The setting is excellent, the Lancashire rustic is delightful, and the whole story, in style, sentiment, and delicacy of touch, far above the average."—Sp. Clar.

A PATH of THORNS. By Ernest A. VIZETELLY.

"A romantic tale, full of point and picturesqueness, well constructed and equally well told. Mr. Vizetelly has a real story to tell, and tells it with the facile skill of a good workman."—Fall Mail Gazette.

MAX THORNTON. By Ernest GLANVILLE. Author of "The Fossicker," With 8 Illustrations by J. S. CROFTON, R.I.

"By far the best novel directly inspired by the war that the present writer has seen. A good deal of excellently constructed character-drawing."—Spectator. "A vigorous and entertaining story of adventure, the inherent interest of which is sharpened by its association with the present war in South Africa. The story is excellent of its kind, and will be read from beginning to end with breathless interest and keen enjoyment."—Scotsman.

THE INIMITABLE MRS. MASSINGHAM. By HERBERT COMPTON.

"One of the really good novels of the year."—Manchester Guardian. "It is very long since we read so delightful a story.... Healthy, vigorous, and charming romance."—Daily Graphic.

A MISSING HERO. By Mrs. ALEXANDER. Author of "The Woeing o't." THIRD EDITION.

"Mrs. Alexander has not devised a more ingenious plot, nor can we recall one more cleverly worked out."—World. "A very delightful story."—Glasgow Herald.

ECCENTRICITIES of GENIUS:

Memories of Famous Men and Women of the Platform and the Stage. By Major J. B. POND. With 91 Portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s.

"An interesting and amusing book.... a perfect mine of entertaining anecdote.... Major Pond seems to have come in contact with every celebrity in the universe."—To-day.

"It was with some pleasure that we hailed the announcement that Major Pond was engaged in the genial exercise of writing his reminiscences. Now that we have his work before us in the shape of a handsome volume, with not far short of a hundred portraits in it, we confess that our anticipations are not only realised but are exceeded."—Literary World.

WALFORD'S COUNTY FAMILIES of the UNITED KINGDOM (1801). Containing Notices of the Descent, Birth, Marriage, Education, &c., of more than 12,000 distinguished Heads of Families, their Heirs, Offices, Addresses, Clubs, &c. Royal 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt edges, 50s.

THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

One Shilling Monthly.—Contents for MARCH.

THE WINNING CHARM. By George Morley.

ANURADHAPURA. By E. O. Walker, C.I.E.

THE WEST PYRENEAN PEASANT PROPRIETOR. By A. R. Whiteway.

FAIRFIELD: a Peakland Township. By John Hyde.

THE CAT and the MOON. By the Rev. Geo. St. Clair.

GONDOMAR. By Georgiana Hill.

SOME THOUGHTS on HERRICK. By H. A. Spurr.

THINGS IRISH. By E. M. Lynch.

ANNA of CLEVELAND. By W. G. Cowland Field.

THE ISLAND VALLEY of AVILLION. By F. M. Rutherford.

THE IDEAL ANTHOLOGY. By Sylvanus Urban.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.Two Important New Works of Fiction.

READY SHORTLY, price 6s.

AFIELD AND AFLOAT.

By FRANK R. STOCKTON,

Author of "Mrs. Cliff's Yacht," "A Story-Teller's Pack," "The Girl at Cobhurst," &c.

With 12 Full-Page Illustrations.

READY SHORTLY, price 6s.

A SOLDIER of the KING.

By DORA M. JONES.

The romantic story of John Gifford, the original of Bunyan's Evangelist, though well known to students of Bunyan's early life, has never yet been made the subject of a novel. Gifford was a wild Cavalier before he became a preacher, and the adventures of his earlier unregenerate days form the subject of "A Soldier of the King." The scene of the story is laid chiefly in Maidstone, and it includes the most picturesque episode in the history of that ancient town—its capture by the Commonwealth soldiers in 1649.

Cheap Issue of the Century Science Series.

The FIRST VOLUME of the CHEAP EDITION in MONTHLY VOLUMES of this CELEBRATED SERIES, Edited by SIR HENRY ROSCOE, F.R.S., D.C.L., is MICHAEL FARADAY: His Life and Work.

By Prof. SILVANUS P. THOMPSON.

Bound in cloth, price 2s. 6d.

THE SECOND VOLUME, JUST PUBLISHED, Price 2s. 6d., is

CHARLES DARWIN

AND

The Theory of Natural Selection.

By E. B. POULTON, F.R.S.

A Beautiful Portrait Album.

NOW READY, price 6d. net.

QUEEN VICTORIA: Her Life in Portraits.

Beautifully printed on Art Paper, these Portraits will form an enduring memento of the greatest monarch in the history of the Empire. Descriptive text accompanies the pictures.

"A charming production."—Morning Post.

London at the Close ofQueen Victoria's Reign.

On March 13th will be published the First Weekly Part, price 6d. net, of

A MEMORIAL EDITION ofTHE QUEEN'S LONDON

Containing nearly 500 Full-Page Pictures, beautifully reproduced from Copyright Photographs.

With Part I. is presented a Splendid Rembrandt Photogravure Plate, "THE FUNERAL PROCESSION of QUEEN VICTORIA." Size 17 in. by 14 in.

For this Edition a number of Photographs of Fresh Subjects are being reproduced, whilst a series of Splendid Photographic Views of The Funeral Procession are being specially reproduced for this Edition.

The Great History of theTower of London.

PART I., JUST PUBLISHED, price 6d., of

HER MAJESTY'S TOWER.

By HEPWORTH DIXON.

With New Introduction by W. J. LOFTIE, F.S.A.

A Series of Splendid Coloured Plates has been prepared expressly for this Edition.

To be Completed in 16 Parts.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED London; and all Booksellers.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

SECOND AND CHEAPER EDITION, WITH ADDITIONAL CHAPTERS.

WEST AFRICAN STUDIES.

By the late MARY H. KINGSLEY.

With Portrait, Illustrations, and Map.

Extra crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

By MAURICE HEWLETT.

Author of "The Forest Lovers," &c.

EARTHWORK OUT OF TUSCANY.

Being Impressions and Translations of Maurice Hewlett.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED. Globe 8vo, 5s. [EVERSLEY SERIES.]

NEW VOLUME of the UNIFORM EDITION of RUDYARD KIPLING'S PROSE WORKS.THE NAULAHKA.

By RUDYARD KIPLING and WOLOOTT SALESTIER.

Extra crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN EAST ANGLIA.

By WILLIAM A. DUTT.

With Illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL.

Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

VOL. IV. OF THE NEW ISSUE OF THE BORDER EDITION

OF THE

WAVERLEY NOVELS.

Edited by ANDREW LANG.

ROB ROY.

Crown 8vo, tastefully bound in blue cloth, gilt, 6s. each.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. 47th THOUSAND.

THE PRIDE of JENNICO.

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s.—Contents for MARCH.

ON the HIGH VELDT. By a City Imperial Volunteer.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

THE COINAGE of WORDS. By Sir Courtenay Boyle, K.C.B.

SOME FRENCH PRISONS and their INMATES. By Captain Eardley-Wilmot.

THE SINNER and the PROBLEM. By ERIC PARKER.

Chaps. XV.-XVIII.

A SKETCH from MEMORY.

ROYAL EDWARDS (A.D. 901-1901).

THE PASSING of the QUEEN.

NORTH and SOUTH. By W. A. ATKINSON.

A PIONEER of EMPIRE.

VICTORIA.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated.—Price 1s. 4d.—Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The MARCH NUMBER contains—

SURABHI. By Flora Annie Steel.

IMPRESSIONS of JAPAN. By Rev. Henry C. Potter, LL.D.

THE FLIGHT of the EMPRESS DOWAGER. By Lukella Mizer.

DOWN the RHINE. Worms to Coblenz. By Augustine Birrell, K.C. Pictures by André Castaigne.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR THE YOUNG.ST. NICHOLAS.

Illustrated.—Price 1s.—Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The MARCH NUMBER contains:—

CAREERS of DANGER and DARING—III. "The Balloonist." By CLEVELAND MORFITT. Illustrated.

HOW ARMIES TALK TO EACH OTHER. By Capt. Charles D. Rhodes, U.S.A. Illustrated.

THE STORY of BARNABY LEE. Serial. By JOHN BENNETT. Author of "Master Skylark" Illustrated.

And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

The Academy

Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1504. Established 1869.

2 March, 1901.

Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE second edition of the late Miss Mary Kingsley's West African Studies contains, besides other additional matter, some account of Miss Kingsley herself by her friend Mr. George Macmillan. In this is included a letter she wrote to the native editor of a West African paper, that is, in a sense, her confession of faith. The letter fills three pages of close print. We quote a passage:

Forgive this long ill-written letter. I am writing in the Bay of Biscay, an unrestful place for writing in. I am on my way over to nurse fever cases in South Africa. I may never see West Africa again, but if I do, I hope it will be Liberia. I assure you I shall always feel grateful for the invitation to come there. I know I have been a nuisance. I know I have spoken words in wrath about the educated missionary-made African, and I am glad to hear you will tolerate me, I who admire to get on with the utter Bushman and never sneer or laugh at his native form of religion, a pantheism which I confess is a form of my own religion. I yield to no one in the admiration for Jesus Christ, and I believe in the Divine origin, but the religion His ministers preached I have never been able to believe in.

In honour of the memory of this able woman, and delightful companion, the merchants of Liverpool and Manchester have decided to establish in Liverpool a "Mary Kingsley" hospital for the treatment of tropical diseases. "Others," says Mr. Macmillan, "who know that her careful study of West African problems had aroused in her a passionate desire to promote a better understanding between the native races and the Englishmen who came into relation with them, have decided that no nobler monument could be raised to her memory than an attempt to carry on, as far as may be, this beneficent work." This memorial will take the form of a "Mary Kingsley Society for West Africa," for the systematic study of native customs and institutions.

THE supplemental volumes to the Dictionary of National Biography, which will be three in number, will cover the period to the end of the reign of Queen Victoria. A memoir of Her Majesty will be included. Mr. Sidney Lee will write on the Queen, Mr. G. W. Prothero on the late Bishop of London, and Mr. Arthur Sidgwick on Mr. F. W. H. Myers.

THE Tolstoy shelf is the despair of those who have a passion for orderly bookshelves. His works have been published in all forms and sizes, from the orthodox shape of Anna Karenina to the flimsy paper-covered parts in which Resurrection was first published. We are glad to hear, therefore, that there is now some chance of the issue of a uniform edition of the Russian master's works.

MESSRS. LONGMANS hope to publish this year a posthumous work in two volumes by Mr. F. W. H. Myers. It will be called Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death.

THE three first volumes of the new edition of Ibsen's Prose Dramas, under the editorship of Mr. William Archer, who has revised, modified, and strengthened the text, are comely. The League of Youth, A Doll's House, and Pillars of Society have been issued, and each volume has as frontispiece a costume portrait of one or more of the actors who took part in the representation. We may also draw attention to an admirable article by Mr. Archer in the International Monthly (Vermont, U.S.A.), on "The Real Ibsen." Such nonsense has been written about Ibsen's "message" that it is quite a relief to read so clear, and in our opinion, so sound an analysis of Ibsen's mind and temperament as this passage from Mr. Archer's article:

He is more of a seer than a thinker. He has flashes of intense insight into the foundations of things; but it is none of his business to build up an ordered, symmetrical, closely-mortised edifice of thought. Truth is to him many-sided; and he looks at it from this side to-day, from the opposite side to-morrow. The people who seek to construct a "gospel," a consistent body of doctrine, from his works, are spinning ropes of sand. He is "everything by turns and nothing long." He is neither an individualist nor a socialist, neither an aristocrat nor a democrat, neither an optimist nor a pessimist. He is simply a dramatist, looking with piercing eyes at the world of men and women, and translating into poetry this episode and that from the inexhaustible pageant.

It has been suggested that, in his volume of short stories entitled The Monster, the late Mr. Stephen Crane was less original than usual, that he was indebted to Uncle Tom's Cabin for the idea of the title story, and that "The Blue Hotel" resembles a story by a distinguished compatriot called "Snow-Bound at Eagle's." These suggestions hardly carry conviction, and we are not surprised to learn, from Mrs. Crane, that the stories which are thus criticised were founded on her late husband's personal experiences. Mrs. Crane writes: "'The Blue Hotel' was one of Mr. Crane's own experiences when he went West for the Batchelor Syndicate of New York. . . . Uncle Tom's Cabin did not suggest the 'Monster.' Mr. W. D. Howells says: "'The Monster' is the greatest short story ever written by an American.' Henry Johnson was a real man—that is, he was burned horribly about the face; but he was a hero only as he was a horror. Out of the crêpe-bound face of a negro whom Mr. Crane saw came the story of the 'Monster.'"

A "LADY READER" complains to a contemporary of the distraction she suffers in the British Museum Reading Room from the coughing and sneezing of a small group of readers. Moreover, she considers that the desks "must be swarming with the microbes of bronchitis, consumption, and other chest diseases." We sympathise, but we fear that a "Lady Reader's" suggestion that the Trustees ought either to provide a special room for those afflicted with bad coughs, or exclude them until they are well, lies outside the practical politics of the Reading Room.

PROF. JEBB'S lecture on Macaulay, delivered at Cambridge and in London, and published by the Cambridge University Press, is a lucid and appreciative estimate of the great historian. Recognising a tendency to exaggeration in Macaulay, Prof. Jebb entirely rejects the charges of wilful dishonesty and habitual inaccuracy often brought against him. It is interesting to have the opinion of so weighty a scholar as Prof. Jebb on the most fascinating history of recent times. Prof. Jebb's verdict is this:

The moral tone which pervades the history is manly and sound. It condones no deed of treachery or cruelty; it has no tolerance for hypocrisy or pretence; it also awards praise without stint to fortitude, to honest effort, to self-sacrifice, wherever they are found. There is no attempt to win a cheap and spurious credit for originality by the poor device of whitewashing bad characters, or of detracting from generally acknowledged merit. A robust judgment, an honest and independent spirit, can be felt throughout the work; it inculcates a respect for civil justice, and it is animated by a generous love of constitutional freedom.

Prof. Jebb's statement that "there is no attempt to win a cheap and spurious credit for originality by detracting from generally acknowledged merit," leaves Macaulay's treatment of William Penn unanswered. Whatever his motive may have been, Macaulay certainly did detract from Penn's "generally acknowledged merit," and stuck to his guns to the last in spite of the exhaustive reply of the Right Hon. William E. Forster, who showed that the Mr. Penne of Macaulay's charges was a George Penne, and a very different person from William Penn, the Quaker founder of Pennsylvania. In an interesting letter to the Speaker, Mr. Frederick Andrews, of Ackworth School, puts the final Quaker view:

An ardent admirer of Macaulay as a historian, an orator, and a politician, I cannot but regret this action of his, and associate myself with the sentiment of the poet Whittier, who with this episode in his mind says of "the glorious essayist":

How vainly he laboured to sully with blame
The white bust of Penn, in the niche of his fame!
Self-will is self-wounding—perversity blind:
On himself fell the stain for the Quaker designed.
For the sake of his true-hearted father before him;
For the sake of the dear Quaker mother that bore him;
For the sake of his gifts and the works that outlive him,
And his brave words for freedom we freely forgive him.

THE King's English is rather to seek in the circular which has been issued to the inhabitants of the Epping, Loughton, and Theydon Division of Essex by a candidate for the County Council, whose style has apparently found favour in the district, since he asks for re-election after "eight years' faithful service." He says:

I have always made it my fort to stand upon the platform of truth and justice in the interests of all classes and denominations within my constituency. I have always acted honestly and outspoken concerning every question of interest on your behalf, and indignantly opposed selfish complicity by wealthy representatives working for their own corners.

I know I am a thorn in the side of preremortory conclusion being obtained by hole-and-corner adoption in the interest of proclivitous feudal powers, and the sweating of the honest representation of the people by indirect influences.

If elected, I shall continue in the same old groove and conservatively work in the best interests of all classes.

As the candidate is resolved to "continue in the same old groove," we reserve the advice we might otherwise have tendered to him.

BETWEEN English of this type and English "as she is wrote" by the foreigner there is, of course, a wide difference. The latter seldom misses a certain pathos. Take the following letter recently received by a City firm:

Cape Coast Castle, Cape Coast,
16th January, 1901.

Messrs. —, Cheapside, London, E.C.

Dear Sirs,—Understanding from the News of papers lately published that your goods are also accountable to those of the mechanical importance in London, I hesitate not for your due consideration to be so good as to me Samples Price List and catalogue, in your firm. In Short I have abundant evidence to prove that I could without hesitation have send you an order for the goods. But that which cause me to hesitate a moment is the colour and the nicety for the goods. Briefly Speaking I mean to say I hope my hopes will not die out ere you send the samples, for other remittance.

Accompanied with the Samples. And do you feel duty inclined to comply with my request, by Sending me the samples—first. It will be my duty Since I am still in the natural world to be in the capacity of making some returns; for the many obligation your goodness or either your kindness will bestow on me.

With my best kind regards,

I remain, Dear Sirs, Yours Respectfully,

B— S—.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us a page from the Blairgowrie Parish Magazine, in which the growth of the "Rector's Library" is chronicled. Its shelves are filled largely with works which have been presented by authors at the rector's request. Sometimes an author was so far blind to the privilege offered him as to prove contumacious. Contumacious is the rector's word. A few others were (awful pravity!) "both contumacious and splenetic"; and one author, when asked to make a gift of his works to the library, "voided bile to such an extent that it was thought advisable to publish his letter in the Times, to show how ireful an author could become even without protest or provocation." The unwillingness of these authors to unload becomes almost inexplicable when we read that those who have already presented books include (we quote the list as printed):

4 Archbishops.	6 Knights.
19 Bishops.	1 Companion of the Bath.
8 Deans.	1 Cabinet Minister.
3 Archdeacons.	1 American Ambassador.
38 Canons.	1 Poet Laureate.
8 Prebendaries.	50 Principals, Fellows, and
113 Rectors, Vicars, &c.	Professors of Colleges,
1 King.	Editors, &c.
1 Prince.	2 Duchesses.
3 Dukes.	1 Marchioness.
2 Marquesses.	2 Countesses.
4 Earls.	1 Honourable.
3 Barons.	4 Ladys.
3 Baronets.	31 Ladies (Mrs. and Miss).

The most recent giver, not included in the above, is a "Countess-Authoress." We are further told that "the various Countries from out which the books have been drawn, wheedled, or coaxed are Wales, Ireland, Scotland, England, America, Canada, New Zealand, India, France, Germany, East Africa, South Africa, Italy, and the West Indies." Happy Blairgowrie! There is one thing that authors ought to know. It is, that escape from immortality at Blairgowrie is almost impossible when once you have heard from the rector. If you send a book it will be accepted, catalogued, and lovingly cared for by trustees. If you decline, your letter will be copied into the History of the Rector's Library.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "I have in my possession a translation of Victor Hugo's 'A une Femme,' by a Cork gentleman of considerable literary ability, a copy of which I now enclose, for it seems to me in some respects superior to the versions printed in the ACADEMY of February 9":

TO A WOMAN

From the French of Victor Hugo.

Were I a King, my empire uncontrolled,
My throne, my sceptre, and my subjects true,
My marble palaces, my crown of gold,
My mighty fleets that Ocean cannot hold,
I'd give for one sweet smile from you!

The waves' domain, bright earth and heaven's high bliss,
Angels and demons, trembling at my nod,
Chaos, eternity, the starr'd abyss,
The spheres and skies, I'd give for but one kiss
Of thine, were I the sovran God!

ANOTHER correspondent offers the following rendering:

TO A WOMAN.

Child, were I King I'd give my monarchy,
Car, sceptre, homage from my people due,
My golden Crown, my baths of porphyry,
My fleets for which too narrow is the sea,
All for one glance from You.

If I were God, earth, air, I'd sacrifice,
Angels and demons under my decree:
The deeps where teeming-bowelled Chaos lies,
Eternity and space, the spheres, the skies,
All for one kiss from Thee.

WHAT strikes us most in Miss Zoë Proctor's admirably compiled Birthday Book from the Writings of John Oliver Hobbes (Lane, 3s. 6d. net) is the blending of two wisdoms—the wisdoms of the world and the heart. The following sentences are, we think, fairly typical of the book, which will be very welcome to Mrs. Craigie's readers:

It is only a very unselfish man who cares to be loved; the majority prefer to love—it lays them under fewer obligations.

The secret of managing a man is to let him have his way in little things. He will change his plan of life when he won't change his bootmaker.

Are there many of us, or any of us, nowadays, who feel that there are certain things which we must do, not do, or perish eternally?

If one thinks about it—but one mustn't—it seems a strange thing that mothers, as a race, are ominously silent about the joys of existence.

The truth is only convincing when it is told by an experienced liar.

Poetry—and most of all amateur poetry—stands for pain. Every line of it spells woe. Either the writer, or those living with the writer, could tell a tale.

The art of dying daily is slowly mastered; but once learnt, it becomes an instinct—an unconscious will deciding all our difficulties.

He is never afraid of changing his mind. Many people are called firm, merely because they haven't the moral courage to own their second thoughts.

The merest half-belief in a living God will sustain many souls through adversities and trials of any picturesque or stirring order, but only the most exalted faith can give one the strength to bear in patience the misery of loneliness, the constant fret of uncongenial surroundings, the heavy burden of little woes, which, because they are little and common, are so humiliating.

Death in grotesque circumstances is none the less death, and the martyr to a fool's cause is still a martyr . . . it is the heart that makes the occasion.

What sum is too large to settle on a wife who can adore without asking questions?

It was no slight virtue . . . to have kept . . . after a life of sham passions and passionate shams—that indefinable Eve-like pathos which from the beginning conquered—and until the end will conquer—the rigour of strict criticism.

Busy men should not marry pretty wives.

Faust called in all hell in order to ruin one simple girl, and she, by her prayers to Heaven, saved his soul! . . . Love will get the better of the devil every time. . . . Love is the supreme power.

It is unnecessary to add that a great many of these Birthday Book sentences are taken from the lips of characters, and must be read with some reference to, or recollection of, their origin.

MR. ANDREW LANG is always interesting and impressive when he draws the portrait of a departed friend. In the March Longman's he writes thus of the late Bishop of London:

Of the Churchman I am not able to speak, but may bear a word of witness to the kind and constant friend, in whose company, for thirty years, I have had so much pleasure, never touched by an unkind word or look. His humour was as inexhaustible as his energy; his lifelong burden of heavy work, as a scholar, a teacher, a parish clergyman, a professor, and a bishop, he wore "lightly as a flower." Were it fitting, now and here, an anecdote could be told of his personal courage in endeavouring to save life, in circumstances very unusual and trying. His later duties, which to anyone else would have been most wearing, prevented him from completing his natural work as an historian, of which his book on Queen Elizabeth is the most easily accessible, and perhaps most useful and entertaining. . . . Imperishable youthfulness, swiftness, and keenness characterised his intellect.

THE Anglo-Russian gives an amusing account of the vagaries of a Russian press censor named Krassovsky, who, in the reign of Nicholas I., was the bugbear of poets. He not only blacked out all that he did not approve, but he often favoured the poet with criticism. A poet named Olline wrote the following verses, and was rewarded with the following criticisms by the censor:

What bliss to live with Thee, to call Thee mine,
My love! Thou Pearl of all creation!
To catch upon Thy lips a smile divine,
Or gaze at Thee in rapturous adoration.

CENSOR: "Rather strongly put. Woman is not worthy for her smile to be called divine."

Surrounded by a crowd of foes and spies,
When so-called friends would make us part,
Thou didst not listen to their slanderous lies
But Thou didst understand the longings of my heart.

CENSOR: "You ought to have stated the exact nature of these longings. It is no matter to be trifled with, Sir, you are talking of your soul."

Let envy hurl her poisoned shafts at me,
Let hatred persecute and curse,
Sweet girl, one loving look from Thee
Is worth the suffrage of the Universe.

CENSOR: "Indeed?!! You forget that the Universe contains Tsars, Kings and other legal authorities whose good will is well worth cultivating—I should think!"

Come, let us fly to desert distant parts,
Far from the madding crowd to rest at last,
True happiness to find when our (two) hearts
Together beat forgetful of the past.

CENSOR: "The thoughts here expressed are dangerous in the extreme, and ought not to be disseminated, for they evidently mean that the poet declines to continue his service to the Tsar, so as to be able to spend all his time with his beloved."

MR. E. V. LUCAS writes very pleasantly in the New Liberal Review on "Fighting Against Odds." He likes a good fight in a good story, and is not indifferent to it in a bad story. For illustrations of what has, and can be, done in this kind, Mr. Lucas draws on the Bible, Homer, Dumas, and the Sagas. "An adventurous romance," he says, without a strong man, a hero of Herculean grit, may be entrancing, even exciting, but it is not ideal. The psychological novel, the satire, the short story and the novel of manners may traffic in anæmia as they will; but the perfect romance must have muscle, must tell of at least one man of might; or, as Dumas in his handsome way used to have it, of iron:—D'Artagnan is "this man of iron"; Chicot, the superb Chicot, has "a wrist of steel." One might go further and say no story with a credible strong man in it can be altogether a failure. A paltry mind cannot invent a strong man. Even the strong man of the Penny Dreadful, machine-made and impossible though he be, predicates right instincts in his inventor. It is, perhaps, too much to say that one wants to read the story, any more than one wants to read all the romances deriving from Dumas via Stevenson and Mr. Haggard; but had one the power of life and death, as every serious reader must now and again wish he had, one would be lenient with the muscular school.

A REVIVAL of the short essay is not exactly the most probable of developments, though by many of us it would be welcomed. In the meanwhile some of the old essayists are, perhaps, too much neglected. A collection of Scottish writers, from the Earl of Sterling to Stevenson, ought not to be thought a superfluity; and it has been undertaken by Mr. Oliver Smeaton. Essayists like Hume, Lord Hails, Christopher North, Hugh Miller, and Dr. John Brown, with others, will be represented in the volume, which will be issued by Mr. Walter Scott.

A "MEMORIAL number" of the Argosy is devoted to an account of the reign of Queen Victoria. The number is admirably and profusely illustrated, and much editorial care has gone to the preparation of this comely and interesting record.

Bibliographical.

As a bibliographer, I am naturally pleased to find that the taste and feeling for bibliography is spreading. The publishers of the "Great Writers" series did a good deal for the art, or science, or pursuit (shall I call it?), when they arranged that each volume of the series should comprise a bibliography from the careful pen of Mr. J. P. Anderson. More recently the authoress of a biographical and critical study of Richardson was good enough to append a bibliography of that writer to her narrative-criticism. It was, however, meagre in detail—as meagre as the similar features in the recent books on Mr. Bret Harte (by Mr. Pemberton) and Mr. Swinburne (by Mr. Wratistlaw). I notice, too, that Mr. Baildon has compiled a bibliography, so-called, of R. L. Stevenson, for the volume about that writer which he has just issued. What he has supplied is very much better than nothing, but, like so many of its predecessors, it does not go sufficiently into particulars. Thus, Mr. Baildon tells us that "the four plays, 'Deacon Brodie,' 'Macaire,' 'Admiral Guinea,' and 'Beau Austin' were published in 1897." Now, as a matter of fact, the volume containing these four plays appeared in February 1896. But Mr. Baildon might have noted that three of the four ("Brodie," "Guinea," and "Austin") had figured together in volume form in 1892; and he might have added that all four plays have likewise been published separately (between 1896 and 1898). Those are precisely the sort of details that the bibliographer loves.

A complete and uniform translation into English of Tolstoy's writings, such as we are told to expect "anon," will necessarily be welcome to our reading public. Probably most, if not all, that the great Russian has written has appeared in English, but in all sorts of shapes, at all sorts of prices, and under all sorts of auspices. In the eighties a good many American versions had circulated in this country—Vizetelly and Walter Scott being, I think, the only English publishers who saw their way to the popularisation of Tolstoy in those days. The former issued an edition of Anna Karenina and also of War and Peace in 1886; the latter distinguished himself by issuing, in 1888-9, a set of Tolstoy's in seventeen cheap volumes. Scott, Limited, have continued to take a considerable interest in Tolstoy, who has also approved himself to Mr. Heinemann, the publisher of versions of Work While Ye Have Light, The Fruits of Enlightenment, and The Kingdom of God is Within You. In my humble opinion, not all that Tolstoy has produced is equally worthy of perpetuation; but, edited with judgment, such a uniform edition as that of which report speaks would be an agreeable addition to our libraries.

One is glad to see that Ralph Roister Doister is to be issued as a unit of the "Temple Dramatists," although it was included by Mr. Arber in 1869 among his "English Reprints," and is presumably still obtainable in that form. An edition of it appeared in 1821; it was edited by W. D. Cooper, with an introduction, in 1847; and it is to be found, of course, in Hazlitt's Dodgley. The new editors will no doubt busy themselves, as their predecessors have had to do, with the difficult and unsettled question of the date at which the comedy was written. It was long claimed by Eton that the play had been penned by Udall for performance by the boys there during his head-mastership of the school. Recent researches, however, point to 1552 or 1553 as the year in which Udall wrote his work, in which case, as Dr. Ward remarks, there is every likelihood that it was written for performance at Westminster School, the scene of Udall's second head-mastership.

Is it really true that we are to have a Brontë Dictionary, setting forth all the characters and localities described by the three sisters in their prose fictions? Surely the force of heroine-worship could no farther go? One could understand, and to a certain extent approve, the compilation of a Dickens Dictionary, which many have found useful as well as entertaining. A Thackeray Dictionary and a Walter Scott Dictionary would not be unacceptable; in fact, such guides to the creations of great authors who have been at once very productive and fertile in the invention of characters would always be tolerable and to be endured. But a chart to take us over the little "potato-patch" of the sisters Brontë—surely that is not needed?

Mr. Alfred Perceval Graves, who has just been delivered of a sonnet on the German Emperor, is one of the most modest, if not absolutely the most modest, of our minor bards. A stray lyric of his meets the eye occasionally, and that is about all. In book form his original work is rarely found. The latest edition of his Irish Songs and Ballads dates back, I think, to 1882; after that (in 1884) came a collection of Songs of Irish Wit and Humour; next, a booklet called Father O'Flynn, and Other Irish Lyrics (1889); and, finally, so far, an Irish Song Book (1894-5). Some day a gathering together of his best lyric performances will be indispensable to the happiness of verse lovers.

It is quite like old times to find Her Majesty's Tower staring us in the face on the bookstalls. There were days when William Hepworth Dixon was a power in the literary land, turning out book after book, each vying with the others in popularity at Mudie's. We all remember the to-do over Spiritual Wives. Her Majesty's Tower, which came out in 1869-71, was of a class of work which Dixon did excellently well—a class to which he also contributed Royal Windsor. That, by the way, would seem to be ripe for reproduction.

One of our publishing firms has for a long time been issuing a series of volumes called "The Story of the Nations." Now another firm announces a forthcoming series which is to be entitled "The Great Peoples." There's originality for you!

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Japan at Play.

Japanese Plays and Playfellows. By Osman Edwards. (Heinemann. 10s. 6d.)

DESCRIPTIONS of Japan are passing from the general to the particular, but the change is slow, and cannot wisely be accelerated. What has the Englishman really learned—from books—of these bright islands “east of the sun, west of the moon”? We make great war-ships and guns for the Mikado, and his almond-eyed sailors come and take them away. But whither? What co-ordinated picture have we of the Mikado's realm? We think of miles of cherry blossom, exquisite postures, the tea-house, the geisha, the rollicking rickshaw, the strange temples, the shuddering masks, the sails of innumerable junks on sapphire seas, and Fujiyama, queen of mountains, behind all. It is a kind of beautiful nightmare. And when we have catalogued the everyday and comprehensible sight of Japan, how much remains hid or half-hid; what a world of beautiful superstition and folk-lore, of strange ethics, difficult symbolisms, and what not, still curtain off Japan from our sight and understanding. Yet, as we have said, books written about Japan tend to speciality. A few years ago general descriptions were more rife; and it is but two years since Mrs. Hugh Fraser's book, A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan, admirably supplied the simpler need. Now, books dealing exclusively with separate phases of Japanese life begin to multiply, and it is a sign of the times that in a six months' visit Mr. Osman Edwards devoted himself chiefly to the study of the Japanese theatre. Chiefly, but not exclusively; and we are not sure but we shall find it hard to dwell on this element in his very interesting work. The intricate, multi-coloured whole of Japanese life fills the eye, and has power to defeat almost any attempt to fix our gaze on a part. One does not traverse the first chapter without being held by Mr. Edwards's account of the Japanese Press. More than a thousand newspapers minister to the curiosity of the gossip-loving Japanese, and the Press laws grow daily less stringent. A little while ago an American writer made some tabulations of American newspapers in order to show their relative depth of “yellowness.” But the yellowest of American newspapers would look chalky beside those journals which hit the popular taste in the land of the cherry-blossom. Libel is the mainstay of these prosperous organs, and what this means Mr. Edwards sufficiently indicates when he asks: “What would be thought of a London newspaper which should record so minutely the movements of a visiting prince as to chronicle the names of professional beauties visited by him, as well as the price paid for their transitory favours?” This by the way. And yet the turning of a few pages brings this yellow journalism, beloved of the masses, into weird contrast with the archaic Nō Dance, instinct with the high and holy things of mediæval Japan, which still delights the upper classes in their drawing-rooms. As Mr. Edwards points out, the Nō Dance is an instance of wisely arrested growth. It is comparable to our old English Miracle Play in naïve didactic intention, though far surpassing it in refinement and taste. Yet the Nō Dance holds a cultured audience of to-day in thrall, while a thousand newspapers are disseminating news, views, and scandal. A description of one incident in a Nō play will suffice to indicate the character of these strange spectral dramas. The Devil of Jealousy appears, wearing a frightful mask, and a mountain priest is summoned to exorcise the intruder:

Inch by inch the priest falls back, as the grinning demon with gilt horns and pointed ears slowly unveiled from a shroudlike hood glides forward to smite him with menacing crutch. To and fro the battle rages . . . ; neither holy man nor devil will give way; the screaming and shrill fitting of the musicians rise to frenzied pitch; adjuration succeeds adjuration, until the evil spirit is finally driven away. Nothing can exceed the realism of this scene, so masterfully played that the hardest agnostic must be indeed fancy-proof if he cannot feel something of the awe inspired into believers by this terrific duel. Moreover, this is exactly the sort of incident which exhibits to the full extent of their potency the peculiar characteristics of Nō drama. What human face, however disguised and distorted, could rival the malignant horror of a Japanese mask? What mincing and gibing M-phistopheles could compare for a moment with the devilish ingenuity and suspense of this posture-pantomime, with its endless feints and threats and sallies and retreats? And how the anguish of battle is enhanced by the “barbaric yawp” and sharp, intermittent drum-taps, which excite without distracting the spell-bound audience! So abrupt and discreet is the interjected cry of the immobile musicians that one might easily take it for the defiant or hortative outburst of an invisible spirit attracted to the ghosly combat. Indeed, all that is wild and primitive in these en/sants sautages of Melpomene is chastened in'to harmony by the innate sobriety of Japanese art. The creative instinct works within small limits by small means, but with these means it contrives to project on its tiny stage a vital suggestion of the largest issues. The gods become marionettes for an hour, without wholly losing their godhead.

Of Japanese popular plays, Mr. Edwards gives a very interesting account. It is curious that the national drama took its rise at about the same time as our own. In 1575 a runaway priestess, nam-d Okuni, gave her first theatrical performance at Kyōtō. In the following year the “Earl of Leicester's servants” were installed in their theatre at Blackfriars. But whereas our drama rushed into fullest bloom and gave us Shakespeare, Japan had to wait about fifty years for Chikamatsu and his fifty five-act dramas. These, strange to say, were written for marionettes, and to this day many actors retain the jerky motions of the dolls, on which their art was formerly modelled. In the popular, as in the religious, drama there has been arrested development, but whereas in the religious drama this has resulted in the preservation of a very beautiful form of entertainment, here the advantage is less apparent. Except in stage-craft, there has been no advance since the eighteenth century. “No development in construction and character-drawing, as we understand those terms, no change in the peculiar ethical and feudal teachings of the Yedo period, has supervened. Enter a Tōkyō theatre to-day and you will find yourself in old Japan, among resplendent monsters, whose actions violate our moral sense, yet exhibit a high and stern morality by no means out-modelled through the advent of modern ideas.” Instruction has always been an essential aim of the popular drama, which is deeply and irrevocably coloured by Japanese ideas and ethics. The Shakespearean drama has begun to interest Japanese actors and playwrights, but its presentation in Japan is declared “impossible.” To a Japanese audience the free talk of Rosalind and Beatrice, and even the masquerading of Portia in cap and gown, would be repellent. And as for the “Merry Wives of Windsor,” Mr. Edwards pithily indicates its probable reception by an anticipation of the criticism of the “Tōkyō counterpart of Mr. Clement Scott,” who, he thinks, would deliver himself something as follows:

This disgusting representation of the most loathsome of all Shakespeare's plays was unutterably offensive. So foul a concoction ought never to have been allowed to disgrace the boards of a Japanese theatre. The lewd maunderings of Sir John Falstaff; the licentious jesting of Mistress Ford, Mistress Page, and Mistress Quickly, must excite reprobation in all but those lovers of prurience and dabblers in impropriety who are eager to gratify their illicit tastes under the pretence of art. Ninety-seven per cent. of the people who laughed to see the fat knight smothered in a basket of dirty linen are nasty-minded people. Outside a silly clique, there is not the slightest interest in the Elizabethan humbug or all his works.

As a rule, the only things that fascinate the tourist in a Japanese play are the quaintness of the stage arrangements and the weird unintelligibility of the acting. The stage is enormous, and the actors reach it by walking through the audience on two platforms extending from the back of the auditorium to the footlights. Properties are removed during the performance by attendants in black cloaks who are supposed to be invisible. As a rule, two long plays are presented consecutively, with a tableau between, and the performances begin at ten in the morning. You leave your shoes at one of the many tea-houses round the theatre, and enter your box to find it supplied with a tobacco-box, tea, and cakes, with luncheon to come. The voices on the stage at once strike you as hard and artificial, and either too shrill or too gruff. But the reason is plain. "The traditional samisen, a three-stringed guitar, follows the performer like a curse from start to finish. Unless he pitched his voice above or below its notes, he could not be heard." There is no doubt of the effect on the audience. Especially do the wonderful facial expressions of the actors work upon the women. A rush to the "Tear Room" during a pathetic passage is quite common. There the susceptible playgoer may weep her heart out in comfort. As men and women are not allowed to appear on the same stage the female parts are taken by men; on the other hand, at some theatres, where the performers are all women, you may see male parts sustained by actresses. This is only one among the many conventions and restrictions which hamper the drama in Japan. Another is the extraordinary ascendancy of the actor over the author. A successful actor is the darling of the people, purses are thrown at his feet as he walks toward the stage, and love-letters are sent to his dressing-room, for "the Japanese matinée girl is very susceptible." He may make £5,000 in four weeks. The author is only one member of a kind of committee which devises the play, and his remuneration in trumpery.

When he comes to the music-hall songs of Japan, Mr. Edwards opens up the very interesting subject of "non-literary poetry." His contention is that what we recognise as real poetry often owes its position to extrinsic ornament, to tricks of rhetoric, and conventions of sentiment to which we have been won over; whereas, he thinks, there is often more real poetry (not literature) in verse which, though condemned as vulgar, goes to the heart and raises real emotion about real things, as distinct from secondary emotion about unreal things. Mr. Edwards's sufficiently daring illustrations are these:

Tennyson tells an Arthurian story, or wishes to, and his listeners are so charmed by the irrelevant embroidery of sound and simile that they do not perceive that what they obediently consider a naïf barbarian, the hero, is really a Broad Church country-parson in fancy dress. Mr. Swinburne writes an Athenian play, or intends to, and his readers are so ravished by the splendour of intrusive rhetoric that they are in no mood to distinguish between archaic piety and nineteenth-century free thought. Thus the modern crowns his Muse with paper roses, cleverly manufactured, while the true flower blushes undisturbed, or fades in humbler keeping.

In what keeping, then? Mr. Edwards instances Mr. Albert Chevalier's song of life-long love between husband and wife:

We've been together now for forty year,
And it don't seem a dy too much;
There ain't a lydy livin' in the land
As I'd swap for my dear old Dutch.

Or, again, Yvette Guilbert's rendering of a prostitute's remorse as she recalls her young innocence "is more intense, because less diffusely obtained, than by Victor Hugo in the case of Fantine."

With the foreigner's freshness of feeling and freedom of ear, Mr. Edwards comes to the Dodoitsu of the Japanese masses, which he declares is not so inferior to the aristocratic and infinitely elaborated Tanka or Haikai as is often assumed. In length it is intermediate, the Tanka containing thirty-one syllables, the Haikai seventeen, while the Dodoitsu has twenty-six. We need not remind the reader that brevity is the soul of Japanese poetry. Here is a Dodoitsu:

Nushi to neru toki
Makura ga iranu
Tagai-chigai no
Ote makura.

Mr. Edwards gives the nearest English equivalent, thus:

PILLOW SONG.

Sleeping beside thee
No need of pillow;
Thine arm and mine arm
Pillows are they.

Plebeian sentiment and everyday emotion run into thousands of such moulds, the degree of literary merit varying from nil to such prettiness as we find in this Dodoitsu:

REFLECTION.

Far from each other
Yearning for union
Good, were our faces
Glassed in the moon!

The Dodoitsu is nearly always a simple statement of a fact, a situation, a preference, usually without simile or metaphor. But when similes are used they are often as startlingly modern as those of the Tanka are rigidly archaic. Thus a lover expresses his despair in the lines:

Borne in no road-car,
Endless the railway
How shall poor I reach
Station at last?

—meaning that his love is life-long, and will last till he reaches the terminus of the tomb.

We have dwelt on those of Mr. Edwards's chapters on which he has himself laid most stress. His book is a valuable, a fascinating contribution to the popular knowledge of Japan; and its coloured illustrations by Japanese artists lend much distinction to its pages.

Theocritus.

The Idylls of Theocritus. Translated into English Verse by James Henry Hallard. (Rivingtons. 5s. net.)

THIS is a revised and corrected edition of the book which Mr. Hallard published some six years ago. It well deserves a reissue, for, on the whole, we take it to be the best metrical version of Theocritus that there is. It is very good indeed from every point of view: above all, it has the prime merit in a verse translation that it reads like good English verse. Mr. Hallard lays special stress in his preface on the pains which he has taken with his metre, and it certainly justifies his care. The hexameters, in particular, are the best English hexameters we have seen; and this for the precise reason he assigns—the attention he has paid to quantity. There are none of those pebbly syllables which trouble the current of other English hexameters, even the best. If the hexameter is to be used in English (and it is always alien, neither Greek nor English, for it is absurd to think it represents the classic quantitative hexameter) then this is the best, doubtless, that can be done with it. Mr. Hallard's style is excellent, and recognises the thoroughly literary and artistic style of Theocritus himself, which (as he truly says) is not represented by the rusticities of Allan Ramsay. It is a translation which one can read with pleasure, as one reads an original; and the translations of which that can be said might be counted on the fingers.

Theocritus is not merely a great poet, he is a source, an ancestor; a whole species of poetry descends from him—the pastoral. His is a beloved figure—perhaps the sweetest name and fame in the stern literature of antiquity. To name him is to call up some such picture as Mrs. Browning's:

Theocritus, with glittering locks
Dropped sideways, as betwixt the rocks
He watched the visionary flocks.

"Visionary"—yes, it is true, they were visionary; he was a poetic pretender after all, whose babble of shepherds and fields was written in polished Alexandria, as Thomson saw his sunrises in bed. Nothing could be falser than to regard him as a kind of Greek Wordsworth, whose songs breathe the rustic atmosphere he lived amidst and loved. It was a convention, this pastoral form: its author dwelt in the courts of kings, and had a right reverence for the brodered shoe of Ptolemy. Yet the convention was based on nature. Theocritus must have studied to some extent and with some intimacy the life he represents; perhaps like Virgil, in the earlier days before he became a courtly favourite. Virgil we know was a countryman, yet his pastorals never convince us of the country. Classicism, according to the eighteenth century conception, lay in generalising everything; and Virgil's pastorals are classic in this fashion. His shepherds have the air of belonging to a stage country, which might be set down anywhere. They would be just as probable—or improbable—in Windsor forest. But not so Theocritus. You look through his eyes, and see a landscape with figures which make you cry, "Ah! this I have not seen before!" It is individualised. Yet his object is not description; the individualising touches are only accessory, but they are the right ones. His eye for what vitalises a scene comes out in the smallest things. His shepherds, like Virgil's, call an arbiter to judge their singing-contest; the shepherd with the white-faced dog leaping among his flock. Virgil, if he thought of the dog, would have forgotten its bounds among the sheep, and above all would never have noticed that it was white-faced. It is that which gives you the dog, instead of a dog; and it is such touches which put life in Theocritus' background.

You know that country of his. It was "betwixt the rocks" that he watched his "visionary flocks"; for it was a rocky country, bordering the sea-shore, with pastures spreading inland, one fancies. The sound of the sea is seldom long absent from these pastorals, and he is as ready to sing of fishermen as of shepherds—nay, his fishermen have a whole pastoral to themselves. The frequent contrasts between the home of the field and the home of the rock show how contiguous were the two in the mind of the poet. His shepherds often live in caves, like Polyphemus, to whom two charming pastorals are devoted. One does not wonder he was a favourite with Theocritus; for by his love for the sea-nymph Galatea he seems to gather up in his own person the rocks, the pastures, and the sea.

The peasants of Theocritus, too, are thinkable beings, with passions single, primitive, and unrestrained. Love turns quickly to hatred or despair; and then the woman tries sorcery, and dreams of poison—for her lover, not herself. The girls are quite ready to make the first advances, by pelting the chosen shepherd with fruit, or other rustic hints. The formula of the poems varies little, but the fresh and sweet accessories keep monotony aloof. Sometimes, but not often, Theocritus indulges in set description. There is one famous instance, which Mr. Hallard has translated so well that we must quote it. It is the account of the symposium at the house of Phrasidemus:

There we rejoicing
Laid us deep on a couch of fragrant rushes and vine-leaves.
Poplars and rustling elms waved o'er us; a Sacred fountain Babbling and murmuring gushed from a grot of the nymphs hard by us;

Sunburnt merry cicalas aloft on the shadowy branches
Shrilled their ceaseless song, and afar in the bushes of bramble
Softly the tree-frogs chirped, and the crested larks and the finches
Sang, and the turtle moaned, and around those plashing waters
Darted golden bees; all things smelt richly of Summer,
Richly of Autumn; pears and apples in bountiful plenty Rolled at our feet and sides, and down on the meadow around us
Plum-trees bent their trailing boughs thick-laden with damsons.
Then from the wine-jar's mouth was a four-year-old seal loosened.

This shows Mr. Hallard at his best, and also exhibits his skill in handling the English hexameter. But it is seldom Theocritus elaborates his touches in this way. He is a master of suggestion, and has never been excelled in the art of miniature; his dramatic sense, too, is admirable; but the poem which exhibits all these qualities in the most perfect way is not a pastoral at all, it is an idyll of the city. All Theocriteans know it, and many poets have attempted its translation. Of all these efforts Mr. Hallard's seems to us the best, and so very good that we cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of quoting from it at some length. It is simply the dialogue of two women who go to the Adonis festival in Alexandria, which Ptolemy is celebrating with unusual splendour in his palace hall; but it bridges the ages in the most vivid way, and that Alexandrian festival becomes modern to us. It is a Greek Anstey, giving us a poetic Voces Populi. Note the art with which the milieu is indicated. As for the women, we know these good ladies; they are immortal as sex, and may be seen and heard at every London gathering.

GORG0: How out of breath I am! I hardly got
To your house alive out of the dreadful crowd
Of carriages and people. Soldiers' boots
And cloaks here, there, and everywhere—I thought
The way would never end. Your house, my dear,
Is really much too far away from ours.

PRAXIN0E: My madcap husband's fault. He came and took
At world's end here a beast's hole, not a house,
Merely to keep us apart, the jealous wretch!
And all for spite as usual.

GORG0: Hush, my dear!
Don't rail at Dinon so before the child.
Look, woman, how he eyes you. Never mind,
Zopyrion, dear, sweet boy, it's not papa
That mother talks of.

PRAXIN0E: By our Lady Goddess,
The baby understands us!

GORG0: But come, put on your mantle and your gown,
And let's be off to Ptolemy's palace-hall
To see the "Adonis." It is said the queen
Is planning something splendid.

GORG0: Oh, Praxin0e, dear,
Look at that dreadful crush about the doors!

PRAXIN0E: Oh, terrible! Gorgo, dear, give me your hand,
And, Eun0e, you take Eutycheis, and mind her—
No straggling—let us all get in together!

Oh, Eun0e, Eun0e, do stick fast to us!
Alack, now there's my mantle torn! O Sir,
As you would hope for happiness, mind my cloak!

STRANGER: I scarcely can, but I will do my best

PRAXIN0E: Oh, what a crowd! They push like pigs.
STRANGER: Cheer up.

Dear madam, all's well now.

PRAXIN0E: Oh, thanks indeed!
May all be well for ever and a day

With you, dear Sir, for shielding us!—What a good
Kind man!—Oh, there's poor Eun0e getting crushed!
Push, silly, push! That's right! "Now all are in,"
As cries the groomsman when he locks the door.

GORG0: Oh, come and look first at these broderies,
Subtle and lovely as the work of gods!

PRAXINOË: I wonder who the weaving-women were,
And who the draughtsmen that so deftly drew
These pictures! How like life they stand or move!
People, not pictures! Wonderful is man!
And there Adonis lies so fair to see
Upon his silver couch, youth's early down
Upon his tender cheek, the thrice-beloved,
Dead both to us and those that dwell below!

ANOTHER STRANGER: A plague upon your endless pigeon-prattle!

They'll kill a body with their Dorian brogue.

GORGO: Whence did this fellow come? What's that to you,

If we are prattlers? Lord it o'er the slaves
That you have paid for! Bully us, forsooth!
Ladies of Syracuse, who came of old
From Corinth, like Bellerophon—mark that—
And talk like people in the Peloponnese!
Since when may Dorians not talk Dorian, pray?

The range of the idylls, it will be seen, is really considerable. Another describes a boxing match. Sidelights slant continually on the intimate life of that old Græcised Egypt. You hear of their banquets in humble life, where snails and truffles form the delicacies—a menu that might find favour in France. And over all is the lovely grace of an artful simplicity, the uncapturable something which is Theocritus. It is the best compliment to Mr. Hallard that a suggestion of this has been retained in his version.

One of Last Year's Sieges.

The Siege of Kumassi. By Lady Hodgson. Illustrated.
(Pearson. 21s.)

In her preface Lady Hodgson remarks: "It is possible that some may think that here and there I have expressed opinions which are too candid." We suggest that it would have been better if some of Lady Hodgson's candid opinions had not been expressed at all; for example, the implication on pages 282 and 283 that the relief force might have accomplished its object sooner. "It seems strange," says Lady Hodgson, "that operations were not hurried on." And she asks: "Why was there so long a halt on the part of the column at Prashu, which is certainly not the most pleasant of places to spend a fortnight at?" There is no reason why the wives of besieged Governors should not write books about the perils they have passed, but they should not don the cloak of "our military expert." We want from them vivid, yet simple, descriptions of what they saw, not vague criticism of methods and events which did not come under their notice. Lady Hodgson, on her own confession, knew nothing about the Relief Force, or Colonel Willcocks's plans. But the world knows that Colonel Willcocks telegraphed from Fumsu, on July 4, that the rations of the garrison at Kumassi would last till July 15, adding: "I will personally relieve Kumassi on July 15." And he did. These being the facts, the implication that the Relief Force was lazy, and not sufficiently alive to the importance of their task, comes with ill-grace from the wife of the ex-Governor, speaking entirely without inside knowledge. Sir Frederick Hodgson's attitude was impersonal. Like the Sphinx he said nothing. Lady Hodgson suggests that the delay of the Relief Force was "due to waiting for a gun, but," she adds, naively, "I am not sure of the authenticity of this statement, for my husband would never talk to me about important official matters, nor would he satisfy my natural curiosity." Such reticence is commendable on the part of Governors whose wives write books.

Lady Hodgson naturally takes her husband's side in regard to the gold stool speech. "It is absolutely untrue," she says, "that the Governor demanded the delivery of the golden stool, and insolently claimed to be regarded as the king paramount of Ashanti." He demanded it for the Queen, we are told; and with a reference to the "calumnious correspondent" who recorded the speech the incident which "has been made the subject of misrepresentation in the Press" is dismissed.

On the whole, and with the help of Reuter's correspondent, whose report of the raising of the siege and the vicissitudes of the Relief Force are deftly sandwiched into the narrative, Lady Hodgson has given us a readable account of the thrilling episodes that preceded and followed the siege of Kumassi, one of the five sieges that marked the year 1900. It is a compact little story of suffering, pluck, and success, "in the worst climate in the world." Twelve days' journey from Accra stands Kumassi of many memories. Thither on March 13 of last year went Sir F. Hodgson, Lady Hodgson, with their retinue of hammock-bearers, &c., little dreaming of trouble. But trouble met them at Kumassi, in the shape of tribal disputes between petty kings. Who should be the King Paramount, and sit upon the golden stool? The Governor was called upon to adjudicate; but dissatisfaction was in the air, and soon certain tribes had risen, and Kumassi, like Ladysmith, Kimberley, Mafeking, and Pekin, was in a state of siege. They made sorties, they beat off attacks, they fought battles, till the joyful day when the Lagos Hausas arrived, but without food or ammunition. That meant that there were two hundred and fifty additional mouths to feed. On May 15 news came that large loads of food were being brought in. This was followed by the arrival of Major Morris with his troops from the northern territories; but, alas! the food turned out to be much less in quantity than the garrison hoped. Starvation threatened them; "leaves from the trees, grass, anything that was thought eatable, was eagerly sought for, and converted into food; all around us people were dying." As time went on, they ceased to talk of the relieving column, but of their own "march out." The "march out" took place on June 23. Necessity drove them away, for if they had all remained there would have been but three days' rations. So on June 23 the Governor, Lady Hodgson, with 600 native soldiers, under the command of Major Morris, started forth on what looked like a forlorn hope to reach the coast. They fought their way, suffered great hardships, and, finally, reached Accra on July 12.

The little garrison left at Kumassi under Captain Bishop had provisions for twenty-three days. "You are safe for that period," were the Governor's last words, "but we are going to die to-day"—a prophecy that, happily, was not fulfilled. The day after the Governor's column left three of the garrison died, and death visited them daily. On the tenth morning they gave up all hope of being relieved, but the officers "kept up an appearance for the sake of the men":

All were worn to skin and bone, but there were a few who, to relieve their hunger, had been eating poisonous herbs, which caused great swellings over the body. At last the rations consisted of a cup of linseed meal and a block of tinned meat about two inches square. Occasionally some native women would come outside the fort and off-r, at ridiculous prices, certain articles of food. These were greedily purchased, and many would have readily given three times the price asked. A piece of coco, usually costing the fraction of a penny, realised fifteen shillings, and bananas fetched eighteen-pence each. I paid fifteen shillings for a tiny pine-apple.

The news—and they had no means of knowing whether it was true or false—that filtered through to them was of the worst—that the Governor's column had been cut off, and that the Ashantis had a white man's head in their camp. But their sufferings were soon to end. On the morning of July 15th three volleys were heard in the direction of the Cape Coast road:

At 4.30 in the afternoon we heard terrific firing, which removed any doubts we had, and after opening a pint bottle of champagne—one of our few remaining medical comforts—we mounted the look-out, field-glasses in hand. It was very pathetic that even with relief at hand some of the men were just at the point of death. At 4.45, amid the din of the ever-approaching firing, we heard ringing British cheers, and a shell passed over the top of the fort, which was in the direct line of fire. We then saw shells bursting in all directions about 400 yards off, and we fired a Maxim to show that we were alive. Then to our intense relief we heard a distant bugle sound the "Halt!" and at six o'clock on Sunday evening, July 15, we saw the heads of the advance guard emerge from the bush with a fox terrier trotting gaily in front. Instantly the two buglers on the veranda sounded the "Welcome," blowing it over and over again in their excitement. A few minutes later a group of white helmets told us of the arrival of the staff and we rushed out of the fort cheering to the best of our ability. The meeting with our rescuers was of a most affecting character. Colonel Willcocks and his officers plainly showed what they had gone through.

So ended the siege of Kumassi. It is a record of pluck and endurance by all concerned, a brilliant page in the military history of a momentous year that had many brilliant and other chapters. We should much like to know what the Ashanti tribes think of it all, and what thoughts course through the dim brains of the petty kings when they sit in state upon their tribal stools and reflect that the golden stool now belongs to King Edward VII.

The First Question and the Last.

The Meaning of Good. By G. Lowes Dickinson. (Glasgow: Maclehose.)

THIS is an attempt to present in dialogue form, shaped on the Platonic model, something of the jangle of contemporary philosophising. And this has been done with such notable success as should secure for Mr. Dickinson's little book something more than passing notice. The characters comprise, among others, a chronic pessimist, a common-sense optimist, a biologist, a utilitarian, and the host who acts as moderator. The conversation is lively enough, and we may go as far as to say that the characters are sufficiently differentiated to give an impression of several minds at work—and that is already much to have achieved.

Audubon, from whose position of complete scepticism the discussion sets out, is realised and wins a certain personal liking. He doubts the validity of our judgment of good and denies freedom of choice, and, further, that choice implies the pursuit of good. A passage of dialogue follows which may be quoted as a fair sample:

"What!" cried Audubon, interrupting in a tone of half-indignant protest, "do you mean to say that it is some idea about Good that brings order into a man's life? All I can say is that, for my own part, I never once think, from one year's end to another, of anything so abstract and remote. I simply go on, day after day, plodding the appointed round, without reflection, without reason, simply because I have to. There's order in my life, heaven knows! but it has nothing to do with ideas about Good. And altogether," he ejaculated in a kind of passion, "it's a preposterous thing to tell me that I believe in Good, merely because I lead a life like a mill-horse. . . ."

"But if you don't like the life of a mill-horse, why do you lead it?"

"Why? Because I have to!" he replied. "You don't suppose I would do it if I could help it?"

"No," I said; "but why can't you help it?"

"Because," he said, "I have to earn my living."

"Then it is a good thing to earn your living?"

"No, but it's a necessary thing."

"Necessary, why?"

"Because one must live."

"Then it is a good thing to live?"

"No, it's a very bad one."

"Why do you live then?"

"Because I can't help it."

"But it is always possible to stop living."

"No, it isn't."

"But why not?"

"Because there are other people dependent on me, and I don't choose to be such a mean skunk as to run away myself and leave other people here to suffer. Besides, it's a sort of point of honour. As I'm here, I'm going to play the game. All I say is that the game is not worth playing; and you will never persuade me into the belief that it is."

The criteria of Good are examined—instinct, the general course of Nature, current convention, pleasure; all are found wanting. Book I. concludes with the suggestion that Evil is but appearance, and that experience may be a progressive discovery of Good. The second book is concerned with the content of Good and the way is precariously felt, through art and friendship and a great many other things, to love:

"All that I mean to maintain at present is that in the activity of love, as we have analysed it, we have something which gives us, if only for a moment, yet still in a real experience, an idea, at least a suggestion, to say no more, of what we might mean by a perfect Good, even though we could not say that it be the Good itself."

"But what then would you call the Good itself?"

"A love, I suppose, which in the first place would be eternal, and in the second all-comprehensive."

This, it is pointed out, either is unattainable or implies the immortality of the soul, and upon that the dialogue comes to an end.

But it is followed by an attempt to represent the main issues under such figures as a dream might furnish. Entering the third tower, over the door whereof was written: "I am the Heart; come into me and feel," the dreamer became aware of himself as a unit among myriads, involved and embraced in a network of fine relations of attraction and repulsion:

Of this system I was myself a member; about me were grouped some of my dearest friends; and beyond and around, stretched away, like infinite points of light, in a clear heaven of passion, the world of souls. I speak, of course, in a figure, for what I am describing in terms of space, I apprehended through the medium of feeling; and by "feeling" I mean all degrees of affection, from extreme of love to extreme of hate . . . ; and by their joint influence the whole system was sustained. It was not, however, in equilibrium; at least not in stable equilibrium. There was a trend, as I soon became aware, towards a centre. The energy of love was constantly striving to annihilate distance and unite in a single sphere the scattered units that were only kept apart by the energy of hate.

We have, perhaps, said enough to show that, if Mr. Dickinson does not pretend to have found the solution of the problem, his book will serve very admirably to give a general idea of how, at this beginning of a century, we do stand in relation to the oldest of all importunate questions.

Good Work.

French Life in Town and Country. By Hannah Lynch. (Newnes Ltd.)

THIS is the first volume in a well-conceived series of books, called "Our Neighbours," dealing successively with the domestic life of various countries. Miss Lynch has known France from her schooldays, has travelled through its provinces, and has made her home in its gay and cultured capital. She has France at her finger-ends as completely as is possible to an Irishwoman. Apart from her domicile Miss Lynch is a very interesting critic of life and literature. Hence all that she has to say about the dull doings of French country towns; about French home life and school life; about peasants, and shopkeepers, and artisans, and concièrges; about the Paris literary life and the life of fashion; about the Army and the Church; and about the relations of men and women in the world and in the family, is interesting and piquant. In the end, one's English preconceptions of French character are, in the main, confirmed, though with many nice deductions and distinctions well worth study. Miss Lynch's pages are thoroughly interesting and suggestive. Her style, too, is not common. It is marked by vivacity without any drawback of looseness, and resembles a stream that runs strongly and evenly between walls. It is at once distinguished and useful. But good writing is not rare nowadays, and it behoves us to ask what else Miss Lynch achieves. Well, for one thing, she can describe a character. The descriptive character sketch is not often seen nowadays, but one need but open one's Tatler or one's Lamb to know how good it can be. Miss Lynch's five-page description (not dramatisation) of the grasping Paris landlady is a capital piece of work. As a picture of petty avarice practised with system and affability it might be hard to match. Providing the worst and cheapest food, the commonest napery and table service, grinding the face of her bonne, the "little bourgeoisie" is a consistent though hateful person. She staves off unpleasantness with infinite tact, but when you are at last goaded by her parsimony into protest she is superior to confusion. "She will say to you, with that French independence I ever admire, that it is not your purse but hers that is in question; and I judge her to regard as idiots such saints as Martin of Tours and Francis of Assisi." Yet she is entirely free from self-indulgence. We like the firm touches Miss Lynch puts into her portraiture, though in the following passage the illustration she uses will not be accepted everywhere:

She swindles you, not for her comfort, but for the security of her old age. She is circumspect and formal in all her attitudes, absolutely self-respecting, of a cordial coldness; and there is something impersonal, something claustral, in her selfishness. I have remarked that nuns resemble her astonishingly in all their material relations with the world: the same implacable hardness, the same smiling austerity, the same lack of honesty or consideration of others, the same resolute determination to get the best of outsiders in the matter of labour or bargains, to give as little and obtain as much as possible in all transactions, to underfeed, to underpay, and overwork—and all with the same high air of self-approval and righteousness.

Such well-finished portraits are frequent in Miss Lynch's book, which is small, inexpensive, and of a real excellence. The book is prettily illustrated.

Other New Books.

BALLADS OF GHOSTLY SHIRES. BY GEORGE BARTRAM.

Mr. Bartram is not a poet of mark. He tells a plain tale plainly; nor is the tale very original or poetic, though it is drawn from country traditions. There is always a family likeness about such traditions, and we conjecture pretty well the development of the story. But he is an adept in wood-lore, his writing tastes "of Flora and the country green," the touches are fresh and observed, recent from the soil. This is no work of the city poet, after a fortnight of new milk and loafing on the grass. Moreover, he has a vivid vocabulary; and his descriptive passages, judiciously brief and sparing, have something of the true poetic touch and a fresh grace about them. He is, in truth, well worth reading, and has the distinction of writing narrative-verse well in a lyric age. Here is a specimen of his descriptive touch:

The dew is bright on leaf and blade,
The whin is strung with silver cord;
The dappled thrush in yonder glade
Is lavish of his slumber's hoard;
And, ah! the South hath a smack divine
Of new-mown hay and eglantine.

Athwart the budding of the dawn
I saw the spectral mowers pass,
Their valeward course below hath worn
A dewless riband on the grass;
And, hark, their whistling clear and shrill
Streams flute-like up the wooded hill.

Note that touch of the dewless track left by the mowers along the dewy grass—it is new, and straight from observation; while it is no less pictorial than intimate.

Or again:

Hood of fur and horseman's cloak,
And bludgeon stout of English oak;
What need we more, though the night be dark,
And the drift breast-high in the hollows?
Hark!

Two miles east doth Blaydon bell
Midnight-wanting-a-quarter tell.

It is a breezy, picturesque, taking little book, though unambitious withal. (Greening.)

WELSH POETS OF TO-DAY SELECTED AND TRANSLATED BY AND YESTERDAY. EDMUND O. JONES.

This pamphlet-like little anthology of translations from modern Welsh poets is notable for its selections from the work of one man—Islwyn, otherwise William Thomas. It is unfortunate that his best work is in Ode form, and, therefore, too long for complete quotation. It displays no common strength of imagination, at times approaching actual grandeur, with bold and elemental imagery. Mr. Jones, too, seems to have been inspired by it to do his best, and his translation is often excellent. Listen to these fragments from Mr. Thomas's "Night":

Come, Night, with all thy train
Of witnesses. I love
The stars' deep eloquence
That with the evening hours
Grows mute again.

The day is night which hides the stars from sight!

It is the Sun
That at its rising makes the infidel,
And all day long the world alone
Its tale can tell.
Oh, welcome, Night, that bid'st the world be still,
That through the stars eternity may speak.
Too early, Dawn, too early dost thou wake;
Too early climbest up the Eastern hill.

How glorious art thou, Nature, at midnight!
This is the midday of thy gloriousness,
For in the depth of night thou dost display
The roll of thy great ancestry to heaven,
Thy lineage from the eternal: in those hours
We hear thee singing of thy Father, God.

'Tis then
That gentle Nature bends a listening ear
To hear her fountains springing forth from God.
She hears the sound of waters on the hills,
Majestic roar, as though the torrent wished
The stars to hear it, and to tell their God
He still has left upon the hills a voice
Of never-ending worship.

The other poets translated show mediocrity in English, whatever they be in Welsh. But such passages as we have quoted make it well worth the reader's while to gain acquaintance with this Cymric singer, hitherto hidden from English knowledge—"Islwyn." (Llandudno: John Ellis.)

MODERN ABYSSINIA.

BY AUGUSTUS B. WYLDE.

Abyssinia has suddenly jumped into favour with authors. Mr. Herbert Vivian's book was a pleasant and gossipy account of travel as far as Harrar; Mr. Wyld's book is a much more serious affair, and, among other things, deals with his journey to Harrar and then through

Abyssinia from south to north. But the volume is far more than an account of recent travel; it contains a most useful sketch of the history of the country, which will be completely new to most readers; a study of its geography; a very full account of the Italian Campaign of 1896, which is the most important event in the modern history of Abyssinia; descriptions of the architecture, agriculture and domestic animals of the people; information on the different provinces; and hints on shooting in Abyssinia and on its borders, and on the rifles and outfit required. Moreover the Appendices contain the text of the most important treaties of late date, a note on the rainfall of the country, a list of the animals found in Abyssinia, of the chief market towns, and of the titles of the native nobles, and other matters useful to travellers. It will thus be seen that the book contains in a handy compass all that most people can possibly want to know about the country. Mr. Wylde was formerly Vice-Consul for the Red Sea, and, therefore, speaks with authority, though unfortunately he does not write in polished English. The country is one with which we shall probably have more intimate relations in the future, and without some idea of its history it is impossible to appreciate current events. A portrait of Menelik serves as frontispiece, and there is a good map of Eastern Abyssinia. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

Assuredly that must be a great cause which articulates itself in a work so voluminous, so ugly, and so unreadable as Ecumenical Missionary Conference, New York, 1900 (American Tract Society, New York). As we turn the endless pages, we glimpse a lady missionary describing the "Glory Kindergarten" in Kobe, Japan; a secretary beginning his speech: "Let us in imagination take our stand 100 years ago, and survey the world. It is the year 1800; let us look round the world"; a delegate declaring that "the task of representing no less than fifteen Dutch missionary committees, though full of honour, puts me in a difficult position"; and a lady speaker telling this anecdote: "A brilliant literary woman of Boston, prominent as a lecturer before clubs, found that in her crowded life a selection of reading must be made, so she ruled out fiction and substituted missionary literature, and felt rewarded, both intellectually and spiritually, for so doing." The work is an encyclopædia of missionary lore and language; it is also a wonderful memorandum of Christianising work done or planned the world over.

We should like to think that some day we shall look down on the golf-links at Helwân in the Egyptian desert, and employ a white-robed stalwart Arab as our caddy? Trains to Cairo (half an hour's run) twice in the hour, the Step Pyramid (the oldest in the world) close by, the tombs of Mera and Kaben and Ti to explore, lawn tennis, tomb paintings 3,000 years old, bicycling, camels resting under dom palms, electric baths, picnics in the boundless desert: these delights Helwân offers through its eulogists, Dr. W. Page May, Prof. A. H. Sayce, and Prof. G. Schweinfurth. Their joint book is only a pocket volume (prettily issued by Mr. George Allen), but it beckons to Helwân.

Sugary and clerical are the words for The Poet of Home Life: Centenary Memories of William Cowper (Home Words Office). What typical pulpit ingenuity shines in the opening words of the Preface: "There are millionaires and—millionaires. Cowper was a true millionaire, both in possession and giving," &c.!

An enlarged edition of the Rev. George Miller's little book entitled Rambles Round the Edge Hills (Stock, 6s.) is the result of great research. The book is a microscopic survey of one of the least spoiled portions of rural England, and the very names of the villages whose annals are collected are a symphony: Warmington, Arlescote, Shotteswell, Avon Dassett, Kineton, Compton Verney, Whatcote, and Idlicote. Mr. Miller is master of his subject, and his account of the Battle of Edge Hill is as thorough as it is concise.

Fiction.

The Believing Bishop. By Haverall Bates.
(Allen. 6s.)

You have here one of those disturbing books which aim a blow at the foundations of the whole social organism. Other novels, such as In His Steps, have attempted the same thing, but with no disturbing effect, since they were backed by neither intellectual force nor imaginative force. The Believing Bishop is different. We speak cautiously when we say that, despite some rather obvious defects, it is a powerful and brilliant work, a rare example of the legitimate use of polemics in fiction. Its theme is by no means new. Perhaps the author was actuated by a desire to do for the literate what Mr. Sheldon of Topeka did for the illiterate. The hero of the story, the Rev. Albert George Ransome, at the age of thirty-five, has attained to the dignity of the wardenship of Muriel College, Oxford, when he is led to ask himself the question, What would Jesus do? and to act accordingly. His adventures constitute the book. He becomes a bishop. At first his saintly fervour makes him the idol of that society which plays with religion like a toy; but soon his deeds, and particularly his excessively awkward questions both to superiors and inferiors, estrange him from all. He is regarded as an eccentric, then as a crank; and his brother-in-law, a plutocratic peer, wants to get him into a lunatic asylum. Later, the believing bishop perceives that he cannot remain a bishop and keep his ideal. He resigns the bishopric (which involves resigning his wife and children), and takes a small East End parish. Again, by reason of this striking sacrifice, he is idolised by the triflers, and again these fall away, bored, angry, scandalised. Finally, circumstances compel him to give up the living. He dies miserable but triumphant in the cottage of an artisan.

The book is a satire whose bitter but subdued ferocity is justified by continual intellectual acuteness and a great deal of wit. The author is intimately acquainted with the Church and church dignitaries, and he spares none. The story consists chiefly of conversations, in which the believing bishop patiently supports his theories by arguments and Socratic questions. The character of the wife is drawn with skill; and one of the best episodes in the book is her conversation with Canon Senior of Ingot College when she fears that Ransome may refuse the bishopric.

"... He wants to refer everything to the standard of Christ's earthly life. Now as that life is over, is it not possible to press the point too far?"

The Canon hesitated, smiled benignantly, and then said in cautious, soft speech, "There again, Mrs. Ransome, you raise a great question. I almost feel inclined to think that the Church is with you in a way. She has to teach the faith once for all committed to her sacred keeping, and she has to organise worship, and duly administer the holy sacraments. Still, you may remember, the Holy Apostles did attach considerable weight to the facts of our blessed Lord's earthly life. In fact, I do not remember any of the Fathers mentioning this difficulty in this connexion. Personally, and apart from any theological doctrine, I do not see how any man could err in imitating the Divine Exemplar."

(Our italics.) Another Canon in the book, the literary Canon Dreffil, is delicious: "He had no command of language, but words had complete ascendancy over him." But the story abounds everywhere in brilliant cruelties. The faults of the book are shortly these. The incident of the mad undergraduate at the beginning is artistically wrong; it doesn't convince, and it is unnecessary. The author's philosophising is sometimes facile and superficial, not to say redundant, as on pp. 102-3. Thirdly, he has an inclination towards symbolic incident, which is quite out of place in a novel otherwise realistic: an instance is that of the Roman Catholic priest and the Salvation Army captain on p. 7.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Revision of a selection will follow.]

A BICYCLE OF CATHAY. BY FRANK R. STOCKTON.

A good example of Mr. Stockton's quiet and pleasing humour. The narrative is put into the mouth of a pleasant—indeed, judging by the picture on page 146, a magnificent—youth, who is the teacher of an American village school. He spends his vacation touring on a bicycle. His adventures are generally peaceful and always delightful. The character-sketches are deft. The humour of the book must not be judged by its title. "A Bicycle of Cathay" is the name the narrator gives to his machine—an adaptation of Tennyson's well-known line. (Harpers. 6s.)

THE NEW MASTER. BY ARNOLD GOLDSWORTHY.

The humour of Mr. Arnold Goldsworthy is of a different kind. The grain is coarser, and the point is hammered home, whereas it is Mr. Stockton's way to suggest that he who seeks humour may find it lurking. Mr. Goldsworthy's book is the autobiography of a schoolmaster during term time. "Dr. Bunberry had offered me the post of assistant-master in his very select School. My education stretches from the Græca Grammaticæ Rudimenta to halfpenny nap; and my moral character is such that in all the years I have used it I have never been found out." (Pearson. 3s. 6d.)

A NARROW WAY. BY MARY FINDLATER.

Belongs to the domestic class of novel, and is touched with a certain fragrance, although the scene is laid in a crescent off the Kentish Town-road. The author herself proclaims it to be a "domestic story," and remarks that "it runs to an old-fashioned and domestic end." This unassuming book contains clever character-sketches of an old and a young woman, and some graceful verses "To an Old Lady" as prologue. (Methuen. 6s.)

THAT SWEET ENEMY. BY KATHERINE TYNAN.

An Irish story of the olden time. It opens at the Rosery, the dower house of the O'Doherty ladies. Near by is the home of their ancestors, Castle Flinn, from which they have been dispossessed. And to Aunt Theodosia "the wound is fresh as yesterday." A spirited, lightly touched story, brimming with pleasant Irish names. (Constable. 6s.)

THE ROYAL SISTERS. BY FRANK MATTHEW.

Mr. Matthew is faithful to the historical novel. "Now that Queen Elizabeth reigns gloriously, the tale of her struggle with her sister is unknown or perplexed, so I record all I beheld of it. Not many knew more of that time when I was Admiral of England, and witnessed the irrational hopes, miserable tyranny, and final despair of an unfortunate Queen." (John Long. 6s.)

VERONICA VERDANT. BY MINA SANDEMAN.

This is the autobiography of Veronica—a wild young thing. On page 23 she reflects: "I suppose I possess the fatal gift of fascination. My alluring little wiles are part of myself." Chapter V., which is called "I am Kissed," contains a novelty in our experience of novels. Aunt Daisy advises Veronica to use a certain cream for her complexion, and at the bottom of the page is this footnote: "By the way, —'s Cream may be obtained at the Junior Army and Navy Stores." The volume is dedicated to "The Blessed Angels in spheres of light," &c. (John Long. 6s.)

THE BLUE DIAMOND. BY L. T. MEADE.

It disappears. Suspicion, of course, falls on the wrong person, the kind and unselfish daughter of a rector, and many troubles follow. So practised a hand as Mrs. Meade's can hold the skeins of a complicated story like this with skill and apparent ease. Ardent novel readers will find the story absorbing. The end is dramatic. (Chatto. 6s.)

THE REDEMPTION OF DAVID CORSON. BY C. F. GOS.

This is another American novel, which comes to us trailing rumours of "an enormous sale" across the Atlantic. Ohio, in the spring of 1849, and a Quaker boy in the quiet landscape. He is a dreamer of dreams, a natural mystic, but a pretty gypsy trips across his path, and for a time the world holds him tight. He runs, to quote the advertisement, "the whole gamut of vice, and is entangled in crime." But love redeems him, and in the end, though his sins were as scarlet, &c., &c. (Methuen. 6s.)

LOVE AND HONOUR. BY M. E. CARR.

A first novel by a new writer, with this motto on the title-page from Boswell's Life of Johnson: "You know courage is reckoned the greatest of all virtues; because, unless a man has that virtue, he has no security for preserving any other." The leading theme of the story is the conflict between love and honour in the mind of one of the characters, a colonel in the Prussian army. The opening chapter is laid in Westphalia. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THE EMU'S HEAD. BY CARLETON DAWK.

A yarn, a rattling yarn, is this "chronicle of Dead Man's Flat." The prologue opens in Melbourne on a stormy night. "Great Boreas!" writes Mr. Carleton Dawk, "how the night roared, how the rain hissed . . . Whew! Was ever such a night for gods or men?" Mr. George Vincent, hurrying home, hears "Help—help!" "They've murdered me," groaned the poor wretch, and before dying he gives George a pocket-book which tells where the treasure Hall took from the Mount Marong escort is hidden. Then begins Chapter I. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE MASTER PASSION. BY BESSIE HATTON.

This is the story of Dolores, her rebellious childhood, her life in a convent, and "the tragedy of her love." Dolores was a "peculiar girl," who bit her nails, and flew into passions, and, as a child, loved nobody but her father; so she was sent to a convent in Normandy, where she made friends with Drusilla, the English governess, who prophesied that, when Dolores grew up, she would learn "to love poetry very much." Drusilla was already grown up, and "the works of Shelley, Swinburne, and Shakespeare were more precious to her than anything in the world." (Pearson. 6s.)

A HONEYMOON IN SPACE. BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

This is a typical specimen of the new wonder-of-science romance. The hero and heroine are seen in the frontispiece, carefully dressed, and with hair neatly brushed, looking out of the window of their air-ship, each holding a glass of morphine wherewith to purchase death. Suddenly the heroine espies the earth. "Thank God—the earth!" Meanwhile, the captain of the St. Louis, in mid-Atlantic, has been trying to wipe them off his telescope glass. (Pearson. 6s.)

We have also received: A State Secret, with nine other stories, by B. M. Croker (Methuen, 3s. 6d.); The Sin of Jasper Standish, by "Rita" (Constable); Two Sides of a Question, by May Sinclair (Constable); The Mayor of Littlejoy, by F. C. Smale (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.); The Survivor, by E. Phillips Oppenheim (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.); The Shadow of Gilsland, by Morice Gerard (Horace Marshall, 3s. 6d.); Time's Fool (Douglas, 6s.); A Racecourse Tragedy, by Nat Gould (Everett).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)..... 17/6

„ Quarterly 5/0

„ Price for one issue /5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Bad Novel.

An Enquiry.

A NOVEL is bad not so much because the novelist cannot say what he has to say as because he has nothing to say; but both disabilities contribute to the badness, for, by a wise ordinance of nature, he who bears a message can always, somehow, deliver it. Most often the bad novel arises from an accident. A fleeting impulse, a chance remark, even an idle hour, and lo! the bad novel is born. The prospective bad novelist thinks or hears either "How nice it would be to write a story!" or "What a splendid idea for a story!" and he answers: "Why shouldn't I try? I will." Usually, we fancy, it is the curiosity to experience what writing is like, and not the desire to embody a given idea in literary form, that makes the silly scribe, whose feeling is that it would be rather "fun" to do as Thackeray did. The splendid idea follows, forced unnaturally into existence by the piquancy of the desire. So the paper is bought, the pen dipped, and the novel begun. Now, the bad novelist is commonly a somewhat clever and versatile person, with a certain facility, and his first, if not his last, sensation is one of surprise at the easiness of writing narrative. And merely to write narrative is easy; we all do it in our letters—we write narrative "without knowing it." Indeed, anyone—a tea-merchant or an engrossing-clerk—could produce a novel—that is, a connected and coherent invented narrative—if he doggedly persevered; it might be inconceivably fatuous, but it would be a novel; printed, it would deceive the eye of a Ste.-Beuve at a distance of three feet. And the bad novel deceives the eye of its author, as he writes it, at a distance of a foot. It looks like a novel; it has all the customary apparatus of chapter-divisions, short lines, indented lines, inverted commas; it is a novel. The author is encouraged to continue; he continues and he finishes; and, once in a hundred times, by some error of destiny, the novel is published. We calculate that the bad novelists of the United Kingdom, driven by curiosity or the force of an idea, or, perhaps, by poverty, produce several hundreds of irredeemably bad novels each week; so that, though only 1 per cent. of them gets as far as the laughter of compositors (if compositors ever laugh), the number reaching this office in a year is quite considerable. We will briefly examine one or two of the finest specimens, dealing first with the matter and then with the manner.

The bad novelist, instead of finding a central idea for an environment, invariably finds an environment for a central idea. With him the Idea is uppermost. His pseudo-creative impulse is not the vague resultant of long observation and an inclusive sympathy, but a precise and defined inclination to relate something unusual, bizarre or astonishing. The bad novelist has the same false notion as the crowd of amiable friends who persist in annoying the good novelist with the remark: "I have met such a queer man, or heard such a queer incident—I am sure you would be interested—it certainly ought to go into a book." He has not guessed that the aim of the novelist is to discover beauty in the normal, not to provide a literary freak-show; that, in fact, the novelist is attracted by the abnormal about as much as a painter would be attracted by a woman with twelve fingers or a beard. And so the bad novelist goes in search of, or is seized by, the startling Idea; and the more startling it is, the more pleased he is with it. In one novel now before us, the Idea to be envired is as follows: a rich and worldly widowed lord, who is also a painter, finds a female infant of surpassing loveliness. He causes her to be brought up on a remote estate in Norway, where her life is so arranged that she shall never see a man. The lord's son, so adroit is his father's scheming, falls in love with a marvellous portrait of a woman from the lord's masterly brush, and on attaining his majority he is sent to the estate in Norway under sealed orders. The orders being unsealed, the son reads thus: "Ivor, my son, by the grace of Providence, you will now look upon the original of my famous picture, chaste, pure, and undefiled, and she will see in you the first man she has ever beheld! And, best of all, I know that you already love her!" The pair marry. There is the Idea, hypnotising the bad novelist, who very probably thought that in it he had happened on an entirely original method of contrasting the "belles of society" with the perfect woman. And now the author sits down to accomplish the embodiment, and one can almost hear him enquiring, "How ought I to begin?" The obvious course is to ask, "How do other authors begin?" And this is just what he does ask, and, having ascertained the answer, begins accordingly. Observe, it never occurs to him to begin by examining life and nature anew for himself. The mere Idea has already carried him far away from all considerations of truth and probability. In the present instance he begins with the reception held to celebrate the son's majority. There is no general description of it, but a few disconnected "bits," which he has evidently remembered or excogitated one by one, and strung together. The attitude towards "society belles" is sarcastic. "The two girls squeezed our hands with the formula smile, lifted their precious silks about their legs, and squeezed into the carriage in front of their mother, whose enamelled shoulders shuddered a moment in the night air." And later on are such phrases as "veiled vulgarity," "sous-entendu doubly clear and disgusting to a refined creature." Such observations, as they presented themselves to him, he would certainly deem both original and effective. We next come to the father's portrait of the mysterious damsel. The author's purpose is to make this picture impressive, and the means which he adopts are exactly those which would be used by a man ignorant both of life and art. "Unanimously pronounced by the Press as the accomplishment of the year. Such was the witchery of this famous work that little knots of fascinated picture-lovers would linger at the canvas during its tenure at [sic] the Academy and gaze upon it long and with swimming eyes, unconscious of the fleeting time, and marvel at the wonderful beauty of the dreams which it inspired rather than at the radiating loveliness of the picture itself." Now, if the bad novelist could have walked out of his study, had a cold plunge, gazed inimically into the mirror and said to his face: "Do people stand long rapt and with swimming eyes before pictures in the Academy?" there might have been hope for him. But of such a feat of detachment he is constitutionally incapable, and so, gaining momentum page by page, he wanders further and further away from reality. He is lost. Often you can see him puzzling where to go, what to say next, and saying the most ludicrous things in his bewilderment. As thus: "It being bad form to notice any peculiar habits or fads of one's guests, I have no very clear impression of the Lord Archibald's conduct as he left the house." Or again: "That, said as it was with a dreamy, far-away look, would have flattered some men and made them sensible of an unconquerable desire to throw their arms round her neck and embrace her, or raise her hand gently to the lips and imprint upon it a kiss full of the profoundest meaning. Such, however, was my father's training that my mind was entirely innocent of any leaning in that direction." And so the bad novel continues, at haphazard, an inconsequent farrago of conscious and unconscious imitations interspersed with original fatuities, until the last ecstasy—"Ivor, my own, my dearest love, now we shall be together always, on earth and in heaven, always, always together." The Idea is clothed.

In regard to the manner of the bad novel—by which we, of course, mean the literary manner—the commonest and most pervading characteristic of it is the tendency to write, not in words, but in phrases. As Schopenhauer said of unintelligent authors: "They combine whole phrases more than words—phrases banales." There is no clearly defined thought. "It is only intelligent writers who place individual words together with a full consciousness of their use, and select them with deliberation." The subject of phrases banales is much too large to be entered upon here. The habit of thinking in phrases leads, by a curious attraction, to the habit of imagining in episodes or lumps of event, instead of detail by detail. Thus, when a hero is suddenly called away on a journey, all the rigmarole of acts previously performed by other heroes so placed is set out in full. "I scribbled a few brief notes, cancelling the engagements I had contracted"; or, at the end of the journey: "I at once dismissed the driver with a fee that made his old eyes sparkle." It is the same with descriptions: they are conceived in a chunk; there is none of the minutiae of invention, but a vague reminiscence of some remembered whole. Thus, the account of a young lady's boudoir (in a novel which opens: "Everybody knows Champington, the little town nestling in the Surrey hills") begins: "The room was tastefully and elegantly furnished in a style that signalled a woman's inspiration"; then follows a page and a-half of descriptive clichés; and the last phrase is: "Odour of roses and mignonette." Even there the bad novelist cannot drop his chunk of remembered episode, for on the next few pages we meet with these locutions:

Sol shot his beams of light athwart the window.

So, at least, Sol seemed to say to Alice Lawson, a winsome . . .

"How delicious!" she cried, taking a deep inspiration of the flower-scented air.

"Heigho!"

Now, why do young girls say "Heigho!" often when they have not a trouble in the world?

Nine pages elapse before the bad novelist is able to free himself from the spell cast by the incantatory phrase, "The room was tastefully and elegantly," &c.

The bad novelist betrays himself by his nomenclature and his headings. The aristocratic lover of our Norwegian paragon is styled "The Hon. Ivor Treherne"; when the bad novelist wants to create a person of true distinction, he always, as a first step, calls him Treherne, or Dalrymple, or Anstruther. Here are some of the chapter-headings from the Champington novel—"A Baffling Quest," "Toilers in Babylon," "Link by Link," "Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise," "Alas!" "A desperate dilemma."

To conclude, the most pathetic literary shortcoming of the bad novelist is his entire inability to say what he wants to say—a shortcoming not often noticeable because he so seldom wants to say anything in particular. There are rare moments, however, when one can perceive that he really has something on his mind. To witness his struggles then is painful. The expert penman is frequently conscious of having, despite himself, written differently from his intention, of having compassed a passage, but not at all the passage. The bad novelist, by simple amateurishness, "never gets anywhere near" his real thoughts. He is continually stultifying and falsifying himself, posing as a bigger fool than actually he is. That is his tragedy, which he does not suspect.

Things Seen.

Home-Sick.

By occupation he was a clerk, with a passion for long country walks, which he indulged every Saturday and Sunday. He always carried a knapsack and a sleeping sack: where he slept on Saturday nights he and the sky alone knew. He was an inarticulate, brooding man, and nobody troubled, so far as I knew, to learn if there were any deeps of his soul worth exploring. But he had his compensations—those lonely walks. They, I am sure, were his life: his clerking was a detail. When the formation of the Imperial Yeomanry set the hardy youth of England on fire, he applied for his fortnight's leave from the bank and learned to shoot. Later he was enrolled. He did not tell us the day of his departure, but slipped quietly off to Southampton, and we did not know he had left us till he was gone. He was easily forgotten. He left no vacant place.

A year later he was invalidated home. We welcomed him, and tried to do him honour, but he evaded our protestations. He returned to the bank, and after office hours avoided his fellows with singular success. He was more taciturn than ever, refused to talk about the war, and though he had quite recovered from the fever, it was plain that he was an ill man. He grew pale, he lost weight, till the day came when the Government called for more yeomanry. Then, suddenly he awaked. Hope changed him. He looked ten years younger. He was a man with a future. Some great emotion buoyed him up. The night before he sailed he became communicative. Then I understood. His forbears had called, and they would be no longer denied. Town life had touched only the surface of him. He was home-sick for his real home—grass, sky, and hills. He had known the life of the veldt, and nothing else could ever content him. "Oh!" he cried, "after marching all day to lie down on the young grass, and to go off into a dreamless sleep with the great sky overhead, and the decent sounds of free life about you. The colouring, the distances, the smell of the air. That's living, while here ——" The next day he went back—home.

"About the best thing——"

It was a dismal afternoon, and the faces of the passengers reflected the gloom of the dreary streets. We lumbered heavily along, stopping at a corner to fill the one seat that completed our load.

I looked up mechanically as a mass of black drapery trailed itself across my boots. My eyes were instantly held by the beauty of a woman's face. They rested there longer than politeness allowed; but I saw that I need not trouble to look away from a fear of disconcerting the owner of that rare beauty, for she was as unconscious of my admiring interest as of the other pairs of eyes that watched her too. It was nothing to her that we found her good to look upon; one felt that she must have been so always, and the fact was as self-evident as the world about her.

She was not haughty, or contemptuous, merely indifferent as she sat with a certain placid serenity, curving the lines of her half-smiling lips. Thick dark lashes rested like a shadow on the pale oval of her cheek, and were not lifted for an instant. In spite of the becoming modern garments that she wore there was something ageless, dateless, in her mien; an almost classic air, with not so much as a link or touch of any circumstance, environment, or epoch.

We were no longer dull and commonplace. Some unsuspected latent beauty—I am convinced it was no fantastic personal delusion—crept into the dull countenances around in answer to the compelling beauty before our eyes. It was wonderful that transient gleam, in response to an unspoken call. The dowdy matron in the corner smiled as she rose to get out, smiled as she lingered a moment on the step, and turned again to look on that rare face to imprint it deeper on her mental vision; and for the smile's sake I forgave her a gaping buttonhole that hardly constrained its button!

I quoted to myself Fra Lippo's words as I, too, stepped out into the fog. They meant the same as the matron's smile:

If you get simple beauty and nought else,
You get about the best thing God invents.

French Idioms.

As soon as a student has mastered the rudiments of any foreign language, the great stumbling-block which besets him is the difficulty of forming his phrases as the foreigner himself would shape them. In other words, he must learn to think in the new vehicle for expressing such thoughts as he may possess and wish to communicate to the world. There are many men who acquire a great fluency in speaking French, and conversely Frenchmen who speak English with readiness, who have really no knowledge of the tongue, and merely translate from their own language literally, preserving the very form and spirit of the sentences of their mother tongue. They think in English or in French, as the case may be, and then with the aid of a mental grammar and dictionary translate their thoughts into the language of their interlocutor. This is a very primitive stage in the speaking of foreign languages, but there are many who never get beyond it. Such a facility is easily acquired; but to those who are more ambitious it is necessary to use the idioms and phrases of the foreigner, and to think and even to dream in his manner.

About a quarter of a century ago M. de la Morinière published an admirable book on French prepositions and idioms, which was admirably adapted to smooth the way of the student desirous of handling those perplexing particles, the prepositions, with ease and grace. As a companion book we are glad to see a third and greatly enlarged edition of Mr. Payen-Payne's French Idioms and Proverbs (Nutt), for though, of course, it is not as important a work as M. de la Morinière's, it is extremely useful to those who are anxious to speak or to read idiomatic French with understanding. Many French proverbs require no explanation; they are simply the French form of the phrase which, like the corresponding English phrase, is taken from a common source. For example, "La belle plume fait le bel oiseau," which no one could mistake for anything but our own "Fine feathers make fine birds," and "A brebis tondu Dieu mesure le vent," which is obviously "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," though the phrase is not to be found in the French any more than it is in the English Bible. But all specimens of the wisdom of the many summed up by the wit of the one are not the same in both languages. Each nation has its own expressions of common-sense sagacity, and its own way of putting them into words, and here it is that we see the value of such a little book as Mr. Payen-Payne's. A literal translation will not do for the majority of idioms and proverbs, and merely makes nonsense of the phrase. A simple dictionary translation of "Il a les pieds bien chauds" would not convey to an Englishman the idea that the person spoken of was in comfortable circumstances, as the words do to a Frenchman; nor does "Tout le saint-frusquin," literally translated, convey the meaning which in equally colloquial English it possesses of "the whole bag of tricks."

Turning over the leaves at random one comes across many idioms and phrases worth noting. The recent revival of "The Three Musketeers" and similar plays lends an interest to the phrase "N'avoir que la cape et l'épée," which means a penniless man with a long pedigree, and is generally used of young officers who have nothing but their pay. "Il croquait le marmot" means to dance attendance, and is variously explained. Littré says it arose from the fact that artists while waiting for their patrons used to draw pictures of little monkeys in the vestibule, while others assert that visitors used to eat little cakes in the shape of monkeys while waiting in the ante-chamber. It is difficult to say which explanation is the less likely of the phrase "to eat the monkey." The familiar phrase "Reach-me-down" has an exact equivalent in "Décrochez-moi-ça," as we believe was first pointed out by the late G. A. Sala, who unearthed the phrase at New Orleans many years ago in a second-hand clothes shop. An expression which has a curious origin is "Aller au diable Vauvert" or "au vert." It appears that the Carthusians in the time of St. Louis coveted the king's abandoned mansion of Vauvert. They therefore started the rumour that the house was haunted by evil spirits, and in consequence the superstitious king handed the house over to them. The monks speedily exorcised the demons they had created, and the phrase "Aller au diable Vauvert" came to mean "to disappear." It is interesting to note that the favourite tag of those who quote French in and out of season, "Revenons à nos moutons," comes from an old farce of the fifteenth century, "Maistre Pierre Pathelin," a work something like our "Gammer Gurton's Needle."

A frequent trap for the unwary is the difference of meaning in similar phrases. For example: "Faire feu" means to fire a gun, while "Faire du feu" means to light a fire; "Tomber par terre" conveys the idea of falling to the ground from one's own height; whereas "Tomber à terre" means to fall from any height—in other words, to tumble down and to tumble off. In the same way, "Traiter de fat" means to call a man a fop, and "Traiter en roi" to treat him like a king. The English word "bore" may be expressed in two ways: "un raseur" gives the idea of an active bore, and "une bassinoire" of a passive bore.

The book is fairly complete, well printed, and commendably free from misprints. We may, however, point out that "Dussé-je en mourir," on page 85, has a superfluous accent which has escaped the reviser's eye.

Table Talk.

If you want concrete evidence of the reluctance of human nature to change, and of the persistence of jokes, there is nothing like an old newspaper. I was turning over, the other day, a file of a daily paper for 1801, a paper which printed every morning a column of jokes, in the manner of the Globe's "By the Way" column; and, save for an old-fashioned turn of phrase here and there, they might all have been written by the newspaper jokers of 1901. The pun was still the shortest cut to humour, but a hundred years ago the pun was italicised in a way that, happily, has passed, save in the pages of Punch. In the week of 1801 corresponding with the present week of 1901 were these paragraphs:

In the cutting up of poor Turkey by Russia, Austria, and France, the funny Paul will no doubt ask for the merry thought.

There is so much dove-tailing in the new Administration, that many suppose it has come from the Abbé Siequès's pigeon-holes.

Several of the turncoats have brushed out of office as clean as if they had never gone through any dirt in it.

Have they not a familiar ring? The Laureate of the day (poor Mr. Pye) also came in for just such knocks as are reserved in the present year for Mr. Austin; as when he was congratulated upon a decision of the Revenue exempting from taxation all forced products. We truly stand very still.

Why did the Prologue fall into disrepute, and disappear? The newspaper which yields these old jokes prints every few days the prologue to the play of the moment, and very good reading they are. The opportunity thus afforded of lightly lashing the age is not to be despised; nor is the encouragement which the prologue gives to the ten-foot couplet, a measure that is now too much neglected. We have at this moment admirable potential prologue writers—Mr. Dobson, Mr. Gosse, Mr. Seaman, to say nothing of less known practitioners. Indeed, as there probably was never a period when so many persons could rhyme so gracefully as now, this is the ideal time in which to revive the honourable Prologue habit. Of course, the playwright himself often liked to write his own prologue—by way of introduction to his play; but the services of a satirical friend were often called in. And then, on the first night, it was spoken by an actress or actor of eminence. I should like to write a prologue full of such lines as Mrs. Calvert might speak in her most characteristic voice. But these revivals of customs rarely happen: the age is too much given to haste, audiences coming late kill the first minutes of a play too persistently, and spoken poetry—even prologue poetry—has become a bore. The Stage Society, however, might reinstate the custom.

We were talking the other day about the "Song of Solomon"—L. praising its beauty as a love poem and now and then reading a passage with intense rapture. The theory that an allegory was intended made him almost furious. "The thievish church to put that scoundrelly gloss to the chapters!" Afterwards he prepared a specimen, adapting it also to the various Nonconformist sects: as, "The Friends' meeting-house commended under various similitudes"; "The Salvation Army hears the voice of its beloved and has discoveries of his glory."

By the way, if one wants to see every vestige of poetry extracted from the Song, one should read the notes to it by Dr. Adam Clarke, in his edition of the Bible. This is the kind of thing done by that pious commentator: "Thy nose—as the tower of Lebanon. There was doubtless a propriety in this similitude . . . which cannot now be discerned. If we are to understand the similitude as taken from the projecting form of the nose, even here I see nothing striking in the metaphor; for surely the tower of Lebanon did not project from the mountain as the human nose does from the face." And so forth. The Doctor, however, makes up in some degree for his notes by printing a beautiful fourteenth-century version of the Canticles.

LATIN scholars who pride themselves on their learning and ingenuity may be able to translate the lines that follow:

Notæ formæ missarum,
Norræ et formare,
Norræ et formicat.

I found them in a letter to the Athenæum describing the papers left by Canon Manning. After several of the first scholars of the day had toiled at them in vain, the translation was revealed:

No tea for me, Miss Sarum,
Nor yet for Mary,
Nor yet for my cat.

APROPOS of translation, I came upon a good specimen of what might be called the homelifying of poetry in an old paper the other day. One week the following epigram from the Greek of Ptolemy was printed:

I know that I am mortal, and belong
To the vile sod I tread; yet when I raise
My thoughts to heaven, and mingle in the throng
Of worlds that labour in close-ravelled maze,—
No longer then with the base earth I link,
But am with Jove indeed amid his ways,—
Share the same skies—from the same fountain drink.

A week or so later Ptolemy was thus served up in the dialect of the simple:

I know as how I'm mortal, and am fell
Through sin and that,—I knows this 'ere quite wall;
And yet, Lord love you, Sir, tho' I'se no saint,
When I'se a-walking of a frosty night
And sees them stars—I'm blest if I be'nt quit.
Another individual,—“I ain't
Joe Dobson now,” says I, “nor no such cove,
But blest if I arn't up along with Jove.”

V. V. V.

Correspondence.

George Bernard Shaw.

SIR,—May I suggest that the writer of the article in the ACADEMY for February 10, on "George Bernard Shaw," might further edify and enlighten a considerable number of his readers by giving his reasons for some of the remarkable statements he made.

For example: "True criticisms . . . do not argue, they state; they are the expression not of ideas but of emotions." Is there any further reason for this dictum besides the fact that it is a convenient method of avoiding argument for a writer who may be incapable of anything but dogmatic statement? When, in the name of common-sense, did "true criticism" become the expression of emotion, except, indeed, with that type of "critic" who actually boasts of a cultivated "lump in his throat," which tells him unerringly when a work of drama or fiction is good or bad, as the mercury in the thermometer tells the temperature, by its rising and falling?

An even more amazing statement is the remark that not the slightest traces of emotion are observable in Mr. Shaw's works. Of course, if this merely means that there is no evidence of Mr. Shaw having stained his MS. with his tears (figuratively or literally) it is a trivially insignificant utterance. Your reviewer would think less, not more, of Paderewski if he were unable to play a Beethoven sonata without weeping upon the keys. All that the artist feels has to be mastered before perfect expression can be achieved, and "traces of emotion" (on the artist's part) are simply a disfigurement in his finished work. On the other hand, if the statement is supposed to mean that no emotion is represented in Mr. Shaw's plays—that the characters themselves are without feeling, I beg to oppose such an idea (or emotion—which?) with the equally simple and sweeping assertion that there is more genuine human feeling in the second act of "You Never Can Tell," or the first act of "The Devil's Disciple," than in all the sentimentalities of all the conventional stage-shows at present "holding the boards" at the whole of the London theatres. Next in order of incredibility comes the statement that "in not one of Mr. Shaw's plays will the technique bear an instant's examination." I for one should particularly like to have reasons for this (emotional) utterance, because I claim to understand the said plays; and I challenge any living critic to point out a single instance in (say) "Candida" in which the technique is not subordinate to the expression—that is, in which the construction, selection of character, dialogue, and so forth, is not absolutely the test for the artist's purpose. If this is not mastery of technique I am eager to learn what is.—

I am, &c.,
LORENCE NORMAN.

[To reply fully to our correspondent's trenchant statement of her case would need far more space than is available. We can only refer to her three points in the briefest possible way:

(1) Miss Norman slightly twists our meaning in her quotation. We must re-state our view that the finest art criticism is the expression of the critic's sympathetic emotion in the presence of the art work; that there can be no true criticism without such sympathetic emotion; and that Mr. Shaw's criticism has it not. Mr. Shaw's criticism is ideological, not artistic. We gave several examples of true art criticism in our article; we will add another and a better one—Gautier's elegy on Charles Baudelaire.

The "lump in the throat" is a very good test.

(2) When we said that we had never observed the slightest trace of emotion in Mr. Shaw's works, we meant just that. In bringing forward the first act of "The Devil's Disciple," as an example of "genuine human feeling," Miss Norman discloses an inability to distinguish between emotion and deliberately concocted sentimentality. She could not have chosen a more flagrant instance of Mr. Shaw's limitation.

(3) The question of technique is one not of opinion, but of fact. Miss Norman is quite wrong.

We are glad to see Mr. Shaw championed so chivalrously by a woman, for more effectively than anyone else he has fought the woman's cause.]

"Adonis Gardens."

SIR,—I am greatly indebted to Mr. Lang for supplying me with the other references to the "Gardens of Adonis" in Dr. Frazer's Golden Bough, from which it appears that mention of the Gardens is not confined to Plato's Phædrus, as they are also noticed by Theophrastus, Gregorius Cyprian, and others. But this information puts us no further forward. My letter was written to elicit a reference to the Gardens in any English work, or even a translation, anterior to, or contemporary with, the appearance of 1 Henry VI. If no such reference is forthcoming, then the presumption is that Shakespeare obtained his knowledge of Adonis Gardens either from Latin or Greek works (of which there were no translations at the time) or, as Mr. Lang suggests, from "hear say"—a theory constantly advanced to account for much of the learning displayed in the dramas, which, with the poems, are saturated with classic thought and allusion. Mr. Sidney Lee (who, I may mention, maintains "that such coincidences as have been detected between expressions in Greek plays and in Shakespeare seem due to accident") attributes Shakespeare's knowledge of law and legal terms—take Sonnet XLVI., for example—"in part to the many legal processes in which his father was involved, and in part to early intercourse with members of the Inns of Court"; he attributes Shakespeare's knowledge of the North of Scotland in Macbeth to "his inevitable intercourse with Scotsmen in London and the theatres"; and he also attributes Shakespeare's knowledge of Venice, Padua, Verona, Mantua, and Milan to "the verbal reports of travelled friends." Why not either allow Shakespeare an acquaintance with Latin, Greek, and Italian, or endeavour to unearth English works as the sources of his information? The "hear say" theory can scarcely be held by reasoning mortals to account for what Schlegel calls "Shakespeare's mastery of all the things and relations of this world."—I am, &c.,
GEORGE STRONACH.

P.S.—Since the above was written, I find I am able to answer one of my own queries. There is a long account of "Adonis Gardens" in Spenser's Fairie Queene, Book III., Canto 6, where we read of "the garden of Adonis, far renowned by fame," and "there is continually Spring, and harvest there continually, both meeting at one time," an almost exact equivalent to Shakespeare's "Which one day bloomed, and fruitful were the next." The Fairie Queene was published in 1591, and 1 Henry VI was first played March 3, 1592, so that the two quotations come very near each other in the matter of date of composition

G. S.

The "Blue Boy" of Gainsborough.

SIR,—In reply to Mrs. Morgan, who has asked for full particulars about the "Blue Boy" of Gainsborough, I venture to send you the following summary.

The original "Blue Boy" was exhibited in the Royal Academy in 1770. What became of it is not known. In 1802 George IV., then Prince of Wales, gave (or sold) to his particular friend, John Nesbitt—"an old beau of the first water," as he has been described—a "Blue Boy" of Gainsborough. The story is given in Trimmer's Life of J. M. W. Turner, R.A. (1862), ii. 63.

Nesbitt possessed a sound taste in matters connected with Art, and is most unlikely to have been deceived. When his pictures were sold in 1802 owing to bankruptcy, the Times spoke of him as a person "of well-known taste," and one "long distinguished for taste and judgment," declaring his collection to be "invaluable," and containing "the finest works of Art."

A clique of Nesbitt's friends, headed by the Prince of Wales, bought in the "Blue Boy" on behalf of Nesbitt to save it from his creditors, and the Prince entrusted it to Hoppner the painter, who was one of Nesbitt's friends.

Now in October of the same year Hoppner sold to Earl Grosvenor the "Blue Boy," which has ever since remained in Grosvenor House; but this could not have been Nesbitt's picture. There are a dozen sound reasons against such a supposition. Nesbitt's "Blue Boy" was afterwards again in the Prince's possession for five years, and when Nesbitt's affairs were more prosperous his royal friend and patron restored to him the picture of which he was so fond, and Nesbitt had it with him till his death a few years later. It was in the Prince's and Nesbitt's possession for about ten years after it left Hoppner, and it cannot be supposed that these lovers of art were ignorant of the fact that during all those years there was another "Blue Boy" in the possession of Lord Grosvenor. If, then, Hoppner had sold Nesbitt's picture to the Earl, and had palmed off a copy on Nesbitt and the Prince (a most dangerous thing to do, seeing that Hoppner lived by his art, and was dependent for his prospects on his character for straightforward dealings), the fraud would, of course, have at once been discovered. As to Nesbitt, his relations with the Prince till the day of his death are sufficient to prove that he did not combine with Hoppner to deceive his powerful friend and protector—one, moreover, who had been so consistently kind to him.

By far the most reasonable supposition is that Gainsborough was known to have painted two "Blue Boys," and that Hopper procured for Lord Grosvenor the other one, not Nesbitt's; or perhaps that he openly and honestly painted for the Earl a copy of the picture with which he had been entrusted. To suppose that the picture which went back from Hoppner to the Prince and Nesbitt was a fraudulent copy is to suppose that between May and October of 1802 Hoppner was guilty of the most reckless and abominable duplicity, a course of conduct of which, judging from the rest of his career, we have no reason to imagine him capable.

The Prince's "Blue Boy," then, went back to Nesbitt. It was sold by Nesbitt to William Hall, an auctioneer, in 1820. After Hall's death it was bought by Mr. Dawson (1858); he sold it to Mr. J. Sewell. In 1867 Mr. Sewell exhibited the picture, and consigned it for sale to Messrs. Hogarth. From them it was purchased by Sir Joseph Hawley. Sir Henry Hawley inherited it on Sir Joseph's death, and he sold the picture to Mr. Martin Colnaghi. Mr. Colnaghi sold it to Mr. Fuller, of New York, and when this gentleman's pictures were put up to auction it was bought in. Shortly afterwards the "Blue Boy" was purchased by Mr. George A. Hearn, of New York, its present fortunate owner.

The pedigree of the picture is thus clearly ascertained; and whether the Duke of Westminster's be Gainsborough's or not, it is certainly not the "Blue Boy" which in 1802 passed from the Prince of Wales to John Nesbitt. This one is in New York.

Some of the best judges, and among them Gainsborough's great nephew, R. J. Lane, have declared the Nesbitt "Blue Boy" to be superior to the Westminster one, and undoubtedly an original.

The points which it would be interesting to determine are whether the "Blue Boy" exhibited in 1770 was the painter's first or second picture (if he painted two), and whether the Prince of Wales in 1802 owned the original or the replica (if there were two). If there were not two then the Grosvenor House picture is probably Hoppner's copy.

BUSCAPO.

Forgotten Epic Poems.

SIR,—I was somewhat surprised recently on perusing the contents of a list of more than one hundred titles of epic poems ending in "ad," in imitation, I presume, of Homer's Iliad. Of course, the Rolliad, Baviad, Epigoniad, and Lusiad are well known; but who ever heard of The Beeriad, or the Progress of Drink (Gosport, 1736)? There are many other curious names in this list, such as Colman's Rodiad, the Ratiad, the Keckiad, the Diaboliad, the Bruciad, and the Graemiad. I should be pleased if any of your readers could furnish me with additional titles of books ending in "ad," giving the size, number of pages, and place and date of publication.—I am, &c.,

ADAM SMAIL.

13, Cornwall-street, Edinburgh.

"Shakespeare and the Market."

SIR,—In the ACADEMY of February 9, 1901, p. 131, in a paper by Ch. H. Breck, headed "Shakespeare and the Market," I read, to my great surprise, that "the great Jahrbuch of the German Shakespeare Society has ceased publication," kindly let your readers know that this is by no means true. On the contrary, the Jahrbuch has increased in volume and the German Shakespeare Society in members, so that we are more numerous now than ever since the foundation of the Society in 1864. I am just seeing the last sheets of the Jahrbuch for 1901 through the press; and, in order to give the German Shakespeare students systematic direction, the Society has begun to offer prizes for certain themes most worthy of treatment. The first prize (£40) will be awarded at this year's annual meeting in Weimar on April 23.—I am, &c.,

PROF. A. BRANDL,

Vice-President of the German Shakespeare Society and co-Editor of the Jahrbuch.

Gray or Grey.

SIR,—The reasons for sometimes employing an a, at other times an e, in spelling this word are so clearly set forth in a little work by H. C. Standage, entitled The Artist's Manual of Pigments, that I hope you will allow me to give a brief extract from it: "Gray is a term used for a mixture of white and blue. Grey refers, amongst colour scientists, to a mixture made by white and black."—I am, &c.,

F. S. J. B.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 75 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best comprehensive literary portrait of a man or woman not exceeding 250 words, taken from a biographical work or a history.

A feature of the results is a great "run" on the works of Carlyle. Among historians Froude, Green, Macaulay, and Clarendon are laid under contribution by many competitors.

Opinions must necessarily differ on the relative merits of portraits sketched by writers of such eminence, and it is probable that the judgment in such case would vary with the judge. We have, however, to consult only our own judgment, and this leads us to divide the prize among three competitors who have selected Thomas Carlyle's portrait of Coleridge in his Life of Sterling. They are:—Mr. Ernest A. Baker, Midland Railway Institute, Derby; Mr. H. M. Green, 39, Oakfield-road, Stroud Green, N.; Mr. George Herbert Watson, 5, Groll-park-road, Neath, S. Wales.

The extract is as follows:

COLERIDGE.

The good man, he was now getting old, towards sixty perhaps; and gave you the idea of a life that had been full of sufferings; a life heavy-laden, half-vanquished, still swimming painfully in seas of manifold physical and other bewilderment. Brow and head were round, and of massive weight, but the face was flabby and irresolute. The deep eyes, of a light hazel, were as full of sorrow as of inspiration; confused pain looked mildly from them, as in a kind of mild astonishment. The whole figure and air, good and amiable otherwise, might be called flabby and irresolute; expressive of weakness under possibility of strength. He hung loosely on his limbs, with knees bent and stooping attitude; in walking, he rather shuffled than decisively stepped; and a lady once remarked, he never could fix which side of the garden walk would suit him best, but continually shifted, in corkscrew fashion, and kept trying both. A heavy-laden, high-aspiring, and surely much-suffering man. His voice, naturally soft and good, had contracted itself into a plaintive snuffle and sing-song; he spoke as if preaching,—you would have said, preaching earnestly, and also hopelessly, the weightiest things. I still recollect his "object" and "subject," terms of continual recurrence in the Kanteian province; and how he sang and snuffed them into "om-m-mject" and "sum-m-mject" with a kind of solemn shake or quaver, as he rolled along. No talk, in his century or in any other, could be more surprising.

Other selections are as follows:

EDWARD THE FIRST.

He was in the truest sense a national king. At the moment when the last trace of foreign conquest passed away, when the descendants of those who won and those who lost at Senlac blended for ever into an English people, England saw in her ruler no stranger, but an Englishman. The national tradition returned in more than the golden hair or the English name which linked him to our earlier kings. Edward's very temper was English to the core. In good as in evil he stands out as the typical representative of the race he ruled, like them wilful and imperious, tenacious of his rights, indomitable in his pride, dogged, stubborn, slow of apprehension, narrow in sympathy, but like them, too, just in the main, unselfish, laborious, conscientious, haughtily observant of truth and self-respect, temperate, reverent of duty, religious. He inherited, indeed, from the Angevins their fierce and passionate wrath: his punishments, when he punished in anger, were without pity; and a priest, who ventured at a moment of storm into his presence with a remonstrance dropped dead from sheer fright at his feet. But for the most part his impulses were generous, trustful, averse from cruelty, prone to forgiveness. "No man ever asked mercy of me," he said in his old age, "and was refused."—From Green's History of the English People.

[A. A. B., West Bromwich.]

SIR H. H. KITCHENER.

Major-General Sir Horatio Herbert Kitchener is forty-eight years old by the book; but that is irrelevant. He stands several inches over six feet, straight as a lance, and looks out imperiously above most men's heads; his motions are deliberate and strong; slender, but firmly knit, he seems built for tireless, steel-wire endurance rather than for power or agility: that also is irrelevant. Steady, passionless eyes, shaded by decisive brows, brick-red rather full cheeks, a long moustache beneath which you divine an immovable mouth; his face is harsh, and neither appeals for affection nor stirs dislike. All this is irrelevant, too, neither age, nor figure, nor face, nor any accident, or person, has any bearing on the essential Sirdar. You could imagine the character just the same as if all the externals were different. He has no age but the prime of life, no body but one to carry his mind, no face but one to keep his brain behind. The brain and the will are the essence and the whole of the man—a brain and a will so perfect in their workings that, in the face of

MESSRS. METHUEN'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

THE INDIAN BORDERLAND: being a Personal Record of Twenty Years. By Sir T. H. HOLDICH, K.C.I.E. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Next week.]

MODERN ABYSSINIA. By A. B. Wylde. With a Map and a Portrait. Demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Ready.]

THE REAL CHINESE QUESTION. By Chester HOLCOMBE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A HISTORY of EGYPT, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. Edited by W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE, D.C.L., LL.D., Professor of Egyptology at University College. Fully Illustrated. 6 vols. Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

Vol. VI.—EGYPT in the MIDDLE AGES. By STANLEY LANE-POOLE.
A HISTORY of the CHURCH of CYPRUS. By JOHN HACKETT, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

A HISTORY of the JESUITS in ENGLAND. By E. L. TAUNTON. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

THE LIFE of MRS. LYNN LINTON. By G. S. LAYARD. With Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE LAST of the GREAT SCOUTS ("Buffalo Bill"). By his Sister, HELEN CODY WETMORE. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

A HISTORY of the MIDLAND RAILWAY. By CLEMENT STRETTON. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d.

BROTHER MUSICIANS: Reminiscences of Edward and Walter Baché. By CONSTANCE BACHÉ. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

REVELATIONS of DIVINE LOVE. By the Lady JULIAN of NORWICH. Edited by G. H. WARRACK. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE WAY of HOLINESS: a Devotional Commentary on the 119th Psalm. By R. M. BENSON, M.A., of the Cowley Mission, Oxford. Crown 8vo, 5s. [Ready.]

THE SUPERSENSUAL LIFE. By Jacob Behmen. Edited by BERNARD HOLLAND. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE SOUL'S PILGRIMAGE: Devotional Readings from the Published and Unpublished Writings of GEORGE BODY, D.D. Selected and Arranged by J. H. BURN, B.D. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. [Next week.]

THE PHILOSOPHY of RELIGION in ENGLAND. By ALFRED CALDECOTT, D.D. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. [Ready.]

[HANDBOOKS OF THEOLOGY.]
A complete history and description of the various philosophies of religion which have been formulated during the last few centuries in England and America.

THE LIBRARY OF DEVOTION.

Pott 8vo, cloth, 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

THE PSALMS of DAVID. With an Introduction and Notes by B. W. RANDOLPH, M.A., Principal of the Theological College, Ely. [Ready.]

A devotional and practical edition of the Prayer Book version of the Psalms.

LYRA APOSTOLICA. With an Introduction by Canon SCOTT HOLLAND, and Notes by H. C. BEECHING, M.A. [March 12.]

THE INNER WAY: Selections from the Sermons of F. FAULER. Edited by A. W. HUTTON, M.A.

THE CHURCHMAN'S BIBLE.

THE EPISTLE of ST. JAMES. Edited by H. W. FULFORD, M.A. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

METHUEN'S STANDARD LIBRARY.

THE NATURAL HISTORY of SELBORNE. By GILBERT WHITE. Edited by L. C. MIALL, F.R.S., assisted by W. WARD FOWLER, M.A. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE JOURNAL to STELLA. By Jonathan Swift. Edited by G. A. AITKEN, M.A. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE LIFE of SAVONAROLA. By E. L. S. HORSBURGH, M.A. With Portraits and Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. [LITTLE BIOGRAPHERS.]

THE MALVERN COUNTRY. By B. C. A. Windle, D.Sc., F.R.S. Illustrated by E. H. New. Pott 8vo, cloth, 3s.; leather, 3s. 6d. net. [LITTLE GUIDES.]

THE WORKS OF SHAKESPEARE.

New Volume, uniform with Prof. Dowden's "Hamlet."

KING LEAR. Edited by W. J. Craig. Demy 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE LITTLE LIBRARY.

With Introductions, Notes, and Photogravure Frontispieces.

Pott 8vo, each Volume, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

SELECTIONS from WORDSWORTH. Edited by NOWELL C. SMITH, Fellow of New College, Oxford.

THE PURGATORIO of DANTE. Translated by H. F. CARY. Edited by PAGET TOYNBEE, M.A.

SELECTIONS from the POEMS of WILLIAM BLAKE. Edited by T. PERUGINI.

PRIDE and PREJUDICE. By Jane Austen. Edited by E. V. LUCAS. 2 vols. [Ready.]

PENDENNIS. By W. M. Thackeray. Edited by S. GWYNN. 3 vols. [Ready.]

LAVERGRO. By George Borrow. Edited by F. HINDES GROOMER. 2 vols.

THE BRITISH GARDENER and AMATEUR. By W. WILLIAMSON. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

EFFICIENCY and EMPIRE. By Arnold White. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Next week.]

THE ENGLISH TURF. By Charles Richardson. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s.

DISEASES of the HEART. By E. H. Colbeck, M.D. With numerous Diagrams. Crown 8vo, 6s.

FICTION.

THE SACRED FOUNT. By Henry James. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.]

THE FROBISHERS. By S. Baring-Gould. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Next week.]

A STATE SECRET. By Mrs. B. M. Croker. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [Ready.]

THE SUPREME CRIME. By Dorothea Gerard. Crown 8vo, 6s. [March 28.]

A SECRETARY of LEGATION. By Hope Dawlish. Crown 8vo, 6s. [March 15.]

PRINCE RUPERT the BUCCANEER. By C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNE. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s. [April.]

A NARROW WAY. By Mary Findlater. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.]

TALES THAT ARE TOLD. By J. Helen Findlater. Author of "The Green Graves of Bulgowie," and MARY FINDLATER. Crown 8vo, 6s. [April.]

THE THIRD FLOOR. By Mrs. Dudeney. Crown 8vo, 6s. [March 12.]

THE SALVATION SEEKERS. By Noel Ainslie. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Next week.]

STRANGE HAPPENINGS. By W. Clark Russell and other Authors. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.]

THE REDEMPTION of DAVID CORSON. By C. F. GONS. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.]

THE BLACK WOLF'S BREED. By Harris Dickson. Crown 8vo, 6s. [March 22.]

BELINDA FITZWARREN. By the Earl of Iddesleigh. Crown 8vo, 6s. [March 19.]

THE LOST REGIMENT. By Ernest Glanville. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [April.]

BUNTER'S CRUISE. By Charles Gleig. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [March 25.]

THE ADVENTURE of PRINCESS SYLVIA. By Mrs. C. N. WILLIAMSON. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [March 28.]

extremest difficulty, they never seem to know what struggle is. You cannot imagine the Sirdar otherwise than as seeing the right thing to do and doing it. His precision is so inhumanly unerring, he is more like a machine than a man.—From G. W. Stevens's With Kitchener to Khartum.

[S. J. McN., London.]

MARLBOROUGH.

Had this of the god-like in him, that he was impassable before victory, before danger, before defeat. Before the greatest obstacle or the most trivial ceremony; before a hundred thousand men drawn in battalia, or a peasant slaughtered at the door of his burning hovel; before a carouse of drunken German lords, or a monarch's court, or a cottage table where his plans were laid, or an enemy's battery strewing corpses round about him: he was always cold, calm, resolute, like fate. He performed a treason or a court-bow; he told a falsehood as black as Styx, as easily as he paid a compliment about the weather. . . . Our Duke was as calm at the mouth of a cannon as at the door of a drawing-room. Perhaps he could not have been the great man he was had he a heart either for love or hatred, or pity, or fear, or regret, or remorse. He achieved the highest deed of daring, or deepest calculation of thought, as he performed the very meanest action of which a man is capable; told a lie, or cheated a fond woman, or robbed a poor beggar of a halfpenny, with a like awful serenity and equal capacity of the highest and lowest acts of our nature.—From Thackeray's Esmond.

[H. W. B., Tottenham]

R. L. STEVENSON ON FRANÇOIS VILLON.

The poet was a rag of a man, dark, little, and lean, with hollow cheeks and thin black locks. He carried his four-and-twenty years with feverish animation. Greed had made folds about his eyes, evil smiles had puckered his mouth. The wolf and pig struggled together in his face. It was an eloquent, sharp, ugly, earthly countenance. His hands were small and prehensile, with fingers knotted like a cord; and they were continually flickering in front of him in violent and expressive pantomime.

[H. A. M., London.]

SIR KENELM DIGBY.

Sir Kenelm Digby was a person very eminent and notorious throughout the whole course of his life. . . . He was a man of a very extraordinary person and presence, which drew the eyes of all men upon him, which were more fixed by a wonderful graceful behaviour, a flowing courtesy and civility, and such a volubility of language as surprised and delighted; and though in another man it might have appeared to have somewhat of affectation, it was marvellous graceful in him, and seemed natural to his size and mould of his person, to the gravity of his motion, and the tone of his voice and delivery. He had a fair reputation in arms, of which he gave an early testimony in his youth. . . . In a word, he had all the advantages that nature and art and an excellent education could give him; which, with a great confidence and presentness of mind, buoyed him up against all those prejudices and disadvantages (as the attainder and execution of his father for a crime of the highest nature; his own marriage with a lady, though of an extraordinary beauty, of an extraordinary fame; his changing and rechanging his religion; and some personal vices and licenses in his life) which would have suppressed and sunk any other man, but never clouded or eclipsed him, from appearing in the best places and the best company, and with the best estimation and satisfaction.—From The Life of Edward, Earl of Clarendon, by Himself.

[F. B., Milton-next-Gravesend.]

Replies also received from: S. R. Hurlford; R. M. Brighton; F. E. A. C. Marple; R. E. McC., Whitby; E. S., Ely; H. J. Hadley Wood; G. H. Didsbury; E. T. Bexhill-on-Sea; G. S., Brentwood; M. T. R., Livry (France); W. J. F., Birmingham; M. S., London; A. T. Muswell Hill; W. G. H., London; D. E. B., London; J. O'C., Bradford; E. M. S., London; F. W. S., London; J. B. B., London; R. E. V. B., Oxford; F. S. H., Bath; H. F., London; F. W., Oxford; C. J., London; R. W. M., London; A. G., Cheltenham; F. A. J., Brighton; J. A. C., London; E. B., Bideford; P. C. F., Cambridge; A. H. W., Hull; I. R., St. Ives; L. M. S., London; P. R. D., Brighton; L. McC., Whitby; F. M. C., Leeds; A. W., London; L. I., Ashby-de-la-Zouch; A. B., Glasgow.

Competition No. 76 (New Series).

We offer a prize of ONE GUINEA for the best original descriptive sketch of an everyday character in not more than 250 words. As an illustration of what we mean, we refer competitors to Miss Lynch's sketch of the Paris landlady, noticed in our review of her French Life in Town and Country, pp. 185 and 186.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, March 6. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the third page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

N.B.—Many competitors send their names and addresses in separate letters, or write them on loose scraps of paper, or enclose their visiting cards, or write on the backs of their contributions. The ideal competitor writes his name and address on the top of the front page of his actual contribution, saving us much pin and pen work.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

Now ready, in cloth gilt, price 3s. 6d.

STREET DUST.

BY

OUIDA.

FIVE POPULAR NOVELS.

Price 6s. each.

MAY SILVER.

By ALAN ST. AUBYN

A SOLDIER FOR A DAY.

By EMILY SPENDER.

MORALS AND MILLIONS.

By FLORENCE WARDEN.

WHAT MEN CALL LOVE.

By LUCAS CLEEVE.

THE MIDNIGHT PASSENGER.

By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co. Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.

DARLINGTONS' HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE ORCHANNEL ISLANDS.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

THE WYE VALLEY.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

THE SEVERN VALLEY.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, RASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

GLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, and FESTINIOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading Hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., LTD.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

Just Published.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

AN ORIGINAL CHARMING NOVEL, ENTITLEDHIS LORDSHIP'S WHIM

By GORDON CUMING WHADCOAT.

"A clever story. The reader will find in this vigorous story exciting entertainment."—Lloyd's."Continues to yield amusement to the end."—Scotsman.

London:

EFFINGHAM WILSON,
11, Royal Exchange.SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.,
Stationers' Hall Court.F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

Now ready, in cloth gilt, price 3s. 6d.

STREET DUST.

BY

OUIDA.FIVE POPULAR NOVELS.

Price 6s. each.

MAY SILVER.

By ALAN ST. AUBYN

A SOLDIER FOR A DAY.

By EMILY SPENDER.

MORALS AND MILLIONS.

By FLORENCE WARDEN.

WHAT MEN CALL LOVE.

By LUCAS CLEEVE.

THE MIDNIGHT PASSENGER.

By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO. Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

DARLINGTONS' HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

THE WYE VALLEY.

BOSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

THE SEVERN VALLEY.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading Hotels throughout the world."What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times."The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO., LTD.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

Size, 5 by 2½ in., photographic portrait, prettily designed title, head and tail-pieces, and bound in embossed leather, gilt edges.

Price 2s. 6d. net.

THE BIBELOTS.

VOLUME X., JUST PUBLISHED, is

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.*SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.

An EDITION DE LUXE on Japanese vellum (limited to 60 copies), price 10s. 6d. net. Apply at your Bookseller's.

GLASGOW HERALD.—"Never before have they been reproduced in so beautiful a manner. It is worthy of being encased in gold."SATURDAY REVIEW.—"Leaves nothing to be desired."

Detailed Prospectus of the Series post free.

London: GAY & BIRD 22, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

SECOND EDITION, 8vo, gilt top, 407 pp., 5s. net.

SELECTIONS from the WORK, 1s. net. And all Booksellers'.

OUR EARTH, NIGHT TO TWILIGHT, THE STORY OF MAN.

By GEORGE FERGUSON.

Dedicated by special permission to the late Rt. Hon. William Ewart Gladstone.

A few Quotations from Press Notices: "Particularly beautiful theme."—"Each line contains a world of thought."—"A powerful allegory."—"Metre sonorous and in perfect keeping with the majestic theme."—"Highly commendable."—"The author is a deep thinker as well as a poet."—"The cultured reader will read it with pleasure."—"Sublime, and richly executed."—"An epic which sets the singer on a high level among the poets."

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL.

Selections from ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S PUBLICATIONS.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d., post free.

ILLUSTRATIONS from the SERMONS of ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D. Edited and Selected by JAMES HENRY MARTYN. Containing over 500 beautiful and suggestive illustrations. With a Textual Index and Alphabetical List of Subjects.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"THINGS THAT ARE MADE." Devotional Meditations in the Haunts of Nature. By Rev. A. J. BAMFORD, B.A., of Royton. The Freeman says: "Preachers and teachers will find in them many helpful suggestions." The Glasgow Herald says: "They will probably interest and instruct many who would an ordinary sermon flee."

Now Ready, Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH. Lectures on the Principle of Nonconformity. By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D."Explains the position of religious dissent with great force and eloquence." Manchester Guardian."Nothing could be more timely than these learned and suggestive lectures."—Christian World.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LTD., 21 and 22, Farnival, St., E.C.

An American Transport
in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War..... The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece. 198 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO
"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

In large crown 8vo, cloth, fully illustrated,
prices 10s. 6d. net.

THE PEDIGREE OF SHAKESPEARE. SHAKESPEARE'S FAMILY.

Being a Record of the Ancestors and Descendants of William Shakespeare. By CHARLOTTE C. STOPES.

In crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, price 5s.

ALFRED the GREAT: A Sketch

and Seven Studies. By WARWICK H. DRAPER, M.A., late Scholar of University College, Oxford. With many illustrations and a Map, and a Preface by the BISHOP of HEREFORD.

SECOND AND ENLARGED EDITION.

In crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, price 6s.

RAMBLES ROUND the EDGE

HILLS: or, In the Vale of the Red Horse. With a Full and Graphic Account of the Battle of Edge Hill. By Rev. GEORGE MILLER, M.A., Vicar of Radway.

"Mr. Miller is master of his subject, and his account of the Battle of Edge Hill is as thorough as it is concise."—Academy.

"A thoughtful and informing work of the kind of which we have too few at the present day."
Birmingham Daily Gazette.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

BLACK COUNTRY SKETCHES.

A Series of Character Stories Illustrating the Life of the District. By AMY LYONS.

NEW NOVEL.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

LADY WILMERDING of MAISON

ROUGE: a Tale of the Riviera. By J. DUNCAN CRAIG, M.A., D.D., Socii Don Felicitate.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

RUDOLPH SCHROLLE. A

Tragedy in Blank Verse. By E. G.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s.

THE ROMANCE of the BOER

WAR: Humours and Chivalry of the Campaign. By MACCARTHY O'MOORE, Author of "Tips for Travellers; or, Wrinkles for the Road and Rail."

NEW STORY FOR CHILDREN.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

PEGGY, a SCHOOLGIRL; or,

The Sleeper Awakened. By FRANCES STRATTON, Author of "Nan the Circus Girl," "The Rival Bards," &c.

In crown 8vo, tastefully bound, price 2s.

MARRIAGE: its Institution and

Purpose. By J. S.

"The work is written in a very dignified style, and must deeply impress the thoughtful Christian reader."
Echo.

In large 8vo, handsomely bound in cloth and fully illustrated, price 15s. net.

SWEET HAMPSTEAD and its

ASSOCIATIONS. By Mrs. CAROLINE WHITE. With numerous illustrations of Eminent Persons, Historic Houses, and Picturesque Localities.

"Hampstead is extraordinarily rich in literary associations, which Mrs. White chronicles with a charm of style born of true enthusiasm."—Outlook.

"A book which is as interesting as any novel, and one which will live possibly as long as Hampstead itself, whose memories it records so sympathetically."
Speaker.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row,
London, E.C.

JARROLD & SONS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

FOURTH EDITION NOW READY.

Maurus Jokai's "Hungarian Academy's Prize Novel."

EYES LIKE THE SEA.

By MAURUS JOKAI. 6s.

With a specially engraved Photogravure of Jokai.

Author of "Black Diamonds," "The Green Book," "A Hungarian Nihilist," &c.

"Eyes Like the Sea" won the Hungarian Academy's Prize of £100 as the best novel of the year, and is certainly the most brilliant of Jokai's latest novels. It is very largely autobiographical and abounds with intensely dramatic situations none the less effective because absolutely true. Yet the book is above all, comical.

New Novel by John Mackie.

THE MAN WHO FORGOT.

By JOHN MACKIE. 6s.

Author of "The Prodigal's Brother," "Sinners Twain," &c.

With a special Photogravure Portrait of the Author.

"A vigorous and exciting story. Some part of the action of the book is laid in Java, and the catastrophe of Krakatoa is described with a vividness that makes real to us that appalling upheaval of nature."—Daily News.

"An exciting tale... distinctly a book to read and enjoy."
Daily Mail.

Fergus Hume's Exciting Novel.

FOURTH EDITION.

A WOMAN'S BURDEN.

By FERGUS HUME. 6s.

Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &c. 6s. "Highly exciting... never ceases to be mysterious. But the story is more than mysterious, it is extremely well written."

"Very good reading."—Athenaeum.

Curtis Yorke's New Novel.

THIRD EDITION.

CARPATHIA KNOX.

By CURTIS YORKE. 6s.

Author of "That Little Girl," "Hush," "Dudley," &c.

With a Charming Photogravure Portrait of the Author. 6s. "A very graphic and realistic glimpse of Spanish life. Full of freshness and life; prettily told."—Aberdeen Free Press.

By a Popular Hungarian Author.

ST. PETER'S UMBRELLA.

By KÁLMÁN MIKSZÁTH. 6s.

With an Introduction by R. NISBET RAIN, a Photogravure Portrait of the Author, and 3 Illustrations.

The Spectator says: "The freshness, gentility, high spirits, and humour of Mikszáth make him a fascinating companion. His peasants and priests, Jews and Gentiles, are amazingly human. Mikszáth is a born storyteller."

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 & 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.

THE DAINTIEST OF DAINTY BOOKS.

BABY'S RECORD: with Spaces for Mother's Notes about her Baby. As used by the Royal Mother of the future King of England. Compiled by the Rev. R. I. WOODHOUSE, M.A. LONDON: The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, E.C. (One Shilling).

"Baby's Record" will in many cases prove an invaluable aid to the family doctor in the treatment of ailments in later life.

EDITION DE LUXE.

A limited number of Large Paper Copies, in an extremely choice and novel white vellum and green morocco binding, with silk ties.

Each copy contains a couple of genuine Bartolozzi engravings, printed direct from the original copperplates, one of which (the frontispiece) is delicately hand-coloured. [One Guinea net.

An acceptable Christening Present.

MADAME MARIE, SINGER. By

ESTER DALE. LONDON: The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, E.C. [Three-and-Sixpence.

MISS SPINNEY. By the Rev.

SYDNEY MOSTYN, Author of "My First Curacy." LONDON: The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, E.C. [Half-a-Crown.

THE FITZDOODLE MEMOIRS. By

Lord ADOLPHUS FITZDOODLE. LONDON: The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, E.C. [One Shilling.

BALLADS OF GHOSTLY SHIRES.

By GEORGE BARTRAM.

CONTENTS: Under Glamour—The Warlock's Wooing—The White Witch of Maverick—At the Crossroads—The Deadly Sin of the Miverick—Marion Bloodworth—The Muggletonian—The Widow—The Fairy Harper—The Poor Scholar.

2s. 6d. net.

GREENING & Co., 20, Cecil Court, St. Martin's Lane.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON'S NEW BOOKS.

The Leading Book of the Season.

THE

SIEGE OF KUMASSI

By LADY HODGSON,

Wife of Sir FREDERICK M. HODGSON, Governor of the Gold Coast.

Demy 8vo, profusely illustrated, price 21s.

The Standard says: "Of remarkable interest. Lady Hodgson is to be congratulated upon a volume which will be read with keen interest and with admiration alike of the courage and endurance she displayed, and of the skill with which she tells her story."

This book is of special interest at the present moment, as it contains a full and vivid description of Siamland, and the natives who are causing so much trouble just now.

ABYSSINIA.

By HERBERT VIVIAN,

Author of "Tunisia," "Servia."

Demy 8vo, with 2 Maps and 80 Illustrations, price 15s.

"A new book by Mr. Vivian is like a glass of champagne to sea-sick tourists. From cover to cover his latest work does not cease to sparkle."
Morning Advertiser.

AT PRETORIA.

By JULIAN RALPH.

A Companion Volume to "Towards Pretoria."

Extra crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

"Highly interesting... full of picturesque passages. The book is well worth reading."—Spectator.

"Gives many vivid pictures, and contains many serviceable suggestions."—Truth.

Owing to the large demand for Mr. F. T. BULLEN'S latest work, the First Edition was entirely sold out before publication. A SECOND EDITION is now in the press.

A SACK OF SHAKINGS.

By FRANK T. BULLEN,

Author of "The Cruise of the 'Cachalot'."

Extra crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, price 6s.

THE BEST NOVELS OF THE HOUR.

Price 6s. each.

A HONEYMOON IN SPACE.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

'TWIXT DEVIL AND DEEP SEA.

By Mrs. C. N. WILLIAMSON.

THE TAPU OF BANDERAH.

By LOUIS BECKE & WALTER JEFFERY.

HER MASTER PASSION.

By BESSIE HATTON.

THE STRANGE WOOING OF MARY BOWLER.

By RICHARD MARSH.

THE INVADERS.

By LOUIS TRACY.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

MORD EM'LY. By W. Pett Ridge.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

THE NEW MASTER. By Arnold

GOLSWORTHY, Author of "Hands in the Darkness." Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d. With illustrations by Tom Brown.

London: C. ARTHUR PEARSON, LTD.,
Henrietta Street, W.C.

The Academy

Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1505. Established 1869.

9 March, 1901.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THERE is to be a Queen Victoria Birthday Book. The volume, we are informed, will be printed in purple and green, and a saying by her late Majesty will be given for each day in the year, together with a list of events that happened on that day.

A LIFE of Dr. Martineau, by Mr. Jackson, or, rather, a study of his philosophy, interspersed with too many of the author's own views, which is not the ideal way of writing a biography, was published last October. The authorised Life will not be ready till next year. It will be in two volumes: the first, dealing with the Life itself, by Principal Drummond; the second volume, with Dr. Martineau's philosophy, by the Rev. C. B. Upton.

APROPOS of the publication of Mr. Churton Collins's Ephemera Critica, wherein he fulminates at the Universities for their neglect of literature, we understand that Mr. Passmore Edwards has offered to found a scholarship for Literature at Oxford on the lines suggested by Mr. Collins in his book.

MR. THOMAS HARDY will be the other talker in Mr. William Archer's next "real conversation" in the Pall Mall Magazine. These conversations, which began with Mr. Pinero last month, are not in any sense of the word interviews; they are real talks, fair give and take, not sparks struck from a sullen anvil. The conversation with Mr. Hardy ranged around the eternal questions—Why? Whence? and Whither? The Pall Mall Magazine, where these interesting conversations are appearing, has, under Mr. G. R. Halkett's expert editorship, become one of the most interesting and the best illustrated of the magazines.

WE welcome Mr. Maurice Hewlett's Earthwork out of Tuscany to the "Eversley" series. It wears the "crimson of Eversley" in good company, and it merits the honour. In truth, we can hardly imagine a pleasanter fate than to be locked for a year on some sunny island, with trees, a few friends, some food, and a stout wooden case containing the entire "Eversley" series. To this third edition Mr. Hewlett contributes a third preface. Some will consider his prefatorial utterances a thought too pontifical. "I cannot be for ever explaining what I intended when I wrote this book," he begins; and at the end we get this flick: "I leave the former prefaces as they stand. I felt them when I made them, and feel them still; but I shall make no more." And the world still moves—strange!

AND talking of prefaces, this "prefatory note" from a new book called The Romance of the Boer War, has a charming naïveté, has it not? The author is Irish:

In view of the possibility of a second edition of this little work being called for, the author will feel greatly obliged to any of the heroes who have already returned home, or who are still serving at the post of danger and honour, for additional matter forwarded to him or to the publisher.

WE observe that a new volume of the "How To" series is called How to Write a Novel: a Practical Guide to the Art of Fiction. With the knowledge that we have received twenty-five new novels since last Saturday, and, faint but pursuing, have examined them all, we suggest that a series called the "How Not To" would be of some value.

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS is meditating on the wanderings of Ulysses as a subject for his next play. Mr. Tree, as Ulysses, would make a picturesque figure. We wish that Mr. Murray's Andromache, produced so successfully by the Stage Society, could have the advantage of a stage setting at Her Majesty's.

A NEW novel by "Zack" (Miss Gwendoline Keats) will be published during the season. It will be called The White Cottage.

THE accurate term for a Spectator "middle" now seems to be established: "a shaking." At least, so we gather from the title of Mr. F. T. Bullen's new book, A Sack of Shakings, being essays from the Spectator. Shakings! Mr. Bullen goes to extremes in his titles. His last was With Christ at Sea. Can he be a Shaker?

THE biography of Mrs. Lynn Lynton is also well advanced. Mr. Layard has an admirable subject, and we hope he will give a full and frank picture of that talented woman. There should be plenty of good material.

NEXT week Mr. John Lane will publish The Column, by Mr. Charles Marriott, a new writer. The author has only published two short stories before: "Roast Apples" in the New Review, under Mr. Henley's editorship; and "Rosanna," in the Pall Mall Magazine last January. The Column has had the advantage of praise in advance from Mr. Sidney Colvin.

THE good ship that carried the ACADEMY of February 2 to America conveyed to Major Pond the article called "A New American Humourist." In reply we have received a letter from the delightful Major, which is too complimentary to print in full. We transcribe a morsel: "I have been quite conscious that I was a humourist, but never could find a Columbus—well, now you are he." We have been called "a beast" (by a minor poet on a post-card) and other things, but never a Columbus before.

WE sympathise with Helen Mathers. Murder or Manslaughter, she informs us, "has been widely reviewed and accepted as her last novel." It is just seventeen years old.

MR. KIPLING's story, Kim, has reached its fourth chapter in Cassell's Magazine, and is superbly illustrated. We wish we had space to quote the whole of a descriptive passage of which these are fragments:

"Now let us walk," muttered the lama, and to the click of his rosary they walked in silence mile upon mile. The lama, as usual, was deep in meditation, but Kim's bright eyes were open wide. This broad, smiling river of life, he considered, was a vast improvement on the cramped and crowded Lahore streets. There were few people and new sights at every stride—castes he knew and castes that were altogether out of his experience.

They met a troop of long-haired, strong-scented Sansis with baskets of lizards and other unclean food on their backs, the lean dogs sniffing at their heels. These people kept their own side of the road, moving at a quick, furtive jog-trot, and all other castes gave them ample room; for the Sansi is deep pollution. Behind them, walking wide and stiffly across the strong shadows, the memory of his leg-irons still on him, strode one newly released from the jail; his full stomach and shiny skin to prove that the Government fed its prisoners better than most honest men could feed themselves. Kim knew that walk well, and made broad jest of it as they passed. . . . Here and there they met or were overtaken by the gaily dressed crowds of whole villages turning out to some local fair; the women, with their babes on their hips, walking behind the men, the older boys prancing on sticks of sugar-cane, dragging rude brass models of locomotives such as they sell for a halfpenny, or flashing the sun into the eyes of their betters from cheap toy mirrors. One could see at a glance what each had bought; and if there were any doubt it needed only to watch the wives comparing, brown arm against brown arm, the newly purchased dull glass bracelets that come from the North-West. . . . A little later a marriage procession would strike into the Grand Trunk with music and shoutings and a smell of marigold and jasmine stronger even than the reek of the dust. One could see the bride's litter, a blur of red and tinsel, staggering through the haze, while the bridegroom's bewreathed pony turned aside to snatch a mouthful from a passing fodder-cart. Then Kim would join the Kentish fire of good wishes and bad jokes, wishing the couple a hundred sons and no daughters, as the saying is. Still more interesting and more to be shouted over it was when a strolling juggler with some half-trained monkeys, or a panting, feeble bear, or a woman who tied goats' horns to her feet, and with these danced on a slack-rope, set the horses to shying and the women to shrill, long-drawn quavers of amazement.

There is a certain mellowness in this that we like to think will be found throughout the story.

In the March Macmillan Sir Courtenay Boyle enters a timely and cogent protest against the hasty improvisation of new words, or the lazy acceptance of others, to the detriment of the language. He is quite right in considering motor an unsatisfactory word to denote a machine propelled by self-contained power. It is probably too late to make an alteration now. Sir Courtenay Boyle thinks that kion or autokion would have been preferable. Motor must breed derivatives, and what these may be like is seen in the word motoneer, which in some parts of the United States is the word for the driver of a motor. We are glad to see a protest against the use of distinct in the sense of decided, as in "a distinct success." Anyway for at all events is also rightly deprecated. One very common mistake not noted by Sir Courtenay Boyle is the use of "not less" in cases of number where "not fewer" is the correct phrase.

THE rhythm of life has been favourable of late to the repose of Omar Khayyám. There has been less dining and wining and twining, or less talk about them. But now comes The Book of Omar and Rubáiyát, printed and arranged with ceremonious care, and containing "biographical, historical, bibliographical, and pictorial notes on Omar Khayyám of Naishapur, and his inspired quatrains." There are essays and poems and versions and fac-similes which can be turned over with interest, while the cover is so pretty as to bear a fixed gaze. Mr. Gosse's lines on "The Rose of Omar," written for the rose brought by Mr. W. Simpson from Naishapur and planted on FitzGerald's grave at Boulge, should have been accompanied by the date of the ceremony. By the way, how is that rose-bush? May we inquire after its health?

The Thrush's song improves as Spring draws nearer. Miss Nora Hopper is a poet whose verse is never without at least a frail and flying charm, while at its best it is memorable. We give the first and last lines of her rather long poem (it fills three pages), "Rose o' the World," which is divided into eight stanzas:

Rose o' the world, how shall we win her?
She will not stay for saint or sinner.
The sea-sand printed by her feet
Remembers her, how strange and sweet
She went and came, as comes and goes
The crimson glory of the rose,
The purple that the iris shows.
The wind remembers how it flung
Broadcast her hair, the bramble clung
And tore a tatter from her gown
To comfort it when leaves fall brown.

Why wert thou given to our eyes?
"I neither know it nor surmise"
Why all so suddenly withdrawn
Like the first flushing of the dawn?

"I know not this, but it may be
The unattainable for thee
For ever keeps its beauty free
From Time, whose spoiling fingers stain
All flowers he gathers from the tree.
And there's no truth made clear and plain,
Remembered like that hint that lies
Across the trouble of the skies,
Five-coloured, where the rainbow dies.
I am most generous that refuse:
No man shall win me—no man lose."

AMONG many indications that "Londonarians" are multiplying in London is the publication of the first number of a monthly magazine called East London Antiquities. The pages of the magazine will be fed mainly from back numbers of the East London Advertiser, whose editor has had the enlightenment for some years past to devote a column of his paper each week to local antiquities. The contents of this first number are delightfully miscellaneous and recondite. We have a long and grave disputation on the origin of the name Poplar, and for once the obvious derivation from a grove or abundance of poplar trees seems to hold the field. Although Colonel Prideaux opposes this theory, he locks his own in his breast. As Sir Walter Besant points out in an interesting send-off preface, there are many other East London place-names that will repay examination. The Isle of Dogs, Hackney, Norton Folgate, Bow, West Ham, Wapping—whence these? Many Londoners go through life quite untouched by the charm of local antiquities, though we fancy that the taste for them spreads wonderfully with opportunity. Hence we applaud our East London contemporary's enterprise, and gladly commend it to Londonarians who are not indifferent to such subjects as "An Elizabethan Mansion in Whitechapel," "The Ducking Pond in Whitechapel," "Whitechapel Lions," "The Duke of Shoreditch," and "An Eighteenth Century Pleasure Haunt."

COLLECTORS of Stevensoniana will do well to file an interesting article in the March Chambers's Journal, by Miss Eve Blantyre Simpson, the author of Stevenson's Edinburgh Life, entitled "Robert Louis Stevenson's Hills of Home." It is full of Scott and Stevenson and the Pentlands.

THERE is an amusing article on "Yellow Journals" in Ainslie's Magazine for March. It gives one a good idea of the desperate pace at which all hands on a yellow journal are driven. Some extraordinary feats are recorded. An editor on one of the evening "yellows," being about to leave for a month's holiday, was asked by his proprietor to write enough editorials to last the month. He accordingly dictated thirty-five in a single morning. The desire to "do things" is so acute among the staff, that the least opening is taken with a leap. This is the sort of thing:

"Here's a great story," said our city editor to one of the reporters. "Poor Salvation girl chucked out of Jenkins's place. Hurry up there, make a sketch of her, and write a spread!"

In an hour's time the truthful, but unfortunate, man returned to say that the woman was a common drunkard, and had been ejected for picking a man's pocket. He displayed the sketch he had made, something after Hogarth's frowsy women, and declared, for his part, he could see no story in it. But the city editor was incensed beyond measure.

"Well, ———," he said hoarsely, "you'd spoil the best story on earth. You can't see a story; can't see anything. Don't you know we've got a picture of that girl made already? Must get it in the next edition. Now sit down there and write a column to fit the picture."

The story was accordingly written on those lines, although it was about an event that never happened.

AFTER this, and other weird narrations, it is rather amusing to find the writer attributing to the yellow journal the high mission of making people think. Yet the plea has something in it. People want to read about, say, a body found in a trunk. Clerks, shop girls, car conductors, aliens, and servant-girls will read about such a matter when no other print would attract them. They learn to read by habit; hence they are "being educated by the yellow journal," which, the writer contends, is responsible for the immense increase in the sale of books in the last five years. Puzzles, query columns, symposiums, competitions, and other ruses help in the stirring up of minds naturally sluggish and ill-equipped. Yet in the end the writer hesitates in his defence of the yellow journal, ending, not on a hope, but on a doubt. "Whether, like the torpedo, it will continue to inflict a succession of shocks until those who come in contact with it will be stunned to insensibility and quit reading such publications, or whether the yellow journal will advance in quality as it educates the masses, remains to be seen."

THE Picturesque History of Yorkshire (Dent) goes on being born, and the part before us, dealing with the Whitby region, is full of interest. There are some amusing notes on Sterne in connexion with Skelton Castle, where he was frequently the guest of his friend, John Hall Stevenson, the "Eugenius" of the Sentimental Journey. One of Stevenson's many eccentricities was an extravagant dread of an east wind. When that wind blew, nothing, not even his duties as host, would induce him to leave his bed. Sterne missed his friend so much on these occasions that once, when the wind was due east, he bribed a boy to climb to the weathercock which Stevenson always consulted and fasten it so that it indicated a steady west wind.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us lists of the most popular books in the large boarding schools of the Society of Friends,

"compiled by the pupils themselves." They are rather curious. The boys state their preferences as follows:

1. Boy's Own Annual.
2. Treasure Island.
3. St. Winifred's.
4. Tom Brown's Schooldays.
5. Sherlock Holmes.
6. Stalky & Co.
7. Eric.
8. Robinson Crusoe.
9. Ivanhoe.

Evidently these Quaker boys are no respecters of persons. The impersonal Annual rides it over Stevenson and Defoe. Nor is it easy to define the taste which prefers St. Winifred's before Tom Brown's Schooldays, and yet gives Stalky & Co. a place above Eric. We should have thought that the first preference involved a rather strong reversal of the second. The girls are decidedly old-fashioned in their tastes—though, doubtless, a gentle censorship must be taken into account. They read:

1. Little Lord Fauntleroy.
2. Little Women.
3. Uncle Tom's Cabin.
4. St. Winifred's.
5. Gipsy Brenton.
6. A Peep Behind the Scenes.
7. Black Beauty.
8. Wide, Wide World.
9. Carrots.
10. In the Golden Days.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Can any of your readers tell me who originally compiled and who first published The Child's Own Book, which was issued about the middle of the last century? The only entries I can find in the British Museum Catalogue here are: 'The Child's Own Book, illustrated, 9th edition, revised and corrected, with original tales translated from the German, London, 1861.' The book was reprinted in America very shortly after its appearance, and I have in my possession a copy which appears to be printed from duplicate English plates. It is a dumpy, small, square octavo volume of about 600 pages, and it is a very good collection, indeed, of the best of the classical nursery and fairy lore for children. I believe it went from William Tegg to Messrs. Ward, Lock, who still publish it."

THE Writing and Machine News has not come in our way before, but here is No. 1 of its sixth volume. The little paper seems to be doing its own particular work well. Among its contributors is an ingenious alliterist who thus dramatises the merits of Messrs. Pitman's system of phonography:

Papa perceives Pitman publishes phonetic pamphlets, propounding principles. . . . Pushing past pedestrians, papa proceeds precipitately past Paternoster publishing places, perceives "Pitman, Phonographic Publisher": puts purse 'pon Pitman's porter's palm:—"Parcel Pitman's phonetic preceptorial publications, please."

Pocketing precious Pitman—priceless possession—pater's "physog" portrays pleasure. Procures phaeton—Pall Mall passed—presently Papa perceives Philip—papa's pride. Places Pitman's publications proudly 'pon Philip's palm. Philip peruses: papa propounds phonographic philosophy

Philip—preferring play—protests. Papa promises Philip prizes, providing Philip patiently perseveres. Philip promises, procures pencil, pen, paper—proceeds. Perplexed: presently perceives principle—prances.

WE have referred ere now to Miss Millard's (of Teddington) genius for lighting up her catalogues of curios with literary touches. Surely our recent remarks on Byron's forceful personality are sufficiently supported by the following item in Miss Millard's catalogue :

BYRON service (part thereof) in spode, with subjects from the poems in blue and white, and verses at the back of each piece, consisting in all of 26 dinner plates, 21 soup plates, 2 soup tureens and covers, dish strainer, 6 meat and poultry dishes, sauce tureen, and vegetable dish, some 60 pieces. A few of the quotations are appended :

These two, a maiden and a youth, were there
Gazing, the one on all that was beneath,
Fair as herself, but the boy gazed on her ;
And both were young and one was beautiful.

The Dream.

The voice of my mourning is o'er,
And the mountains behold me no more ;
If the hand that I love lay me low,
There cannot be pain in the blow.

Hebrew Melodies.

Ah ! were I severed from thy side,
Where were thy friends, and who my guide ?
You have not seen, time shall not see
The hour that tears my soul from thee.

Bride of Abydos.

There are about fifty pieces that can be used for hanging, with the comforting feeling that the subjects are not hackneyed. Separated, the items should be two and three guineas each. The lot £24.

MRS. CHARLOTTE C. SPOKES is about to publish a volume, entitled Shakespeare's Family, which will contain a record of the ancestry and descendants of Shakespeare. The work will be published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

Bibliographical.

"THERE have been labourers in this field before me," says Mr. Lewis Melville in the preface to his collection of Stray Papers by Thackeray. Undoubtedly there have been. The first, I suppose, was the "Theodore Taylor" (John Camden Hotten) who published, in 1864, Thackeray, the Humourist and the Man of Letters, which gave, practically for the first time, particulars of the novelist's connexion with the Cambridge "Snob," and other details then "not generally known." In 1875 came Thackerayana, a book of "Notes and Anecdotes" compiled by Mr. Joseph Grego, and republished in 1898. The Bibliography of Thackeray, by Mr. R. H. Shepherd, which appeared in 1880, put a good many people on the track of the minor and forgotten writings; and then in 1887 came an amplification and extension of that bibliography, as an appendix to a volume called Sultan Stork, and Other Stories and Sketches. This was the first notable attempt to reproduce work by Thackeray which had not been officially "collected." In 1899 we had not only Mr. Spielmann's resuscitation of old matter from Punch, but a reprint of the one-act interlude entitled King Glumpus, and a reproduction of Thackeray's contributions to the National Standard and the Constitutional.

The last-named is an expensive volume; and Sultan Stork, I believe, is out of print. Mr. Melville's collection of Stray Papers (Hutchinson) may be said, speaking broadly, to give us the contents of both these books, and more besides. They supply some things which he omits; but his is by far the most comprehensive and acceptable compilation. In general, such literary gleaning is to be deprecated, if not condemned; but Thackeray comes out of the process much better than most men, and of very much of Mr. Melville's volume one can honestly say that it is worth possessing in this handy form. It will soon be time for a further extension of the Shepherd Bibliography. Since 1887 many of the principal works have fallen out of copyright, and the non-official editions of them have been numerous. Vanity Fair became public property in 1890, Pendennis in 1892, Esmond in 1894, and The Newcomes in 1897, and of all of these there were fresh editions as late as 1899, not counting the "authorised" ones. Meanwhile, the Biographical Edition (with which this book of Stray Papers ranges) must, from the interest and value of its editorial prefaces, continue to hold the field.

A literary gossip has been telling us that the original publication of Adam Bede was postponed a little for fear of clashing with that of Bulwer's What will He Do with It? "What about Bulwer's story now?" asks my contemporary. Well, I should say that it is doing fairly. It was issued in two volumes in 1898 as part and parcel of the "new Knebworth edition"; a pocket edition of it appeared in 1897, and there were other editions of it in 1893 and 1892. That, I think, is a tolerably good record for the last decade. It is fashionable to sneer at Bulwer, but the sneering is generally done by those who are blissfully ignorant of his best work.

It is fashionable, also, to sneer at Anthony Trollope, who, according to Dr. Richard Garnett, never "created" anybody or anything. By something more than a coincidence, Trollope's praises are sung this month by Mr. Lang in Longman's and by Mr. Street in the Cornhill. I have not heard that either of these gentleman is about to "edit" a reissue of Trollope's stories; so it is to be hoped that their disinterestedness will not be impugned. I venture to think that a republication of Trollope's tales in a cheap, neat, handy form would be a commercial success. We shall see.

It has been "the thing" for some time past to disparage the work of George Eliot, whose literary limitations are obvious. It is easy to lay one's fingers on the weak points in Daniel Deronda and Middlemarch, for example; but elaborate attempts to belittle the author of Adam Bede, Silas Marner, Romola, and the Scenes from Clerical Life, are apt to recoil upon the heads of those who make them. That there is, meanwhile, a "recrudescence" of the vogue of the "unpopular" writer is made clear by the announcement of a George Eliot Reader—an enterprise on which, I think, the publishers would not enter without having previously felt the pulse of the public and found it beating healthily—on that point, at any rate.

M. Emile Verhaeren, who lectured at Oxford on Wednesday, would, of course, be familiar, by name at least, to those who heard him. There is, however, no reason why even those of his audience who know no language but English should not have made acquaintance with at least some of his literary outcome. It so happens that in 1898 Messrs. Duckworth published an English version (by Mr. Arthur Symonds) of M. Verhaeren's play, "Les Aubes," while in the following year Mr. Lane brought out an English rendering (by Miss Alma Strettel) of certain of his poems. For perfidious Albion that is not so bad.

The old favourites are apt to hold their own well with the new ones. In these days of Mr. Henty and the rest, the books of Mayne Reid, W. H. G. Kingston, and J. G. Edgar still sell. Nor is the late Mr. R. M. Ballantyne—though, to my mind, much inferior as a story-teller to those I have just named—without his present-day admirers. A firm of publishers is about to reprint his Coral Island, Ungava, and Martin Rattler, which are just out of copyright, and for which a measure of renewed popularity may fairly be expected. Time was when the boys of this country—ay, and the girls also—hung upon the lips of Mr. Ballantyne.

Mr. A. Stodart-Walker has written, and we shall shortly see, a volume on Robert Buchanan, the Poet of Modern Revolt. It is pleasant to find Buchanan's verse exciting attention in these forgetful days. It is to be hoped, however, that Mr. Stodart-Walker will not confine himself to a mere phase of Buchanan's poetry, but will expound it in all its variety—its very Celtic mysticism, its grimly humorous satire of religious hypocrisy, and so forth, and so forth. He will find most matter in the earlier volumes; the latter were too much in the modern journalistic manner.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

"The World is Very Evil."

Ephemera Critica: Plain Truths about Current Literature.
By J. Churton Collins. (Constable. 7s. 6d.)

If critics were ever on view, as the members of the Royal Academy are on view at the tenth of December distribution of prizes, we can imagine an eager, touzled girl-student nudging another, and, singling out Mr. Churton Collins from the bearded veterans on the dais, whisper, regardless of grammar: "That's him! He's the only one with an intimate acquaintance with classical literature. Don't let him see that you're looking, for he's the fiercest of the Saturday Review lions, and, let me write it or we may be overheard, he's a reviewer with a conscience. He knows everything about English literature and he was awfully cross with Prof. Saintsbury for saying that Wordsworth has 'echoing detonation, and the auroral light of true poetry'; and with Mr. Gosse for remarking that Lydgate was tuneless. He's dreadfully learned, and if it hadn't been for him nobody would ever have known that Tennyson was a pla—giarist. As to dates, oh, my dear! And they say he thinks in Latin and Greek on alternate days."

We ourselves learn from this stout volume that Mr. Collins is "drefful" angry. He is angry with the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, with the University Presses, with philologists to a man, with Mr. W. M. Rossetti, with Mr. Aldis Wright, with Mr. Gosse, with Mr. Saintsbury, with Mr. Le Gallienne, with the public, with critics, with writers; indeed, with everyone, apparently, except himself. True, his anger is sometimes inconsistent, but that is because it has lasted such a long time. All of the articles in this book, or almost all, are familiar. We have remembered and forgotten so much else since we read them. His polemic against the Universities for giving the cold shoulder to Literature, and the friendly hand to Philology, battered its way through the pages of the Nineteenth Century years ago, and a review of the late Sir George Osborn Morgan's translation of Virgil can hardly be said to shine with the auroral light of novelty. Mr. Collins does not, of course, attempt to conceal the fact that these selections from a working journalist's ephemera are not new. We remark upon it because the first line of his preface gave us the thrill that ladies are supposed to feel when they see in a shop window a confection labelled le dernier cri. The first line of the preface is: "It is time to speak out," which is as if Mr. Chamberlain should remark this afternoon: "It is time to say something against Home Rule." Moreover, so adept a stone thrower as Mr. Collins should see that the building in which he lives (best glass, you may be sure!) is well protected. In the first essay, on "The Present Functions of Criticism," he is contemptuously angry with those who republish articles they have contributed to current periodicals. "A few years ago," he says, "a man would as soon have thought of inflicting them in the shape of a volume on the public as he would have thought of issuing an edition of his private letters to his friends." Yet the papers in this volume are reprinted from current periodicals. "All," we are told, "have been carefully revised." Surely so faultless a critic, who pilloried Mr. Saintsbury for such a slight slip as referring to Browning's James Lee, should have deleted a reference to "these columns" (see p. 211), obviously a reference to the columns of the Saturday Review. And a critic who is so particular about figures—"we are informed by Prof. Saintsbury that Ascham's Schoolmaster was published in 1568; it was published in 1570"—should have cast a more searching eye on his own. Of the twenty-eight chapter headings given in the List of Contents only seven correspond to the paging in the volume. Suppose you want to know what Mr. Collins has to say about "The Gentle Art of Self-Advertisement." In the Contents you are referred to p. 154. You turn to p. 154, and find yourself in the middle of an article on "The New Criticism." A trifle, possibly, but it is so often on trifles that Mr. Collins fixes the indignant gaze of his microscopic eye.

Not always! Indeed, it is far from our intention to belittle the service Mr. Collins has rendered to literature in his efforts to introduce more of the scientific spirit and a riper scholarship into criticism. But we suggest that his pin-pricks might have been less frequent and less vicious. Because a writer is fallible, and too ready, often through enthusiasm, to write on subjects which he does not happen to know up to the hilt, it does not follow that he has nothing to say worth saying on those subjects. Criticism should be sympathetic as well as destructive. Mr. Collins reminds us a little of a very intelligent rodent tremendously concerned with the stubble in a field long after the grain has been picked, eaten, and assimilated by numbers to whom the knowledge that such good grain existed was a discovery. Stubble is all very well as far as it goes, but it is not the only thing on a country side. Many good causes are ruined by overstatement: some of Mr. Collins's statements are so wild as to be amusing. This, for example: Said an editor once to Mr. Collins, and he quotes it with gusto: "If I were to tell the truth as forcibly as I could wish about the books sent to me for review, in six months my proprietors would be in the bankruptcy court."

We admit the justice and the need of much of Mr. Collins's criticism, but oh, for a little breeze of appreciation, for a holiday from the contemptuous words that sprinkle his pages, such as: "flaccid dilettantism," "philological pedantry," "vile arts," "grossest ignorance," "charlatans and fribbles," "miserable compilation," "the canaille of sciolists and fribbles" (fribble is dear to him), "ludicrous adulation"; and such sentences as: "anything more sickening and depressing, anything more calculated to make the name of Shakespeare an abomination to the youth of England, it would be impossible for man to devise"; or "it is shocking, it is disgusting to contemplate the devices to which many men of letters will stoop for the sake of exalting themselves into a factitious reputation."

To Mr. Collins the world of letters is awry and evil. In almost everything he sees something bad. Mr. Colvin, we are told, "has been guilty of a grave error of judgment" in his editorship of Stevenson's letters. One third of them would have been enough for Mr. Churton Collins. Here is his opinion on the Letters themselves:

In their slangy familiarity and careless spontaneity they remind us of Byron's, but what a contrast do these trivial and too often insipid tattlings present to Byron's brilliance and point, his wit, his piquancy, his insight into life and men! Only here and there, in a touch of description, or in a casual reflection, do we find anything to distinguish them from the myriads of letters which are interchanged between young men every day in the year.

Clearly Mr. Collins is constitutionally unable to appreciate the buoyancy, the lilt, the surprise and refreshment of Stevenson's mind as revealed in his Letters. We would not have one taken away, and we are inclined to mistrust the judgment of a critic of belles-lettres who finds them little better than "the myriads of letters which are interchanged between young men every day in the year." Detective criticism has its uses, but it is apt to narrow the mind, and it certainly has a deadening effect on the reader. To read Mr. Collins on Virgil, in his review of Sir George Osborn Morgan's translation, is like listening to a pedantic schoolmaster pulverising the efforts of an amiable but stumbling class. We are breathless at the learning of the examiner, but we never want to hear the name of Virgil again. How different is the influence of a sympathetic critic, whose head rises above the stubble, and whose enthusiasm for right and lovely things, for the humanities, has not been embittered by the shortcomings and the trips of his contemporaries. The late Mr. F. W. Myers also wrote on Virgil. Read this passage, and if you do not go straight back to your Virgil, his name, when you think of him, will send a thrill from brain to heart:

No poet has lain so close to so many hearts; no words so often as his have sprung to men's lips in moments of excitement and self-revelation, from the one fierce line retained and chanted by the untameable boy who was to be Emperor of Rome, to the impassioned prophecy of the great English statesman as he pleaded till morning's light for the freedom of a continent of slaves. And those who have followed by more secret ways the influence which those utterances have exercised on mankind know well, perhaps themselves have shared, the mass of emotion which has slowly gathered round certain lines of Virgil's as it has round certain texts of the Bible, till they come to us charged with more than an individual passion and with a wider meaning than their own—with the cry of the despair of all generations, with the yearning of all loves unappeased, with the anguish of all partings, "beneath the pressure of separate eternities."

Yet Mr. Collins was once young: once he had enthusiasm. In a review of Mr. Tremenheere's translation of Catullus he confesses to it, to the time when even to him existence was "a perpetual feast":

Perhaps the best thing in this world is youth, and the poetry of Catullus is its very incarnation. The "young Catullus" he was to his contemporaries, and the young Catullus he will be to the end of time. To turn over his pages is to recall the days when all within and all without conspire to make existence a perpetual feast, when life's lord is pleasure, its end enjoyment, its law impulse, before experience and satiety have disillusioned and disgusted, and we are still, in Dante's phrase, "trattando l'ombra come cosa salda."

Alas!

In a book which is almost all blame, and such praise as the author permits himself is usually half-hearted, the passages of unqualified commendation stand out like crocuses in the early spring. "Probably the best hexameters which have been composed in English [besides certain of Hawtry's translations of the Iliad] are those in William Watson's Hymn to the Sea." And the Golden Treasury (first series) "may be said to lay something more than the foundation of a sound critical education." But Mr. Palgrave does not escape a flick of the whip. Two pages further on we are told that the acquaintance of the lecturer on Landscape in Classical Poetry with the Greek and Roman poets was, "if scholarly and sympathetic, somewhat superficial." "But," adds Mr. Churton Collins, and he alone knows what the generosity of this clause cost him, "he was getting old, and perhaps he had lost his memory or his notes." That is characteristic.

An Ambassador's Book.

Shifting Scenes; or, Memories of Many Men in Many Lands.
By the Right Hon. Sir Edward Malet, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., sometime Ambassador to Germany. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

WHEN we saw on the first page of this book the sentence, "I am an unusually good sleeper, and ascribe to this talent in great measure the steady duration of my health," our misgivings were acute. But it was with us as it has been with Sir Edward Malet. All through his life the cloud he dreaded has passed him by, or has dropped only a casual chill. The passage was not the prelude of banalities; it was to introduce Whiffles. Whiffles appeared a little after midnight on Sir Edward's bed, and, in fact, sitting on the diplomatist's feet. "I have come to interview you," he said; "my name is Whiffles. I am The Reporter." Naturally Sir Edward kicked out, whereupon Whiffles rose slowly into the air like a feather, or a captive balloon, and then slowly descended to his first position. No amount of kicking could evict him, and, in a word, the interview came off; this book is it. Again we had misgivings. Shall a great diplomatist, an ex-envoy to the Shadow of God, and Ambassador to the Kaiser, write his reminiscences in the guise of an interview with a reporter man named Whiffles? This is modernity if you like. This is romps in levés dress. It is certainly not the high Roman fashion. You cannot call it the "genteel style in writing." Shall a man climb the great stairway of British diplomacy; learn to talk with slow effect to attachés, secretaries, mandarins, ministers, sultans, and emperors; see the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, from the Argentine to Rome, and from Berlin to Cairo; and then give his story to Whiffles? Shade of Sir William Temple! where is thy book in which Elia found "scarce an authority quoted under an ambassador"—thysself an ambassador, clothed with the glory of the Triple Alliance, and high doings at Nimeguen and the Hague? On what a scale Temple wrote of men and things, naming building and planting as among "the follies of my life," and gathering all up in those words of tender and lofty farewell: "When all is done, human life is at the greatest and the best but a froward child that must be played with and humoured a little to keep it quiet till it falls asleep, and then the care is over." And from this to turn to Whiffles, sitting on the bedclothes, with his expansive smile!

This cloud, also, rolled by, though it left us sad. Whiffles accepted, this is a cheerful, chatty book, like another; better written than most. Not that even on his own plane Whiffles is too amusing. His office is only to keep the tap running. Sometimes he grows fitful and shadowy. Often you find yourself skipping his interjected remarks; they can be taken as read. When he is lively or absurd the dialogue goes like this:

"During the two years that I was in the United States all the members of our service were treated with constant kindness and hospitality, and I gained by intimate contact with Americans an affection for them which has caused me to delight in their society from that day to this. So I say again, if any Secretary has a chance of going to Washington, let him bless his stars."

"And stripes," put in Whiffles.

"I hate silly jokes," I said, and Whiffles went up into the air, and as he sank to rest again cross-legged at the foot of the bed he said—

"The essence of a joke is to be silly."

"A joke," I rejoined, "may be good or bad."

"You are confusing," he retorted; "the adjectives 'good' or 'bad' only apply to a joke in action."

"Well, listen to this joke," I said, my thoughts jumping back unaccountably to a long-forgotten remembrance: "A traveller in the shires rested at noon at a wayside hostelry and took luncheon. When it was finished he asked for the bill. The landlord brought it to him, and, after casting a glance at it, he looked at Boniface and said, 'What is your name?' 'My name,' replied the landlord, 'is Partridge.' 'Ab,' said the traveller, 'by the length of your bill I should have thought it would have been Woodcock!'"

A broad grin rippled over Whiffles' wrinkled features. "It's not a joke at all," he said; "it's an anecdote."

"Well, joke or anecdote, I have told it to you because it was always a special favourite with Prince Bismarck."

"Right," said Whiffles. "Thank you; it is always interesting to hear of the small things that interest great minds. I suppose you have some reminiscences of Prince Bismarck which are of greater interest."

Of course Sir Edward obliges with some Bismarckiana. Let us say at once that the savour of the book lies in its reflection of a happy life. Sir Edward Malet has done and been most things which we associate with success. He has had his whack, as Byron said of himself. Not a Byronic whack of course, but a good rousing, correct whack. He was given the post of attaché at Frankfurt on his sixteenth birthday ("such a thing could not be done now" he assures the alarmed Whiffles), and from that hour his rise was steady and at times swift. He found in marriage not only the comfort promised to man in Eden, but the impetus that is so necessary to him out of it. A certain self-indifference, and insusceptibility to the joy of existence (tenderly probed by Whiffles) had dogged his steps. "I married, and the whole scene was changed—life was no more a dreary waste. The knowledge that another was concerned in the success of my action at once invested it with the microbe of anxiety." We had not thought of anxiety as a beneficent microbe, but Sir Edward Malet's happiness in the Dual Alliance is matter of public knowledge. By the way, he was prepared for his good fortune by a palmist eighteen years before he led the daughter of a Duke to the altar. "Do you believe in palmists?" asks Whiffles. "No; but I am inclined to believe in palmistry"; and Sir Edward tells us that in 1879 a Parisian seer told him, at the end of a long interview: "It is a pity that the quality of judgment which is so marked in your hands should be useless to you. It is quite cancelled by the absence of self-confidence. You possess a gift, of the value of which you seem to have no knowledge." "Whether these words were true or not they had a permanent effect upon me. It is not going too far to say that they opened a new world to me. . . . I do not think I should have become Ambassador at Berlin if I had not had that interview with a palmist, who rightly or wrongly made me believe what he told me." Were we defending a palmist in a police-court we fear we should be wicked enough to quote this passage. Sir Edward makes acknowledgment to all who, consciously or not, have helped him. His early diplomatic training was under Lord Lyons at Washington. We see a good deal of Lord Lyons later at Paris. Always he is the fine figure we knew him to be, a bachelor, a disciplinarian, a Stoic, and a master of his calling. Lord Dufferin, however, excelled him in fascination, brilliancy, and joyousness. Some of the best passages in the book concern diplomatic life at Constantinople, and there is a good story of an interview in which a new and inexperienced dragoman interpreted between Sir Edward and the Sultan. This young man's interpreting was so slick that Sir Edward at once perceived that he was neglecting the customary duty of wrapping every sentence in the flowers of Eastern hyperbole. In a word, the Sultan was getting Sir Edward's remarks neat. The situation was decidedly touchy, and we think it says much for the British Minister-Plenipotentiary that he did not permit himself to quail under His Majesty's open-eyed astonishment. On the contrary, he at once embraced so rare an opportunity and carried the conversation over wider ground, putting everything he had to say into the frankest speech. The Sultan grew more and more animated in his listening, and a moment of some suspense followed the dragoman's last sentence. But the upshot was agreeable to all parties.

Sir Edward Malet passed much of his childhood in the house of Lord Brougham, who was his mother's step-father; and some lively pages are concerned with the rough old Chancellor. During five pages there is not a single interruption from Whiffles. Brougham lived at No. 4, Grafton-street.

The whole place frightened me as a child. It seemed so big and gloomy. In the morning my brother and I used to be made to go into the room where Lord Brougham was at breakfast, to say "Good morning" to him. He would look at us under his bushy eyebrows, and say almost immediately, with a strong Scottish accent, "That will do; ye may go away." My remembrance of his appearance is concentrated in those thick eyebrows and his black and white check trousers, immortalised by Punch. He was delightful in conversation when he was amused, but nothing stirred him to this lighter mood but the company of outsiders. He could sit through the family dinner in absolute silence, broken by occasional outbursts of rage at some trivial mistake in the service on the part of the servants. He would suddenly hallo at them, calling them brutes and beasts if they handed him salt instead of pepper; and this halloing when he was angry inspired me as a child with terror, so that I never entertained for him any other feeling than fear.

This is perhaps the most definite portrait in the book, if we except that of Toby, the dog who enthroned himself at the Paris Embassy and rode out regularly with Lord Lyons in his barouche. The amusing thing was that Toby had won his privileges only by unwearied homage to the ambassador's person. To the last Lord Lyons said: "He is not my dog. He chooses to come with me, but he does not belong to me. I hate dogs." Yet they were inseparable, and the Figaro printed a delightful Gallic article on Toby beginning thus: "In the most aristocratic street in Paris there is a magnificent house between court and garden. If a passer-by asks who lives there, the answer given will be: 'Toby, et puis l'Ambassadeur d'Angleterre.'"

The exciting chapters in the book are those dealing with the Franco-German War. Sir Edward was in charge of the British Embassy during the Commune, and we have a weird account of the removal of furniture, clocks, and candelabra to the cellars of the house, which looked like a haunt of brigands, piled as it was with archives and valuables, despatch boxes, and china vases. And there, while shells rained on the mansard roof, and the female servants cowered in corners, Frank Lascelles and the author dined in dress clothes and white ties, waited on by the butler and servants in due form. When, after dinner, they went upstairs and looked out, Paris was in flames. Alike for its intrinsic interest and its sunny tone of achievement and content this book is one to read and lightly digest. Whiffles, to be sure, reproached the ambassador, whom he had coerced, with a lack of modesty. Sir Edward very properly told him to "Go to —," and on that lofty note the book ends.

Lookers-on in China.

Mount Omi and Beyond. By Archibald John Little. Illustrated. (Heinemann. 16s. net.)

THE instinct of the traveller is nowhere more clearly seen than in those who endure continual discomfort for the sake of seeing places that are already tolerably well known. Mr. and Mrs. Little are travellers, thus admirably curious, yet at the same time unpretentious. Lhasa, that Mecca of Buddhism, allured them not. Though day by day they cheerily boiled their thermometer to ascertain their altitude, there is evidence that it was in the open pot that science deprecates. They were not in search of records, but of the picturesque.

Mountains too often mean records nowadays, and there are two mountains particularly prominent in these pages. But Mount Omi had until recently "eleven summit temples," and it remains one of the most popular holy places in Sze Chuan. The other mountain, the Sai King, was bought by a young priest for the equivalent of £150—a statement which means the acquisition of a "domain of some 800 acres, perfectly walled in by inaccessible precipices, and approachable only by removable ladders." Both mountains are under 12,000 feet in height.

Mr. and Mrs. Little are, then, acquitted of "renowning it." We never find Mr. Little in lofty loneliness writing in purple ink of that which he has no vocabulary to describe. His book is a picture of the Chinaman and his vassal, the Thibetan, as seen in travels during the 'nineties in one of the richest provinces of China.

Let us begin by showing how he and his wife paid in comfort for the privilege of painting this picture. The following describes the interior of a restaurant rejoicing in the name of the Yung Hua Kuan Tsan, or Perpetuallyflowering Official Hotel, in a town near the celebrated salt wells of Tsz' Liu Ching :

The walls were black, and the floor encrusted with several inches of mud upon which it was impossible to adjust the table upright: there was a floor above, which was inhabited, and we had to send up and request its occupants to keep quiet while we were eating, as every movement they made sent down a shower of black dirt upon our food.

In Mr. Little's diary four days later we read :

Torrential rains in the night [at Kiating Fu], and the water came through freely, drenching poor A[lisia] to the skin. She, trying to escape in the dark to our sitting-room, which, though entirely open on one side, appeared to have a sounder roof, had her shoes pulled off in the sticky mud of the floor.

A night spent in an inn on the Thibetan border produces the remark that "twenty Norfolk Howards" were extracted from his pillow, while at Yachow the poor man had the greatest difficulty in keeping a mob of students out of his wife's bedroom.

The last incident sheds an instructive light upon the Chinese point of view towards aliens. To the "hoodlums" Mrs. Little in a sedan chair was "the foreign woman in a cage," and all foreigners are to Chinamen as strange impious animals, whose practical cleverness in no way atones for their spiritual deformity. It is as at deformed creatures—barely human, however blue-eyed and stalwart they may be—that Chinamen on their own soil gaze at "foreign devils."

And to us he is now the Yellow Terror. For long the oddity of his pigtail and of his inveterate fondness for the letter l kept prejudice at bay. Now it is rampant.

But a book like Mr. Little's draws him again for us, and how he is that wonderful being a man with the divine spark unobliterated by his density. Note that suspension-bridge over the Tung river. The roadway lies on the chains, and the chains, "as near the horizontal as it is absolutely possible for a suspended chain to swing," are unsupported by towers, though the bridge is 311 Chinese feet long. Yet the bridge has stood in use without repair since 1703, the year of its completion. It is, then, essentially a wonderful structure, but the small planks of pine which form the roadway are not bound to the chains, and shift about with the traffic leaving many gaps.

Alas for these gaps! They signalise the indolence that drifts into degeneracy. Where are the glories of Cheng-Tu which Marco Polo saw? "The modern town is little more than a vast aggregation of streets, in which the dirt and crowds of Sze Chuan towns generally appear to reach their culminating point." Why does Sze Chuan now suffer from droughts from which once it was free? Because the Chinese have a "locust-like propensity" to destroy every green thing wherever they penetrate, for when the trees are gone comes the turn of the scrub and bushes, then the grass, and at last the roots, until, finally, the rain washes down the accumulated soil of ages, and only barren rocks remain. This fact accounts for the diminished rainfall, the lessened rivers. . . . The diminished size of the rivers is very marked everywhere.

But the Chinese are excessively superstitious, and officials never shrink from attributing disasters from natural causes to their own misdeeds "in their reports to the Throne." Near Lung Tung Mr. Little noticed the frightful laceration of the mountain tops, the result of eruption, which science seemingly attributes to the action of water, but the Chinese to "the escape of a dragon from its lair." The Littles' boy informed them, in the present instance, that the dragon lays its eggs on the mountain tops, and that, further, over such a spot the snow never lies, so that, if only the officials would exercise due vigilance, they could trace these spots in the winter and have the eggs destroyed.

Writing in September, 1892, Mr. Little chronicles an example of a more tender, less stultifying superstition than the foregoing :

For the last few days, in all the Chinese villages we passed through, the whole population—men and boys alike—were engaged in writing letters, and we noticed them especially addressing the envelopes with careful calligraphy. At first we could not make it out until we remembered it was the mid-seven moon, when deceased relatives have to be provided with funds to carry them over another year in the nether regions. The big envelopes contain voluminous supplies of paper cash which are ceremoniously burnt and so conveyed to their addressees.

What a picture is that; it might come out of Herodotus. Fifty pages before we saw a phlegmatic woman covered with jewellery cooking her rice at an improvised furnace in the corner of a ruined house, and seeming "anything but sad." Yet she was "the only survivor of twenty-five persons who had occupied the house when a few nights back [before August 17, 1892] the spate came down." "Anything but sad"; it sticks in the gentle Englishman's soul; but the image of the gentle Chinamen writing to their dead banishes the bedizened lady from our thoughts, or one thinks of her as haply no more bedizened, writing to hers.

The element of the childlike consecrates China. Even hideous Chinese law is relieved by passages that Mr. Gilbert might have framed.

There is no tax on distilleries; indeed, theoretically they are all illegal; in the centre of the town of Fulin we noticed a grand proclamation carved in huge letters on a lofty stone tablet prohibiting the cultivation of millet. Why these continue to be issued when no dinner party in China, whether amongst the rich or the poor, is complete without liquor, is one of those things no one, not even a Chinamen, can explain.

Mr. Little had a comic encounter with Chinese law over some wounded coolies and some stolen furs. The accommodating magistrate produced two wretches in wooden collars to vindicate the majesty of justice. But, urged the plaintiff, they were not the culprits. Mr. Little was assured he was mistaken. Furthermore, said the magistrate, "there was no need, as you have seen, even to make a complaint where an insult to foreign travellers has been given." Then, said Mr. Little:

"But where are the furs?"

"Oh, those fell into the river in the dark. We have a guard on the bridge, and no one would dare have stolen them."

"But it is the guard that stole them."

"Impossible! . . ."

Mr. Little was worsted, and, taking one consideration with another, he cannot help liking the Thibetans better than the Celestials. Also, he wonders why the Thibetans, who are strapping fellows bearing arms, remain in vassalage to a "rabble." So do we, and especially why they buy Chinese refuse in the name of tea. And here we say adieu to a very pleasant book.

"Puir Auld Scotland."

A Century of Scottish History: from the Days Before the '45 to Those Within Living Memory. By Sir Henry Craik. 2 vols. (Edinburgh: Blackwood.)

SIR HENRY CRAIK is a very able man and a capable writer, with a style that seems to be modelled on that of Principal Robertson, and we hope he will have as much luck as his pattern, who got £4,500 for one only of his numerous works. Hume was paid £5,000 for the concluding portion of his history. These facts are eloquent of changes in Scotland. In 1760 literary property was almost unknown. Then came a kind of golden age for authors, and now such prices as we have quoted would be what the daily journalist calls "phenomenal."

Sir Henry Craik's work scarcely seems to us so well proportioned as that of Robertson. He describes the Jacobite rising as a mere episode in the Scottish history dealt with, yet it appears to have fascinated him so much that he could not carry out his early intention of dismissing it with brevity. The best part of a volume is devoted to Prince Charlie, and he could not refrain from telling once more how Lord Lovat, Balmerino, and the rest of them behaved on the scaffold, which is all an Old-Bailey-Calendar kind of a business. Very much better are his elaborate studies of character, which are invariably interesting, even though, in too many cases, the personages have no national importance whatever. The best bit of writing in the book is a graceful and fine appreciation of Dr. Johnson as a tourist, and we are only sorry that it is too long to quote. On the other literary forces that went to the making of nineteenth-century Scotland, Sir Henry is not so satisfactory. He has a great deal about Allan Ramsay, only a mention of Fergusson, and very little that is to the point about Burns, whose merciless wit and satire did so much to break down the harsh, intolerant, and to some extent hypocritical religious spirit inherited from the Covenanters. But evidently his attraction is less towards poetry and belles-lettres than to the more solid aspects of literature. His picture of Hume is worthy of a place beside that of Johnson, while that of Scott is quite unsatisfactory. The name of Thomas Carlyle occurs only once, and so trivially that it is not mentioned in the index, although for a great deal of the period covered there is no more illuminating authority than the sage's account of his peasant father and mother, his uncle "home from the wars," Edward Irving, and his own early days at college. In those you get the Scotland, or part of it, of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century painted from the life with a power and vividness unrivalled. The change is a very extraordinary one that Sir Henry Craik works out. Even at the beginning of the nineteenth century Scotland was a poor country, thinly populated. Nobody was so rich that he could get on without economy, and the habits of the majority were frugal and simple. Oatmeal porridge and milk, oatcakes and cheese, formed the general diet. Land was ill-cultivated, and the towns not much more than large villages. Glasgow itself, "a neat and picturesque little town, nestling about the banks of a humble stream navigable only by boats of small draft and scanty tonnage." There were few factories. Now it is exactly like England on a smaller scale. Huge ugly cities—and Edinburgh itself is becoming one of them—attract the toilers from the land. Highland clachan and coast fishing village are deserted, save of the hotel-keeper, the sportsman, and the tourist, and those who baited lines or tended sheep and lived healthy natural lives are to be sought in mine and shop and factory. And with this has come an equal change in manner and thought. The kirk and the "Sabbath" are no longer what they were to the Scot of the day of Burns, and Sir Henry Craik's learned exposition of the ecclesiastical changes that forms so large a part of Scottish life and history reads like the end of a tale that is told. In truth quite a new one has begun, and that under circumstances so different from any recorded in the past that no one yet can tell whether it is developing into comedy or tragedy. Greater wealth, greater comfort of every kind, have come to Scotland, but they have brought new dangers to which not even our author, who is patriotic to the verge of being provincial, is blind. However, that is a matter for the statesman and thinker; it is the historian's business to record only, and Sir Henry Craik deserves a "Well done!" for his performance of it.

Other New Books.

THROUGH SIBERIA.

By J. STADLING.

EDITED BY F. H. H. GUILLEMARD.

Owing to the interest in all things connected with that vast Russian Asiatic empire whence the Muscovite bayonets pour into Manchuria, created by recent events in China, books on Siberia of course tread fast on each other's heels. But the present volume deserves a position distinct and distinguished among the literature hastily thrown together for the occasion, or, at best, with nothing to note it unique. The author, Mr. Stadling, is a Swedish traveller and sociologist, who has a special interest in and acquaintance with things Russian. When the hapless Andrée started on his (too probably) disastrous balloon-voyage to the Pole, Mr. Stadling accompanied him north; and when his anxious countrymen began to desire news of the long-missing aeronaut, Mr. Stadling was fixed upon by the Swedish Geographical Society to travel along the Siberian coast-line, and see if tidings could be gathered from the natives. This was the starting-point of the journey described in this book. Its peculiar value is that he turned aside from the usual tracks of travellers and merchants, traversing districts little known, and even one, in the far north of the Taimyr, which has not been trodden by civilised foot since the remote days of Middendorff. His observations on the country are very valuable. Everywhere in Siberia he found shameless official corruption, and cruel extortion practised on the natives by the merchants. The Taimyr district, as shown by one of the excellent illustrations in the book, is a dreary waste, full of marshes and lakes. What is called a forest appears as a flat sweep of snow, with a few scraggy and leafless larches streaking it at intervals like telegraph poles. At one of his camps, he says, we were waited upon by a formal deputation, headed by a Dolgan chief, complaining bitterly of the way they were being fleeced and bullied by the merchants, especially by a certain Sotnikoff, who had on one occasion beaten the eyes out of a native because he had sold a fox-skin to another merchant, while other wretched people had been treated in a similar barbarous way. . . . There is no doubt . . . that these poor natives are infamously treated by some of the merchants, and are often reduced to a state of misery and famine, which at times has led to cannibalism, as, indeed, has been officially proved.

It is good to know that this Sotnikoff has been since banished to Yakutsk. The value of the book lies largely in its information about these natives: nomads with their tribes and districts like the old North American Indians, fishers, fox-trappers, or reindeer hunters. Few can realise that one industry is the gathering of mammoth-tusks, which impressively suggests the number of these extinct animals in Siberia. (Constable. 18s.)

ANNALS OF POLITICS AND CULTURE.

By G. P. GOOCH.

The idea of this work was, it seems, suggested to the author by Lord Acton, who has himself contributed an Introductory Note, besides revising the proofs. For the form, too, he is responsible; and it may be said without modification that both idea and form are exceedingly excellent. It is nothing less than a general chronology, from 1492 to 1899 (inclusive), covering the principal European nations (and, of course, America), with the chief events in Asiatic or other extra-European countries that have bearing on world-history. But this is not all. For, unlike any work of the kind published here or abroad, it combines political with literary, religious, scientific, philosophic, and all other history bearing on the general progress of humanity. By an admirable idea making for clearness, political history has its chronology on the left-hand page, while the other departments, under the general heading of "Culture," are dealt with in a parallel column on the right-hand page; so that the politics and culture of each year are set forth side by side. By a further device the paragraphs assigned to each subject are numbered, and in a general index of subjects and persons at the end of the book these numbers are referred to. Thus the searcher can ascertain at a glance what are the paragraphs dealing with the subject he wishes to look up, and a world of trouble is saved. Moreover, the reader can readily discover the context of any particular paragraph he is reading. Our sole objection is, doubtless, an inevitable one. When we arrive at recent years the attempt to include so many subjects leads to a certain arbitrariness of selection. The literature, for example, thought worthy of record in any given year displays often some curious judgments of relative importance; and the reader is likely to be tantalised by unexpected—perhaps exasperating—omissions, balanced by as unforeseen inclusions. But, under the circumstances, it could scarce be otherwise, in the work of one man. We are rather disposed to thankful surprise at the much which is given us, than to cavil at the little withheld. Mr. Gooch has done his work with remarkable thoroughness and clearness; and it should be an indispensable volume of reference for every student. We may add that a good, though, of course, far from exhaustive, bibliography is provided of the chief subjects treated. (Cambridge: University Press.)

OUR NAVAL HEROES. EDITED BY G. E. MARINDEN.

Many books have been written about the British Navy since the revival of interest which began fourteen or fifteen years ago, but there is plenty of room for this collection of sketches of our chief naval heroes. In the rush of a general history many men of undoubted worth and valour unavoidably get passed over, and in such cases individual biographies of any length are, of course, out of the question. Here, perhaps for the first time, justice is done to the naval exploits of King Edward III. It is generally said that Henry VII. founded the Royal Navy with the Great Harry in 1488; but a hundred and fifty years earlier Edward III. had admirals and ships, and in ordering his two admirals to take the sea in 1339 addressed them in these words: "Whereas our progenitors, the kings of England, have been, in all times past, lords of the English sea on every side"—words which show no heedlessness or unconcern for the naval glory of the realm. In this book, too, the gallant Commodore John Watson, of the H.E.I.C.S., is rescued from undeserved obscurity; and justice is done to the Earl of Torrington, who was so severely blamed for the battle off Beachy Head. The sketches, of which the book is made up, originally appeared in the United Service Magazine, and are now edited and annotated by Mr. G. E. Marinden. A feature of the collection is that, where possible, the life of the naval hero is written by a descendant. Thus, Admiral Blake is dealt with by Captain Blake, a Volunteer officer; Admiral Lord Hawke, by the present peer of that name; Earl Howe, by Viscount Curzon, M.P.; Admiral Lord Graves, by Lord Graves and Colonel Frank Graves; Lords Bridport and Hood, by General Lord Bridport and the Hon. A. N. Hood; and so on. The idea is ingenious; and as in many instances the authors have been assisted by an expert in the person of Mr. L. G. Carr Laughton, the experiment is satisfactory. The book is admirably illustrated with reproductions of old portraits, and with plans of naval battles. There is some good, stirring stuff in this volume, and it is prefaced by a breezy Introduction by Lord Charles Beresford. (Murray. 16s.)

COUNTRY LIFE ILLUSTRATED.

Volumes VII. and VIII.—being the bound numbers for 1900 of this charming weekly—excel their predecessors, and praise could scarcely go beyond that. But the conductors seem to be ever widening their scope, and filling out the picture of rural life. The gardens old and new and the country seats, done in finer style than was ever before attempted, are now familiar features. What is new for the year is the attention given to model farms, dairies, shire horses, cows, and other kinds of pedigree stock, the keeping and breeding of which has become a favourite pursuit of the landed gentry, from the King downwards. This alone would impart to these volumes a lasting value, since the pictures reproduce most faithfully the animal and human life on the English farms of to-day; and the articles, written with remarkable clearness, are in the right sense descriptive—that is to say, they are free from gush, accurate, and well-informed, without being so technical and dry as similar compositions are in journals written by experts for breeders. The aim of Country Life, as far as we can understand it, seems to be to address those who take an intelligent interest in the topics dealt with, whether they are well up in them or not. Any general reader would feel attracted by the account of Lord Rothschild's wonderful estate at Tring, and the excellence of all his live stock, which includes a notable stud of shire horses, perhaps the finest herd of Jerseys in existence, herds of red polls and shorthorns not unworthy of comparison with it, and a splendid flock of Southdowns. And Lord Rothschild is only one of many. The estates of Lord Baring, the Duchess of Wellington, and Sir James Blyth, to mention only these, are equally well done, so that no finer addition to the library of the country house could be imagined than these two volumes. In turning the leaves one seems to catch a breath of wholesome air from rural England, the England wherein men still sow and reap, rear horses, and fatten bees; where women go a-milking and churning; and life is all tranquil and content, as it was in the olden time. We know of no healthier or more charming periodical, none that we would put more gladly into the hands of old or young. (Newnes.)

By far the fullest Life of Earl Roberts yet issued is Mr. J. Maclaren Cobban's Life and Deeds of Earl Roberts (T. C. & E. C. Jack, of Edinburgh, 7s. 6d. net), of which the first volume is before us. It is a handsome quarto, admirably printed and produced. Portraits of great Indian soldiers, coloured pictures of types of the Indian Army, and reproductions of valuable paintings, are among the equipments of the work, which will be completed in four volumes. Mr. Cobban has undertaken a big task, for his work is as much a history as a biography. His narrative is as vivid and anecdotal as any reader can wish, and the care for style and form shown in Mr. Cobban's novels is not lacking here.

Mr. Frank T. Bullen's sea-life sketches have been much to the taste of the readers of the Spectator, and their republication in volume form is natural. They are called A Sack of Shakings. Mr. Bullen's matter and style are so familiar that we shall only remark that the sketches we enjoyed most are "The Polity of a Battleship," "Ocean Currents," and "The Voices of the Sea." Of all the sea's "voices" the silence of a great calm is in the end the least supportable. "The tension is too great to be borne long with patience. Men feel that this majestic environment is too redolent of the coming paradise to be supportable by flesh and blood. . . . It is like the Peace of God."

William Law's Practical Treatise upon Christian Perfection is neither so well-known nor so available as his Serious Call, but Mr. L. H. M. Soulsby has now made a selection from its pages which Messrs. Longmans' issue as a devotional book. Mr. Soulsby considers that the Christian Perfection has certain claims above those of Law's best known work. "The brilliant, sarcastic character-sketches in the latter somewhat divert our attention from our own shortcomings," whereas here "we are, perforce, on our knees, feeling, to use Law's own recurring phrase, 'our own Littleness and the Greatness of God.'" Digitized by Google

Fiction.

Eben Holden. By Irving Bacheller.
(Grant Richards. 6s.)

It is not very difficult to understand the exceeding popularity of this book in America, for the story is truly American, "of the soil," and it has good fellowship, humour, variety, and an agreeable inconsequence. The first part of the novel is chiefly Picaresque, beginning as it does with the cross-country travels of the hero, the dog, and Eben Holden. There is a faint similarity between Eben Holden and a certain David Harum; Eben's kindness of heart is less ingeniously concealed, but a horse-deal between the two of them would have surely resulted in a draw. The equine episode on p. 189 might well have occurred in the late Mr. Westcott's tale. The second part of the novel treats largely of New York journalism just before the Civil War, and is remarkable for an excellent portrait of Horace Greeley, the renowned editor of the Tribune. The Greeley chapters are a delightful store of anecdotes:

"Mr. Greeley," he said, halting at the elbow of the great editor

"Yes, what is it?" the editor demanded nervously, his hand wobbling over the white page as rapidly as before, his eyes upon his work.

"Another man garrotted this morning on South-street."

"Better write a paragraph," he said, his voice snapping with impatience as he brushed the full page aside, and began sowing his thoughts on another. "Warn our readers. Tell 'em to wear brass collars with spikes in 'em 'til we get a new mayor."

The man went away laughing.

Mr. Greeley threw down his pen, gathered his copy, and handed it to the workman who stood beside him.

"Proof ready at five!" he shouted as the man was going out of the room.

"Hello, Brower!" he said, bending to his work again.

"Thought you'd blown out the gas somewhere."

"Waiting until you reject this article," I said.

Mr. Bacheller is apparently not a professional novelist; but he had in him the material for one good book, he had also some literary skill, and he has produced the book—unpretentious, unshapely, invertebrate, but full of readability. He has not escaped the fell temptation to weave into his character-sketches a love-romance of the common sentimental kind, and there is, perhaps, a trace of the saccharine in the last words of Uncle Eb, afterwards engraved on his tombstone:

I ain't afraid,
'Shamed o' nothin' I ever done.
Alwuss kep' my tugs tight,
Never swore 'less 'twas nec'sary.
Never ketched a fish bigger'n 'twas,
Er lied in a hoss trade, [?]
Er shed a tear I didn't hev to,
Never cheated anybody but Eben Holden.
Goin' off somewheres, Bill—dunno the way nather;
Dunno 'f it's east er west er north er south,
Er road er trail.
But I ain't afraid.

Anne Mainwaring. By Alice Ridley.
(Longmans. 6s.)

THIS novel is not better than The Story of Aline; at the same time it is a quite satisfactory product of Lady Ridley's refined, pretty, but not vigorous talent. Like its forerunner, it deals with the mild and bridled passions of gentility in an austere way which is scarcely free from primness. Lady Ridley's pen moves easily and correctly among immemorial seats and Belgrave-square and the ball-rooms of the mightiest. One feels that it is incapable of a gaucherie; one wishes that it were, or that, at any rate, it would permit itself now and then a little freedom. There is no touch of snobbishness in the book, and yet one is made to perceive that a successful barrister (even that gilt-edged creature) barely achieved the lowest circle of the paradise wherein Anne Mainwaring exists. As for the story, it is an old one. Given a family of girls, all fair save one, a conventional mother, and sundry eligible men, and the rest follows:

"We don't quite know what we are to do with Anne," Mr. Mainwaring went on, with a kind of heavy playfulness. "She certainly won't be fit to be a cook, Mrs. Graham, and I should be sorry for the hospital where she was nurse. You're a scatterbrains, aren't you, Gipsy? You don't learn your lessons, and you fight with your governesses. Whenever there's a row you're always in the thick of it—at least so I'm told—and the only thing you take an interest in is scribbling in that mysterious notebook of yours, and drawing pictures—oh, and getting up and going out with the boys in the small hours of the morning, tearing your frocks climbing the trees . . ."

How long is it since the prototype of Anne appeared in English fiction?

The book discloses a fairly broad and unprejudiced mind, and a knowledge of some sorts of human nature. But its literary demureness—one might almost call it minauderie—is somewhat trying.

A Wayside Weed. By A. F. Slade.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

WE have here yet another version of "Jenny's case." Miss (or Mrs.) Slade gives the history of Annie Deane's seduction and its consequences with an artlessness which is rather unusual. For, as a rule, the novelist of rustic immoralities has at least a superficial air of profound wisdom and god-like aloofness. But Miss Slade writes of lawless passion in the manner of Mrs. Henry Wood (though more grammatically), and the result is decidedly quaint. She devises chapter-headings like "Alas!" and "Good-bye!" and this is her extraordinary account of the heroine's lapse:

Oh! it was pitiful, but it was all grim reality to Annie Deane.

And he? He knew it, he could not help knowing it, and—he held all women so lightly!

Thus, day by day, they two, the girl of sixteen and the boy of one-and-twenty, drifted nearer and nearer to the brink of a precipice, which to a woman means—ruin. Not all at once. At first unconsciously, then fearfully, then foolhardily, until with a leap and a gasp one of them was—over!

Italics and dashes abound in the story. The "end is happy," at the cost, several times over, of conviction. Further, the author seems unable, in her narrative, to choose between the important and the unimportant. The book might be shortened by one half—we do not exaggerate—with advantage to its effectiveness; it is weighed down by quantities of feeble and futile observation. With all this, there is something in A Wayside Weed which extorts respect, some trace here and there of a serious and courageous intention to be true to life and to Miss Slade's own individuality. One or two of the London scenes are creditable, and the sketches of rural character are happily marked by an entire absence of sentimentality. We recognise the infrequent goodness of the book with pleasure, but our praise must be very restricted. It does not appear to us that Miss Slade has, after all, a great deal to say, and her method of saying that which she has to say lacks not only distinction, but the mediocre skill of our workaday manufacturers of fiction.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE SHIP'S ADVENTURE. BY W. CLARK RUSSELL.

A page from the end we read "The ship's adventure is told"; and when the narrator is Mr. Clark Russell the reader knows the kind of spirited yarn that awaits him. It opens at Dr. Hardy's house near the East India Docks, which commands "a wide prospect of sloping fields and green sweeps," and introduces "a young fellow with something nautical in his lurch." He is George Hardy, chief mate of the York, just off to join her. And when he meets Julia, "an old love" who has "left her home for good," we know that the gallant George will look after her, and that Julia is not long for the tame, tame shore. (Constable. 6s.)

IN HIS OWN IMAGE. BY FREDERICK BARON CORVO.

This volume is quite unlike any other novel that has come under our notice. Indeed, it is not a novel at all; it is a collection of sketches and stories, all about Italy, and written in a bejewelled, staccato style. The author is steeped in the lore—the dateless lore of Italy, and Toto, as in a former book, is master of the ceremonies. At the end of the volume are printed six tales that appeared in the Yellow Book in the years 1895 and 1896. The author has nothing in common with John Bull. (Lane. 6s.)

THE GIRL AT THE HALFWAY HOUSE. BY E. HOUGH.

This is the first volume in the "Dollar Library," a new series of books by American authors, mainly unknown writers of fiction. Mr. Hough's story opens at Louisburg, in the thick of the American Civil War. In the first three chapters the heroine loses her father, her two brothers, and the youth she was to have married. But time heals all things, and Mary Ellen found, as others have found, that, with the aid of the living, love has a wonderful power of re-birth. (Heinemann. 4s.)

THE GOLDEN TOOTH. BY J. MACLAREN COBBAN.

A quick, bustling story. Mr. Cobban knows how to write, and how to arouse the reader's interest straightway. It opens with the makings of a good fight, and quickly leads to a murder that interests without harrowing the feelings. One Townsend, "a strange, whimsical person," peering about at the scene of the murder, finds "a false tooth broken from a gold setting." Now, who was the murderer? (Digby, Long. 6s.)

THE LESSER EVIL. BY IZA DUFFUS HARDY.

A story of modern life—a drawing-room, "at homes," &c., &c.—beginning with marriage and comedy, and passing by way of villainy and murder to a fire, a further tragedy, and a final explanation—"the Countess of Conysborough is one of the loveliest women of the day, but she has the saddest eyes." The two heroes are Archibald and Kenneth Mainwaring, heir and heir-presumptive to the old Earl of Conysborough. And Kenneth loved Beryl, and did not forget her when he was away three years at Aramaquipa. A pleasant mixture of melodrama and social amenities. (Chatto. 6s.)

THE DAY OF SMALL THINGS. BY ISABEL FRY.

A collection of autobiographical sketches of child life, as if one of the children in the Golden Age had, one day, feeling a little retrospective and low-spirited, written down her musings on the wonder of the dawning world. (Unicorn Press.)

'TWIXT DEVIL AND DEEP SEA.

BY MRS. C. N. WILLIAMSON.

The cover shows a moonlight picture of Waterloo Bridge; and when the hero found Sheila on Waterloo Bridge he hoped that God had meant her for him. It is Sheila who tells the story, and as it is by the author of The Barn Stormers it is hardly necessary to say that 'Twixt Devil and Deep Sea is melodramatic. The book opens during a performance of "The Bells" at the Lyceum; and if you want to know the kind of girl Sheila was, she was like this—her own words: "I had just been presented. I had just found out that I was a pretty girl, and that people rather liked me." (Pearson. 6s.)

STRANGE HAPPENINGS. BY SIXTEEN AUTHORS.

It is said that the public is not avid of volumes of short stories. But experienced publishers, and they should know, show no coyness in offering them to a fickle world. Here are sixteen tales just short or long enough to pass the time pleasantly in the Tube between the Bank and Shepherd's Bush. Messrs. Lowry, Clark Russell, Marriott-Watson, Mrs. Flemming, and the witty authors of The Silver Fox contribute. (Methuen. 6s.)

MY INDIAN QUEEN. BY GUY BOOTHBY.

Historical. On page 9 the hero is to meet the woman "he loved best in the world at Her Grace of Hampshire's house in Soho-square." The company included "hideous Lord Chesterfield, grave Sir Robert Walpole, and dashing Bolingbroke." The Indian Queen's name was Pudmini, and, "now that Cicely was lost, she was the only woman in existence for me." But heroines called Cicely are never lost. It is the Pudminis who die. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

SCOUNDRELS & Co. BY COULSON KERNAHAN.

A new kind of "detective story," told in the first person by one who was in the Syndicate of Scoundrels, and yet not of it. In the forefront of the book "a word in the reader's ear" is whispered, which should mollify criticism. The author refers to Scoundrels & Co. as "irresponsible work," and announces that the pages have no purpose more serious than to while away an hour or two by "a yarn." (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE BANNER OF ST. GEORGE. BY M. BRAMSTON.

This tale of the peasant revolt in Essex and Herts is a learned novel of the fourteenth century. "Of course an embroidery, but the framework upon which it hangs is fuller of historical details than often lie ready to an author's hand. It is founded on Walsingham's Chronicle, and I have followed the details there given as far as I could, sometimes finding them so mediæval that they gave quite a shock to the picture my imagination was working at." (Duckworth. 3s. 6d.)

We have also received: This Body of Death, by Adeline Sergeant (Hurst & Blackett); The Midnight Passenger, by R. H. Savage (White); What Men Call Love, by Lucas Cleeve (White); John Townley, by R. Thynne (Drane); Ray's Daughter, by General Charles King (Lippincott); Edward Blake, by Charles Sheldon (Ward, Lock); Lady Wilmerding, by J. Duncan Craig (Stock); As the Twig is Bent, by Lucas Cleeve (Digby, Long); Rival Claimants, by Sarah Tytler (Digby, Long); A Syndicate of Sinners, by Gertrude Warden (Digby, Long); Sesa, by H. St. John Raikes (Arrowsmith); The Adventures of Captain Kettle, by Cutcliffe Hyne, a cheap edition (Pearson); and From the Dead Past, by P. J. Moro (Simpkin, Marshall).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage).....	17/6
„ Quarterly	5/0
„ Price for one issue	/5

On Obscurity in Verse.

NOTHING is so misunderstood as the obscure. People are in the habit of calling subtle thoughts and delicate sentiments obscure. They thus commit the impertinence of calling the light obscure because it does not shine in their shut rooms, but in its own untrammelled firmament. There is a dull impiety which the gods forgive.

Yet is there an obscurity which is a fault of form, and not a condition of fineness. Let us examine it for a moment.

The case of Mr. Meredith is peculiar. He is the most sociable of those whom the crowd comprehend not. He has "a speech of fire that fain would blaze"; but the crowd oftentimes believe themselves, for their credit's sake, to be the spectator of mere smoke. Especially when he sings does it seem to them—strange irony!—that he is discovered, half-articulate, in a brown study, negligible for all his greatness. One is saddened at the shrug which gives eloquence to the back they turn to the "sun-kissed hill," which is the poet's stage. One is saddened because he wishes to sing to an audience, and with no supercilious intention. He is as desirous of gathering folk around him as any evangelist preaching in sight and danger of unconverted traffic. And he has a message. There lies his personal grandeur and the mischief to his muse. "Love Earth!" he cried twelve years ago:

For love we Earth, then serve we all;
Her mystic secret then is ours:
We fall, or view our treasures fall
Unclouded, as beholds her flowers
Earth, from a night of frosty wreck
Enrobed in morning's mounted fire,
When lowly, with a broken neck,
The crocus lays her cheek in mire.

No wonder that the man who could sing his philosophy like that should endeavour to sing more philosophy than his song can hold. It is no wonder, but it is great pity, for none can for long make music the vehicle of philosophy. It is by divine accident only that perfect stanzas accurately sing the truth. It is in the nature of rhyme to torture the ear it was wont to caress when forced to play the school-master for a "term."

Hence the flippancy of a journal, in which both Coleridge and Mr. Meredith found utterance, when "A Reading of Life" was read in the Monthly Review. We say "flippancy," as decorum hardly prescribes that the Morning Post should publicly acknowledge a poet's "perfect right to amuse himself" on an occasion when his earnestness shows a defenceless skin. Flippancy apart, the Morning Post "italicised" a weakness in the poet which was none the less real and regrettable because the Daily Chronicle displayed a happy talent for paraphrase. The lines which extorted a barren but "considerable" effort from the paragrapher of the Morning Post to understand them were these:

He drank of fictions, till celestial aid
Might seem accorded when he fawned and prayed;
Sagely the generous Giver circumspect
To choose for grants the egregious, his elect;
And ever that imagined succour slew
The soul of brotherhood whence Reverence drew.

It is hardly necessary to consider the explanation of these lines to realise how bad are the last four. Prose had at once disclaimed ellipsis and been more eloquent. No rhyme can pleasure an ear painfully hunting for dropped words to prove an intelligence brought suddenly into competition with the "elect" of another than the "egregious" sort. Here is no tripping mnemonic rhyme, but the Procrustean bed on which noble thought lies, capable, it is true, of identification, but lopped, disfigured.

Yet the stanza which follows is simple, and its music lies like soothing fingers upon the neuralgia of our perplexity:

In fellowship religion has its founts;
The solitary his own God reveres:
Ascend no sacred Mounts
Our hunger or our fears.
As only for the numbers Nature's care
Is shown, and she the personal nothing heeds,
So to Divinity the spring of prayer
From brotherhood the one way upward leads
Like the sustaining air
Are both for flowers and weeds.
But he who claims in spirit to be flower,
Will find them both an air that doth devour.

There, articulate above the rant and scream of Republican Man-Gods, is the divine socialism of fellowship. He who bade men pray "Our Father," not "My Father," implied it, but there is genius in this common chord struck across the ages by a man of innumerable subtleties.

But to return to Mr. Meredith as a creator of the obscure in poetry, it must be observed that the simplicity of the foundations of thought is no guarantee of the coherence of the superstructure. The two leading ideas of Mr. Meredith's "Reading of Life" are simple as any wholesome platitude undamned by the treatment of Martin Tupper. Walk the "balanced mean" between your tempters, he says to man. Be not dragged by Artemis on to her frozen height, nor yet be lured by Aphrodite into her prison-house of debilitating bliss. Each goddess leads men to death if "too devoutly" followed. In a word, be temperate. And, on the other hand, love the Earth, your mother, and conspire not in prayer against man, your brother. Very impressive is this love of temperance, this warm-blooded sagacity which constituted Meredith the Preacher. The prodigal as depicted by him loses, in seeing contented cattle drinking from their trough, the bitterness that antedated his sojourn with swine. Fleetwood, the delicate snob, "perished of his austerities"; Sir Willoughby, the self-centred paragon, lost even the love of a slave in the woman, weary of his exquisite triflings, who became his wife; the brilliant Diana had no thought of Dacre and her venal breach of faith when she felt the throb of her babe under her breast. Lucy Feverel, whom all who know her love as they love Miranda, because she is the very child of Nature, is the victim of the systematiser, whom Nature in all her moods detests. In Nesta, another Miranda, two who had miserably defied the world's convention, "kept their faith with Nature." And nothing less than Nature, the kindly Earth-mother, prompted Rose Jocelyn to enter the tailor's shop at Lymport to give away once more the heart that the aristocratic, fish-cold Laxley could not keep.

In prose and verse, and more—dare we say?—in prose than in verse, has Mr. Meredith been the spokesman of Earth.

He is wise. Earth is the great corrector of values, the great proportioner. Man from her gets a good gospel that shrieks at no other gospel; but beckons to all who but for it were agnostics.

Near is he to great Nature in the thought,
Each changing season intimately saith,
That nought, save apparition knows the death;
To the God-lighted mind of man 'tis nought.
Close on the heart of Earth his bosom beats
When he the mandate lodged in it obeys,
Content to breast a future clothed in haze,
Strike camp, and onward, like the wind's cloud-fleets.

No miracle the shoot of wheat from clod
 She knows, nor growth of man in grisly brute;
 But he, the flower at head and soil at root,
 Is miracle, guides he the brute to God,
 And that way seems he bound; that way the road,
 With his dark-lantern mind, unled, alone,
 Wearily through forest tracts unsown
 He travels, urged by some internal goad.

One burns as he reads, and rubs his eyes to reassure himself that the Morning Post really did make that remark about Mr. Meredith's "amusement." But seeing it was made, the thought is inevitably suggested that music is inaudible to many ears because to them it is only sound. Admitting that obscurity is a defect in style, one stands aghast at the multitude of fluent writers who are cognisant of darkness and ignorant of the glories of rhythm, the majesty of phrase—"thunder spitting lightnings on the world." Then one reads their compositions, their leaders and articles, and observes how neat sentence after neat sentence falls like pellet after pellet, connected only by argument—by thought-stuff, as it were—and gathering no rhetorical volume or collective shape as they run. They have scales for quantity, these writers, and grammars for syntax, but they have not ears for delight. They are not, æsthetically speaking, sensual enough. The onomatopœia of a Verhaeren is to them but an eccentricity.

But they are punished, punished by a real obscurity—the persistent and fluent ugliness of poets whose raucous song constitutes an implied slander on the poets of ancient Greece and Rome. Take this:

No, the Christian faith, as at any rate I understood it,
 With its humiliations and exaltations confining
 Exaltations sublime, and yet diviner abasements,
 Aspirations from something most shameful here upon earth and

In our poor selves to something most perfect above in the heavens.

No, the Christian faith, as I at least understood it,
 Is not here, O Rome, in any of these thy churches;
 Is not here, but in Freiburg or Rheims or Westminster Abbey.

And that is Clough—the Clough and the Crow one can scarce forbear saying; it being understood that we yield to none in an admiration, or rather liking, for his satirical gaiety, his human tenderness and bitterness so undonnish and sincere. Still, he could write as we have quoted and by the page together. Why? Surely for no reason but this—an innate ignorance of verbal music, the painful consequences of which the arbitrary adaptation of the man to school rules could only enhance.

We will not blame the journalist for the fact that real obscurity is, when it jingles and alliterates, often mistaken for light. The official bard who for the sake of two w's lately sang that "the world seemed widowed," when the whole English-speaking world was wailing the just and inevitable word "orphaned" in his ears, supplies an instance. And Blake gabbling that

Nature and art in this together suit
 What is most grand is always most minute is harder to follow than in "The Book of Thel." Donne's noisome flatteries and dispraises of women have an obscurity which perhaps Chapman did not attain. For the one insoluble riddle of art is ever this: how can it dare to be unbeautiful? How can it dare to be insincere?

Now in Mr. Meredith the unbeautiful is not ignorant and the artificial is not insincere. His verse refreshes one continually by the variety and originality of its rhyme-scheme, and a technical finish which gives his reader confidence in his sanity even when his thought is most freakish. His harshness is the result of thought, instead of emotion, holding the reins of Pegasus. The noble animal is pulled too hard; there is the agony of dislocation in his rearings. Only fitfully can a Pegasus so mis-ridden retain the sense of wings.

Mr. Meredith renders a doubtful service to the light by his incessant employment of adjectives as nouns. It is true that the unaccompanied adjective, as in the epigram: "Providence and Sir Walter Besant have exhausted the Obvious," gives a shade of meaning which the abstract noun would miss. Thus obviousness is the essence of that which is obvious; it does not convey the idea of persons and things which present manifestations of obviousness. The Obvious, then, stands for the visible representation of obviousness all over the world, and has definite utility. But in the course of one poem Mr. Meredith gives us also "the radiant roseate," "his rough refractory off on kicking heels," "the widowed's dream of her new mate," to say nothing of "the egregious, his elect." Again, our Anglo-Saxon ancestors, in the rush of a song not worth reading at this time of day, omitted the particles. But Mr. Meredith compels his weary verbs to extend their duties across semi-colons, as in the passage which baffled the Morning Post. He is devoted to inversions. He adores oddity as though a glimpse of shaggy Pan had sanctified it for him. His metaphors hang all altogether—pure ivory, rich jewels, and common beads on one long string. And withal he is great.

. . . the onward stress
 Unto more spacious . . .

His obscurity is always fathomable and fruitful. The darkest obscurity is the vacuum which Nature abhors. Obscure is therefore a word of criminal significance in literature and in all the arts. The Obscure is not, as some think, the deadly enemy of the Obvious. They are often stealthy allies.

Things Seen.

Equals.

THE feud between Mitchell and the Vicar began that day when he stumped out of church as a protest against the prayer for fine weather. "I don't question the orders of my Superior Officer," the old soldier said later, "He sends His sun or His rain, and it's for the best; anyway, I have to make the best of it, and the best of it I'll make till I get my marching orders." The philosophy of prayer, as expounded by Mr. George Meredith—"when a man rises from his knees a better man, his prayer is answered"—was explained to Mitchell (not by the Vicar), but he would have none of it. "You ask for fine weather because fine weather will put more money into your pockets. Who knows but while you're praying for sun other folk want rain?" So the old soldier ceased to be a member of the church militant, and was added to the Vicar's ill-borne crosses.

I do not suggest that the Vicar had any unworthy intention in building the new schoolroom so close to old Mitchell's cottage that the walls would hide the sun from his roses.

One Sunday afternoon when I passed the cottage Mitchell was not sitting in his porch—and the rose-trees were gone. The flower-bed under the new school-room wall showed nothing but five gaping holes, and five disconsolate shrubs, each about the height of a walking-stick, lying alongside. I withdrew, and concealing myself behind a stack of hop-poles on a neighbouring hillock, watched Mitchell digging five holes on a plot of grass on the other side of his cottage, in the full light of the afternoon spring sun. This plot of grass, to which he had given years of devotion, was as green and velvety as the turf in a college garden. What it meant to him to stab and scatter it no one knows. It must have been like trampling on young birds. I watched him take the rose-trees, and after carefully cutting away the suckers, plant them one by one in their new home, scattering the loose earth tenderly on their roots, and pressing it down inch by inch with his knuckles. When all was finished he gently replaced so much of the grass as was not damaged. Then he looked from the sun to the rose-trees and—nodded. Then from the rose-trees to the sun and—bared his head. His face was raised, his clear eyes looked straight out from beneath the wrinkled brow. There was nothing defiant in his manner. It was the look of an equal to an equal. He asked no favour. He had done his best for his rose-trees. If the sun shone, that was well. If not, that was always well.

Ambition.

I suppose everybody has some ambition, or ideal, hidden (it is better so) from the casual eye. But this little elderly man, who spent his week-days at a shop in a dingy, noisy street, and his Sundays at the chapel over the way—had he an ambition? I would have said none, except perhaps the desire for goodness according to his light. But one day his ambition was revealed to me.

He was a printer in a small way—handbills, tradesmen's circulars, and chapel ephemera. In the tiny front shop his daughter struggled with the clerical work; in the room behind he and two youths set up the type, and worked a cropper machine. Often we talked a little—of many things, but mainly of the chapel over the way, and its social institute, of which he was a committeeman. Sometimes our talk took a wider sweep, touching even the fringe of world affairs like the Great Steel Trust, and the present dispute between Masters and Printers. The little printer shook his head. "It's greed," he said. "Sometimes," and he looked doubtfully at the two youths who were setting up type, "sometimes I think I'll go back to as I began when I set up all the type myself, without assistance. A man should not want more in life than to serve God, love the brotherhood, and earn his own living." "You mean that you, with the help of your son and daughter, could control this—establishment," I said. "But perhaps you would like your son to have more of a chance in life. I'm told that a good—say, advertisement canvasser makes money." For the first time the little Printer's face was touched with something like enthusiasm. "Thank you, my son will have a better occupation," he said with dignity. "He is eighteen, and—" in that moment I touched the cords of my friend's ambition; as he spoke the shop, his desire to put a check on his growing business, his own personal life faded away, and his real ambition rose like a fountain—"my son is preparing for the ministry," he said.

And I saw in a flash the star in the east that shone for ever before his honest life. There was only one career for a man that profited him. He himself had missed it, but it was to be won by his boy.

The Saintly Hannah.

A Modern Woman's View.

A book about Hannah More should easily be replete with good things. A book about her could be, indeed, a positive storehouse of all sorts and kinds of admirable scenes, anecdotes, and reminiscences—a book where one could, exactly as one pleased, get laughter or tears, the pathetic or the grotesque, the beautiful and moving, or the ridiculous and incredible. There is charm in the mere names Hannah More calls up, in the society which she frequented, in the very modes and fashions at that time adopted. Garrick, Johnson, Wilberforce, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Pepys, Walpole, Mrs. Delany, were all her friends. Among her stupendous record of acquaintances even the fascinating Lord Monboddo had a place. While Hannah herself, sensible, sometimes fulsome, always priggish, without taste, without spirituality—Hannah with her tracts, and her quite extraordinary poetry—what a fund of quaintly interesting things!—time has made her for us.

That Hannah More was figuratively an undiscovered goldfield has long been obvious; and that no one came forward to dig deep, and with immense patience and ardour, into the magnificent resources of the Hannah More circle, was a neglect of opportunity genuinely to be regretted. Then suddenly comes Miss Harland's volume,* careful but insufficient, interesting but commonplace, interspersed with a quantity of excellent quotations, and yet in itself somehow not good enough for the subject—not good enough to be, upon Hannah More and her acquaintances, all that could be expected.

The anecdotes given are invariably admirable. But the moment Miss Harland is left to her own resources, and to personal dealings with the "delectable" Hannah, a certain dullness creeps into the subject. The tracts of Miss More's later years give the impression of overpowering her biographer. To write otherwise than admiringly of a lady publishing three tracts a year, and reclaiming godless paupers to a state of virtuous sanctity, was evidently to her out of the question. Therefore, having also to deal with the earlier Hannah, undisguisedly sprightly, self-conscious, and complacent, Miss Harland loses the courage of opinion, and throughout hedges behind a vagueness of manner that not only leaves her own impressions timidly indefinite, but pales and obscures the outline of the, in reality, by no means ambiguous Hannah.

Cheddar and the tracts are the undoing of Miss Harland. Under the glamour of them she cannot but write lovingly of Miss More's piety. Now Miss More's piety is as follows, and the clarity of its expression is at least unimpeachable. First, however, it must be explained that at Cheddar, a parish in which she and her sisters set themselves, at the inspiring call of Wilberforce, to instil morality among the poverty-stricken and wicked, every virtuous maiden received from Miss More on her wedding day a Bible, five shillings, and a pair of white stockings. It is in reference to this that she wrote: "This summer I have had the satisfaction of seeing the first dawn of hope on a subject of great difficulty and delicacy. My young women who were candidates for the bridal presents which I bestow upon the virtuous gravelly refused to associate with one who had been guilty of immoral conduct." Poor Hannah, it is true she belonged to an age more anxious for the prospect of salvation than for the love that understands; but this extract is not a trivial phrase to pass over and ignore. This extract is the very heart of the woman, the essence of what she had to give in her long labours for ennobling and redeeming the unenlightened of her period. This one short comment summarises her in brief—the compass, the style, the whole quality and fibre of her. The unctuous exultation of the Pharisee was the practical goal Miss More's religion offered. Its reward gleamed a bland and text-expounding superiority—a refusal to mix with sinners, while its foundations were rooted in a bargaining for heaven, commercial in its absolute sense of ultimate personal profit.

Having complained, however, it must be admitted that there are charming fragments scattered about Miss Harland's biography. All the Johnson reminiscences have savour, while every line of the Garrick friendship quickens one's pulse with tenderness. There is a little story of the Garricks, too lovable in its kindness not to quote as Hannah More gives it, though she did her best, poor lady, to spoil it by a characteristic outburst at the end:

Mrs. Garrick came to see me this morning, and wished me to go to the Adelphi (the Garricks' home in town).

* Hannah More. By Marion Harland. (Putnam's.)

which I declined, being so ill. She would have gone herself to fetch me a physician, which I refused. But at six this evening, when Garrick came to the Turk's Head to dine, there accompanied him in the coach a minced chicken in a stew pan—hot—a canister of her fine tea, and a pot of cream. Were there ever such people? Tell it not in Epic nor in Lyric that the great Roscius rode with a stew pan of minced meat with him in the coach for my dinner.

Of Garrick, indeed, one could scarcely get more charming glimpses than in this life of Hannah More, when, towards the end of his career, he played two execrable plays of her production, and, in conjunction with his wife, made their author an amie intime of the household.

But Garrick died, and the prig in the woman became paramount. In the second period of her life it is the reformer, the preacher, that wins her way to corresponding with unctuous Church dignitaries, and it is as a reformer that Hannah More would doubtless wish to be remembered among the great. But it is just in that capacity that Hannah More leaves one unmoved to one's wickedness. Wilberforce, the fiery and soul-impassioned, was her friend; and yet no glow comes to us through all the works of Miss More, no profundity, no force. We are not even made afraid, and saved through the grim entrance of terror, since of love she has nothing to persuade us by. It is sad, but true, that Miss More's spiritual tastes, for all her abounding common sense, were as bad as her literary ones; and how bad these were can be imagined by the selection of the following passage in Akenside's Pleasures of the Imagination, upon which to make the statement (it is put into the mouth of Cæleb) that "I know nothing more splendid in the whole mass of our poetry [than this] exquisite and truly classical passage":

Mind,—mind alone; bear witness, earth and heaven,
The living fountains in itself contains
Of Beauteous and Sublime; here hand in hand
Sit paramount the graces; here enthroned
Celestial Venus, with divinest airs,
Invites the soul to never-failing joy.

Towards the end Miss More's life does yield one or two moving incidents. The grace and dignity of old age were given to her, and tragic partings with the faithful sisters Death claimed before her. The death of her sister Sally, indeed, has a beauty quite unsurpassable. Here at least is spirituality as a living force lovely beyond words, when in a lull of agony so intense, the endurance of those about her was strained to snapping point even to see it, the dying woman, asked by Hannah whether she had comfort in her mind—sanctimonious comfort it is needless to add—answered smilingly: "I have no uncomfort at all"—sweeping the tortures of the poor body out of consideration even, so overpowering were the sweetness and power poured, by the visions of the soul, into all her being.

But it is essentially in the middle, and not in the later period of her life, that the fascinating qualities of Hannah More's biography lie, and Miss Harland has excellent anecdotes of the momentous London visits as well as one child's story—very familiar, but too good not to be repeated again. It relates Miss More's first introduction to Thomas Macaulay, then a child of four. "Calling upon Mrs. Macaulay, she was received by a quaint four-year-old boy, who regretted that his mother was not at home. 'But if you will be so good as to come in and sit down, I will give you a glass of fine old spirits.' When his mother asked him afterwards why he had made such an offer to a lady, he answered that Robinson Crusoe always drank old spirits, and he supposed it was the right thing to do."

As regards the Johnson snubbing, in itself too familiar to need repetition here, it constitutes surely the supreme circumstance over which Miss More deserves sympathy, though curiously enough it appears the one occasion upon which she has been denied it.

Briefly, she poured the precious ointment of adulation upon her uncouth admirer so generously, that, seized with mental indigestion, he made her one of the rudest of his known speeches—a speech instantly made famous as worthy the great man at his best. But, after all, rudeness is a tolerably simple and easy affair. To have been rude to Miss Hannah at this sprightly period, moreover, would not, one would imagine, entail stupendous genius. Besides, Johnson, having encouraged the "little fool" up to the point he did, ought to have behaved like a gentleman, and suffered the consequences of his indiscretion. Added to which, this repudiator of fulsome compliments was by no means guiltless of the same excess when dispensing praise to a young or charming woman; while, in the beginning of their acquaintance, so genuinely was enthusiasm kindled by this lively and taking lady, that he was not unwilling, we hear, to monopolise her conversation for the whole of a social evening. This is what Sally, the sister of Hannah, whose death comes to one beautiful as the scent of violets, wrote of an evening at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, when Hannah and Johnson sat side by side:

She was placed next to him, and they had the entire conversation to themselves. They were both in remarkably high spirits. It was certainly her lucky night. I never heard her say so many good things. The old genius was certainly jocular, and the young one very pleasant. You would have imagined we had been at some comedy, had you heard our peals of laughter. They, indeed, tried which could pepper the highest, and it is not clear to me that the lexicographer was really the highest seasoner.

It is sad that the close of so fair a beginning should be Boswell's also famous remark that "he would not make the tiger a cat to please anybody," flung in reply to Miss More's not unnatural request (in the face of her subsequent experiences with Johnson) that he would "soften some of his departed friend's asperities."

Miss Harland's book is well worth reading; but a life of Hannah More still remains to be written—a life fuller, more enriched by diverse things, more "bulging," to quote her own admirable expression, with reminiscences, that year by year, as we recede from the mood as well as the modes of that period, become more precious and more "instealing."

The Flood.

THE Catalogue of English Books (Sampson Low), for 1900, is the same neat, exhaustive, and accurate work of reference that it has been these many years. But as a human document it makes for depression. You are first amazed by the multitude of one year's books, and then you are amazed by their fewness, and the result is a headache. Of the making of books—that-are-not-books there is, indeed, no end. Are you aware, Sir or Madam, that there were published last year a half-guinea book on Glus and Glus Testing; a five-guinea work on Researches into Leadless Glazes; a three-guinea treatise on Toadstools, Mushrooms, and Fungi, Edible and Poisonous: How to Select and Cook the Edible, to Distinguish and Avoid the Poisonous; and a shilling Temperance Entertainer; and have you any guess of the number of such volumes that swell the "literary output" of a year? Have you taken into your reckoning books like these:

Story of Some Famous Bonfires; or, Our Bible and Our Liberties and What They Cost.

Assurance: Thoughts on 2 Tim. iv. 6, 7, 8.

Honey Gathered and Stored: Helps towards Hoarding the Word of God.

Face to Face: Glimpses into the Inner Life of Moses.

Or these:

The Bridge Manual.

The Lop Rabbit.

How to Write for the Magazines.

Everybody's Stamp Album.

Or these :

Sunny Southsea.
Where Shall We Go ?
Road Coach Guide.

Or these :

Etiquette for Gentlemen.
Etiquette for Ladies.
Hints on Etiquette for Volunteer Officers.
Complete Etiquette.

These are but types of the thousands of titles that baffle your search for pure literature. A hundred suggestions and irrelevancies detain the eye. If one chose to play with surface incongruities one would say something about the relations of prices to titles. As a rule, the more ambitious the theme the smaller the price. A book entitled What is Man ? The Purposes of God Traced through the Course of Time, is published at half-a-crown, whereas just twice the sum is asked for What One Can Do with a Chafing Dish. It seems scarcely reasonable to pay eight-and-sixpence for a Guide to Scotland, when for two shillings you can buy a Guide to Eternity. The prices set on advice, too, are strangely different. Thus How and Where to Fish in Ireland costs you three-and-sixpence, while only a shilling is demanded for How to Regain Health and Live 100 Years, By One Who has Done it.

What author wrote the largest number of books last year ? We think the palm must be awarded to Mrs. L. T. Meade, from whose pen came seventeen story-books and novels. She is also represented by four new editions of her earlier works. Mr. Richard Marsh has explained that his apparent extraordinary fecundity is due to the enterprise of the publishers of his earliest novels, who are now issuing them as if they were new. Hence a considerable deduction is to be made from the thirteen entries under his name. In reality he has probably been no more prolific than Mr. William Le Queux, who issued five new novels last year. Mr. Guy Boothby seems also to have talked five stories into his famous phonograph.

Books dealing with the war are found under so many headings that it is not easy to take a census of them. Those with the word "Boer" in their titles alone number twenty-six, while "Transvaal" enters into the titles of nineteen works. A good idea of the congestion of war books is obtained by the following consecutive entries :

Ladysmith, Relief of, Atkins (John Black) 6s. Apr. 00
Ladysmith Siege, Macdonald (Donald) 6s. Nov. 00
Ladysmith Siege, McHugh (R. J.) 3s. 6d. May 00
Ladysmith Siege, Nevinston (H. W.) 6s. May 00
Ladysmith Siege, Pearse (H. H. S.) 6s. May 00
Ladysmith, Siege of, Photogs., 1s. net Apr. 00
Ladysmith Siege, Story, Hallows (F. S.), 3s. 6d. May 00

The importance of the series in modern publishing may be gauged by the circumstance that more than twelve columns are devoted to their enumeration and the books added to them. The more important literary series now in course of publication are these :

Bohn's Classical Library (Bell).
British Anthologies (Frowde).
Chiswick Shakespeare (Bell).
Eversley series (Macmillan).
Flowers of Parnassus (Lane).
Highways and Byways series (Macmillan).
Library of English Classics (Macmillan).
Lovers' Library (Lane).
The Little Library (Methuen).
Little Biographies (Methuen).
Mediaeval Towns (Dent).
Modern English Writers (Blackwood).
Modern Plays (Duckworth).
New Century Library (Nelson).
Periods of European Literature (Blackwood).
Popular Studies in Mythology (Nutt).
Scott Library (Scott).
Temple Classics (Dent).
Temple Dramatists (Dent).

Many good series of a less literary kind might be named, as :

The Cathedral series (Bell).
Fur, Feathers, and Fin series (Longmans).
Great Educators (Heinemann).
Haddon Hall Library (Dent).
Heroes of the Nations (Putnam).
Temple Cyclopaedic Primers (Dent).

On the minor curiosities of the list we have not space to dwell ; but we confess to being rather awed and pleased by the following entry :

Rathbone (H. S.).—Dunvegan Castle : Poem. 4to. 31s. 6d.

Correspondence.

Theocritus.

SIR,—While thanking you for your kind review of my Theocritus in your last number I feel urged to make one little criticism on your article.

I do not believe that all the pastoral poems of Theocritus are delicate masquerades. Some undoubtedly are—e.g., the seventh, which is perhaps the finest of all the idylls—but in the fourth, fifth, eighth, ninth, tenth, twenty-first, and twenty-seventh we have true pictures of humble life. To doubt that these are meræ rusticae is really quite impossible. We must not be misled into thinking that because of their delicacy and charm they cannot apply to peasants. We must not judge of ancient Sicily by what we know of modern Suffolk.

In the first idyll, too, we have a most genuine country scene, with real shepherds and hinds and goatherds. No doubt, the gods are present, but in those days they "walked with men." Even the graceful sixth idyll seems to me a truthful scene rather than a travesty. Still, of course, we must not be blind to the fact that Theocritus had all the morbidezza of dwellers in towns and courts in his keen love of the woods and hills and sea waves of his island. We all know how the ruris amator of the intenser sort is apt to live in Piccadilly and the real urbis amator in the shires.

All the same, Theocritus knew minutely and loved intensely each country sight and sound. His was no second-hand knowledge, but a poetical, passionate, and practical acquaintance. It may be true enough that he and his young poet and doctor friends used in summer-time to go a pic-nicking in the beautiful island of Cos dressed up as goatherds and shepherds, but it is also quite likely that they took au sérieux their métier for the time being, and actually herded the flocks of the island landholders, spending the intervals between work and sleep in making love and making songs.—I am, &c.,

J. H. HALLARD.

"Peter Parley's Annual."

SIR,—It is curious how, for the most part, the obituary notices written upon that true philanthropist, Sir George Samuel Measom, omit reference to his connexion with the above once famous publication. It seems to have been forgotten that the worthy knight and acquaintance of Dickens, Thackeray, and many other celebrities in literature, was not only the unfailing friend of afflicted humanity as well as of the dumb creation, but also a benefactor to all English-speaking boys. For years he edited Peter Parley, and took great delight in his duties. I am afraid the juvenile palate relishes nowadays less wholesome fare than that supplied through the pages of the treasured old Annual.—I am, &c.,

CECIL CLARKE.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 76 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best original character sketch, not exceeding 250 words in length. We award the prize to Mr. Ernest Davies, 3, Phené street, Chelsea, S.W., for the following :

THE PROSPEROUS BANK CLERK.

He is forty. A bachelor, though appreciative of women, to whom he behaves with a loaded courtesy. For his own satisfaction he dresses carefully, and wears a gold pin set in an ample tie, with a seal-ring on his little finger. His habits are methodical. At 9 o'clock he reaches the bank; at 12 he goes to his customary restaurant, where a liberal helping from the joint awaits him; business over, he strolls Westwards, smoking a cigar, and will drop into the Criterion bar on his way home.

Having endured poverty in early days he is now inclined to treat himself handsomely. He is generous to others, too, in small matters, and has a kind heart which will soften at any chance tale of misery. His life is a lonely one, but he finds happiness in possessing a sufficient income to supply his wants. His pleasures are simple: a dinner at a restaurant, and frequent visits to the play, with the popular novels and magazines, form his principle recreations. Pictures do not interest him, and for travel he has no desire.

He is thoroughly contented, for he is without cares, and his aspirations are not strong enough to incommode him. Marriage, he thinks, has its drawbacks. But should he meet a widow with a comfortable fortune, it is not unlikely that he would offer her his affections.

[E. D., London.]

We should have awarded the prize to "The Man in Khaki" had it not considerably exceeded the limit of 250 words.

Other replies are as follows :

THE MAN IN KHAKE.

As an assistant in the stores he had no ambitions beyond getting a sufficient increase in his salary to enable him to marry a pretty and commonplace little girl who dispensed tea and smiles at an adjoining cheap-class café. His dreams ran to the luxury of a suburban villa, furnished on the hire purchase system; but a not unlooked-for national upheaval, brought about by the action of a certain Statesman and a certain stubborn, old parochial autocrat, amongst other things, caught up our unambitious friend and transposed him from the tame glory of a frock coat and a tape measure to the drab destiny of khaki.

The mental transition was just as complete. All his former plans of work evaporated, leaving him with only the consciousness that he had committed something heroic, and that his future must, hereafter, take care of itself. He was too utterly unimaginative and healthy to consider the prospects of annihilation à la Boer bullet. The campaign he was about to embark on struck him as something between a Bank Holiday at the Palace and his annual summer pilgrimage to Margate. The days that intervened between his enlistment and embarkation were the cause of much joy. He went round to the stores clothed in all the nobility of war, commanding and absorbing the worship of the people he once lived with in some remote and unrememberable post. He lordly patronised the tea girl, and promised to come home with a V.C. and marry her. And then up and down the Strand, booted and spurred, and mailed, even to the cartridge casket, worn ostentatiously outside his great coat. It was an expansion of soul for the little draper, and he might have ultimately developed something akin to individuality, but when he got to the front he Boers, knowing nothing of the psychological aspects of the case, shot him in a first engagement—and that was all.

[L. V., London.]

THE VICAR.

To the casual observer he was little more than a superior specimen of the country vicar. But to his intimates he was the one man in the whole world. You would never have put him down for a saint, but, insensibly, as you conversed with him, the impression took birth and grew that here was a man of larger soul and sympathies than the general—one who, desiring first and above all what is right and just, could yet in a lesser degree appreciate and love the primrose paths of life. Nor could there be a more convincing proof of the loveliness of the man than this—that his presence was no less welcome to the sick and afflicted than to the strong, the hale and happy. But wonderful above all other winning attributes of his was the charm of his voice and laughter. Through the former, like a thread of gold 'mid coarser threads, ran a singularly tender tremor—a low musical shake, as it were, bubbling up from the well-springs of the heart—that made immediate capture of all who heard it, and his laugh was the most entrancing that nature ever vouchsafed to one of human kind. Like the voice, it was low—scarce to be heard more than a few yards away—but the melodious shake of the uttered words was here reduplicated and emphasised to an extraordinary degree, so that you seemed to be listening to the deep "jug-jug" of the bird of Atys without its sadness.

[A. A. B., West Bromwich.]

THE NEWLY COMMISSIONED.

The Newly Commissioned, however interesting to himself, is rather a strain upon the nerves of his relations. He lives in hourly expectancy of being ordered to the front. Every morning he looks inordinately grave over his letters, especially if there be a blue official envelope among them; and if there be none he looks positively worried.

He is the busiest man in town, and yet, like Chaucer's Man-of-Law, he seemeth busier than he is. He begins by calling in his sister to approve the fit of a collar, the knot of a sash, the curve of a belt. After dashing off a few cheques, he gets himself up to stroll casually into the War Office, perhaps stopping on the way to murder his tailor and to slay his boot-maker.

He drops into the Junior Army and Navy for boxes of cigarettes, and spends much of the afternoon in consuming them. If he chances to be at home for tea, he does all the pretty acts with a semi-sentimental air, which suggests that it may be for the last time.

He accepts many invitations to farewell dinners, and invites the young ladies out to tea (separately) afterwards. When the round is finished, he is not loth to begin again and continue until his orders arrive.

Thereupon, swearing politely at the mountain of luggage which accompanies him, he says good-bye with a nonchalant smile, a lump in his throat, and the stern resolve to come back nothing less than General.

[E. R., London.]

THE NORTHUMBRIAN PITMAN.

Behold him! A stunted figure in drab and blue worsted, with bright eyes gleaming from a coal-smear'd countenance, tramping along blithely to the swing of his lamp, the hardest manual labour known powerless to crush his inborn light-heartedness. The individuality of the race is beyond question, each man being the product of a long line of hard-headed toilers, whose work has accustomed them to independence of thought and action. This accounts for Geordie's rabid republicanism and his lively interest in politics. Rightly, he believes himself second to no man, and treats his superiors in rank with that calm naturalness born of a sense of perfect equality, which gives him unique anthropological charm.

He is good-natured and honest, and a curious combination of simplicity and shrewdness. He is sober, too—except on special occasions, when his potations are long and deep, as befitting his iron constitution.

In keenness of observation he is unequalled, a trained eye meaning to him a matter of life and death. Hence his naturalist propensities, which are of no mean order.

The interests of his home life are varied, and his affection for his family only rivalled by his love of animals. He is as proud of his "bairns" as of the pure-bred hens, greyhounds, and song-birds, which absorb his leisure moments.

The excitements of gambling are not unknown to him, local football matches forming the chief object of his speculations.

Music is a favourite recreation, and a band contest his ideal holiday. A truly many-sided man.

[C. M. J., Hexham-on-Tyne.]

Other replies received from: E. A. M., Shoreham; H. H., Canterbury; E. R., London; J. C., Glasgow; M. J. B., —; M. W. J., Manchester; Miss C., Redhill; M. H. R., Guernsey; Miss G., London; A. S. H., Dalkeith; R. R. W., Sudbury; G. H., Didbury; F. L. W., Bradford; M. J. R., Livry, France; H. J., Hadley; H. W. D., London; A. F., Exmouth; M. M., Richmond; A. G., Cheltenham; K. C., Wolverhampton; E. B. B., Inverness; A. E. W., Greenock; Mrs. S., Mentone; Miss L., Harpenden; R. W. R., London; T. C., Buxted; A. S., Edinburgh; B. A. S., Bloomsbury; F. S. H., Bath; F. B. D., Torquay; C. C., London; Z. McC., Whitby; H. E. M., Glasgow; A. G., Sutton; Miss P., Norwich; A. L. C., London; J. F., Hull; T. B., Cheltenham; A. L. C., London; F. V., London.

Competition No. 77 (New Series).

THIS week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best onomatopoeic verses describing the advance of a band of music down a narrow street. Limit, twenty-four lines.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, March 13. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the third page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT of LITERATURE.—Monthly List of newly-purchased Second-hand Books.—No. 606, just issued, for MARCH, consists of a Collection of BOOKS in ENGLISH LITERATURE.—Post free from H. SOTHERAN & Co., Booksellers, 140, Strand, W.C.; and 37, Piccadilly, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
Importers of Foreign Books,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; and 7,
Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & Co., 37, Soho Square.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

THIRD LIST OF BOOKS.
Royal 8vo, pp. 279-339, and Plates XVII. to XXXVIII.
PRINCIPAL CONTENTS: MUSIC, EARLY PRINTED BOOKS, BINDINGS, BOOKS on AGRICULTURE, AMERICANA, &c.—Price 2s. 6d. post free.
CATALOGUE No. 1, out of print. CATALOGUE No. II, 2s. 6d., may be had, post free, on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

CATALOGUE, No. 16, of interesting Miscellaneous SECOND-HAND BOOKS, recently purchased.—Post free from GEO. A. POYNDEE, Bookseller, Reading.

BOOKS OUT-OF-PRINT SUPPLIED.—State wants. CATALOGUES free. Books bought. We offer Burton's "Arabian Nights," illustrated, 12 vols., £6 6s. (pub. £12 12s.).—HOLLAND'S Great Book Shop, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each offered for FitzGerald's Omar Khayyam, 1859, 1862, 1868, 1879; FitzGerald's Agamemnon, 1865 or 1876; Euphranor, 1851; Polonius, 1852; Mighty Magician, 1853; Six Dramas of Calderon, 1853. Please report anything by FitzGerald.—BAKER'S Great Book Shop, Birmingham.

FOR SALE, in perfect condition, a copy of the "Standard's" Edition of the LIBRARY of FAMOUS LITERATURE (20 vols., cloth, 1900), together with Bookcase and Literary Pictures. Also Ogilvie's IMPERIAL DICTIONARY (8 vols., Blackie, 1897), in perfect condition. Offers to B. W., c/o Sherren & Son, Booksellers, Weymouth.

STAMPS.—King Edward VII.'s Portrait as Prince, Queen Alexandra as Princess, on Newfoundland; 30 different Portraits of Queen Victoria on various Colonies; 32 genuine varieties, 1s. 1d.—SMITH, Upper Park Road, Kingston, Surrey.

PRIVATE LIBRARY for SALE.—General Literature and First Editions, nearly all new (must be cleared; no fancy prices). Catalogue in three parts. Part I. now ready, post free on application.—W. G. SPENCER, 7, Abingdon Road, Leicester.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS
2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%
DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
2½% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%
STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

PERSIAN LESSONS—A PERSIAN GENTLEMAN of very high Oriental and European culture offers to GIVE LESSONS in PERSIAN.—Apply H. 12, Colville Terrace, Bayswater, London, W.

RE-IDENT ASSISTANT TUTOR WANTED; experienced; proficient in Mathematics and easy Classics; some knowledge of French and Book-keeping; disciplinarian.—Address, stating salary, "Box 919," Willing's Advertisement Offices, 125, Strand, W.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

GRAHAM'S TYPE-WRITING OFFICE, 23, Cockspur Street, Pall Mall.—All kinds of difficult MSS. receive careful attention from EXPERIENCED workers. Specimen page and references sent if desired. Over five years' experience.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, having access to British Museum, will arrange to assist in Research, or seeing Work through Press. Translations from French, Italian, or Spanish.—D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

WANTED by a LADY, APPOINTMENT as SECRETARY or AMANUENSIS to Literary Man, Politician, or in Business House.—Apply E. W., 26, Highfield Road, Derby.

STUDIO, very large and lofty, over 30 feet square, with three small rooms, self-contained, all on ground floor. Private entrance, with fore-court, splendid north light. Quiet situation, near Edwards Square, Kensington. Suitable for a School of Art or a Sculptor. Possession in three or four weeks.—Write for particulars to "STUDIO," care of Willing's, 162, Piccadilly, W.

THE DOWNS SCHOOL, SEAFORD, SUSSEX.

Head Mistress—Miss LUCY ROBINSON, M.A.
(Late Second Mistress St. Felix School, Southwold).

Reference: The Principal of Bedford College, London; the Master of Peterhouse, &c.

UNIVERSITY of EDINBURGH.
CHAIR of NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

The Curators of Patronage of the University of Edinburgh will, on a date to be afterwards fixed, proceed to the ELECTION of a PROFESSOR of NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, in room of Professor Tait, whose resignation of the Chair has been accepted as from 29th April next.

Each Candidate for the Chair is requested to lodge with the undersigned not later than Saturday, 1st June next, eight copies of his application and eight copies of any testimonials which he may desire to submit. One copy of the application should be signed.

R. HERBERT JOHNSTON, W.S.,
4, Albyn Place, Edinburgh, Secretary.
12th March, 1901.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY
(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months, and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE (Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS
SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 49, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;
And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.
6s., claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORFOLK BROADS. THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
BOSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR,
LLANFAIRFACHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and Pwllheli.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 6s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all booksellers.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD'S NEW BOOKS.

Now Ready at all Libraries and Booksellers'.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "A ROMAN MYSTERY."

CASTING OF NETS.

The Story of a "Mixed Marriage" and a Passion for Proselytizing.

By RICHARD BAGOT.

Cloth, 6s.

HIGHLANDS OF ASIATIC TURKEY.

By EARL PERCY, M.P.

With 40 Illustrations from Photographs taken by the Author, and 2 Maps. Demy 8vo, 14s. net.

THE JOURNAL OF MRS. FENTON IN INDIA and the COLONIES, 1826-1830.

1 vol., 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

MEMORIES OF THE MONTHS.

By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT
MAXWELL, Bart., M.P.

FIRST SERIES.—A New Edition, with additional Plates, is published this day, large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.
SECOND SERIES.—Now ready, with Photogravure
Illustrations, large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

*• The Two Volumes are now uniform.

London :

EDWARD ARNOLD, 37, Bedford Street.

MR. JOHN LANE has great pleasure in announcing the publication of "THE COLUMN" (Crown 8vo, 6s.), by Mr. CHARLES MARRIOTT, a new writer, on Wednesday, March 20.

The Publisher confidently predicts that this Novel will rank as one of the most remarkable productions in Fiction of recent years.

JOHN LANE, Publisher,
Vigo Street, London, W.

MADAME MARIE, SINGER. By
ESTER DATE. LONDON: The LEADENHALL
PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, E.C.
[Three-and-Sixpence.]

MISS SPINNEY. By the Rev.
SYDNEY MOSTYN, Author of "My First
Curacy." LONDON: The LEADENHALL PRESS,
Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, E.C. [Half-a-Crown.]

THE FITZDOODLE MEMOIRS. By
Lord ADOLPHUS FITZDOODLE. LONDON:
The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall
Street, E.C. [One Shilling.]

BALLADS OF GHOSTLY SHIRES.

By GEORGE BARTRAM.

CONTENTS: Under Gimmour—The Warlock's Wooing
—The White Witch of Maverick—At the Cross-roads
—The Deadly Sin of the Mavers—Marian Bloodworth—The Mungletonian—The Widow—The Fairy Harper—The Poor Scholar.

2s. 6d. net.

GREENING & Co., 20, Cecil Court, St. Martin's Lane.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

In large crown 8vo, cloth, fully Illustrated,
price 10s. 6d. net.

THE PEDIGREE OF SHAKESPEARE. SHAKESPEARE'S FAMILY.

Being a Record of the Ancestors and Descendants of William Shakespeare. By CHAR-LOTTE C. STOPES.

In crown 8vo, cloth, Illustrated, price 6s.

ALFRED the GREAT: A Sketch

and Seven Studies. By WARWICK H.
DRAPER, M.A., late Scholar of University
College, Oxford. With many Illustrations and a Map, and a Preface by the BISHOP of HERE-FORD.

SECOND AND ENLARGED EDITION.

In crown 8vo, cloth, Illustrated, price 6s.

RAMBLES ROUND the EDGE

HILLS: or, In the Vale of the Red Horse.
With a Full and Graphic Account of the Battle of Edge Hill. By Rev. GEORGE MILLER, M.A.,
Vicar of Radway.

"Mr. Miller is master of his subject, and his account of the Battle of Edge Hill is as thorough as it is concise."—Academy.

"A thoughtful and informing work of the kind of which we have too few at the present day."
Birmingham Daily Gazette.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

BLACK COUNTRY SKETCHES.

A Series of Character Stories Illustrating the Life of the District. By AMY LYONS.

NEW NOVEL.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

LADY WILMERDING of MAISON

ROUGE: a Tale of the Riviera. By J. DUNCAN
CRAIG, M.A., D.D., Soci Don Felibrice.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

RUDOLPH SCHROLLE. A

Tragedy in Blank Verse. By E. G.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s.

THE ROMANCE of the BOER

WAR: Humours and Chivalry of the Campaign.
By MACCARTHY O'MOORE, Author of "Tips for Travellers; or, Wrinkles for the Road and Rail."

NEW STORY FOR CHILDREN.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

PEGGY, a SCHOOLGIRL; or,

The Sleeper Awakened. By FRANCES STRAT-TON. Author of "Nau the Circus Girl," "The Rival Bands," &c.

In crown 8vo, tastefully bound, price 2s.

MARRIAGE: its Institution and

Purpose. By J. S.

"The work is written in a very dignified style, and must deeply impress the thoughtful Christian reader."
Echo.

In large 8vo, handsomely bound in cloth and fully Illustrated, price 15s. net.

SWEET HAMPSTEAD and its

ASSOCIATIONS. By Mrs. CAROLINE WHITE.
With numerous Illustrations of Eminent Persons,
Historic Houses, and Picturesque Localities.

"Hampstead is extraordinarily rich in literary associations, which Mrs. White chronicles with a charm of style born of true enthusiasm."—Outlook.

"A book which is as interesting as any novel, and one which will live possibly as long as Hampstead itself, whose memories it records so sympathetically."
Speaker.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row,
London, E.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS, Publishers.

EAST LONDON.

By WALTER BESANT,
Author of "London," "Westminster," and "South
London."

With an Etched Frontispiece by F. S. WALKER, and 55 Illustrations by PHIL MAY, L. RAVEN HILL, and
JOSEPH PENNELL. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 18s.

A HISTORY of the FOUR GEORGES and of WILLIAM the FOURTH

By JUSTIN MCCARTHY and JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY.

Vols. III. and IV. (completing the Work), demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. each. [March 21.]

R. L. STEVENSON:

A Life Study in Criticism.

By H. BELYSE BAILDON.

With 2 Portraits. Crown 8vo, buckram, 6s.
"An interesting and readable book.... A useful contribution to modern criticism."—Yorkshire Post.

POPULAR SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE LONE STAR RUSH.

By EDMUND MITCHELL.

With 8 Illustrations by NORMAN H. HARDY.

THE CHURCH of HUMANITY.

By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY,
Author of "Joseph's Coat."

THE BLUE DIAMOND.

By L. T. MEADE.

"A story of absorbing interest.... It has a dramatic ending."—Scotsman.

THE LESSER EVIL.

By IZA DUFFUS HARDY.

QUALITY CORNER.

By C. L. ANTROBUS,

Author of "Wildersmoor," &c.

"The setting is excellent, the Lancashire rustics are delightful, and the whole story, in style, sentiment, and delicacy of touch, far above the average."—Spectator.
"Interests from the beginning."—Outlook.
"From beginning to end.... one realises with gratitude that a novelist of no small power is giving us of her best. We can recommend this book with an unusual certainty of pleasing our readers."—Literature.

A PATH of THORNS.

By ERNEST A. VIZETELLY.

"A romantic tale, full of point and picturesqueness, well constructed and equally well told.... Mr. Vizetelly has a real story to tell, and tells it with the facile skill of a good workman."—Pall Mall Gazette.

MAX THORNTON.

By ERNEST GLANVILLE,

Author of "The Fossicker."

With 8 Illustrations by J. S. CROMPTON, R.I.
"His adventures were both daring and romantic, and they are told with a spirit and a dash that make them as exciting as anything in Rider Haggard."
Glasgow Herald.

THE INIMITABLE

MRS. MASSINGHAM.

By HERBERT COMPTON.

"One of the really good novels of the year."

Manchester Guardian.
"It is a fascinating book."—Liverpool Post.

A MISSING HERO.

By Mrs. ALEXANDER, Author of "The Wooing o't."
THIRD EDITION.

"A very delightful story."—Glasgow Herald.

"Surprisingly readable."—Manchester Guardian.

ECCENTRICITIES of GENIUS: Memories of Famous Men and Women of the Platform and the Stage.

By Major J. B. POND.

With 91 Portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s.
"An interesting and amusing book.... a perfect mine of entertaining anecdote."—To-day.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Academy

Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1506. Established 1869.

16 March, 1901.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

WE comment elsewhere on the rush and noise of the literary market-place. There is the more reason to feel interest in an attempt to revive a quiet individual literary form like the eighteenth-century essay published as a weekly paper. It is Dr. Johnson's Rambler that has been selected for re-birth. In No. 208 the Doctor took a sonorous and melancholy farewell of his journalistic child. Mr. Herbert Vivian will issue No. 209 shortly. We only wish that a copy might be conveyed to the Doctor in the Elysian Shades, and that the messenger could bring back to us Boswell's report of the great man's astonishment. We wish well to Mr. Vivian's venture, which, if well handled, should be refreshing.

ON the twenty-fifth of this month Mr. George Moore shakes off the dust of this unbearable island from his feet, and removes his household effects to Dublin. There, in the pages of the Leader, from week to week, he will tell his countrymen why he found existence in England no longer bearable. Those who are curious to read about this revolt of the literary Irish will find their protests and pleadings set forth in a slim volume published by the Unicorn Press, called Ideals in Ireland. It is edited by Lady Gregory and contains essays by Mr. Moore, A. E., the Editor of the Leader, Mr. W. B. Yeats, and others.

MR. MOORE leaves his work in order. He has re-written, or rather re-spoken to a typist the whole of Evelyn Innes, with the result that, in spite of additions, there are now fewer pages by ninety. This revised version will be published at sixpence. The sequel, Sister Theresa, is also finished.

AN Edinburgh correspondent sends us the following: "Addressing his students last week on the intoxications (in medicine the term extends from alcoholism and ptomaine poisoning to the drug habits), Dr. Wyllie, the Professor of Medicine in Edinburgh University, adduced an experience of his that is not without its literary moral. He was called one day to see a young man. As he was entering the house the patient's sister exclaimed: 'Oh, it's all that horrid book!' Inquiry elicited the fact that the patient's favourite reading was Sherlock Holmes. The young man was in a very low state, and his tell-tale arm was dotted with hypodermic punctures. His admiration for the most popular of paper detectives had betrayed him into the cocaine habit. Taking this case as text, Dr. Wyllie permitted himself a sentence or two of severe stricture on Dr. Conan Doyle's knowledge of the action of drugs: 'If such a man as Sherlock Holmes had existed, dosing himself as depicted by his creator, in a few weeks his opinion on anything would not have been worth having.' Cocaine, according to Dr. Wyllie, is even more disastrous than morphia. It renders its subject vain-glorious and pleased with himself, but blunts the intellect and blasts the imagination."

FAME comes to Mr. Bernard Shaw along many and various channels; but who would have thought to find him giving his name to a flower? Yet in Messrs. Kelways' calendar, under the heading of "Fine New Cactus Dahlias for 1901," is: "Bernard Shaw, lovely dark salmon-red, tinted salmon-pink. Strong, good habits; long flower stems." Perhaps it is not wholly unsuitable that this dahlia is the cactus variety.

"THAT means larks" was the comment of a flâneur on hearing that Mr. Frank Harris was about to issue a new sixpenny weekly paper, to be called The Candid Friend.

THE contents-sheet of the new number of the Anglo-Saxon Review promises some good reading. Among the articles are: "The Custom of Biography," by Mr. Edmund Gosse; "A Word More About Verdi," by G. Bernard Shaw; "The Brownings," by Wilfred Meynell; and "Plays of the Modern French School," by John Oliver Hobbes.

THE Chair of Natural Philosophy at Edinburgh University will become vacant at the end of April. Applications, with testimonials, should be lodged with the Secretary to the Curators before June 1.

MR. CHURTON COLLINS's plain speaking in Ephemeræ Critica has provoked some plain speaking from the critics. "A Man of Kent," in the British Weekly, who always has a point of view, and knows how to put it, says:

I cannot get over the fact that Mr. Churton Collins himself recently published an edition of the earlier poems of Tennyson, which I have no hesitation in saying was the most slovenly and inaccurate piece of work in literary history that ever passed through my hands. Its errors were glaring, and the more closely one examined the book the more errors he found. In fact, I spent several nights testing it, and laid it down with the feeling that it was so bad that it was better to say nothing about it. A man who gave the world such a book and allows it still to be circulated is not in a position to criticise, say, Mr. Saintsbury or Mr. Gosse. Both of them make mistakes, but there are as many mistakes in Mr. Churton Collins's Tennyson as in Mr. Gosse's Life of Donne, and I do not see what right he has to call names.

AMONG the pleas for "neglected books" published in our issue of February 16, the name of Alexander Smith figured. In Messrs. Nimmo's, of Edinburgh, list we observe cheap editions of two volumes by Alexander Smith: A Summer in Skye and Dreamthorp. This may bring some comfort to the correspondent who, finding A Summer in Skye "at least as fine as Travels with a Donkey," asked: "Why, then, is Smith confined to the waste-basket of forgetfulness?"

THE report of Messrs. Chapman & Hall shows a profit of £17,074. A dividend of 4 per cent. is to be paid. Messrs. Chapman & Hall have paid the full preference dividend of 7 per cent., and the arrears of half a year. Mr. W. L. Courtney was congratulated at the meeting on his enterprising and successful conduct of the Fortnightly Review.

In the current Forum is an interesting, though not too accurate, appreciation of Mr. Alfred Harmsworth. The writer is quite wrong in representing that Mr. Harmsworth was the first to perceive the rise of a vast Board-school constituency of readers, whose needs he satisfied with Answers. Sir George Newnes it was who saw this need, and met it with Tit-Bits. The writer actually represents Tit-Bits as an imitation of Answers. He repudiates the idea that the "tabloid journalism" advocated by Mr. Harmsworth is likely to satisfy Americans, although from America it took some of its inspiration. He says: "Fortunately, the American newspaper reader has not yet reached the tabloid state. He wants his news presented as concisely as possible; he does not want long disquisitions on recondite subjects which have no possible interest for him; he cares more for news than views; but he does not care for a diet of scraps. If a story is to be told he wants it told in full; and if it is well written and has intrinsic importance, he does not find two or three columns any too much. He does not want essays served with his breakfast coffee, but he is prepared to read a not too abstruse article which may instruct him. In other words, his appetite is too healthy to be satisfied with tabloids."

No modern writer's workshop secrets are more easily come at, and more profitable, than those of Alphonse Daudet. The Life of Daudet by his son is a treasury of wise saws and close instances of the literary life. Daudet, as is pointed out by a writer in the American Bookman, was not a giant like Balzac or Molière. He was a craftsman like Stevenson, in whom mere dogged industry went for much. He filled note-books and emptied them. "It was his system of work. All through his literary life he was jotting down observations and thoughts, sometimes condensed to one finely written line, by which he was able afterward to recall a gesture, a word, or a tone, and to develop and magnify it for use in some important work. He was for ever blackening sheets. In Paris, in the country, travelling, these little note-books were always with him. He was constantly looking out for striking proper names, believing with Balzac that there was in names a characteristic physiognomy, a certain likeness of the people who bear them. And of his characters one may say, as one says of Balzac, that the substitution of other names would make them seem incongruous." We doubt whether young writers sufficiently understand the value of note-book work. It is the perpetual gathering in of wheat and tares that enables the young Levite to produce good show bread for the Tabernacle.

MATTHEW ARNOLD is often credited with having described Macaulay's style as "a perpetual appearance of hitting the right nail on the head without the reality." Mr. Aaron Watson, writing to the Speaker, points out that Arnold did nothing of the kind. He was speaking of Hepworth Dixon, whose style he described as "middle-class Macaulayese," and then he applied to this style the words which he is too often supposed to have applied to Macaulay's own.

THE reader who ventures on Miss Agnes Groves's article in the Westminster Review, entitled "Mispronunciation and Middleclassdom," carries his social status in his hands, and must be prepared to lose it irretrievably. Many of the writer's points, be it acknowledged, are excellent; but there is—we must use the word—a sniffiness about the article which is calculated to annoy anyone whose sense of humour does not come speedily to his rescue. For example, scorn is emptied on those who "ride" in a carriage, train, or cab. Very good; but why add: "And if the latter were a hansom, and one of these were its sole occupant, he or she would probably betray him or herself by sitting in the middle of the seat"? Anything more absurd than this we do not often read. The sole occupant of a hansom cab sits in a corner seat for the very good reason that this is the safe and comfortable position. But if, in a mood, he wishes to look at the street, and sits in the middle of the seat to do so, he betrays his middleclassdom! No, life is not so hard to live as that. But, as we have said, Miss Groves makes her points, though her tests are too Belgravian. You should not call a "blouse" "blowse" or "envelope" "envelope." You certainly should not say "photoed," and it is a sign of grace if you never talk of "wiring" to your friends. You should try to give a correct value to the e in "jewel," "towel," "enamel," and "moment." You should not ask your guest whether he "takes" sugar. You should not be of those "who talk about a 'dress' when they mean 'gown,' and being 'gowned' when they mean 'dressed.'" Miss Groves prefers honest "napkin" to serviette, and so do we. On the other hand, you need not avail yourself of those aristocratic privileges to which Miss Groves herself clings in defiance of principle. You need not say "di'mond" for "diamond" unless you please. To sow your discourse with "ain'ts" and clip your "ings" is aristocratic, but foolish.

APPROPOS of the "pen pictures" we published a fortnight ago, a correspondent sends us the following brilliant "pen picture" of Vaekehu, sometime Queen of Cannibals in the Marquesas. We should like to see a Vaekehu Birthday Book. The extract is from Stevenson's last volume, In the South Seas:

This was a queen of cannibals; she was tattooed from head to foot, and perhaps the greatest masterpiece of that art now extant, so that awhile ago, before she was grown prim, her leg was one of the sights of Tai-o-hae; she had been passed from chief to chief; she had been fought for and taken in war; perhaps, being so great a lady, she had sat on the high place, and throned it there, alone of her sex, while the drums were going twenty strong, and the priests carried up the blood-stained baskets of long-pig. And now behold her out of that past of violence and sickening feasts step forth, in her age, a quiet, smooth, elaborate old lady such as you might find at home (mittened also, but not so well mannered) in a score of country houses. Only Vaekehu's mittens were of dye, not of silk; and they had been paid for, not in money, but the cooked flesh of men. It came in my mind with a clap what she could think of it herself, and whether at heart perhaps she might not regret and aspire after the barbarous and stirring past. But, when I asked Stanislae, "Ah!" said he, "she is content, she is religious, she passes all her days with the sisters."

MRS. L. T. MEADE, to whose industry as a writer we referred last week, ought to know as much as anyone about the mind of the English girl. In an interview with an emissary of Great Thoughts she has stated her opinion that girls require more excitement and movement in books than did their mothers: "You won't get a girl, except with great difficulty, to read Miss Charlotte Yonge, and yet think how The Heir of Redclyffe was the rage in my girlhood. Her books, they say, have too many characters, and girls now have no time to bother over them. The honest truth of the matter is, I think, that people nowadays, with all their veneer of smartness and quickness and movement, are very lazy. And they are very excitable; they want to dash into movement at once." Only last week we gave the titles of some quiet, old-fashioned books preferred by girls. But then these girls belonged to that "Quaker rule which doth the human feeling cool"—always excepting the Hesters.

"TRUE Landorians," Mr. Sidney Colvin has said, "may be counted on the fingers." Nevertheless, the Pilot has opened its columns to three articles on Landor by Mr.

W. S. Lilly, of which the first, on "The Man," appeared last week. In his second paper Mr. Lilly will discuss Landor's claim as an artist, and in a third his position as a critic. The "Man" comes out well and truly in the first article. Although Mr. Lilly thinks wrath was the very essence of him, he does full justice to his gentle depths, and it is delightful to think that a man who could throw his cook out of the window in a paroxysm of rage could care so tenderly for flowers that he would never pluck one, but wrote :

"Tis, and ever was, my wish and way
To let all flowers live freely, and all die
(Whene'er their Genius bids their souls depart)
Among their kindred in their native place.
I never pluck the rose : the violet's head
Hath shaken with my breath upon its bank
And not reproached it : the ever-sacred cup
Of the pure lily hath between my hands
Felt safe, unsoil'd, nor lost one grain of gold.

LANDOR is the subject, too, of an article in the New York Critic for March. The writer is Mr. G. E. Wall, who has had the good fortune to pick up on a Chicago bookstall a copy of Aubrey de Vere's poems, presented to Kate Field by Landor in 1861, and, as the inscription shows, at Florence. The value of the book consists in Landor's pencilled marginal notes. The marginal notes of such a man must needs be fascinating. Mr. Wall writes :

The preface speaks of "the great mystery of Joy and Grief, Life and Death," as "pressing heavily upon the minds of pagan Greece."

"Not very—witness Anacreon, Bion, and others," wrote Mr. Landor, who of all modern writers was best prepared to interpret the minds of ancient literary pagans.

To the line,

"From the proud meadows arched along the sea," is appended the word "stuff"; the expression, "green with jealousy," is condemned as "too Elizabethan"; but adverse comment is more than neutralised by praise. A line in honour of Hermes,

"And breathe a sudden spring on valley and plain," is styled "Miltonian." A poem entitled "Allegory" is so highly commended that we read it with curiosity. The octave runs thus :

"You say that you have given your love to me.

Ah, give it not, but lend it me; and say

That you will oftentimes ask me to repay,

But never to restore it; so shall we,
Retaining, still bestow perpetually :

So shall I ask thee for it every day,

Securely as for daily bread we pray :

So all of favour, not of right, shall be."

"Like Shakespeare, but better," is the comment.

THAT flowery "too-good-to-use" rejection form with which Chinese editors are said to favour their unsuccessful contributors, and which we quoted many months ago, continues to amuse mankind. It has reached the office of the New York Life, where it has inspired some humorist on the premises to draw up a reply form for the use of authors. These forms are offered to literary aspirants at special rates per thousand. The communication runs as follows :

The author regrets the editor's inability to appreciate a Truly Good Thing.

The rejection of a MS., however, does not necessarily imply that the editor is lacking in merit, merely that he is lacking in judgment.

As many thousand MSS. are returned to him annually, the author cannot enter into correspondence with each editor personally concerning the deficiencies of his taste. Nor can the author give his reasons for considering the editor blind to the best interests of the magazine.

Because, as an editor, he does not meet the present requirements of the author does not argue that he would not be successful elsewhere in some other position. He might make an excellent dry-goods clerk or an entirely satisfactory coal-stoker.

(Signed) THE AUTHOR (per Himself).

ARE first editions of Byron rising in value? That they are in some demand is indicated by the following list of "wanted books," advertised by a book-selling firm in the Publishers' Circular :

Byron's Childe Harold. 4to, boards, uncut. 1812.

— Don Juan. Do. 1819.

— Monody on Sheridan. Wrappers, uncut. 1816.

— Ode to Napoleon. Do. 1814.

— Deformed Transformed. Do. 1824.

— Bride of Abydos. Do. 1813.

— Beppo. Do. 1818.

— Giaour. 1813.

— Island. 1823.

Any other Byrons, fine uncut copies, and first editions only, please report.

Meanwhile adventurous sums are being paid for first editions of Stevenson's works. At Sotheby's, last week, Deacon Brodie fetched £10; Beau Austin, £10 15s.; Father Damien (1891), with two autograph corrections by R. L. S., £27 5s.; Moral Emblems, £11 15s. A first edition copy of Blackmore's Lorna Doone brought £3 6s.; of Mr. Meredith's Richard Feverel, £2 3s.; Edward Fitzgerald's Polonius fetched £11 10s.

KENSINGTON now has an organ for its culture. The Kensington is its title; it is broad in the page, handsomely printed, and decidedly Art-y. It will contain criticisms of painting, music, and the drama, poems, essays, dialogues, and discussions, &c., besides monthly letters from Paris, Rome, Munich, and other "art-centres." For Kensington there will be antiquarian lore, and patterns in leather-work, carving, needlework, &c. As is the programme so is the first number, in which we find articles on "The Present Position of French Impressionists," "The Sculptors of the Italian Revival," "The Progress of Stage Costume," "England and Purcell," "Sir Frederick Bridge and Handel's Messiah," and "The Lyric Poetry of Robert Bridges." Great care has been taken with the illustrations, one of which, a reproduction of a sketch by Claude Lorraine, from the British Museum, is very charming.

THE following title is not familiar to us :

MY NEW CURATE: A Story gathered from the Stray Leaves of an Old Diary. By the Rev. P. A. Sheehan, P. P. Doneraile (Diocese of Cloyne). Author of "Geoffrey Austin, Student," "The Triumph of Failure," &c. (Boston, Martier and Co., Ltd.) (London and Lamington, Art and Book Co., 1900.)

But to this book "C. K. S." of the Sphere devotes more than a column of praise. He tells us that the book has been selling so far only in Roman Catholic circles, but that it deserves the attention of the Protestant community. It certainly does if it is "the best study of Irish life and character that has been written for many years," and if it is "beautifully written."

"KING HENRY THE FIFTH," after a long and prosperous career at the Lyceum Theatre, will begin next week a tour through the provinces. Mr. Lewis Waller and Mr. William Mollison are to be congratulated on the success of their bold venture. The presentment of the play lost nothing by its long run; indeed, Mr. Waller's Henry V., Mr. Mollison's Pistol, and Mr. Robson's Fluellen gained in mellowness without the loss of vigour. It is highly satisfactory to know that there is a large public ready to encourage serious actors to produce classics. The public, we believe, is eager for good plays, but the presentment must be intelligent and capable. Henry V. was that—and more.

FROM THE "ACADEMY" OF THIRTY YEARS AGO.
MARCH, 1871.

It may be affirmed that Mr. Darwin has all but demonstrated the origin of man from some inferior animal form—that he has proved the vast importance of sexual influences in modifying the colours and the structure of the more highly organised animals—and that he has thrown fresh light upon the intricate question of the mode of development of the moral and intellectual nature of man. Yet it must be admitted that there are many difficulties in the detailed application of his views; and it seems probable that these can only be overcome by giving more weight to those unknown laws whose existence he admits, but to which he assigns an altogether subordinate part in determining the development of organic forms.—[From a review of The Descent of Man.]

Mr. Browning's poem, "Hervé Riel," in the March number of the Cornhill, is perhaps less striking than its subject. The story of how a common Breton sailor saved Damfreville's squadron after La Hague is told with picturesque and breathless energy, and the paradoxical modesty which was taken at its word receives its full effect. But as the character was too simple for analysis, Mr. Browning's special power hardly finds a field. Perhaps the most curious thing about the poem is the reflection it suggests, that the picturesque of Mr. Longfellow when he lays aside his sentiment approximates to the picturesque of Mr. Browning when he lays aside his subtlety.

Bibliographical.

THE boom in Tennyson is by no means over. The name is still one with which to conjure mightily. The fact that there are so many monographs of Tennyson in existence has not deterred Messrs. Dent from announcing him as the subject of one of their "Cyclopædic Primers." Mr. Morton Luce has written the book, and it will be admitted that he is an accomplished Tennysonian. One remembers his New Studies in Tennyson and his Handbook to the Works of Tennyson, both produced early in the nineties. Then Mr. A. H. Miles is going to make the bard of Aldworth the first of his "Poets for the People"—a series similar in aim, I suppose, to one which was projected and edited by Mr. Stead. Mr. Miles will, in this connexion, add one more to the biographical sketches of the poet. Nor is this all. The Cambridge University Press has decided to add to the separate editions of In Memoriam (so lately edited both by Mr. Gollancz and by Mr. Beeching). With the text will be given a "commentary," for which, surely, there is nowhere any breathless demand. Robertson, of Brighton, gave us his "Analysis" of the poem in 1862; Dr. Gatty his "Key" to it in 1881, and Mrs. Chapman her "Companion" to it in 1888. Besides these, there have been volumes on its "Purpose and Structure" by J. F. Genung (1884), and some "Prolegomena" to it, with index, by T. Davidson (1889). Altogether, the editions of In Memoriam and the books devoted to it form quite a little library in themselves.

Mr. J. M. Stone proposes to give us a new Life of "Bloody Mary"; Mr. Fitzgerald Molloy will do the same service for Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough; and Mr. Walter Sichel is to produce a new "study" of Lord Bolingbroke. There is room, I think, for all three promised works. Of Mary I. of England there is in existence only one regular biography, that by Miss Strickland, though there is plenty of biographical material in the State papers and elsewhere, of which Mr. Stone, we may be sure, has made due use. The portraits of the Queen painted by Lingard and Tytler have little vitality, and I should be disposed to say that for the real Mary the student had best go to the dramas of Tennyson and De Vere. Duchess Sarah, too, has had only one formal biographer—the Mrs. Thomson who brought out that lady's Memoirs over sixty years ago. The Private Correspondence, which came out in 1830, and the further Letters, published in 1875, have of course been utilised by Mr. Molloy, who has already written "popular" accounts of such worthies as Peg Woffington, Edmund Kean, and so forth. The most recent biography of Bolingbroke is that by Mr. Arthur Hassall, published in the "Statesmen" series in 1888. Mr. Sichel's book, apparently, will be biographical only so far as is necessary for the "vindication" of his hero.

I announced a little while ago the imminent publication in book form of the address delivered by Prof. Ferguson on vacating the presidency of the Edinburgh Bibliographical Society. The Address has now been issued, under the title of Some Aspects of Bibliography, by Mr. G. P. Johnston, of Edinburgh. It makes quite a substantial tome, the Address (which runs to fifty-two pages) being followed by an elaborate Appendix (which runs to another fifty). This Appendix is a sort of Bibliography of Bibliographies, and its only fault is that the entries are not arranged either alphabetically or chronologically: they have been put together solely to illustrate the eighth section of the Address, in which the author describes the various forms that Bibliography may take. Despite this drawback the Appendix is very welcome, while the Address itself should be of much practical service—first, by making clear the nature and aims of Bibliography, and, secondly, by indicating the many different directions in which bibliographers can work. The combined utility and attractiveness of the bibliographical art have never been more successfully asserted than by Prof. Ferguson in this brochure.

In the new volume of The English Catalogue I find this entry: "Pæd (Mrs. Campbell)—As a Watch in the Night: Drama of Waking and Dream in 5 Acts." This, I have no doubt, is an accurate transcription of the title, but it shows how misleading a mere transcription may, on occasion, be. It is possible that persons not very well acquainted with current literature might assume, from the above, that As a Watch in the Night is a play, whereas it is, of course, only a romance, to which the authoress has given a fantastic sub-title. It is, I fear, too much to expect that cataloguers should add to every entry an indication of the character of the volume entered.

Mr. G. F. Savage-Armstrong, who is about to publish some Ballades of Down, has been silent as a verse-writer for just ten years, his latest poem (One in the Infinite) having appeared in 1891. In 1892, however, Mr. Armstrong republished several of his former volumes—namely, Poems Lyrical and Dramatic, The Tragedy of Israel, Stories of Wicklow, Ugone, and Mephistopheles in Broadcloth. The last named, a satire in rhymed couplets, was published originally in 1888, and is one of the last of its kind, that species of literary effort having long ago gone out of fashion.

A Hidden Foe, the novel by Mr. G. A. Henty which figures in Messrs. Low & Co.'s Spring programme, is just ten years old, having been published originally in 1891. Mr. Henty has not devoted much of his time to novel-writing, preferring apparently to be champion tale-teller to the British boy. Nevertheless he has put forth some half-dozen fictions of a more or less ambitious type, such as All but Lost (an early effort), Rujub the Juggler (1893), Dorothy's Double (1894), Colonel Thorndyke's Secret (1899), and so forth.

I see Mr. G. B. Burgin is to give us a story called A Son of Mammon. He is not so liberal as was the late Mr. George Augustus Sala, who gave us The Seven Sons of Mammon all in one novel. And, talking of titles, I notice that the According to Plato of one fictionist is to be followed by the Plato's Handmaiden of another. Plato, in the Shades, will see that he is not forgotten.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Study of Poetry.

Two Lectures, Introductory to the Study of Poetry. By the Rev. H. C. Beeching. (Camb.: University Press. 2s.)

THESE two lectures, by a man who has himself earned an honourable measure of distinction as a poet, are of very unequal merit. For the first, by our troth, we care not. Of course, it contains some true and thought-worthy things, for Mr. Beeching is a writer of taste and reflection. But for the task of delivering an answer to the question, "What is Poetry?" he seems to us too light in calibre. The philosophic principles on which poetry rests demand for their research what we think he lacks—analytic ability and penetration. Scientific system appears deficient here, nor does he go to the root of principle. It is, we think, somewhat superficial. Therefore, in place of tracking Mr. Beeching through it, we shall preferably consider the second lecture, where he is master of his ground. That is preferable to the barren elaboration of our causes of dissatisfaction with the opening lecture. We should, however, like to break a lance with the author over the first item in Milton's famous description of poetry as "simple, sensuous, and passionate." The two latter adjectives he interprets as Milton undoubtedly meant them. But by "simple" he considers that the poet intended "sincere," with the frank and open gaze on the world of a child. Now certainly this is a corollary of Milton's meaning, but we ourselves are convinced that by "simple" he intended something much more fundamental. That his meaning is not apprehended results from our modern and limited English specialisation of the word. Milton intended it in the radical signification of the Latin simplex (which is also the true philosophic conception of simplicity), "twined, or bound, in one." He meant that poetry should be what we would nowadays call synthetic, as opposed to analytic delivery of truth, such as in philosophy or science generally. "Simple" in this sense means "integral"—an equipoise of co-ordinated parts working as one, and its true antithesis is "disintegrated," or "analytic," rather than "complex." In this sense a child is truly simple, for it sees everything with a unified eye, not having learned the habit of analysis. Milton, therefore, did intend the "single eye" of the poet, and so far Mr. Beeching is right. But his primary intention, we repeat, was to lay down that poetry is pre-eminently synthetic, not analytic. It gathers in one, not divides.

In the second lecture, on "Expression in Poetry," Mr. Beeching gets away from philosophic principle, and enters the realm of practice and experience, where his own work as a poet enables him to speak with knowledge, not as the outside critic who dogmatizes in newspapers, reviews, or treatises, with an assurance proportioned to his ignorance of his ignorance. Here Mr. Beeching is excellent, and states many truths which have so lapsed in this hasty day that they need to be taught again as new. His taste and delicacy of perception are in this part an unmingled pleasure. He rightly protests against the idea that there is anything but a formal severance between substance and expression, and the fashion of assigning undue importance to external craftsmanship in poetry. He then regards expression under the three heads of metre, rhyme, and diction. Metre, he truly says, is a means of emotional expression—whereas the prevalent notion is that it exists for the mere sensuous and insignificant pleasure of the ear—a bell on the neck of Pegasus. Hence to various emotions their fitting metres. He finely says of the seemingly "irregular" metres of "Samson Agonistes" that they are like the wheels of Ezekiel's vision: "To the place whither the head looked they followed it, for the spirit of a living creature was in them." He points out that a set metre varies in rhythm within its own boundaries by changes of pause and accent.

Thus the individual poet can so impose himself on his metre that Tennyson's blank verse and Milton's are like two different metres. Common octosyllabics (usually sneered at as "easy") are strikingly distinct in each master's hands, though in the poetaster's they are all alike, and easy enough to write mediocresly. For the metre fluctuates with each pulse of a true poet's emotion.

At the outset of his remarks on diction, Mr. Beeching sets forth the important principle that all the words must be in the same key. Every poem has its own atmosphere, its individual mood; and the words used must be in tone with that atmosphere. This is an essential truth, wofully missed by the ordinary critic. Mr. Beeching might have said further, that each passage of a poem has its own character, to which the diction must be keyed up; nay, each line must have its keeping—and this not only in respect of sense, but in respect of sound. Even as every touch of colour laid in painting alters the touch laid before, so each word in poetry affects and is affected by the words in which it is set, alters and is altered by their contiguity. "Why not use another word? It would mean just the same," says a critic. But the pitch would be discordant, on an alien level from the diction of the line or passage. Or there would be a jar in sound—the metre would give at that particular point, since words in poetry are not mere signs of expression, but also notes. The song is "to its own music chanted." Mr. Beeching, after dealing excellently with key, the effects of association and imagery, proceeds to note the musical effect of words, but rather as regards the suggestion of concrete sound. Motion, he observes, may also be conveyed through words; which is obvious, since motion creates characteristic sounds. He instances Keats:

Save for one gradual solitary gust
Which comes upon the silence and dies off
As if the ebbing air had but one wave.

"Much of the effect of this passage," he says, "depends upon the emphatic monosyllable 'comes,' which gives the impression of suddenness." But there is a good deal more in it than this. We cannot here analyse all the complex effect; but generally there is a preponderance of long vowels, arranged for emphatic effect, and intercrossing, which suggest the sough and changeful breathing of a tidal wave; there is the final liquid alliteration of "one wind"; there is the mimetic word "gust." And, with regard to "comes," the combination of "m" and "s" after the "o" produces a sound at once humming and sibilant, which, along with the sighful vowels of the context, admirably conveys the drone and whistle mingled with the varying spirit of the long wind. Another happy selection of Mr. Beeching's is a verse from Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar," in which an admirable picture of motion depends upon the monosyllabic verbs:

May there be no moaning of the bar
When I put out to sea,
But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
Too full for sound or foam,
When that which drew out of the boundless deep
Turns again home.

Masters like Keats can suggest more than sound or motion—they can suggest even taste by the syllabification of words. Take the banquet in "The Eve of St. Agnes," and such lines as:

Lucent syrups tinct with cinnamon,—
or again:
Jellies soother than the creamy curd.

They dissolve in your mouth, you roll them on the tongue. In the last line it seems to be a mixture of alliteration with artfully smooth vowels. But in the first, besides the alliteration of soft sibilants in "lucent," "syrups," "cinnamon," there is the assonance of short, mincing "i" sounds in "syrups," "tinct," "cinnamon," which gives the effect of delicate, in-drawn suction, such as is made by the lips in the luxurious imbibing of syrup dainties. To compare the aptly changeful sounds throughout Keats's description of the banquet is a lesson in what a poet can do by syllabic suggestion.

Undoubtedly he learned it from Spenser, who uses vowel assonances no less skilfully than alliteration of consonants.

An American on Shakespeare.

William Shakespeare: Poet, Dramatist, and Man. By Hamilton Wright Mabie. (Macmillan.)

WE are conscious of a distinct sense of disappointment in laying down Mr. Mabie's stout and comely volume on Shakespeare. This is, within its limitations, a compliment. Innumerable Shakespearean books do not go so far as to disappoint us. They declare themselves from the beginning vain, pretentious, trivial. They raise no hopes, and they dispel none. Mr. Mabie's long, critical, and biographical study has, on the other hand, very great merits. Its tone, for instance, is charming; the delicate homage to the mother-land from over seas; the full realisation of all that Shakespeare has meant and means to history in the life of the spirit both of England and of America. It is charmingly written in suave, serene English, the English of a scholar and the thinker, erring, if anything, in a certain academic want of freshness, but never in the direction of provincialism or decivilisation. And it is eminently sound and reasonable in its judgment of the many vexed questions connected with the fragmentary tale of Shakespeare's earthly career and the development of his genius. We do not suppose that Mr. Mabie has studied the literary history very closely at first hand and from the documents. But he has made good use of those who have. He expresses his debt, in particular, "to Mr. Halliwell-Phillipps, Mr. F. J. Furnivall, Dr. Horace Howard Furness, Mr. Sidney Lee, Mr. George Wyndham, Mr. Israel Gollancz, Prof. C. H. Herford, and Mr. A. W. Ward," and we hold him to have steered, on the whole, a judicious course among the occasionally warring theories of those and other specialists. Certainly he slips occasionally, for one reason or another. Meres' Palladis Tamia is twice quoted as Palladio Tamia. What does Mr. Mabie suppose the title to mean? It is a considerable exaggeration to say that at the close of Elizabeth's reign there were "no less than fifteen or eighteen playhouses in London." A Londoner will smile at the confusion, pardonable enough in an American, between Whitechapel and Whitehall as the site of the great palace. Mr. Mabie thus describes the Shakespeare marriage bond "in the Edgar Tower at Worcester":

Three parishes within the diocese in which the contracting parties lived are, in accordance with the law and custom of the time, named in the bond, in any one of which the marriage might have taken place. The registers of two of the parishes have been searched without result; the register of the third parish disappeared at the time of the fire which destroyed the church at Luddington in which it was kept.

But Mr. Mabie has clearly never read the bond, although it is printed in French's Shakespeareana Genealogica and elsewhere. It does not mention Luddington or "three parishes" at all. It is, indeed, probable that in the marriage licence, which was a distinct document from the bond and has never been found, three parishes were, as was usual in such cases, named. But there was no real obligation for the marriage to take place in one of the three. Luddington is not a "parish," but a hamlet; and though it is true that there was a chapel there with a register, which was burnt, there is nothing to connect it with the bond or with Shakespeare, except a tradition based on the statement of an "old lady," and dating from 1862. However, Mr. Mabie does not often mix up his authorities like this, and we have not come across any misapprehension of fact which vitally affects the value of the criticism of Shakespeare as a man and a writer, which is his primary object.

And the disappointment? Well, it lies in this, that after all Mr. Mabie has so little to tell us that is new about Shakespeare. He points out himself that his conclusions largely follow "the lines marked out years ago by Dr. Edward Dowden," to whom, like all of us, he owes so much in the way of "suggestion and stimulus." It is quite true. The portrait of Shakespeare which Mr. Mabie draws for us, in all essentials, yet another reproduction of the familiar and admirable Dowden portrait, of which so many copies, more or less blurred or embroidered upon, to suit the fancy of the individual engraver, are already before the world. A typical quotation shall illustrate at once this point and the quality of Mr. Mabie's writing:

In his life of sustained productivity Shakespeare passed through four periods: a period of apprenticeship, when he was learning both his trade and his art; a period of joyous and many-sided contact with the world and with men, during which he made his approach to life; the period of the Tragedies, when he entered into life, sounded its depths of experience, and faced its problems; and a period of reconciliation or meditation, when the tragic elements found their place in a comprehensive and beneficent order. Out of this rich and vital contact with life the poet came at last into a mood at once serene, grave and tender; he looked upon men with a deep and beautiful pity; fortitude under calamity, charity for human weakness, faith in the power of human sweetness and purity, pervade the Romances and give them an interior beauty of which the exquisite poetry in which they are steeped seems only an outward vesture. That beauty was the reflection of a nature of great richness, which, through deep and searching experience, had at last found peace in a wide vision, a catholic spirit, and a reverent faith in purity, goodness and truth.

Now, we are second to none in our admiration of the invaluable work done by Prof. Dowden in the field of Shakespearean criticism. He has told a great deal of the truth about Shakespeare; but we are sure he would be the last to claim to have told the whole truth, to be final, to have said everything there is to be said. Are there not still "two points in Hamlet's soul" left for Gigadibs; "much music, excellent voice," still in the "myriad-minded man" for those who can make him speak? Of recent writers almost the only one who has endeavoured to come to close quarters with Shakespeare, and to see him face to face and not through the haze of the commentators, is Mr. Frank Harris, in those striking Saturday Review articles, the publication of which in book form is so persistently promised and so persistently withheld. Side by side with Mr. Harris, Mr. Mabie, for all his charm and all his scholarship, can only appear fettered to tradition. We regret it. And the method contains in it the seed of its own punishment; for it is but a step from the utterance of the conventional truth to that of the conventional untruth. How many predecessors does not Mr. Mabie follow in tracing the "tragic period" in Shakespeare's work, among other causes, to "fierce dissensions between his personal friends in his own profession"—the "War of the Theatres," if you please! The "War of the Theatres" was admirable "copy" for both sides, a thing to roar over together in the congenial shades of "The Dog, the Triple Tun"; where if Ben Jonson "beat Marston and took his pistol from him," it was assuredly sack and not satire that stung him. But it was not one of those things which drive poets to pessimism. Again, Mr. Mabie says:

That he early formed the habit of exact observation his work shows in places innumerable. No detail of natural life escaped him; the plays are not only saturated with the spirit of nature, but they are accurate calendars of natural events and phenomena; they abound in the most exact descriptions of those details of landscape, flora, and animal life which a writer must learn at first hand, and which he can learn only when the eye is in the highest degree responsive.

This is a very common statement, and a very imperfect approximation to the truth. No Elizabethan—not even Shakespeare—is “saturated with the spirit of nature,” in the sense that he saw it as Gilbert White, Wordsworth, Jefferies, and a score of others have taught us to see. And it is, perhaps, one of the unconsidered trifles still unsnapped up by the Autolycei of criticism, to show exactly how in Shakespeare the firsthand personal outlook on nature amalgamates with the traditional outlook on nature which, in common with his contemporaries, he inherited from belated mediæval writers. Did he, for instance, or did he not, think that the “mortal touch” of a snake is in its “double tongue”?

The book before us is liberally supplied with illustrations, of very unequal merit. For the reproductions of old maps and prints we have nothing but praise, and the pictures of modern Stratford are well enough, except of course for the distressing memorial fountain, and the “streaky bacon” memorial theatre. But more pains might have been taken to distinguish between the possibly authentic portraits and mere modern “fakes”; and some of the fancy pictures, such as those supposed to represent performances of miracle plays, are out of place. We observe that the wood-cuts to “Hycke-Scorner” once more do duty as representations of “morality-players,” although it is surely notorious that they were originally engraved for quite a different work. What is the object of printing the titles of the full-page illustrations upon the sheets of thin paper put in to preserve them while the ink is still wet, and destined ultimately to be removed by the binder?

Oliver Cromwell, M.P.

Speeches of Oliver Cromwell, 1644-1658. Collected and Edited by Charles L. Stainer. (Frowde. 6s.)

THESE speeches by no means represent the sum total of Cromwell's contributions to debate, which began probably in 1629; but the collection includes a great deal more than may be found, remodelled and reshaped, in the histories of the man and his times. It must be confessed that they are difficult reading, even apart from the extreme confusion of the text. Mr. Stainer sees reason to think that many of our MSS. are founded on shorthand versions; and the quality of the obscurities confirms the opinion, while the frequent reduplication of sentences seems to show that the stenographers reported in relays. For Cromwell was a rapid speaker, and would speak from two to three hours at a stretch. On the whole, the editor concludes that the text remaining does but little justice to “the man who seems to have been the greatest orator of his time.”

Scholars and serious students of history apart, no one is likely to read consecutively the speeches reproduced here, though whatever modern punctuation and spelling and the insertion of bracketed glosses could do to make them clear and readable has been done with the skill of an adept and the devotion of an amateur. But travelling at large among the gigantic loose-limbed periods you may still find amid the clouds of their confusion something of the quality which in their speaker made for personal domination. Here from the debate on the appointment of a commander-in-chief from Ireland, in a passage of comparative simplicity, is sounded the tonic of almost every discourse:

I do not think that God hath blessed this Army for the sake of any one man, nor has his presence been with it on any such ground; but that presence and blessing that God hath afforded this Army, it hath been of his own good pleasure and to serve his own turn. That presence and blessing that he hath afforded us has been for his own name's sake, because he would do amongst the sons of men what seemed good in his eyes for the bringing of his glory and purpose to pass; and upon this score has this Army undertaken all that it hath undertaken in the presence of God. It matters not who is our Commander-in-Chief if God be so; and if God be amongst us and his presence be with us it matters not who is our Commander-in-Chief. Truly I do believe that God hath so principled our Army that there is none amongst us [but] that if God set us out [under] any man, we should come to this, to submit to one another for the work's sake.

How he believed in religion as a sufficient motive power to countervail the absence of chivalrous traditions among the rank and file of the Parliamentary forces he tells at a later day with the frankness of an unconscious aristocrat:

And I will deal plainly with you, I had a very worthy friend then, and he was a very noble person, and I know his memory is grateful to you all, Mr. John Hampden. At my first going out to the engagement I saw these men were beaten, and at every hand, I did indeed. And I desired him too, that he would make some addition to my Lord of Essex's army [of] some new regiments, and I told him I would be serviceable to him in bringing such men [in] as I thought had a spirit that would do something in the work. This is very true that I tell you, God knows I lie not. Your troopers, said I, are most of them old decayed serving-men and tapsters and such kind of fellows, and, said I, their troopers are gentlemen's sons, younger sons, persons of quality: do you think that the spirits of such base and mean fellows will ever be able to encounter gentlemen that have honour, courage, and resolution in them? Truly I pressed him in this manner conscientiously, and truly I did tell him, You must get men of spirit, — and take it not ill what I say, I know you will not, — of a spirit that is like to go as far as a gentleman will go, or else I am sure you will be beaten still. I told him so, I did truly. He was a wise and worthy person, and he did think that I talked a good notion but an impracticable one. Truly I told him I could do something in it. I did so. And truly I must needs say that to you, impute it to what you please, I raised such men as had the fear of God before them, and made some conscience of what they did. And from that day forward I must say to you that they were never beaten; wherever they engaged the enemy they beat them continually.

And whatever the subject upon which for the moment he finds himself engaged—the title of his office, the machinations of the Papists, the iniquities and treacheries of the Spaniard—there is the same conviction of his own righteousness, the same insistence that his word shall carry conviction home to his hearers' hearts. First he enunciates what he has to tell them; then he tells it, with infinite repetition; he proves and confirms it with protestation—“I do” and “I say”—and abundant appeal to the Deity. He must have worn down opposition and broken the back of incredulity by sheer weight of words and vehement asseveration.

Falaise for the Philistine.

Falaise, the Town of the Conqueror. By Anna Bowman Dodd. (Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

OUR author's title-page mentions several preceding works and an “Etcetera.” Among the former we instance In and Out of Three Normandy Inns (which suggests what in Germany is called a Bierreise, in England a “gin-crawl”), On the Broads, and Cathedral Days. Mrs. Dodd, is therefore, we presume, an adept at the glorified guide-book. Falaise is her latest example. It deals, firstly, with the author's drive from the Normandy coast to the city of horse-fairs and William the Conqueror. We are taken along in her char-à-banc, so to speak—a native vehicle from which we look down, observing the humours of the road. Mrs. Dodd's attitude is that of the American spectator who writes for the American tourist. She transcribes the peasant life, not as a Millet, a Zola, or Max Liebermann, but, rather, as a "bright" person spending idle hours in the Zoological Gardens, Regent's Park. We accept the attitude and pass on to the horse-fair, which is in full swing as she arrives. Here follows some rather good reporting. The horse-fair is done the justice that so often illumines the encyclopædic columns of the American newspaper. We are treated to the "bright" letter-writing that is so special to Transatlantic journalism. Facility is its key-note; it is a trifle florid, and gay with flourishes; nor is it entirely reliable; but it amuses, and will do till the occasion arises for something more serious and—we say it in all humility—masculine.

After the drive to the horse-fair, and the horse-fair itself, we reach the story of Arlette and her lover, Duke Robert of Normandy. From these two sprang the Conqueror. Mrs. Dodd retells this romance of Falaise quite prettily, though assuming always that Arlette and Robert are of the same family as the puppets that play at chivalry in the pages of the American romanticists. They weren't, we make bold to say; and Mr. Maurice Hewlett, better than anybody near at hand, could say why. Nevertheless, our guide makes a very pretty story of it: tells us how Arlette would only go up to the castle in state, with an escort of mounted knights, and by the great gateway; and how her lover loved no other but the mother of his little Willie. He went off to the Crusades after seven years of it, and Madame Arlette married a nobleman when he died, and bore two sons. After Robert, the story of Falaise is one of siege and battery. The English came and went, Normans and French exchanged mighty blows over its masonry. Henry V. conquered it, and Talbot (the ancestor of him who first provided us with rubber-tired hansoms) built a tower and called in decorators to take the chill off the cold stone. Mrs. Dodd explains these matters very satisfactorily, and then presents us with a final section that tells us how Henry Quatre came here, and after him the great Napoleon, who was serenaded by the townspeople. These innocents thought they were giving pleasure to the hero; they sang "Où peut-on être mieux qu'au sein de sa famille?" and Napoleon set his guards upon them and made them stop.

History, a horse-fair, and a few discursions on the architecture of one of the most picturesque of cities, make up Falaise. Also there are other things in the book, such as an occasional mixed metaphor (the penalty of ready-writing), and certain slipshod statements that cause the immaculate reviewer to bristle. Falaise and Guibray, we read, are practically one town, "yet does Guibray, with peculiar antique pride, unknown in modern suburban districts, maintain its separateness." Has Mrs. Dodd never heard of Huntingdon and Godmanchester, Windsor and Eton, Hamburg and Altona, St. Gallen and St. Fiden? Far from being "unknown," the custom is quite common. There is Mayence and—but why multiply the endless examples? On page 104 we meet a gentleman who was advised to drown his sorrows "in the bowl, that, like remorse, reserves its worst dregs for an uncertain tomorrow." This is far too subtle. On page 116 a piece of "fine writing" depicts Arlette as in a state of nudity, whereas we are sure she was dressed. On page 188 it seems rather silly to describe the erection of some of the masterpieces of Norman architecture by William as a seizure with "the building mania of his age." Building mania applies more properly to sky-scrappers. Mrs. Dodd rather revels in such laxities, though severe enough when seeking an effect. It is rather absurd of her to follow such an idyll as the love-story of Arlette and Duke Robert with her "child of sin—yes, of shame" (page 162). While we will not enter into the "sin," Mrs. Dodd's lyrical pages are our best supports in disputing the "shame." As narrative and as history Falaise is rather strained, but it makes an interesting enough guide-book.

Prose Fritters.

The Life Romantic: Including the Love-Letters of the King.
By Richard Le Gallienne. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THIS cannot be the serious book which Mr. Le Gallienne recently bade us expect from him. We should describe it as being composed of "prose fancies," strung on a thin story. These fancies range in length from phrases to paragraphs, from paragraphs to poems, from poems to the introduced writings of Mr. Pagan Wasteneys and his friends. The "Love-Letters of the King" are read by Wasteneys to Adeline Wood in a restaurant. The story, as a story, is nearly trash. We are to pretend that Pagan Wasteneys, a modern rich young poet, is so tortured in his enslavement to a Madonna-like girl named Meriel that he pursues her to Provence, to shoot her with a revolver and purchase freedom in death. He calls shooting a "sudden lash of flame on her white breast." However, he is lured into a day's butterfly-hunting, and finding that he can buy wine at forty centimes the litre, he falls to quoting Omar, and his murderous enterprise loses the name of action. The book is a tissue of fancies to which the story often appears to be merely irrelevant. In one of his pursuits of Meriel, Pagan Wasteneys journeys from London to a Devonshire fishing village on the barest chance of finding her. But, of course, she is there, playing on her violin on a moonlit balcony, her instrument filling the sky "with tall summoning angels of passion, with flocks of little birds warbling desire, and silver butterflies of flitting hope." Listening, and recognising her soul's call to his own soul, he meditates:

O for an answer to that call—no verbal, mortal cry, no intermediate symbolic articulation in some provincial human tongue, but some essential cry of the very soul and body of things. Properly, there is only one verb for love. It is not amo. It is not aimer. It is not the softest Italian verb. No printed language of man knows it. But the violin knows it, even the sea knows it. The rose is it, and the look of a man's eyes into a woman's is it, and the look of a woman's eyes back again is it. But no man or woman can say it, in any language that endures. Only a violin, and a nightingale, and a woman talking in her sleep, can be trusted to say it—as alone it can worthily be said.

Of such prose fritters Mr. Le Gallienne can give us any quantity. They please and tire by turns. They tire most in a story which is continually being adjourned for these light refreshments. Very characteristic is the title of Chapter VI., "A Moon-Bath." "Wasteneys walked the two moonlit miles of country road to his old home in an ecstasy of purification. 'Yes! nature is moral,' he said to himself, 'nature is terribly pure and sane. But how sweet to be pure and sane!'" We are glad that for "But" Wasteneys learned to say "And." Although it is necessary to go on laughing a good deal at Mr. Le Gallienne, it is just as necessary to go on admitting that his fancies and his lore are all his own, and that he possesses a clear, engaging style. Take a passage at random:

Who are you that shall dictate to the mysterious soul of another? The soul of man takes strange fancies. It is apt to lay up its treasure in little precarious heavens, the heavenliness of which others cannot understand. A little child, perhaps, shall be its heaven. The child dies—or lives on to break your heart. It is true that Parliament is still open to you. Many sounding things remain to be done. The gates of other people's heavens are hospitably thrown open. But where is your little child?

There still remains much beauty, much music, in the world—but it all belongs to other people. Your beauty has withered, your music has ceased. The heaven has enough stars for us all—but what if the tiny star on which we had set our hearts has shot down the gulf of space some November night, and shines for us no more, is perhaps lying somewhere, a cinder, on the iron floor of the universe?

There is not much in them, but the sentences sing together.

Australian Actualities.

Pages from the Journal of a Queensland Squatter. By Oscar de Satgé. (Hurst & Blackett. 10s. 6d. net.)

ANY book dealing at first hand with the early days of the settlement of Australia is certain of a welcome nowadays, even though it have nothing to recommend it beyond its mere value as a record of fact. Mr. de Satgé's volume is such a record, and little more; he has no literary skill, none of the quality which makes people and places live. Perhaps, in a sense, the narrative gains by the writer's obvious limitations. One never suspects him of heightening effects or juggling with figures, so that when he tells us that a certain estate carried a quarter of a million sheep we accept the statement as bare truth. He was in the rough-and-tumble of the first period of the pioneering of Queensland, and with the aid of a little imagination we get a sufficiently clear impression of what the work and its results were like.

Mr. de Satgé set out in 1853 with his brother for Melbourne. The journey occupied ninety days, and the diet consisted mainly of salt pork. Mr. de Satgé does not appear to have had the gold fever badly, although it was that which first turned his eyes towards Victoria. Instead of securing a claim, he took a clerkship in the office of the Chief Commissioner of Goldfields, with a salary of two hundred pounds a year, and what he calls "a gratuity of one hundred a year for house rent." In the following year he was ordered to Bendigo, where the Gold Office was . . . the resting place—previous to its being sent away by escort once a week to Melbourne—of many a ton of alluvial gold, and many a celebrated nugget, some of which I have handled weighing over 16 lbs. of pure gold without quartz.

But soon the allurements of the pastoral life prevailed over the arid and hot existence of the mining camp, and Mr. de Satgé went north to Moreton Bay. At the Glenlyon station he first began to gain experience of flocks and herds. It was not, however, until 1861 that he undertook the stocking and development of a large tract of land in Central Queensland, known as the Peak Downs.

Free selection and its accompanying dismemberment have, I understand, since played havoc with that fine country; but in the days I speak of—the good old days of squatting—we were all happy in working early and late—managers, overseers, and men—for the employ we served in. The selector had not sprung up as a thorn in the squatter's side, nor was the "Sundowner" the institution he has since become in the country—viz., the man who travels from station to station asking for rations and for work, the second of which he heartily prays he may not get.

In this district Mr. de Satgé remained for fifteen years, making money for his owners, and disposing, to great advantage, of various stations he had formed on the estate.

Of the adventures of Bush life Mr. de Satgé tells some interesting stories, the best, perhaps, being an experience of his own with the notorious Frank Gardiner, a great bushranger of his day:

One day, returning from one of the many trips I had to make to Rockhampton on station business, I met first, near Apis Creek, a man who then called himself James Christie; he was riding a very fine brown horse, and was crossing the road before me, making towards a camp that had a lot of timber stacked about it. As the man was a stranger, I caught him up and entered into conversation with him, and he proved, though shy, affable and fairly communicative, asking me to get off my horse and have a cup of tea with his "old woman," who turned out to be a pretty little person, though silent and demure. Having asked him if he would sell the brown horse, he referred me to his wife as the owner, when she at once said nothing would induce her to sell him. I little knew then the "romance of the road" that was attached to that gallant brown horse. . . . On another occasion when camping there, I remember giving into Christie's charge for the night a saddle-bag with a considerable sum in notes and gold, that I was about to pay into the Rockhampton Bank, which he kept quite safe for me.

Twelve months later James Christie was arrested as Frank Gardiner, and was convicted at Sydney, his late guest being called as a witness to identify him.

Mr. de Satgé was active in the parliamentary life of his colony, and sat as M.L.A. for Claremont. He has a particularly interesting chapter on the initiation of responsible government, which indicates very clearly the quickness and readiness of Englishmen to make use of the best material at their command.

The life of a squatter in the days of Australia's youth was a life of hard work, of infinite kindness, of some danger, and often of much profit. Its simplicity was the simplicity of a patriarchal community, and its ways were the ways of those who return to the oldest of occupations. One cannot read such a book as this without being carried away to pastures which were made to bear flocks innumerable for the building up of a great race. But the history of these pioneers has yet to be written.

Other New Books.

THE GOOD MAN O

THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

BY CHARLES WHITTUCK.

This book stands very much by itself. Not often nowadays do we find an original idea worked out with such intellectual zest. Mr. Whittuck's aim is to piece together, and restore, a portrait of the good man as he was described or conceived of in the didactic literature of the eighteenth century. It is not, however, a dramatic portrait that he seeks to make; rather, he wishes to compile a scientifically correct catalogue of abstract qualities. He works from the living portraits of the Spectator of Fielding and of Lessing to an ethical description. Sometimes he works from less dramatic material, as when he draws data from Law's Serious Call, Voltaire's Candide, and Johnson's Rasselas. To all these sources he goes for clues to the eighteenth century man's notion of what a good man should be. It is an inquiry that is hardly calculated to interest the general reader, who is content to study eighteenth century ideals loosely in detached figures like those of Sir Roger de Coverley, Parson Adams, Allworthy, and Rasselas without attempting a synthesis so difficult and technical as that which Mr. Whittuck tries to erect. And, indeed, we doubt whether Mr. Whittuck has sufficiently condescended even to his elect readers. His book rather resembles a wall to which the coping-stones have yet to be added. In his preface he says: "All . . . that this work attempts to do is to give a clue to the thoughts of the men of that age. The comparison of those thoughts with the ideals of goodness and wisdom now prevalent has advisedly been left to be undertaken by the reader." But it is just this comparison that is needed to finish the book. There is nothing more fatiguing than a complex inquiry which we follow with patience only to find that we are unable to combine and apply the results. This process may well be as difficult as the inquiry itself, and it is so in the case before us. A large comparison between the ideals of goodness which appealed to eighteenth century writers and readers and those which are upheld to-day would have been crucially interesting; but to ask the reader to make it for himself is to ask too much. We are left at the end of a rope; and the excellence of the rope, its closely-knit fibre, and honest strength, make our disappointment the greater. Yet Mr. Whittuck's book is one to which no student of the eighteenth century ought to be a stranger. Its incidental clarities and illustrations can be appreciated even by those who will not bend to understand its closely-knit plan. The description of the "good man" which Mr. Whittuck distils from Fielding's works (it will be found on pp. 89-91) is a faithful and uncommon piece of work, although to the general reader it may quite possibly seem dry and wordy. (Allen. 6s.)

CONCERNING CHILDREN. By C. P. (STETSON) GILMAN.

Mrs. Charlotte Perkins (Stetson) Gilman is a woman of very unusual common-sense and clearheadedness. She is also a very good practical writer. In this book she subjects to unsentimental analysis a number of hoary conventions whose age she does not permit to be any protection whatever, and the result is that one comes out of the pages in a state of dazed bewilderment mingled with irritation that the world has gone on so long without the wisdom of Mrs. (Stetson) Gilman coming earlier to make it sensible. The particular object of the author is to get children's training on a more reasonable basis, and to do this she has first to destroy old illusions. For example: obedience. The ordinary parent is under the impression that she knows better than her children and should exact compliance with her rule. But Mrs. (Stetson) Gilman is not at all sure of this. She shows that obedience vitiates a child's independence, keeps it weak in mind and formal and unoriginal in cut; and to exact it is, moreover, a form of self-indulgence in the parent. "The habit of obedience forced . . . tends to make us a helpless mob, mere sheep, instead of wise, free, strong individuals," and so forth. That is the kernel of this very interesting book. It looks traditions in the face with twentieth-century eyes and finds them wanting, and says so with excellent emphasis and good-humour. Children have had many champions of late years, but none better than Mrs. (Stetson) Gilman. But we wish we could understand the mysterious intricacies of her name. (Putnams.)

LIBYAN NOTES. BY DAVID RANDALL-MACIVER AND ANTHONY WILKIN.

This is an interesting narrative of very valuable anthropological researches in Algeria, undertaken by the authors in the spring of 1900, and is illustrated by handsome plates of Berber pottery and Berber facial types. The expedition, due to the suggestion of Prof. Flinders Petrie, was designed to collect such information about the Berber tribes of Algeria as should solve the moot point regarding their early connexion with pre-historic Egyptian civilisation. It was known that the Egyptian monuments showed the Libyans as a white, blue-eyed, fair-haired race; and it is now known that blonde types occur among the Berbers. These Berbers, known of old as Libyans, Numidians, and Mauri, or Moors, may be pretty safely identified also with the Amorites (Hebrew 'emōri), who were probably an Eastern branch of them. The close connexion with Egypt suggested by the monuments, and borne out by history, has been pushed back further by the discovery of a pre-historic Egyptian civilisation, the pottery of which resembled some in use among the Kabyle Berbers. Was this early civilisation Libyan in origin? Were the people themselves a Libyan race? To answer these questions the authors set out for Algeria.

Their results are elaborately recorded in this book. It may be said in general that their examination of Berber pottery has led them to answer chiefly in the negative. They rather infer that Berber and Egyptian drew from common centres of influence; one perhaps in or near Egypt, the other somewhere in the Ægean—perhaps Crete. Egypt, lying midway, passed on the influence to the Berbers. But for more explicit statement the book should be consulted, which well repays reading by its incidental information, apart from the main purpose. (Macmillan. 20s. net.)

SANDS OF SAHARA.

BY MAXWELL SOMNERVILLE.

This is a book which one should read, and execrate the writer. It is a record of travel through the Sahara, viâ Syracuse and Algiers, a principal object being to see the splendid remains of Roman cities excavated in the desert sands. The writer has seen a large number of supremely interesting things, which he relates in a way supremely uninteresting when it is not actually exasperating. His style is a happy compromise between that of a third-rate guide-book and a third-rate—American—reporter. Moreover, he has American humour in an acute form, and is seldom long without a paroxysm of it. In one place he makes the extraordinary statement that he saw an assembly of monkeys, in a natural forest-temple, engaged in public worship—"evidently engaged in worship." But what led him to this conclusion, what acts made their worship so "evident" a fact to him—and his native guide—he does not record; he is too busy making bad jokes. We may, however, quote his description of "Dionysius' Ear" at Syracuse—a cave said to be the actual structure of the famous Sicilian tyrant, for eavesdropping on his prisoners:

The man . . . took a sheet of letter-paper, and standing within the portal of the ear, struck the edge of the paper with the forefinger of his right hand—once, twice, thrice; each light tap was repeated through the orifices of that stone ear as though it had been a blow with a heavy sledge-hammer on the roof of an iron house. He then rattled the paper slightly, and that feeble sound . . . was augmented a million-fold, reverberating through the vaults above and beyond, like the crash and roll of thunder. He whistled, spoke, and called; thousands of stentorian voices repeated every sound.

It is a book to be read for its record of facts and sights—if you can. (Lippincott Company.)

ANIMALS OF AFRICA.

BY H. A. BRYDEN.

This volume, which forms the second in "The Library for Young Naturalists," under the general editorship of Mr. Aflalo, fulfils its object concisely and well. For a work not intended to be exhaustive, Mr. Bryden has succeeded in including a vast amount of information, and he has presented it in an entertaining and simple manner. The book is divided into five parts, dealing respectively with Mammals, Birds, Reptiles and Amphibians, Fishes, and Invertebrates. Most boys, we imagine, will turn with the greatest interest to the quaint and less known creatures with which the author deals—to such possible pets as the lemur and the meerkat. Of the latter Mr. Bryden writes:

I knew a young English girl at the Cape who had a meerkat, of which she was very fond. Sometimes she would take it out into the veld. She teases it occasionally by imitating, as she could perfectly, the croak of a vulture. At this sound the little fellow was terrified, and snuggled up into her neck, as if to beg protection from that dreaded foe.

These animals, Mr. Bryden adds, "would be welcomed in many a family." The section dealing with Birds is particularly interesting, and so untechnical as to present no difficulties to the youngest naturalist.

Mr. Caldwell's illustrations to the volume are particularly good and full of character. If the din of war has not frightened them into temporary retirement, many of these creatures must have been a source of infinite amusement to tired men in South Africa. Half-a-dozen jumping shrews, for instance, should serve to keep a whole regiment in good humour. (Sands. 6s.)

The coming national commemoration of Alfred the Great at Winchester has inspired Mr. Warwick H. Draper to write a handy and scholarly little book of studies of the "Mirror of Princes." First we have a biographical sketch, and then seven essays dealing with such subjects as Alfred's Legislation, his Local Government, his work as a Man of Letters, his Burial Place, &c. There is also a Supplement, enumerating the materials for a History of Alfred, and a Bibliography of works on the subject. Within 136 pages Mr. Draper has packed, without recourse to dryasdust conciseness, an immense amount of information and useful guidance. The illustrations are strikingly interesting, including as they do careful drawings of Alfred's Jewel, the thirteenth-century portrait of Alfred from the Chronicle of Matthew of Paris, views of Athelney and the Vale of the White Horse, &c.

The military and expert side of the operations in the recent Ashanti trouble is admirably set forth in Captain Harold C. J. Biss's book The Relief of Kumassi (Methuen, 6s.). Captain Biss writes as an eye-witness and partaker of the eventful march to Kumassi, and of the relief. Many of his pages are thrilling, as, for instance, those in which he describes the storming of Kokofu with its running fight. The author writes like a good soldier and a good fellow, and lights up a story in which gruesome incidents abound with many a humorous interlude. His native boy, "Dan Leno," is an admirable foil.

Messrs. Sampson Low have issued a new edition (at 3s. 6d. net) of Mr. Arthur H. Beavan's Popular Royalty, a budget of anecdotes about royal personages which some of our readers will remember. The book appears as originally issued, hence Queen Victoria is written of as though she were living. On one occasion, when the Queen heard a great deal of laughing among her ladies-in-waiting, she inquired the cause, and was told that Miss H—— had been dancing a jig. Miss H—— was forthwith ordered to come and dance her jig before the Queen. When she had done, the Queen said: "Now, you must select a present. No one ever dances before royalty without being rewarded. What would you like?" Miss H—— hesitated, and then archly said: "Mr. ——'s head in a charger!" The Queen was much amused, and next day a splendid black horse arrived for Miss H——, with the message that since the Queen could not gratify Miss H——'s whole wish, she sent the "charger" minus the politician's head.

In the "Great Masters" series (Bell) the work of Piero della Francesca is the subject of a study by Mr. W. G. Waters, who brings a strikingly earnest spirit to his researches into a rather hidden corner of Italian art. The reproductions of Francesca's paintings and frescoes are, however, in themselves sufficient to whet the reader's curiosity; and in Mr. Waters he will find an excellent guide.

The Official Year-Book of the Church of England for 1901 is issued this week by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. In the preface the editor deplores the continued scarcity of candidates for Holy Orders, but can assign no cause for it.

In Scottish Cathedrals and Abbeys, by the Rev. D. Butler (A. & C. Black, 1s. 6d. net.), we have a very thorough, well-packed survey of Scottish cathedrals, monastic and collegiate buildings and parish churches built between 1047 and 1560. The author's arrangement of his material could hardly be more scientific.

Fiction.

Mr. Stockton and Two Others.

A Bicycle of Cathay. By Frank R. Stockton. (Harpers. 6s.)
The New Schoolmaster. By Arnold Golsworthy. (Pearson.)
Georgie. By S. E. Kiser. (Unwin.)

WRITING books, we should imagine, has ceased to resemble work to Mr. Stockton. Once he gave the impression of seeking a comic idea with some diligence and extracting all the fun possible before passing on to the next. Those were the good days, the crowning glory of which was The Casting Away of Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Aleshine. But they have gone; and in their place we have the new period, when it seems too much trouble to expend energy on writing, and page follows page automatically. The Associate Hermits, which we seem to have read only the other day, was like that; and now here is A Bicycle of Cathay, in which the author's exertions are still further to seek. Not that the book is exactly bad. It is not: it is suavely entertaining, and credible enough; but it wasn't worth doing so slightly—either wholeheartedly and comically, or not at all. Mr. Stockton must be whimsical, or we have no place for him. Without fancy his small beer is too intensely small.

A young schoolmaster takes a cycling vacation, riding whither his machine likes. It leads him among various young women, and in the end he finds one to marry. Incidentally he becomes possessed of a bear. That is all. It is too exiguous. Mr. Stockton has such charm that we are never wholly disappointed; but a book like this is playing pranks with one's reputation.

We find another schoolmaster, also recounting his adventures in the first person singular, in Mr. Arnold Golsworthy's volume. Mr. Golsworthy is a humorist of a more resolute brand than Mr. Stockton. "Your laughter or your life!" he seems to say, as he levels his jokes at one's head. Such humour too!—the variety that was once called new, but now seems older than mirth. The New Master tells the story of his experiences in a private school; and the expected always happens. The principal is named Dr. Bunderby. Could it have been anything else? Miss Bunderby, who physices the boys, is hideously plain. How could a professional humorist have made her beautiful? (Besides, the English sense of fun would not have tolerated the caricature.) The boys are referred to by the author as ruffians. The new French master kisses Miss Bunderby. The hero's dignity comes out of a lesson on Roman history, with "a spavined base." There are boys who will find this book hardly less of a delight than Stalky & Co. But it seems to us very poor stuff, especially as we fancy that the author might, had he liked, have made a genuine thing.

Boy nature of a kind dear to American readers is to be found in Georgie. Georgie is the precocious, observant, cynical historian who figures in comic papers in this country as "Our Office Boy," and detects and exposes the meanness of his employers. His first notable appearance in literature was in Habberton's A Bad Boy's Diary, a work to which Mr. Kiser seems to be indebted. We fancy also that Mr. Kiser is not unacquainted with Huntly's Mr. and Mrs. Spoopendyke; for we seem to recognise many of Mr. Spoopendyke's lineaments in the figure of Georgie's father, who is the central character of the book. This amusing impostor and very human creature is cleverly presented, but a little of him goes a long way, and one can get heartily tired of his exploits unless they are taken in homeopathic doses. Here is a specimen. Paw is playing golf:

Then paw struck with all his Mite, and Uncle wesley sed it was A good thing that part of the state was fassened down or they mite of been a land Slide.

After Uncle wesley got the Links in good condition again he gave paw another chance, and paw struck like he Intended to brake the ball into all Kinds of pieces. Then maw came out from Behind a tree about as thick around as one of the Golf clubs and says:

"Paw, wait. Ill send Georgie home for The garden spade."

"What do you want it for?" paw ast, looking at the ball, Kind of saprised that it was there yet.

"Becos you can Dig up the sod a good deal quicker and easier with it than you Can with that club," maw told him.

That is the style. Mr. Kiser is by no means a Max Adeler; but he will amuse the very simple. We might add that such is the popularity expected in this country for this work, that the book is issued also by another firm under the title The Pa Papers.

The Monster. By Stephen Crane.
(Harpers. 6s.)

IF Mr. Crane had written nothing else, this book would have wrested from the world an acknowledgment of his curious, searching gifts, and would have made him a reputation. Not that he is wholly represented here. The Crane of The Open Boat, of Maggie, of Death and the Child, of The Red Badge of Courage, is absent, or only fugitively present; but the quick, nervous, prehensile mind that in an instant could select the vital characteristics of any scene or group, is notably here; and here also in superabundance is the man's grim fatalism, his saturnine pleasure in exhibiting (with bitter, laughing mercilessness) the frustrations of human efforts, the absurd trifles which decide human destiny. There is one story, for example, "Twelve o'Clock," which tells how a young cowboy's excitement on hearing a cuckoo-clock for the first time led indirectly to murder—all done with perfect credibility. Nothing but a kind of savage impatience with the accidentalism of the scheme of things could have caused a man to set down this particular story; but it is finely done—a triumph of narrative art. "The Blue Hotel" is another excellent piece of work—the history of a quarrelsome night and its fatal issue—a nocturne in blood and whisky, with a curious thread of grotesque running through it, and a very peculiar knowledge of human nature in every line. The question, "Is it worth while?" had better, perhaps, not be asked. To our mind the art justifies it. "The Monster" itself, the title-story, has been praised in America with that warmth of praise for which the country is famous; but it is not better than "The Blue Hotel." It is, however, an amazing story, with deeper interest, and the question, "Is it worth while?" is far less likely to be put. "Manacled" is an exercise in the horrible that does not quite succeed. "His New Mittens" belongs rightly to Whilomville Stories. The last story of all, "An Illusion in Red and White," is a very delicate piece of gruesomeness. Altogether, the book is intensely alive and intelligent, and not by any means the kind of thing for nervous folk or for the "art-for-anything-else's-sake-but-art" school.

Love and Honour. By M. E. Carr.
(Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THIS dignified and respectable, but rather pedestrian, novel by a new writer deals with military society in Westphalia just after the elevation of Jerome to the Westphalian throne. Heinz von Ostenburg, the peerless hero, is described in a passage which in its careful conventionality is typical of the whole book:

Ostenburg took the vacant seat at Duclos' side. In some inexplicable way the company, brilliant as it was, had shrunk into insignificance since his entrance . . . The grey eyes were set deeply under thick brows, the nose was straight with finely-cut nostrils, the chin well moulded, the mouth curled scornfully and lined at the corners. There were lines, too, about the eyes, and the whole expression in repose was rather disdainful, though sometimes, as now, a rarely brilliant smile lit it almost to beauty. But even smiling the face was hard to read, and one grew curious to know what lay behind it.

It will be perceived that Ostenburg belongs to a well-known species. He had loved a French girl whom he supposes to have been guillotined in the Terror; but, needless to say, Anaïs arrives duly in Cassel as the wife of a fighting husband. Mutual recognition follows; the lady virtuously repulses, but is conquered. The husband reckes not of his dishonour till the moment when his wife, dying in the retreat from Moscow, breathes with her pale lips the name "Heinz." Then there is a duel, and Heinz, as he thinks, kills the husband. It is a little characteristic of the author that she cannot finish the plot without committing the husband to a false death, from which he rises again to the detriment of the hero.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE FROBISHERS.

By S. BARING GOULD.

Mr. Baring Gould's twentieth novel (or about) finds him weaving a story of modern manners in the district known as the Staffordshire Potteries. Joan, the heroine, is disclosed at the opening in a bye-road pitying her horse, which has an ugly "raw on the shoulder." When the inevitable young man appears Joan talks like this: "I cannot possibly replace the saddle and remount him. So I shall have to walk all the way to Pendabury House in a riding-skirt—and only a lady knows how laborious that is." (Methuen. 6s.)

THE CHURCH OF HUMANITY.

By D. C. MURRAY.

A list of twenty-four books from Mr. Murray's own pen, and three in collaboration, faces the title-page of The Church of Humanity, which is mainly about John Manger. In the beginning he is a "professional jack-pudding," which, according to the learned Dr. Brewer, is "a buffoon who performs pudding tricks, such as swallowing a certain number of yards of black-pudding." Dreadful trade! In the beginning Manger is that and a clown in a travelling canvas theatre. The pages deal mainly with unhappy things, including drunkenness and murder. In the end Manger is a preacher of the Gospel—and about to suffer a still greater change. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

BALLAST.

By MYRA SWAN.

Ballast, we are told, is "but a synonym for trouble," and trouble and grief enough are to be found in this tale of modern life. It is the story of two step-sisters, "the elder cursed with the hereditary millstone of drunkenness." The younger sacrifices herself and her lover in the task of trying to save her sister. On the title-page is a quotation from Schopenhauer, but the wedding march is threatened at the end. (Longmans. 6s.)

HARLAW OF SENDLE.

By JOHN W. GRAHAM.

"There is no plot in this simple history of country-folk," says the narrator. He is not a Harlaw of Sendle, but "as my great-grandfather Anthony came first to this home, which now owns me as lord, the name of Denton of Holly Lodge is sufficiently known." The sub-title is: "Passages Relating chiefly to the Family of that Name in Strathelyde, collected out of the note-books of Thomas Denton, Esquire, of Eselby." (Blackwood. 6s.)

THE SALVATION SEEKERS.

By NOEL AINSLIE.

A novel in which various religious problems play a part. Some of the scenes are laid in Valentia, off the coast of Kerry. The book is divided into five parts:

Salvation by Circumstance.

" " Action.
" " Seeking.
" " Suffering.
" " Love.

(Methuen. 6s.)

A WOMAN OF YESTERDAY.

By CAROLINE A. MASON.

A novel with a strong religious tendency, printed in America, and opening in the "small white village" of Haran, Ver., where "the incumbent in the year 1869 was the Rev. Samuel Mallison. We have never seen so many quotations from poets, divines, &c. Some of the chapter-headings have three. We open a page and find this: "We all have need of that prayer of the Breton mariner: 'Save us, O God! Thine ocean is so large and our little boats are so small.'" This is from Dean Farrar's mint. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage).....	17/6
„ Quarterly	5/0
„ Price for one issue.....	/5

The Athletic Style.

Away beyond the hospital tent, half-way towards what had once been a happy farmhouse home, a long row of little mounds rose from the ample breast of the veldt like scars on the face of a matron. They were the fever graves of Britain's soldiers, looking so God-forsaken in their loneliness that they struck the eye like a blow from a clenched fist.

THE sentence printed above is a typical one. It crystallises what we may call the athletic style now so common among young writers. That style seems to owe its existence to the extraordinary breadth and bustle to which the literary life has attained in these days. Literature, save here and there in remote places, has become a trade. Every circumstance of noisy trade belongs to it. It has its touts and advertisement agents, its over-the-way rivalries, its shop-window dodges, its violent changes of fashion, and its blaring exchange in which all its affairs are settled, and re-settled. Never was it so easy to make a name in writing. Only bring something that hits or piques the public, or that for any reason is saleable, and you may forthwith go butterfly-chasing after your own name in the newspapers and in the streets. These things being so there is every inducement to a writer who is gaining, or has gained, a footing, to hustle and gesticulate. The critics, no less than the people, love marked characteristics, which they can note while they run. All is hurry, encouragement, and slapping of backs. Of course, such a hurly-burly is fatal to the production of good literature by those who yield to its spell or allow themselves to be deafened by its clamour. Its result has been to stimulate style unnaturally, and force it into shrill and antic forms admirably designed to attract attention for a week or a year, but doomed to be found out and put away. Perhaps the style which is practised with most success, and with the longest license, is the one which meets noise with noise, and agility with agility. We call it the athletic style. At its best, in the hands of a master, it can be very good, can give points to standard forms, and can be accepted by sober critics as devilled literature. But this is only when a Steevens holds the pen. Even Steevens could not put on the brake with complete mastery. His pages are sown with phrases which are a thought too galvanic to be acceptable on a second and third reading. No one of them, perhaps, might not be passed. But in their number and procession they tire the mind which singly they quicken. "The trains drew up and vomited khaki into the meadow." That will do to-day, but hardly to-morrow. When Steevens puts his hand to a battle-piece you have wine, but later comes a slight headache. In him it is persistent, not specific, overstrain that rouses protest. "Houses wined at the buffet." Very good. But also "a horse streaked down the street with trailing halter," and "a roof gaped, and a house leaped to pieces," and a black "reeled over," and so on—all in one half page. It is brilliant, it is compelling, but it is not literature, because literature and moderation are one, and the power to which we do homage is the power that pushes, not the power that pricks.

But when we come to Steevens's imitators—oh, dear! For an object lesson, compare Steevens's description of a storm at Elandslaagte with Mr. A. G. Hales's description of a storm in his book, Driscoll, King of Scouts. Steevens writes:

It was about a quarter to five, and it seemed curiously dark for the time of day. No wonder—for as the men moved forward before the enemy the heavens were opened. From the eastern sky swept a sheer sheet of rain. With the first stabbing drops horses turned their heads away, trembling, and no whip or spur could bring them up to it. It drove through mackintoshes as if they were blotting-paper. The air was filled with hissing; underfoot you could see solid earth melting into mud, and mud flowing away in water. It blotted out hill and dale and enemy in one grey curtain of swooping water. You would have said that the heavens had opened to drown the wrath of man. And through it the guns still thundered and the khaki columns pushed doggedly on.

Now take Mr. Hales's storm:

He had neither moon nor stars to guide him, for the night was as black as the frown on the face of a nigger. The wind, which had sprung up when the night set in, now howled through the gorges between the kopjes, and swept shrieking across the open country like a battalion of devils searching for the soul of a seasoned sinner. The thunder tore holes in the air, and seemed to make the rocks ring again with the awful majesty of Nature's gunnery; lightning licked the sky with tongues of flame like burnished steel; then the face of the heavens was rent asunder with mighty sheets of crimson flame, as though the very gates of the Eternal City were opened to the eye of man, leaving for one brief moment a carmine track wide enough for all the armies in Europe to have marched in. Then blackness came again—blackness so deep, so dense, that a lost soul would have seemed like a snowdrop on its crest.

Observe how much more Steevens sees and says than his disciple. We need say nothing of the sanity preserved by the one writer and the wild cat imagery of the other. Let us make another parallel between the finely athletic style and the grotesquely athletic. Mr. Steevens describes a hot bombardment of Ladysmith as follows:

Along the broad, straight street not a vehicle, not a white man, was to be seen. Only a herd of niggers cowering under flimsy fences at a corner.

Another crash and quaking, and this time, in a cloud of dust, an outbuilding jumped and tumbled asunder. A horse streaked down the street with trailing halter. Round the corner scurried the niggers: the next was due from Pepworth's.

Then the tearing scream: horror! it was coming from Bulwhana.

Again the annihilating blast, and not ten yards away a roof gaped and a house leaped to pieces. A black reeled over, then terror plucked him up again and sent him running.

Head down, hands over ears, they tore down the street, and from the other side swooped down the implacable, irresistible next.

You come out of the dust and the stench of melanite, not knowing where you were, hardly knowing whether you were hit—only knowing that the next was rushing on its way. No eyes to see it, no limbs to escape, no bulwark to protect, no army to avenge. You squirm between iron fingers.

Mr. Hales writes:

Their big guns were trained upon our earthwork capped with rock: the shells came in showers; they wailed through the air like devils around a dying deacon; they moaned like a mother mourning for a son who had died in dishonour. Then they came along in a cloud, and shrieked like a mob of mad women through the bars of Bedlam. Then they burst, and to us, who sat within the shadow of death, it seemed as if the mouth of hell was all agape, spitting tongues of white flame from lips of crimson fire. The foul breath of battle brought with it flying teeth of iron, and the short, dull cough of the bursting shell was the cough of death to many a man out there. In between the storm of shells came the rain of bullets. It was a devil's jubilee, and the Boers were wasting none of their privileges.

Here is a pretty tintamar of phrases: "The shells wailed like devils around a dying deacon"; what does that convey? Only a grotesque picture that is not wanted. "They moaned like a mother mourning a son who has died in disgrace"; an unhappy simile for the rush of projectiles over a field where death was honour. Mobs of mad women are not to be found shrieking behind bars in Bedlam; and if they were, the recourse to death, disgrace, Bedlam and hell for similes is in itself violence, rather than a description of violence. The return to devils ("a devils' jubilee") in the last sentence is a characteristic of this promiscuous groping after missiles of speech. Mr. Steevens's description is not a perfect piece of writing; but Mr. Hales's is not writing at all—it is an eruption of words. The one passage opens your eye a little too wide, the other closes it with a "clenched fist." When Mr. Hales passes from the battle to the drawing-room his athleticism is hardly less terrifying:

The Venetian, with great masses of hair floating down her back, tossed her arms Godward; her slender frame quivered as willows quiver in a gale, her blue eyes blazed like sunlight on sabre-point, her cheeks were flushed, her lips were crimson. Madame, the governess, with hands tightly clenched upon the back of a chair, stood as though fashioned out of tempered steel.

We are afraid that Mr. Hales only supplies us with a highly developed, easily recognisable example of that grotesque athleticism which is the bane of hundreds of writers anxious to make their mark. At bottom it is a question of the quality of mind a writer has. Steevens had so much mind that his matter acted like a garden roller on his exuberant manner. It never allowed him to soar into the inane. He had abundant material on which to spend his force, whereas his imitators beat the air, or black your eye in sheer goodwill. Like Armado, they are ready with "some delightful ostentation, or show, or pageant, or antick, or firework." Quoth Holofernes: "He shall present Hercules in minority: his enter and exit shall be strangling of a snake; and I will make an apology for that purpose." "An excellent device," quoth Moth, "so, if any of the audience hiss, you may cry, 'Well done, Hercules! now thou crushest the snake!'" But the Muse reserves her judgment and her wreath.

Things Seen.

Palingenesis.

WHEN that happened to the Minor Poet, he wrote no more verses. It was enough to live.

Before that his happenings had been one slim volume a year, with never a thought in them that pushed or peered beneath the emotional fringes of life. He sang of the greyness of the world; of his mistress who was coy, who was cruel; of his heart which was light, which ached, which was broken; and so on. When he read aloud snatches of his pretty, facile muse, and his friend asked him if all life was frubbles and whipped cream, if the virtue of matter and manner and high seriousness meant nothing to him, he chirped of artistry, and murmured that "expression, perfect expression," was his goal. And his friend, who had something of the prig and the preacher in him, said: "Go your way till you find your way," and then acted as "best man" at his wedding. He also sent him this on his wedding morn: "All that has value to man—the eternal, the self-existent—is contained in man himself, and has to develop from himself."

The youth was just the average selfish young animal, but the child, the Idealist in him, had not quite died. The delightful indulgence of being in love had interested him hugely. He passed through all the stages—astonishment (as if he were a chemist, and had discovered a new element), bliss, sentiment, jealousy, devotion, anger, indifference, neglect, moodiness, and injured vanity. In time the little clash of nature against nature began to sound louder, his wife proffered an individuality that bent less and less, and the new feelings that the intercourse had evoked ceased to bow and scrape to his vanity. He felt himself ill-used, and self-pity stalked with him. Emotional self-indulgence, which so often masquerades as love, was flickering, and it seemed as if his unawakened soul was to be written off as another failure. But it was not to be. He was to make joy in heaven. And the new birth was to come about through the agency of—you will never guess!—of Hegel.

He told me about it long afterwards ("a thing was secretly brought to me, and my ear received a little thereof"), when happiness no longer caught him in gusts, but went like a deep river through his days. "I had come to the end," he said, "to the precipice, when one day, by the merest chance, I picked up a volume of Hegel, his Philosophy of Religion, and there read this: 'If love is to be pure, it must first renounce selfishness, it must have freed itself, and Spirit is only freed when it has come outside of itself.' I read, and was inspired to a forlorn hope. I tried it that very day, soothing my vanity by saying 'it is only an experiment.' I drove certain sentences into my brain, and hugged them there. I kept saying: 'Ask nothing for yourself.' 'No love is worth anything which does not desire the happiness of the beloved above one's own.' I tried it as an experiment that day, and words cannot tell the strange, unimaginable pleasure that came to me. And other days followed, and other days, and I stumbled on, and my kite became the arch of heaven."

He is no longer a Minor Poet.

The Sciolist.

SHE was eighteen and pretty. It was her first dinner party, and mine was the privilege of being her cavalier. Nature and her mother had done much for her, but the wise world had given nothing. Faith! there had not been time. She was not content to be her own young, charming self, "half vegetable, half lamb," but, for some inscrutable, feminine reason, must try to speak as the foolish women of the world speak, must emulate the surface manner of those of her elders who pretend to toss the ball of conversation to and fro, never catching it. Knowing that I was by way of being "literary," even as we crossed the threshold of the dining-room she said: "Of course, you have read An Englishwoman's Love-Letters!" "Not! why you are behind the times." "The world goes so quickly!" I pleaded. "I know I should have read it, and I did get hold of a copy, but somebody borrowed it." "Ah!" she said with a bright look, "why don't you follow Shakespeare's advice, 'Neither a borrower nor a lender be.'"

I ate my soup in silence. Heaven knows I didn't want to talk "literature," but I had been to see "Henry V." the night before, and somehow I was tempted to remark that I had felt a lump in the throat at the St. Crispian speech. But I added: "Why one should want to cry at such simple words as—

We few, we happy few, we band of brothers, amazes me." Her comment came pat as the closing of a cab door. The most pathetic passage in literature is "Et tu, Brute," after that I should place Dante's "In la sua volontade è nostra pace." I helped myself to a wing of something, smiled indifferently well, and waited for her next remark. "Of course you have read Ad Astra," she said. "I gave away three copies at Christmas time owing to the advertisements, but I don't think it's as good as In Memoriam, do you?" Then I said: "May I tell you a little story?" "Oh, do!" she cried. "A little while ago I was travelling from Paris to Marseilles, and opposite me was a little chubby schoolboy, who spelled through Punch, struggled with a magazine, and tried so hard to be a man. He refused the orange I offered him, sat bolt upright and talked to his neighbour about agriculture. In the middle of the night I awoke from sleep to see him draw a card furtively from his pocket, and examine it, with flushed cheeks, from behind the pages of the magazine. It was the football match card of his school, and, under cover of the darkness, he was counting up the goals once more."

My pretty companion was silent after that, but when the hostess gave the signal to rise she gathered her skirts in her hand, and whispered: "I think I know what you mean. Now I'll tell you something: I'd much rather read Mrs. L. T. Meade than Dante."

French Nursery Verse.

THE literary worship of the child has grown to dimensions against which some of us protest. He has, to our thinking, been somewhat too prominently and persistently set in the midst. If any one nation be responsible for the inauguration of his tyranny, it is surely France and Victor Hugo. Therefore it is interesting to see what France can do in the way of an anthology for children, and to compare it with the similar collections which we have in profusion. Such an opportunity is afforded by M. Bernard Minssen's Book of French Song for the Young, issued not long ago by Mr. J. M. Dent. The author is assistant master at Harrow; and one surmises at once, from his English title and preface, that the anthology is designed for English children. At the outset one notices a very principal distinction. It contains little poetry for the young properly so called; little like R. L. S.'s Child's Garden, for example. And the author frankly confesses that such poetry practically does not exist in France:

Too often (he says) books which claim to be written especially for children are merely childish. Poets of their own they have none, or very few. Many delightful things have, of course, been written by French poets about children, but very few for children. . . . As a rule, a French boy is only introduced to poetry by school books, and then it is not really poetry for the young.

It is, in fact, "improving" verse, which we know to be an abomination.

Another distinction, not present in this book, is the lachrymose strain of verse placed in children's hands—indeed (the author admits), of French lyrics generally. The incomprehensible thing to an English mind is that French boys—actual boys—relish them. "I remember," says M. Minssen, "a small French boy of my acquaintance spending his half-holidays, for choice, in reading with streaming cheeks the woful and sentimental poem of 'Le Petit Savoyard.'" We ourselves had a French school-fellow who lamented the inferior pathos of English stories as compared with those of France. "They would make you cry," he said, with a convinced delight which non-plussed us. But M. Minssen can justly claim that his book is, at any rate, cheerful.

The collection, from what we have said, is of necessity for the most part one of "grown-up" poems which are within children's capacity and sympathy. Much, too, must be allowed for the small scale of the book—the author carefully warns us it is by no means exhaustive. But when we compare it, say, with Mr. E. V. Lucas's Book of Verses for Children we are struck at once by its lesser variety, robustness—life, in fact. There is a large preponderance of descriptive poems, which are unloved by the English boy, no matter how excellent—and nothing could be terser, more direct, than these. Where is the note of action and open air which blows through Mr.

Lucas's book? In these admirably finished pieces of country life and scenery you feel the air does not get between the lines.

Yet it is a pity that French poets have not written for the young. One great advantage the French tongue possesses, in a power of infantile simplicity unmatched by English: it babbles delightfully, as anyone acquainted with old French poetry knows. And some of the few pieces meant directly for the young in this book show that modern French has still the power, or the potentiality of the power, though but one or two poems have quite captured it. The best of these is Paul Verlaine's "Dame Souris." It is impossible to give in English the finished sweetness of its prattle; but, so far as the untranslatable can be translated, we have made the attempt. Here it is:

Mistress Mousie patters,
Night-black in the grey twilight,
Mistress Mousie patters,
Grey in the night.

Ding-dong, the bell tolls,
By-by, in blanket-gaol who lie!
Ding-dong, the bell tolls,
You must go by-by.

Storm is passing over,
Dusk as in an oven is deep.
Storm is passing over,
See! the morning's peep.

Mistress Mousie patters,
In the blue light rosy-red;
Mistress Mousie patters:
Up, slug-abad!

Another example of naïveté belongs to a different order. It is one of the popular songs which are scattered sparsely through the book, and though the language is modern, the form and spirit suggest the old ballad sufficiently, we think, to justify us in employing the ballad style in the following version of it. It is, moreover, the only way we can suggest the child-like quality of Le Pont du Nord:

'Twas on the Pont du Nord
That a ball there was begun.
And Adèle asks her mother
If there she may make one.
"It's nay, it's nay, my daughter,
To the dance you shall not be gone."
She mounted to her chamber,
And let the tears down run.
O who came but her brother,
In his boat with gold o'erdone.
"My sister, my sister,
Why let the tears down run?"
"My mother will not let me
To dance at the ball be gone."
"Put on, put on your white robe,
And your golden band gird on."
She had not made but three turns,
When in the waters run.
Then up and asked her mother
Why the bells to toll begun.
"O it is for your Adèle,
But and your eldest son."
Now see ye what ill chances
The wilful weans must run!

The popular songs are of varying kind and merit; some simple and pleasantly pretty, others within measurable distance of the nursery rhyme. But the nursery rhyme, which in one form or another plays a fair part in Mr. Lucas's book, is almost absent from this French anthology, for the same reason which abbreviated the famous chapter on snakes in Iceland. There are few French nursery rhymes, for there is no French nursery. "French children," says M. Minssen, "do not live apart with their nurse. They live with their parents, visit the same friends, keep the same late hours, sit down to dinner with them (instead of being sent to bed), eat the same food, and read the same books, or at least some of them." The true nursery rhymes in his anthology seem to be mostly associated with games, and can hardly be translated. But some of the livelier popular songs (as we said) verge on the nursery rhyme. They are "patter," and tend to close rhymes, which increase the difficulty of an English version. Take a few lines from Biron, for example :

Quand Biron voulut danser
Son violon fit apporter,
Son violon,
Son basson,
Son épée
Affilé, &c.

Yet we may offer a version pour servir of the lively jingle

When Biron to dance would choose,
He must have them bring his shoes,
His round shoes to put on.
Now dance away, Biron !

When Biron the dance would 'gin,
They must bring his violin

All in tune,
His bassoon,
And his sword
On to cord,
His hat crooked
And pendant-nooked,
With his cuffs
Of well-made stuffs,
And his breech
Of modish stitch,
Vest fit for buck
Spangle-stuck,
Coat with fur
Of minever,
His perruque
A la turque,

His round shoes to put on,
Now dance away, Biron !

One wonders whether children, either English or French, will appreciate the dainty snatches of lyrical fancy which are scattered among those too numerous descriptive poems of which we have spoken. Will they savour Théophile Gautier's charming "Barcarolle," so well known to their elders by Gounod's exquisite setting? Or will they be captured by this gossamer twist of Hugo's, which we are criminal enough to pass through the coarse loom of translation?

THE FLOWER AND THE BUTTERFLY.

The flower bespake the butterfly, the gad-about so airy :

"Flee not so !

Behold thou how our destinies are different : I tarry,
Thou dost go.

"And yet we love each other, live without men, and afar
Them refrain :

And we are like each other, and some say that we are Blossoms twain.

"But thee, alas ! the air off-wafts, on me the earth-bond lies,

Cruelty !

I would that with my breathing thy flight I could enspice
In the sky.

"But, no, thou go'st too far ! Among uncounted flowers adrift,

And I, I bide here lonely, to watch my shadow shift
At my feet.

Thou fliest, then returnest, then thou go'st again to blaze
Otherwheres.

"So dost thou find me ever, in the auroral rays,
All in tears !
King of me !

Do thou like me take root, or do thou give me pinions
Like to thee !"

It will be gathered that for the adult, at any rate, this book is a "paradise of dainty devices." Indeed, compared with Mr. Lucas's book, there is a notably higher artistic level. This arises partly, no doubt, from the wider net Mr. Lucas has cast. And there is one final distinction to be noted : here there is nothing kindred to the delightful fun of Lewis Carroll, Edward Lear, and other votaries of the Muse of Nonsense. Some humour there is, but sparsely, and of much thinner quality—vin ordinaire to Veuve Clicquot. One poem there is, by Dionys Ordinaire, "The Sun of Picardy," in the original a charming blend of humour and poetry, which we translate :

No sun smiles on them, no blue sky
Is there abroad :
How do the folk of Picardy
Believe in God ?

Up there a lantern of white paper
Is all one sees,
Which in the sullied sky will caper
At the least breeze.

The sun of England is their fate too,
Apollo stoops
From heaven to ripen a potato,
Or row of hops.

O splendours, grandeurs that abound
In flat countries !
The fogs in silence crawl around
The cabbages.

Between the beetroot-fields the while,
And the wheat-ways,
The Somme, in grave and tranquil style,
Slumberous strays.

"Alas ! I'm so cold," the earth sighs ;
The Sun, his peepy
Eye with a wink half-closed, replies :
"And I'm so sleepy !"

Doubtful star, luminary dun,
Where thy beams dwell
It seems the twinkle of the moon
Down in a well.

Thou only art the Dromio base
Of that sun good,
Who urges in the vine the chase
O' the vermillion blood,

Froths the young autumns in the vats,
To sparkles stirs
The great dark eyes beneath the hats
Of vintagers.

But the humour of this will rather be tasted by adults than youngsters. And while an anthology of this kind should, we hope, give every child a taste for the poetry of France ; for fun—rich, and three inches on the ribs—he must come back with gratified patriotism to England.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. BOURGET's new book, Le Fantôme, is his most serious study in psychology since Le Disciple. It is delicate work, done with a singular reserve. The subject is not one to please the average reader, for there is nothing on earth the average reader more dislikes than an abnormal situation. But then the suffrage of that airy individual was certainly not in the mind of M. Bourget when he planned this book—novel, I cannot in all conscience call it, for it bears more resemblance to a casuistical treatise than to a story. In a world where abnormal situations are far more frequent than the easy-going bourgeois will admit, it were idle and stupid to limit the observation and study of the novelist, and, given the circumstance of the hero's painful marriage with the daughter of a dead and still loved mistress, nothing could be abler, more discreet, more conscience-weighted than M. Bourget's ruthless investigation of its moral results. The contrast between the morbid young man and the chivalrous and magnanimous old man, who both so deeply loved the dead woman, is both fine and effective, and the book leaves a lasting impression of hopelessness, irremediable suffering.

Among recent serious publications is M. d'Haussonville's second volume of The Duchesse de Bourgogne. It lacks the charm of the first volume, because in that we had the delightful picture of a mighty and aged monarch and a brilliant Court existing, one might almost say, for the pleasure of one little girl. The child's whims and petulance, her infant shoulders so quaintly weighted with brocades and Court mantles, the figure of her boy-betrothed, made a charming study, which M. d'Haussonville treated with freshness and grace. But the piquancy of the spoiled child is lost in the second volume, and our only wonder is how any little girl was allowed to grow up in such an outrageous manner. In the shade of that pink of prim and enigmatic propriety, Mme. de Maintenon, this infant monster, the future Queen of France, was, in some respects, not many degrees removed from a savage. Madame complains, with justice—though it is easy to see that M. d'Haussonville disapproves of her harsh judgment of the Court pet—that she eats abominably, dipping her fingers in sauces, and tearing meat and fowl with fingers and teeth; that during the Royal dinner she mounts on her chair, shrieking and singing and dancing, and everybody about her finds her most engaging and witty and amusing. Then at fifteen she is a confirmed gambler, Louis XIV. and Mme. de Maintenon at repeated intervals being obliged to pay her gambling debts. It has been said that if the Duke of Bourgogne had not died the Revolution never would have taken place. These sort of statements are easy enough to-day, since there is nothing to prove them right or wrong; but if we are to believe that the vices of Louis XV. hurried on that fatal and inevitable event, there were not, of a surety, brains enough between the bigoted and most virtuous Duke of Bourgogne and his volatile, gambling, pleasure-loving duchess to save a throne tottering to an increasing unpopularity. That model trainer of youth, that glorified pedagogue, Mme. de Maintenon, to secure the young princess's affection made a holocaust of all her principles in the child's regard, and allowed her to grow up with no ideal of duty or responsibility, breathing an atmosphere of malarious excitement, living solely for play and pleasure, borne through the hours at a feverish rate upon the wings of selfish caprice; lovable enough, no doubt, as a pretty, petulant, impulsive girl may be, but without any trace of dignity or nobility in her character. Her delicacy and appreciation of her husband's admirable fidelity to her will be valued by the following anecdote faithfully and not at all disapprovingly recorded by M. d'Haussonville, who is one of her worshippers. She persuaded one of her handsomest ladies of honour to undress and take her place in bed; then she sent word to the prince that it was time for him to come to bed. The prince, who was studious and absent-minded, obeyed her, undressed and went to bed, at which moment the princess rushed from behind curtains, and made a feint at upbraiding him for his scandalous conduct. The entire scene has a touch of singularly low farce. The prince beats the lady of honour and drives her out of the room with his slipper, using language to her not fit for modern ears, not even giving her time to collect her clothes, while the princess holds her sides laughing. The most touching thing in this fragment of French history is the deep and unrequited love of the unhappy Duke of Bourgogne for his faithless and fascinating wife. The letters he writes from the camp to Mme. de Montgon are really charming and quaint: full of tenderness and love and pain. They are a long cry against his wife's intolerable silence, a cry the more lamentable because of the little touch of gaiety that goes with it. "As for that wicked one I spoke of, tell her if henceforth she doesn't write oftener I'll break off with her, and vow

I won't write her another letter during the rest of the campaign. Postscriptum.—I fear me greatly these threats will be of no avail, for I should most certainly be more punished than she." In spite of his great love for her, his unwearied tenderness, and a fidelity unique in such times and at such a Court, his character had much to do with the frailties of his light-minded wife. He was too serious, too pious, too austere, though at one period of his life he is charged with an excessive love of the wine-cup, and then he was slightly deformed, while around him were handsome and well-made gallants ready enough to dispute his wife's smiles. For her sake he dipped into verse—not with glory, however; but, as he touchingly sung: "If I loved you less, I would hymn you better." His sense of duty was as intense as this sense was lacking in her, and an impromptu of his to her runs:

Draco, cequ'etre esclave est bien doux
Quand c'est du devoir et de vous.

The Parisian lion of the hour continues to be Björnstjerne Björnson, whose play, "Au-dessus des Forces Humaines," is still being played at the Nouveau Théâtre.

H. L.

Correspondence.

The Dilemma.

SIR,—Mr. Andrew Lang, in the Pilot of the 9th March, tells us that your review of The Encyclopedia Biblica, Vol. II., suggested to him that facts not specially collected to support a theory may be ruinous to the same theory when applied at second hand; and that your reviewer is "fluttered" by what he reads in the volume in question. Into the rest of his article, which suggests a doubt whether he did me the honour to read the review to the end, I will not go in detail; but the gist of it appears to be that the conclusions of the Higher Criticism are so indefinite and contradictory that the Church of England can safely ignore them.

It is against this policy of silence, which there is some reason to suppose is official, that my review protested. Contradictory though they may be in some points, the conclusions of the Higher Criticism are not indefinite. The gravamen of the whole matter seems to be the assertion of Prof. Schmiedel before quoted, to the effect that the only absolutely credible passages in the Gospels prove the Founder of Christianity to have been a completely human being, in whom the Divine is to be sought only in the form in which it is capable of being found in a man. Whether this assertion is supported by sufficient proof or not, I do not propose here to inquire; but I think it is plain that the Church that allows such a statement first to be put forward under the auspices of her own dignitaries, and then to pass without challenge, will be considered by most of us to have formally abandoned her belief in Trinitarian Christianity.

The issue with regard to the credibility of the Canonical Scriptures, though most people will consider it of less importance, is quite as definite. Whether books like Esther and the Song of Solomon were rightly included in the Canon is in itself but a very small matter. But the Church of England not only declares, in her Articles, her belief in their canonicity, but exacts from her ministers at ordination the assertion of their belief in all the Canonical Books. It therefore seems to me that she must choose between rejecting the conclusions put forward by some of her own officers and altering in toto her own formularies. This, and not the conclusions of the Higher Criticism, is the dilemma she has to face.—I am, &c.,

YOUR REVIEWER.

Adonis's Garden.

SIR,—Mr. Albert R. Frey, the secretary of the New York Shakespeare Society, has this moment come to me with a copy of your valued issue of February 2, containing Mr. Stronach's letter, exclaiming: "Here is that old question about Adonis's Garden once more!" (His allusion was to an extremely protracted meeting of the New York Shakespeare Society some seven years ago, in which we debated these "gardens" well into the small hours without result, except that a respectable contingent of us waived the Baconian theory in our faces as the only possible solution of this and a thousand other similar "posers"! Warning you, therefore (if I am not taking too great a liberty),—I am, &c., APPLETON MORGAN.

The National Arts Club, New York, Nos. 37 and 39 West 34th Street: March 2, 1901.

Last Year's Books.

SIR,—In your review of the Catalogue of English Books for 1900 you give me the credit of having issued "five new novels last year." This is not quite correct. During 1900 I wrote two books only—In White Raiment and Wiles of the Wicked. These were both issued, together with a third book, Of Royal Blood, written in 1898, and published in Chambers's Journal in 1899. The other two books were probably sixpenny reprints.—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

Villa Teresa, Ardenza, Livorno, Italy.

That Rose Bush.

SIR,—In "The Literary Week" of March 9, you refer to "the rose brought by Mr. W. Simpson from Naishapur, and planted at FitzGerald's grave at Boulge." The rose-tree at the head of FitzGerald's grave was not brought from Naishapur, but was grown at Kew from seeds brought from Persia. You may be interested to know that when I saw it in August last it was alive and flourishing.—I am, &c.,

F. WYNN HELTINGS.

[We knew the facts; our words should have been more precise.]

A Much-Neglected Novelist.

SIR,—It is consoling to admirers of Bulwer Lytton's novels to find that there are authorities on matters literary who will say a good word for him. The "Bookworm's" remark on Lytton in your current issue has much truth in it: "It is fashionable to sneer at Bulwer, but the sneering is generally done by those who are blissfully ignorant of his best work."

Some of his early work is poor, and called forth the harsh criticisms of Thackeray and Dickens. But surely his later novels, such as The Caxtons, My Novel, Kenelm Chillingly, have a high place among nineteenth century fiction. At any rate, no one ought to decry Lytton until they have read these books.—I am, &c.,

H. P. WRIGHT.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 77 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best verses descriptive and imitative of the sound of a band of music advancing down a street. Only fourteen readers have attempted the rendering, and of these only three or four have achieved merit. We think that the winning contribution is distinctly clever, though rather superficial. It is sent in by Miss Edith Rickert, 3, Great James-street, W.C., to whom a cheque has been forwarded. Her lines are as follows:

THE PASSING OF THE BAND.

A lone, deep drone
Thrummeth a resonant monotone.
Up soareth the horn with an undulant flare,
That dies—is re-born—just a flash of an air,
Through the rumble of drums, as their throbbing beat
Sends a rhythmic pulse down the winding street.
Then a streaming pennant of sound is out-flung,
Flamboyant from wall to wall is swung.
Near—and more near—the harmonies clear
Build skyward a ponderous tower, then sheer
It breaks in a clarion crash of sounds,
An ululant tumult, that bounds and rebounds:
A voluminous groan
From the blaring trombone;
And a clangour of brass
As the cymbals pass;
Then the drum's lone boom, as the melodies fly
Forward—and waver—and faint—and die
Into murmur amphoric,
Sweet-blending, choric,
To a far-away swell,
Till at last they mell
In a note long-drawn—
Are gone—on—on.

This is pleasant:

Under Italian sky,
"Down in a city" bright,
Browning's "Person of quality" hears
Rhythmical din of delight;
"Bang-whang-whang, goes the drum,
Tootle-te-tootle the fife.
Oh, a day in the city square,
There is no such pleasure in life!"
Up in a villainous London slum,
Perched in an attic high,
One who once was an officer brave,
Watches the band go by!
Thud, thud, thud, through the mud,
"Come, come, come," says the drum;
"Duty," answers the fife;
"Duty and beauty and booty of strife,"
Clash, flash,
Plain, through the brain of old Jack Dash!

[R. F. MoC., Whitby.]

And this:

Hark! From afar they come!
A faint and distant strain!
Far sounds of fife and drum
That rise, and fall again.

Now, louder on the air
Peals forth that music sweet.
The trumpet's brazen blare—
The tramp of many feet.

They come. A crash of drum!
The strain in volume swells,
It drowns the City's hum,
And all the clanging bells

They pass, amid the roar
Of voices. Deafening sound,
That shakes the houses hoar,
And all the walls around!

They pass! Each moment grows
More faint that music sweet;
Again, the old repose!—
Again, the drowsy street!

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

Competition No. 78 (New Series).

IN these days literary reputations are reconsidered with some severity. This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best original heterodox literary judgment on some established book or author. Limit, 250 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, March 20. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW LIST.

Ready early in April. In 1 vol. large crown 8vo, Illustrated with numerous Portraits. Price 7s. 6d. net.

THE MAN in the IRON MASK. By TIGHE HOPKINS, Author of "An Idler in Old France," &c.

Now Ready. In 1 vol. demy 8vo, with numerous Illustrations and Portrait of Author. Price 10s. 6d. net.

PAGES from the JOURNAL of a QUEENSLAND SQUATTER. By OSCAR DE SATGE, who has been intimately connected with the Colony since 1854.

Now Ready. In 1 vol. demy 8vo, with upwards of 250 Illustrations from Drawings and Photographs. Price 16s. net.

RIDING and HUNTING. By Captain M. HORACE HAYES, F.R.C.V.S., Author of "Stable Management and Exercise," "Points of the Horse," "Veterinary Notes," &c.

Now Ready, in 1 vol. crown 4to.

Fully Illustrated by Drawings by A. D. McCORMICK (from Sketches made by E. S. GROGAN), Original Drawings by E. S. GROGAN, Photographs and Photogravure Portraits of the Authors, Maps, &c. Price One Guinea net.

FROM the CAPE to CAIRO, the First Traverse of Africa from South to North. By EWART S. GROGAN and ARTHUR H. SHARP. With Introductory Letter from the Right Hon. CECIL RHODES.

Now Ready. In 1 vol. demy 8vo. Price 12s. net.

STABLE MANAGEMENT and EXERCISE. A Book for Horse Owners and Students. By Captain M. HORACE HAYES, F.R.C.V.S. Illustrated by numerous Reproductions of Photographs taken specially for this work.

NEW AND POPULAR NOVELS.

HIS OWN FATHER. By W. E. Norris, Author of "My Friend Jim," "Major and Minor," &c. In 1 vol. crown 8vo. Price 3s. 6d. [Ready April 1.]

THE LIFE ROMANTIC, including the LOVE LETTERS of the KING. By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE, Author of "The Quest of the Golden Girl," &c. In 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

AMUSEMENT ONLY. By Richard Marsh, Author of "The Beetle," "The Seen and the Unseen," &c. In 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

THIS BODY of DEATH. By Adeline SERGEANT, Author of "No Saint," "The Story of a Penitent Soul," &c. In 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

CHILDREN of HERMES. By Hume NISBET, Author of "Bail Up," "The Swampers," &c. In 1 vol. crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A SUFFOLK COURTSHIP. By M Betham EDWARDS, Author of "The Lord of the Harvest," "A Storm-rent Sky," &c. In 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW SERIES OF SIXPENNY NOVELS.

AYLWIN.

By THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON. [Ready.]

THE FOOTFALL of FATE.

By Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL. [Ready.]

THE VANISHING of TERA.

By FERGUS HUME. [Ready.]

WHAT a WOMAN WILL DO.

By LUCAS CLEEVE. [Ready.]

MISS KATE.

By "RITA." [Ready in April.]

HURST & BLACKETT, Limited, 13, Great Marlborough Street, W.

J. M. DENT & CO.'S SPRING BOOKS THE WORKING CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.

By the Right Hon. LEONARD H. COURTNEY.

With Photogravure Frontispiece. Large demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"Weighty and authoritative.....No M.P. and no student of the Constitution can neglect a political survey so scholarly and judicial."—Outlook.

AUSTRALASIA:

THE COMMONWEALTH AND NEW ZEALAND.

By A. W. JOSE. With Illustrations and Maps. 1s. net.

"There are many interesting things to read here...The reader who wants to hear about them will find information, admirably given, in this little volume."—Spectator.

* * Particulars of Prof. RAMSAY'S "Modern Chemistry" and other Works in the TEMPLE CYCLOPÆDIC PRIMERS, on application.

A Memoir of the last Minnesinger of Tirol.

OSWALD VON WOLKENSTEIN

By SIGNORA LINDA VILLARI.

With many Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

MASTER MUSICIANS SERIES.

HANDEL.

By C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS, Author of "Bach."

Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations. Square crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Handbooks for Visitors to Italy.—THE MEDIAEVAL TOWN SERIES.

Fcap. 8vo (Pocket size), cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. net; also in limp leather, 4s. 6d. and 5s. 6d. net.

ROME.

By NORWOOD YOUNG.

With over 50 Sketches by Nelly Erichsen, Reproductions, and Maps. Cloth, 4s. 6d.; leather, 5s. 6d. net.

"The outline, the suggestion or reflection, of all that distinguishes travel from sightseeing...Mr. Young has seen everything for himself: he is a thorough modern; his views are fresh and interesting, and in our belief those which will prevail. The book is well illustrated and indexed, and will go into the pocket."—Monthly Review.

FLORENCE By Edmund G. Gardner.

With Sketches by Nelly Erichsen. 4s. 6d. and 5s. 6d. net.

ASSISI. By Lena Duff-Gordon.

With Sketches by Helen James and N. Erichsen. 3s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. net.

PERUGIA. By M. Symonds and L. Duff-Gordon.

With Sketches by Helen James. 3s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. net.

The Alfred Millenary, 1901.

ALFRED THE WEST SAXON.

By DUGALD MACFADYEN, M.A.

With Portraits, Facsimiles, &c. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 4s. 6d. net.

"So completely has the author studied his subject that he has left little to be said by those who may be contemplating other books of the same character...There is a picturesqueness about Mr. Macfadyen's history that makes it pleasant to read."—Observer.

THE TEMPLE CLASSICS.

"PORTABLE GEMS EVERY ONE OF THEM."—Punch.

Photogravure Frontispiece and Bookmark, cloth, 1s. 6d.; leather, 2s. net per vol.

THREE WORKS BY THE LATE F. S. ELLIS.

CAXTON'S GOLDEN LEGEND, or Lives of the Saints. Edited by F. S. ELLIS. Frontispieces by EMILY S. FORD. Seven vols.

THE ROMANCE OF THE ROSE.

Englished by F. S. ELLIS. Frontispieces by ARTHUR ELLIS. Three vols.

CAVENDISH'S THOMAS WOLSEY.

Edited by F. S. ELLIS. Frontispiece Portrait of Wolsey. In One vol.

EMERSON'S ESSAYS. (First Series, 1 vol.; Second Series, and NATURE, 1 vol.) Edited by WALTER JERROLD.

HOLY LIVING and HOLY DYING. (2 vols.: 1 vol.) Edited by A. R. WALLER.

DANTE'S INFERNO. Italian Text and Translations by Dr. CARLYLE. Revised, with Notes and Arguments, by Dr. ORSNER.

An ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE and Special LISTS on application.

J. M. DENT & CO., 29 and 30, Bedford Street, London.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

10th Thousand.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

By JOHN MORLEY.

With Portrait, 8vo, 10s. net. Illustrated Edition, extra crown 8vo, 14s. net.

BOOKS BY MAURICE HEWLETT.

EARTHWORK OUT OF TUSCANY.

Being Impressions and Translations of MAURICE HEWLETT. Third Edition, Revised. Globe 8vo, 5s. [EVERSLEY SERIES.]

Review of the Week.—"Truly delightful Should be read by every lover of Italy."

70,000 copies have been sold of THE FOREST LOVERS.

By MAURICE HEWLETT.

55,000 copies have been sold of RICHARD YEA-AND-NAY.

By MAURICE HEWLETT.

Illustrated Presentation Editions now ready.

58,000 copies have been sold of ELIZABETH AND HER GERMAN GARDEN.

Extra crown 8vo ILLUSTRATED EDITION, white buckram, gilt edges, 8s. 6d. net. ORDINARY EDITION, 6s.

27,000 copies have been sold of THE SOLITARY SUMMER.

By the AUTHOR of "ELIZABETH and her GERMAN GARDEN." Extra crown 8vo, ILLUSTRATED EDITION, white buckram, gilt edges, 8s. 6d. net. ORDINARY EDITION, 6s.

RECENT DISCOVERIES IN CRETE.

NOW READY.—8vo, 10s. 6d.

THE ANNUAL OF THE BRITISH SCHOOL AT ATHENS.

No. VI. SESSION, 1899-1900.

*. The contents include the preliminary reports (1) by Mr. Arthur Evans, on "The Palace at Knossos"; (2) by Mr. D. G. Hogarth, on "The Dictæan Cave." Both are the fullest statements yet published, and are abundantly illustrated.

A NEW NOVEL.

The HERITAGE of UNREST

By GWENDOLEN OVERTON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

*. A very striking Story of the American Frontier during the Indian Troubles in the late Seventies.

NEW ISSUE of the BORDER EDITION of the WAVERLEY NOVELS.

Latest Volume.

OLD MORTALITY.

With 10 Etchings. Crown 8vo, tastefully bound in blue cloth, gilt, 6s.

NEW ISSUE OF THE

WORKS of MARION CRAW- FORD.

Crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d. per volume.

Latest Volume.

MARZIO'S CRUCIFIX.

MRS. HENRY WOOD'S

NOVELS. The New and Cheaper Editions, each Story in 1 vol., crown 8vo, red cloth, price 2s. 6d., or in green cloth, price 2s., may be obtained at all Booksellers, where a Complete List of the Thirty-seven Stories may be seen.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

Some Spring Announcements.

BOOKS OF TRAVEL.

IN TIBET and CHINESE TURKESTAN. Being the Record of Three Years' Exploration. By Captain H. H. P. DEASY. With Appendices, Maps, and 80 Illustrations. Cloth gilt, 21s. net.

FALAIKE. The Story of the Town of the Conqueror. By A. BOWMAN DODD. Illustrated. 7s. 6d.

BOOKS OF HISTORY.

FIFTY YEARS of CATHOLIC LIFE and PROGRESS. By PERCY FITZGERALD. With Photogravure Portraits. Cloth, 2 vols., 21s.

HISTORY of FLORENCE. By Professor PASQUALI VILLARI. Illustrated. Popular Edition. Gilt cloth, 7s. 6d.

THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS and CANADIAN IMPERIALISM. By W. SANFORD EVANS. Illustrated from Photographs, and with Maps. Cloth, 6s.

THE BIOGRAPH in BATTLE. By W. K. L. DICKSON. Second Edition. 100 Illustrations from Biograph Photographs. Cloth, 6s.

THE JEW in LONDON. Second Edition. Cloth gilt, 6s.

BIOGRAPHY.

ANDRÆS VESALIUS. By C. L. TAYLOR. With Frontispiece. (Masters of Medicine Series.) Cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE LIFE of RICHARD COBDEN. By the Right Hon. JOHN MORLEY, M.P. (Reformer's Bookshelf.) 2 vols. Cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

BOOKS ON SCIENCE, &c.

ENGLAND'S NEGLECT of SCIENCE. By Professor PERRY, of the Royal College of Science, South Kensington. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

IN BIRD LAND with the FIELD-GLASS and CAMERA. By OLIVER G. PIKE. With over 80 Photographs. Second Edition. Cloth gilt, 6s.

FICTION.

THE LOST LAND. By JULIA M. CROTTIE. 6s.

THE WIZARD'S KNOT. By WILLIAM BARRY. 6s.

SISTER THERESA. By GEORGE MOORE. 6s.

BLACK MARY. By ALAN MCAULAY. 6s.

BY ROCK and POOL. By LOUIS BECKE. 6s.

SOULS of PASSAGE. By AMELIA E. BARR. 6s.

A JILT's JOURNAL. By RITA. 6s.

AMONG the SYRINGAS. By MARY E. MANN. 6s.

MISTRESS BARBARA CUNLIFFE (The Combers). By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE. 6s.

THE WISDOM of ESAU. By C. H. CHOMLEY and R. M. OUTHWAITE. 6s.

"SARAH, P.Q." By H. SANT MARTIN-LANTON. Second Edition. Cloth gilt, 6s.

NEIGHBOURS. Being Annals of a Dull Town. By JULIA M. CROTTIE. Second Edition. 6s.

A DAUGHTER of PATRICIANS. A Story of Canada. By F. CLIFFORD SMITH. Illustrated. Cloth, 6s.

THE WISDOM of the WISE. A Comedy in Three Acts. By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net; paper covers, 2s. net.

THE AMBASSADOR. A Comedy in Four Acts. By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net; paper covers, 2s. net.

GEORGIE. The Diary of an Observant Boy. By S. E. KISER. Fully Illustrated. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

NAOMI'S EXODUS. A Tale of Ghetto Life. By LILY H. MONTAGU. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

UNWIN'S

POPULAR COPYRIGHT NOVELS.

TESSA and THE TRADER'S WIFE. By LOUIS BECKE.

DESMONDE, M.D. A striking Hypnotic Novel. By HENRY WILLARD FRENCH.

THE ENDING of MY DAY. By RITA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. each.

ANOTHER ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE LETTERS. By BARRY PAINE. Paper, 1s.; cloth, 2s.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN,
Paternoster Square, E.C.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS. (A SELECTION.)

AN ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE LETTERS.

Small crown 8vo, 5s. net.

FIRST EDITION	NOVEMBER, 1900
SECOND IMPRESSION	DECEMBER, 1900
THIRD IMPRESSION	DECEMBER, 1900
FOURTH IMPRESSION	DECEMBER, 1900
FIFTH IMPRESSION	JANUARY, 1901
SIXTH IMPRESSION	JANUARY, 1901
SEVENTH IMPRESSION	FEBRUARY, 1901
EIGHTH IMPRESSION	MARCH, 1901

In consequence of certain statements which have been publicly made, Mr. Murray desires to repeat the following paragraph, which accompanied advertisements of this book, both before and after publication: "The publisher, without holding himself in any way responsible for their authorship, confidently hopes that their special characteristics will be considered fully to justify their publication."

THE LIFE and CORRESPONDENCE of the Rt. Hon. HUGH CULLING EARDLEY CHILDERS. By his Son, Lieut.-Col. SPENCER CHILDERS, R.E., C.B. With numerous Portraits and Illustrations. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 23s.

OUR NAVAL HEROES. By Various

WRITERS. Edited by G. E. MARINDIN, M.A. With a Preface by Rear-Admiral Lord CHARLES BERESFORD. Containing Short Lives of Twenty of our most Famous Admirals, related in nearly every case by one of their Descendants, and when possible by the Head of the Family. With Photogravure of Lord Nelson, and Half-tone Portraits of the other Admirals. Demy 8vo, 16s.

"Well conceived and well-executed volume."
Globe.
"One of great interest and value."—Literature.

SHIFTING SCENES: Recollections of Many Men in Many Lands. By the Right Hon. Sir EDWARD MALET, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., sometime H.B.M. Ambassador to Germany. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"A clever, genial, and amusing book."—Standard.
"The book throughout is a masterpiece of genial autobiography."—Literature.

Two Books of Interest to Travellers in Italy, and Students of Art.

THE PAINTERS of FLORENCE.

From the Thirteenth to the Sixteenth Century. By JULIA CARTWRIGHT (Mrs. ADR). With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE FRESCOES in the SIXTINE

CHAPEL in ROME. By (Miss) EVELYN MARCH PHILLIPS. With 24 Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

The Complete Authoritative Edition of GEORGE BORNOW'S WORKS.

Large crown 8vo, 6s. each.

TWO NEW VOLUMES.

THE GYPSIES of SPAIN: their

Manners, Customs, Religion, and Language. With a Photogravure and 8 Full-Page Illustrations, by A. WALLIS MILLS.

WILD WALES. With a Photo- gravure and 12 Illustrations by A. S. HARTBECK.

MR. MURRAY'S MUSICAL SERIES.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net each.

NEW VOLUME.—Ready next week.

THE OPERA. PAST and PRESENT:

an Historical Sketch. By WILLIAM FOSTER APHORP, Author of "Musicians and Music Lovers," &c. With Portraits.

A New Work by the Rev. Charles Gore, M.A., D.D., Canon of Westminster.

THE BODY of CHRIST: an Inquiry into the Institution and Doctrine of the Holy Communion. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

The Academy

Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1507. Established 1869.

23 March, 1901.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THIS week, following our usual custom, we print lists of the books announced by the important publishing houses for publication this spring.

WE hear of two editions of the complete works of Count Tolstoy. One is announced definitely by Mr. Grant Richards. The other is being planned elsewhere. Possibly, in the end, only one of these editions will see the light.

THE late Mr. Max Müller's autobiography, to which we shall return next week, is, unfortunately, incomplete. It begins with his childhood at Dessau, and ends in the early period of his residence at Oxford. During the last days of his life the autobiography was constantly in his thoughts, and even when lying in bed, far too weak to sit up in a chair, he worked at the MS. with his son. The present instalment contains hints of the interest of the unwritten volumes, had time been given him to write them. For example, it would have been very interesting to read this versatile scholar's account of his discussions with Renan, Froude, Kingsley, and Liddon on the axioms gracefully, but firmly, laid down by him, that "it is truth that makes inspiration not inspiration that makes truth," and "the simple conclusion that revelation can never be objective, but must always be subjective." Max Müller was a real lover of books. Having collected a library of 12,000 volumes during his lifetime, yet he remembered, with sympathy, his acquisition of the first.

One book I still possess which he [my father] bought for me, and which was to be the first book of my library. It was a small volume of Horace, printed by Pickering in 1820. It has now almost vanished among the 12,000 big volumes that form my library, but I am delighted that I am still able, at seventy-six, to read it without spectacles. I think I remember my father taking my sister and me on his knees, and telling us the most delightful stories, that set us wondering, and laughing, and crying till we could laugh and cry no longer. He had been a fellow-worker with the brothers Grimm, and the stories he told were mostly from their collection, though he knew how to embellish them with anything that could make a child cry and laugh.

APROPPOS of our note last week on the demand for Byron first editions, a correspondent who knows writes: "Yes, Byrons are decidedly rising in value, as collectors are beginning to learn. So are FitzGerald's. At the Sotheby sale, in which Polonius fetched £11 10s., the Six Dramas from Calderon sold for £14, and The Mighty Magician for £30 10s. All these were presentation copies to T. Churchyard, the lawyer of Woodbridge. I thought the last was a record price, but an American friend has since sent me a cutting from a New York paper, from which it appears that, at a sale at Bangs's auction rooms in that city, on February 13, a copy of the first edition of the Rubinydt (1859) sold for $260, or, say, £52. It was, of course, in immaculate condition, with edges entirely uncut—and, indeed, unopened."

ALL who know the Edinburgh Stevenson admire its bold, clean page and distinguished type—a positive invitation to read slowly and wisely. We are glad to hear that a similar service is to be done for Sir Walter Scott by Messrs. Jack, of Edinburgh. The edition will be in forty-eight volumes, uniform in every respect, except binding, with the Edinburgh Stevenson. It will be illustrated by twenty authentic portraits of Sir Walter, portraits of the prototypes of some of the best-known characters in the novels, and of the historical personages therein portrayed. The edition will be limited (Why?) to 1,000 copies.

The Complete Works of Cervantes, under the editorship of Mr. J. Fitzmaurice Kelly, are announced by Messrs. Gowers & Gray. The edition, which will be welcome, could not be in better hands. From the same publishers we have received the fourth volume (the "get-up" is not very attractive) of Keats's works. It includes his correspondence from 1814 to 1819. The Letters to Fanny Brawne will be printed in a later volume. Mr. Buxton Forman, in his preface, has this to say about Keats as a letter-writer:

If to be true, interesting, attractive, witty, humorous, idealistic, realistic, speculative, discursive, and gossipy in turns is the note of a good letter-writer, then, indeed, Keats was one. If to tell one's friends just what they want to know about one's doings and thoughts, and about the doings and thoughts of mutual friends, is to be a good letter-writer—that is where Keats, of all men of genius in the last century, excelled. If consideration for the feelings of others in the manner and degree of communicating misfortunes or disagreeables be an epistolary virtue, Keats was largely endowed with that virtue. If to present a true picture of the essential qualities of one's personality is a valuable art, Keats manifested that art in a high form in his letters. And if, when wrung by disease and misery, it is better to leave some record for a pitying posterity than to carry a ghastly secret into the oblivion of the grave, then in this also Keats exceeded others who have made the world richer with their letters.

WE have not heard much lately about Lady Murray's home in the Riviera for ill and distressed authors, but particulars are published of the home for unfortunate authors and artists to be built from the generosity of the late Sir William Fraser, of Edinburgh, who left £25,000 for that purpose. The site chosen is Colinton, about three miles from Edinburgh. C. K. S. in the Sphere prints the following description which he has received from a correspondent:

There are to be twelve houses and an administrative block, forming three sides of a square, a terrace walk outside the doors protected by a stone balustrade and approached from the lower level of the central court by means of stairs. At each end of the terrace are two belvederes with lead roofs, which form an ornamental feature of the design. The houses have dormer windows, towers in the angles, and other pictorial features, while internally they are finished in a correspondingly tasteful manner. The houses are small, varying in size from two to four rooms, with necessary kitchen and sanitary accommodation.

MR. WILLIAM ARCHER'S "Real Conversations" in the Pall Mall Magazine are very welcome. This month he records a conversation with Mr. Thomas Hardy at the novelist's home "near Casterbridge." T. H. is "discovered before a smouldering fire of elm logs." The talk turns on Wessex, Spooks, War, and Criticism. It is real in the sense that it is a true give-and-take talk between friends; it is not a one-sided "interview." Mr. Hardy incidentally meets a number of criticisms with which from time to time he is assailed. There is his pessimism, for instance. On this he says:

People call me a pessimist; and if it is pessimism to think, with Sophocles, that "not to have been born is best," then I do not reject the designation. I never could understand why the word "pessimism" should be such a red rag to many worthy people; and I believe, indeed, that a good deal of the robustious, swaggering optimism of recent literature is at bottom cowardly and insincere. I do not see that we are likely to improve the world by asseverating, however loudly, that black is white, or at least that black is but a necessary contrast and foil, without which white would be white no longer. That is mere juggling with a metaphor. But my pessimism, if pessimism it be, does not involve the assumption that the world is going to the dogs, and that Ahri-man is winning all along the line. On the contrary, my practical philosophy is distinctly meliorist. What are my books but one plea against "man's inhumanity to man"—to woman—and to the lower animals? (By the way, my opposition to "sport" is the one point on which I am at all in conflict with my neighbours hereabouts.) Whatever may be the inherent good or evil of life, it is certain that men make it much worse than it need be. When we have got rid of a thousand remediable ills, it will be time enough to determine whether the ill that is irremediable outweighs the good.

On the question of signed criticism there is an interesting passage. Mr. Archer asks Mr. Hardy whether he does not approve the way in which signed criticism is gradually crushing the old anonymous review?

Mr. Hardy: I think the rule ought to be that favourable criticisms may be unsigned, but that the critic should be bound to take the responsibility of an unfavourable judgment. There should be no stabbing in the dark. Not that I, personally, have any wish to complain of criticism, signed or unsigned.

W. A.: It seems to me that reviewing, as a whole, is becoming more conscientious, if not more competent.

Mr. Hardy: I remember a case in which a critic seemed to me to carry conscientiousness to an inconvenient pitch. Writing of my Wessex Poems, this gentleman said that when he first read the book he thought it rather good, but, being determined not to be taken in, and to be conscientious at all hazards, he made a point of getting up to re-read it on a wet morning before breakfast, and then found that it was worth very little. That seemed to me an excessive devotion to critical duty.

THE Speaker has a clever writer on its staff who signs his articles with the initials "G. K. C." Last week "G. K. C." had a brilliant and rather paradoxical article in defence of the Penny Dreadful. We have before now expressed our conviction that a great deal of nonsense is talked about the "corrupting" influence of Penny Dreadfuls. "G. K. C." evidently thinks this nonsense is not only plentiful, but clotted. As for the Penny Dreadful's crudity, it supplies the demand not for art, which is a luxury, but for fiction, which is a necessity. "The simple need for some kind of ideal world in which fictitious persons play an unhampered part is infinitely deeper and older than the rules of good art, and much more important." Nor will "G. K. C." allow that Penny Dreadful literature is especially plebeian. "It is simply human. The philanthropist can never forget classes and callings. He says, with a modest swagger: 'I have invited twenty-five factory hands to tea.' If he said: 'I have invited twenty-five chartered accountants to tea,' everyone would see the humour of so simple a classification. But this is what we have done with this lumberland of foolish writing: we have probed as if it were some monstrous new disease what is, in fact, nothing but the foolish and valiant heart of man." Finally it is contended that the writers and publishers of books of the Dick Deadshot type have more real right to upbraid the educated classes than we have to upbraid them. "With a hypocrisy so ludicrous as to be almost unparalleled in history, we rate the gutter-boys for their immorality at the very time that we are discussing (with equivocal German professors) whether morality is valid at all. At the very instant that we curse the Penny Dreadful for encouraging thefts upon property, we canvass the proposition that all property is theft. At the very instant that we accuse it (quite unjustly) of lubricity and indecency, we are cheerfully reading philosophies which glory in lubricity and indecency. At the very instant that we charge it with encouraging the young to destroy life, we are placidly discussing whether life is worth preserving."

A BOOK with a strenuous purpose is Mr. Gustavus Myers's History of Tammany Hall. It is not surprising to learn that he had considerable difficulty in finding a publisher for it in New York. He tells his readers something of his difficulties:

Two of the best-known firms wrote that they could not encourage me to submit the MS. to them for consideration. Four others considered the publication "inadvisable," though their readers had returned favourable recommendations. One other declined it without giving reasons. More recently, when the offer of certain responsible persons who had read the MS. to guarantee the expense of its publication was made to a certain house, the firm replied: "... We should hardly feel warranted in locking horns with Tammany Hall. . . ."

Certainly a struggle with Tammany Hall conceived as "locking horns" might well appal a publisher's heart.

MR. W. H. HUDSON, whose monograph on Sir Walter Scott we reviewed a few weeks ago, writes to correct our assumption that he is an American. On the contrary, Mr. Hudson is an Englishman, although he has for some years held a professorship at Stanford University, California.

MR. W. S. LILLY's second article on Landor, in the Pilot, deals with Landor's work in pure literature. It is an interesting estimate, though of course there is nothing new or even recent in Mr. Lilly's main contention that Landor's genius, as shown in the Imaginary Conversations, is neither creative nor historic. Coming to Landor's poetry, it is in his short pieces that Mr. Lilly finds most delight. He is very fond of this on Catullus:

Tell me not what too well I know
About the Bard of Sirmio;

Yes, in Thalia's son,
Such strains there are as when a Grace
Sprinkles another's laughing face
With nectar, and runs on.

And of this "regal compliment":

Why do I smile? To hear you say,
"One month, and then the shortest day!"
The shortest, whate'er month it be,
Is the bright day you pass with me.

We suppose that most of our readers know the epigram, admired of Mr. Lilly, and by Mr. Colvin pronounced to be Landor's best, on Melville:

God's laws declare
Thou shalt not swear,
By aught in Heaven above or earth below.
"Upon my honour," Melville cries,
He swears and lies.

Does Melville then break God's commandment? No.

Mr. Lilly ends on Landor's exquisite rendering of a passage in Moschus:

Ah! when the mallow in the croft dies down,
Or the pale parsley or the crisped anise,
Again they grow, another year they flourish.
But we, the great, the valiant and the wise,
Once covered over in the hollow earth,
Sleep a long, dreamless, unawakening sleep.

MR. FRANCIS EDWARDS, of High-street, Marylebone, sends us an interesting little catalogue of steel-engraved portraits, many of which are from paintings by Hoppner, Reynolds, Gainsborough, Cosway, Northcote and other famous portrait masters. The subjects include men and women of Letters, naval and military celebrities, Court beauties, actors, singers, &c. We observe portraits of Jane Austen, William Beckford, Lord Byron, Thomas Day, William Hazlitt, Theodore Hook, Lord Lytton, Joe Miller, Swift, and others. The prices appear never to exceed a shilling.

It seems to us that there is a place for a little magazine called the Temperance Critic (Parnell & Co., Southampton-row), the first number of which lies before us. "A Sane Temperance (not Teetotal) Paper" is its description of itself. The aims of the paper may be further divined from this sentence in an article called "Where We Stand": "The old headlong frontal attack on drink and the Trade—magnificent in its earnestness and seriousness of purpose—must be exchanged for movements and dispositions which will assuredly terminate in restricting the Trade to its due sphere." We have been waiting to hear that word from a Temperance organ. The little magazine is very well printed and turned out—its price, twopence.

THE editor of the Thrush proposes not only to print original verse, but also to "secure an adequate recognition of modern poetry" by establishing a society for "the study of living Poets and the cult of modern Poetry." There is a charming naïveté about the circular in which this momentous proposal is set forth. A few detached extracts will suffice:

In various parts of the country honorary secretaries will be appointed, whose duty it will be to form little coteries of students. Small reading parties will meet once a week and enrol members. The work of some living poet will be then read and discussed; and it would be of service if the secretary would be kind enough to endeavour to induce each member to become a regular subscriber to the Thrush.

It will be well for honorary secretaries to obtain some measure of support from the clergy and the leading and professional men of their neighbourhood. They may become members, though they may be unable to attend the reading parties. . . . These reading parties for the cult of modern poetry should be held at the houses of invited members or elsewhere, as may be arranged, and (in the summer time) in some delightful garden or woodland dell. Working people who have a soul for poetry, and all classes of the community, should be encouraged to become members. If you are disposed to assist in this little enterprise and will kindly accept such a position, I hereby appoint you one of the honorary secretaries of the society, fully empowered to act, but not in any way to incur debts on behalf of the society. . . . Your duties will be obvious to you. You may make up your own coterie or party, and enlarge it from time to time, or you may depute parts of the work of organisation to others. You will be absolute over your own little society, you will fix a day (once a week preferably) for the readings, and you will kindly take the chair at each meeting and control its action. You will be fettered by no rules. You will endeavour to make the meetings agreeable to the members, and though it will be well to be firm in your control it is needless to suggest to you the all-importance of patience and sweet reasonableness.

We are sorry to feel irreverently amused by this prospectus, but then we are no longer so young as we were in the days when our heart was volcanic. Even then personal friendship seemed to provide the natural atmosphere in which to study other people's poetry and whisper our own. But a society, a coterie, a chair! Well may Mr. Mullett Ellis suggest the "all-importance of patience in honorary secretaries."

THE American historical novel has already appealed to the American sense of humour. Some months ago we quoted Mr. Dooley's parody, and now, in the Atlantic Monthly, Mr. Charles Battell Loomis, in a similar vein of satire, gives directions on "How to write a Novel for the Masses." Selecting the historical novel, he suggests the plot, incidents, and literary fillings of a real "seller." His chief injunction to the would-be popular author is to spare himself trouble. We will quote some of Mr. Loomis's precepts and illustrations:

You must admit that the vast majority of the reading public is made up of dull, unthinking people, so why should writers spend so much time substantiating facts, studying costumes and scenery and other details that do not affect the real interest of the story, which is and must be the romantic portion of it?

Let me show you how it ought to be done:

"It was dawn of a clear spring morning. Guy le Cormorant set forth from his father's castle with never a sou in his pocket, a large credit at his banker's, and the whole world before him."

Here chuck in some reference to the "Provencal robins" that during the reign of the good Louis sang with such surpassing sweetness." If you wish to, run in a few Breton peasants, and dot the meadow with sheep, and fill the fields with Lyonnaise potatoes. The public won't know or care whether you are right or not.

Now it's time for your first adventure, for you are nearing the end of the second page, and a successful romantic novel should yield an adventure to every ten pages, and stop at the 300th page.

"Around the corner of the Louvre" (never mind what or where the Louvre is; the public will think it is a river or a field) "came the wicked seneschal, Vignon de Morimont. His fat horse jogged along lazily, and from the corners of his treacherous eyes he looked at the brave young Guy."

Having tossed the seneschal into the plane tree, let Guy mount his horse and continue on his way. Adventure number one is over, and he has won out easily; but it will be a mistake to let him win every round with as little effort. In a story, a dead-sure thing is not exciting.

It is now time to bring in more singing of birds, as a sort of contrast. If a shepherd is handy, let him pipe up a little, so as to put Guy into good spirits, as the stabbing of the seneschal is on his nerves a bit. Guy might toss the shepherd a sequin or a groat. The public has heard of both coins, but doesn't know where they grow.

Refer briefly to the clouds, and carry him on horseback past the place "where in 1493, the year after Columbus discovered America, two monks of St. Bernard were murdered by Villon, the poet scamp. A shrine still marks the spot—a shrine erected by Villon's daughter." That will make the public say: "My, don't he know a lot!"

OWING to illness in the family of Baron d'Erlanger the Exhibition of the Royal Amateur Art Society cannot be held at Park House. It will be opened by Lord Roberts at 7, Chesterfield-gardens, Mayfair, on the 26th, at 12 o'clock, instead, by kind permission of Mrs. Beer. Ticket holders and contributors will kindly note change of address.

AUTHORS have been divided into those who dedicate their books "To my wife," and those who do not. Also into those who answer their critics and those who—refrain. Mr. John Davidson answers; and when the answer is as readable as "The Romance in Dialogue" he sent to the Daily Chronicle, in response to the criticism of that journal on Self's the Man, we would say to others: "Do likewise." We find room for a few extracts:

Q.: Where did you get the too quaint title?

A.: "Self's the Man" is the translation of a Dutch proverb, "Zelf is de Man." Quaint or not, I think it will become current.

Q.: What moral are we to draw from Urban's history?

A.: No moral. I wish my writings to be entirely non-moral. I would not persuade the world for or against anything. Literature, as I understand it, ought to be impartial.

Q.: Why do you make so luxuriant a plot?

A.: Art is selection, and great art always selects as much of the world as it can. I should like to put the whole universe into everything I write. . . .

Q.: Come, come, sir! Have you no respect for the ideal drama?

A.: For as long as I can remember I have concerned myself more with ideas than ideals, rather with life than with fiction; and my desire is to write my drama. But what is the ideal drama?

Bibliographical.

MR. C. WHIBLEY's new monograph on Thackeray will presumably be an admixture of biography and criticism, resembling in that respect Anthony Trollope's well-known contribution to the "English Men of Letters" series. Of criticism pure and simple on Thackeray there has not, after all, been much in volume form. Messrs. Marzials and Merivale's book, and Mr. Lewis Melville's, are mainly biographical. The first critical note was struck by Hannay in his little Studies on Thackeray, published in 1869. These were eminently sympathetic. So was the essay by Dr. John Brown, of Edinburgh, which appeared in 1877. Mr. Frederic Harrison's essay on Thackeray's Place in Literature came out in 1894; Mr. A. A. Jack's Study in 1895. Macaulay, who is to be honoured by a monograph from the pen of Mr. D. H. Macgregor, is another writer of whom, in volume form, not much criticism has been published. He was the subject of three books produced in 1860; then came one by Dr. Hutchison Stirling in 1868, followed, in 1882, by one from the hand of the Hon. A. S. G. Canning. An essay by Mr. Frederic Harrison appeared in 1894. The books by Dean Milman, the Rev. F. Arnold, and Mr. Cotter Morison were, of course, biographical as well as critical. Is Mr. Macgregor's new work a sign that Macaulay is coming into fashion again?

Taking up Mr. Walter Raymond's new volume, Good Souls of Cider-Land (Grant Richards), I found it consisted of four separate stories, and it struck me at the time that the titles of at least two of those stories were familiar to me. I was right. A little investigation made it clear that the two tales in question—"Gentleman Upcott's Daughter" and "Young Sam and Sabrina"—had been published in 1892 and 1894 respectively, under the pseudonym of "Tom Cobbleigh." Together they fill 269 of the 335 pages which Good Souls of Cider-Land contains. All, therefore, that is new in this new book is to be found in sixty-six pages only; and I cannot be quite sure that even the two short stories therein comprised—"A Son of a Saint" and "A Complete Change"—have not appeared in print before now. Anyway, I venture to think that Mr. Raymond or his publisher might well have frankly acknowledged the fact that the bulk of the volume is not fresh to the public.

Mr. Warwick H. Draper appends to his biography of Alfred the Great (Stock) a bibliography—which is well. It might, however, have been more full than it is. The section concerning "poetical works on Alfred" could easily be enlarged. Mr. Draper has cruelly omitted from it the poetical drama on Alfred which was written by Martin Tupper, and described in the ACADEMY not so long ago.

He has also slighted in the same way the "Alfred" drama (in verse) composed by the late lamented Mr. Sheridan Knowles. He adds, in a note: "It is remarkable that Lord Tennyson (whose lines on Prince Albert have been fitly quoted by Sir Walter Besant in connection with Alfred) appears to have made no express mention of the King in his verse." But Mr. Draper is wrong. There is at least one reference to Alfred the Great in Tennyson—"Truth-teller was our English Alfred named" (Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington).

The author of the announced Descriptive Guide to the Best Fiction has undertaken a difficult task, even if we assume that he has confined himself to English fiction. E. A. Baker is the name of the adventurous scribe, who may perhaps be rudely asked to state his qualifications for the work. A collection of carefully-selected criticisms by accepted authorities might, perhaps, have been the wiser enterprise. But what a wide field to cover! There is already in existence A Guide to British and American Novels, by Mr. Percy Russell (1894); but that also lacks authority. A little work on novelists of to-day was issued recently by a country firm. Jeaffreson's Novels and Novelists is obviously out of date.

It is pleasant to note that Walter Scott, Limited, promise a volume of Poems by Alexander Smith in their series of "Canterbury Poets." But will it contain all the poems? Smith's books of verse came out as follows: Poems (1853), Sonnets on the War (with Dobell, 1855), City Poems (1857), and Edwin of Deira (1861). There were also a couple of poems in the volume called Last Leaves (1868). The Complete Poetical Works of Alexander Smith would be to many, I am sure, an agreeable possession. Why, too, should we not have a complete edition of Smith's essays—both those in Dreamthorp and those in Last Leaves? There should always be a demand, likewise, for A Summer in Skye.

A correspondent writes: "There was some discussion some time ago as to the authorship of the well-known lines beginning:

Oh, for a booke and a shady nooke,
Either in doore or out.

In a little pamphlet called 'The Book Lover,' sent to me by Mr. Howard Wilford Bell, of Oxford, I find the lines attributed to Eugene Field, the American writer. Nevertheless, they are not to be discovered in Field's Book of Western Verse or in his Second Book of Verse. Are they in any other volume of his, if there be any?"

Mr. Fitzmaurice Kelly, who is to edit for Messrs. Gowans & Gray The Complete Works of Cervantes (of course, in English), is already well-known as the author of a Life of Cervantes (1891), as having written an introduction to an edition of Shelton's translation of Don Quixote (1896), and as being co-editor of an elaborate edition of the text of that romance (1898). His competency for his new enterprise is undoubted. For most English people, probably, Cervantes is the author of Don Quixote and nothing else, though some of his Exemplary Novels (in Mabbe's version) were reprinted so recently as last year.

It cannot be said that Mr. Ernest Radford, as a poet, has trespassed at all upon the patience of the public. He has been much more forbearing than most bards. His first publication, I believe, was Translations from Heine, and Other Verses (1882); his next, Measured Steps (1884); his third, Chambers Twain (1890). In 1895 came his Old and New—a title which speaks for itself. In all his rhythmic works one traces Heine's influence, and I, for one, am looking forward with pleasure to his forthcoming book.

Miss Lucy Toulmin Smith is to write a volume on Mysteries and Miracle-Plays for one of the numerous "series" now appealing to readers. Mr. Pollard has already written on English Miracle-Plays (1890), and there is a book on The Miracle Play in England, by Sidney W. Clarke. Miss Smith's work will be welcome nevertheless. We are all grateful to her for her editions of Gorboduc (1883) and The York Plays (1885). THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Beyond Aldgate Pump.

East London. By Sir Walter Besant. (Chatto. 18s.)

IN externals this book is very like its predecessors from the same pen: London, Westminster, and South London. But inwardly it differs. You receive a hint of this in glancing through the illustrations. Again and again Mr. Pennell has resigned a page to Mr. Phil May or Mr. Raven Hill, and the reason is plain. 'Arry and 'Arriet are not the people to sacrifice themselves to their background, and they and the other East-End humanities have come to the front by sheer dominance of sharp-set human nature over stocks and stones. Besides, in East London the stocks and stones are never antique or magnificent, seldom even picturesque. Indeed, Mr. Pennell's exquisite work is more than once employed on subjects which, however necessary to be portrayed, are not in his sphere, nor even strictly within his power. In the river scenes he is triumphant, in many suburban corners he is charming; but he is not the artist to send into the back streets of East London. He is clearly puzzled by the deadly smoothness and unpicturesqueness, the lack of jutting and soaring detail, in these streets. He resorts to a pathetic raggedness which is hardly true. The roofs and chimneys of these streets are indeed ragged to the last degree of squalid quaintness, and we wonder that Mr. Pennell did not give us one of those amazing choppy seas of house-tops, gables, chimneys, and broken walls, which you look down upon from the train between Liverpool-street and Stratford, and especially between Fenchurch-street and Stratford. But in the streets themselves there is a flat-walled monotony, perfectly appreciated, we think, by Sir Walter Besant, but not by his illustrator. Another thing. We wish that Mr. Pennell would give up rearing masses of white cumuli clouds above every street that he depicts, be it in Mile End or Abbeville, in Piccadilly or York. Cumuli are, no doubt, to be seen everywhere, but we are entitled to demand that they shall not be seen everywhere at the same time, or in the same book. We should feel proud in Chancery-lane of the cloudland which Mr. Pennell piles over the decrepit low-lying London street in Limehouse, or over his "Typical Street in Bethnal Green." When Greenwich Hospital or the Tower Bridge is in question Mr. Pennell, of course, piles bleached Ossas on snow-white Pelions, and he has our leave to do so; but the normal sky of East London is less exciting than he makes it. Of his delightful dexterities in congenial subjects we need say nothing; they have no rival in book-illustration. As a mere matter of technique we should like to question whether the view of Ratcliffe Cross Stairs is strictly in drawing, or whether the wonderfully good rendering of the stairs descending and receding from the spectator is obtained by a justifiable license of art—we mean by raising the horizon line higher than it could be in fact.

What shall we say of Sir Walter Besant's book itself? We doubt whether it will receive the intelligent praise it deserves. The people who know East London best—the East Londoners—do not read books. Their children are beginning to read books, but not books like this. The critics and the general readers of West London and the elegant suburbs do not know London east of Aldgate Pump. A few have penetrated to the London Hospital and the People's Palace, both of which institutions stand on the great six-mile highway which connects Aldgate with Stratford and distributes the human tide into the jerry-built fastnesses and creeping fogs of Essex. But these do not know East London. They have not strolled among the beetling warehouses and leafy churchyards of Wapping and Shadwell. They have not lounged on the river terrace by Blackwall Station, or lost themselves among the walls and drawbridges of vast docks where the masts of a hundred ships fill the sky like a redwood forest, great in suggestion, glorious in the sunset. They have not a notion of Poplar. Of London-over-the-Border, that concatenation of strange back regions—Canning Town, Silvertown, Tidal Basin, Galleons—they have hardly heard mention. The misty mid-region of Plaistow, the pretty suburbanities of Forest Gate, the wide rubbish flats north of Stratford where hooligans fire shot-guns on Saturday afternoons, the motley life of Old Ford and Bethnal Green and Cambridge Heath, lightened by Victoria Park and breaking northward into the well-to-do bustle of Hackney and Homerton and Clapton—of all these miles and miles of organised humanity they know little or nothing. What they do not know generally they cannot know in detail. Sir Walter Besant is right when he says that to observe the true life of an East London neighbourhood you must adopt Richard Jefferies's maxim for seeing the life of wild nature—you must stand still and stand long. If you will retire into a doorway in a nameless byway of Bethnal Green, and stand one whole hour watching those who come and go, you will—unnoticed yourself—see into the heart of things. To know in some true way this vast region, which is equal in size to St. Petersburg or Philadelphia, yet is without palaces, hotels, soldiers, booksellers' shops, or newspapers of any account, is to know the strangest place on earth. It is to wonder at its order, its household dignities, its social keeping, its magnetic cheerfulness, its immense honest energy that makes the best of destiny. Sir Walter Besant understands all this. We need remind no one that he has written for the East End as well as of it, and that he has helped to build it a synagogue. His handling of the subject is therefore large and interesting.

East London began as a riverside fringe of "hamlets," and it is in the life of this seafaring, riverfaring fringe of the eighteenth century that we find the beginnings of the vast accretions of to-day. Sir Walter Besant has dipped deeply into its grimy annals, and he brings before us the swarming alleys and stairs where the whole population lived more or less on the proceeds of river thieving in the days when vessels unloaded in the river. Boys rowed under the sterns of great ships to receive parcels tossed from above. The lightermen wore leathern aprons, which were pouched to hold stolen brandy. One hundred years ago it was estimated that goods to the value of a quarter of a million sterling were annually thieved out of ships in the Pool. It was the dock system that stopped this plunder and put industry in its place. You may still catch suggestions of the old order as you wander through Wapping and Shadwell and Limehouse. The graves of sea captains are to be seen under leaves on which the sunlight glances. Wapping Old Stairs, of immortal memory, may still be found, though its old boat bustle is no more. Execution Dock is a place of suicides. In Poplar High-street you find private schools of navigation, and in all that region there is a suggestion of tar and ropes and distant ports. One of the delightful things about these places is the way in which ships and houses mingle. The sky at the end of a slum is crossed by the gleaming spars and cordage of a sailing ship, or you look up to find yourself walking under a great bowsprit beneath which a carved goddess looks down upon the stony street and seems to long for the onset of the green seas. Into, and under, all this Sir Walter Besant looks, and gives us character-sketches of the riverside hooligan, the factory girl, the alien, and the loafer. He takes no extreme views; he is sane and moderate on such subjects as sweating and slums. The East End, he rightly insists, is not a city of slums, but of respectability. Slums there are, but in the vastness of East London they are lost to all but the eyes of social workers, and the fact remains that in Mile End, Stepney, Bow, Old Ford, Stratford, you find sturdy respectability overwhelmingly evident. The young mechanic goes home on Saturday afternoon, washes and dresses himself with extreme care, and applies himself to a hobby. Maybe he is musical, maybe inventive; something he is that makes his mother proud and garrulous. There are a score of matters on which it would be interesting to touch; but even Sir Walter Besant is continually under the necessity of indicating rather than describing a state of things. For example, what will be the future of the amazing jerry-built suburbs of mean streets which, without substance, without dignity, without any proportionate stiffening from public buildings and well-built churches, are spreading like a low-lying red fog over Essex? In a very few years such houses become shaky. Their tenants flit and flit, their poor gentilities deteriorate; what is the end of these encampments of brick? Again, what is the human natural history of centres like Bethnal Green or Spitalfields, where certain trades are deeply rooted? How many families now resident in these parishes are survivors of families that were resident there in 1800? We agree that an investigation would be highly interesting, because, as Sir Walter Besant says, "no one, so far, has attempted to ascertain the changes which take place in the rank and file of a London parish."

In expressing our admiration of this book we must remark that here, as in his other London books, Sir Walter Besant writes for the easily satisfied reader. As an historian he is too secretive. He does not give his authorities, but only a smoothly woven fabric in which the wearing quality of the material is not always easily observed. When he theorises we are more often interested than convinced. A pleasing determination to have the edifice comely and to hide the scaffolding is his strength and is his foible. Indeed, we cannot always divest ourselves of the idea that we are assisting at the erection of an "Olde London" bazaar; and that amid unrolling of red baize and hammering of flags and devices, Sir Walter Besant bustles about, supplying ideas, and fulfilling the duties of a kindly, slightly autocratic, historian-papa. Nevertheless, this is the best general description of East London that has yet been written, or that is likely to be written for years.

Ibsen in England.

"THE PROSE DRAMAS OF HENRIK IBSEN."—The League of Youth, A Doll's House, Pillars of Society. New and Revised Edition. Edited by William Archer. 3 vols. (Scott. 1s. 6d. each.)

If a decisive proof is wanted of the judicial separation between the reading and the playgoing publics in England it may be found in the fact that two collected editions of Ibsen's prose dramas have been issued in eleven years. Ibsen is the supreme pariah of the English stage, while by English bookmen he is honoured beyond any other living dramatist, native or foreign. The second uniform edition, of which three volumes are before us, is again the work of Mr. William Archer, who has further improved his already admirable translations, and added short introductions, which are confined to the statement of fact, without opinion. As regards the translations, they deserve unmitigated praise; they are reassuring, a credit to English letters. But the statements of fact, so calmly made by Mr. Archer, must utterly crush out the budding complacency of English playgoers. Mr. Archer has himself been the apostle of an alleged renaissance of the drama in this island. The current revival of "The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith" reminds us (if we could ever forget) that after seeing Mrs. Ebbsmith pull the Bible out of the fire amid salvoes of applause, he wrote two long articles of apparently serious appreciation of that play. He has watered the frail and sickly plant of our new drama with the tears of his joy, and pruned it with a caress, and predicted how it would grow and grow till it overtopped the French bean and the Norwegian fir. And now he begins the century with an atrocious orgy of the most damning facts. We will give one example. "Pillars of Society" was first performed in 1877 (when Ibsen had been famous for nearly thirty years). Early in 1878 it was being given simultaneously at five Berlin theatres. In Germany it has been performed twelve hundred times at sixty theatres. In England it has been performed twice—once at an experimental matinée (under the title "Quicksands"!), and once at a benefit performance, when Mrs. Kendal recited "Ostler Joe" and Mme. Antoinette Sterling sang "The Three Fishers." As with "Pillars of Society," so with the rest. None of Ibsen's plays, except "A Doll's House," has had even a "run," and "A Doll's House" succeeded (with a success which would have meant failure for a musical comedy) only by virtue of scandal. Who does not know the forlorn and furtive enterprises, undertaken at "unlucky" theatres, with afternoon sunlight coming in through the side windows, at which Ibsen's masterpieces have been exposed to the adoration of the few and the laughter of the many? These must remain among the bitterest memories of all who care for dramatic art, only less shameful, less insulting to the artist, than the present utilisation of the same plays to beguile the Sunday night tedium of the theatrical world. It may be asked what all this has to do with the renaissance of native drama. The answer to such a question would be that there can be no renaissance of native drama without a renaissance of dramatic criticism and a renaissance of general dramatic taste, and that the reception given to Ibsen's plays is an absolute demonstration that our dramatic taste stands approximately where it did twenty years ago. Mr. Archer's conspectus of the history of Ibsenism in this country surely cannot fail to result in an awakening from our absurd self-satisfaction. Awakenings of that kind are always painful, and usually lead to healthy strong language. Therefore we feel justified in remarking with disgust that the renaissance of English drama is a myth. A renaissance of any art means a return to truth, a more sincere striving after truth. Why have Ibsen's plays so lamentably fallen flat in England? Not because they are indecent, for they are not indecent, while gross indecency flourishes again and again. Not because they are unpleasant, for plays of an astonishing unpleasantness have "taken the town" several times. But simply because they are true. We do not want truth on the stage. The playwrights don't want it; the critics don't want it; and the public won't have it. Let that fact be acknowledged. Truth is too exotic for us; we may casually inspect it on Sunday evenings as we would casually inspect a dime museum; but we are not going to treat it seriously. The English stage is the home of fantasy—some very good fantasy—and there is no sign of a desire to oust that sprite.

Three or four years ago, if one had asked for evidence of the "renaissance," the enthusiasts would have naively replied, "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," which, indeed, was definitely proclaimed in the most influential quarters as a masterpiece. But no one can say that "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" stands where it did. There was a similar venting of facile enthusiasm when Mr. Pinero produced "The Profligate." Even Mr. A. B. Walkley was impressed on that excited night at the Garrick. Read "The Profligate" now and that night will seem incredible. In another few years the great Tanqueray night will seem equally incredible. We have considerable respect for Mr. Pinero's talent. He is a very able playwright, but being an incurable sentimentalist he can only be his best self in a frankly sentimental play. "Trelawny of the Wells" is indubitably the finest thing he ever did. In "The Profligate" he thought himself naturalistic while sentimentally lising over a woman who had fallen once. In "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" he thought himself naturalistic while sentimentalising over a woman who had fallen fifty times. In the intervening years he had learnt audacity, and a good deal of Ibsen's mere craftsmanship: that was all the difference. The most artistic, the most entirely satisfactory plays produced during the last decade were "The Liars" and "The Importance of being Earnest." Both were exercises of pure fancy; one was a wild farce; neither had any relation to life. Both were witty, but never at the expense of the ancient ideals of the English stage, which have not altered since "Money" or "London Assurance."

We must conclude by insisting that there is no good dramatic taste in England. Go into the foyer on a first night, and listen to the leaders of opinion. (Mr. Archer, by the way, never does.) Masterpieces can only arise in a general atmosphere of good taste. Moreover, the neglect of serious foreign art is a sure sign of the non-existence of serious native art. In what country is Ibsen best appreciated if not in Germany, where dramatic art is truly alive, the country which can boast of at least two dramatic geniuses of its own? France neglects foreign dramatic art, and the French stage was never in a more pitiable condition than it is at present, when the newspapers are full of futile explanations of la crise des spectacles, and obstinately unanimous in refusing to find the real explanation. Even Paris is in better case than London, as is proved by the gratifying success of Brieux, who almost alone among French playwrights "forsakes all" and follows life itself.

The irony of this new collected and revised edition of his plays will not be lost on Henrik Ibsen.

The Paston Letters.

The Paston Letters: 1422-1509 A.D. Edited by James Gairdner. (Constable.)

THE original publication of the Paston Letters, by Sir John Fenn, "a smatterer in antiquity, but a very good sort of man," in 1787, is, like that of Percy's Reliques, a landmark of the revived interest felt by the waning eighteenth century in the Middle Ages. Miss Hannah More, indeed, found these genuine documents vastly inferior to the independent "Rowley" fabrications of Chatterton; but Horace Walpole, who, for all his absurdities and affectations, had more of the literary sense than most of his contemporaries, was quick to recognise their historic and human interest:

There are letters from all my acquaintance—Lord Rivers' Lord Hastings, the Earl of Warwick, whom I remember still better than Mrs. Strawbridge, though she died within these fifty years. What antiquary would be answering a letter from a living countess when he may read one from Eleanor Mowbray, Duchess of Norfolk?

Early in the seventies Dr. Gairdner issued a new edition, in which he added more than five hundred documents and letters to those given by Fenn, and of this the present volumes are a reprint, with yet another hundred letters, and a long remodelled introduction. Dr. Gairdner's interest is, naturally, mainly in the stores of information which can be drawn from the records of the Paston family to elucidate the difficult and tortuous history of the Wars of the Roses. Roughly speaking, the collection covers three generations of Pastons. First of all comes William Paston. He was the son of the founder of the family, one Clement Paston, "a good, plain husband," who scraped together a few acres in his native county of Norfolk, and tilled them himself. William Paston received a good education, and became a distinguished and, apparently, for his day, a remarkably upright judge. Under him, and still more under his son, John Paston, the family fortunes grew.

John Paston, a cold, businesslike, indomitable man, became an important landed proprietor. He wove many relations and made many enemies. His extensive correspondence is full of personal and political intrigues, and throws singular light upon the turbulent period when the central authority in England was at its weakest, and once again, as in the earliest feudal days, a man must look to his own right hand to protect his possessions against his neighbour. The historical bearing of the letters is minutely and learnedly brought out by Dr. Gairdner; but this mode of treatment by no means exhausts their interest. The student less absorbed in politics may trace through storm and stress the slow continuance of English peasant life, little affected, except for a scarlet streak here and there, by the struggles for sovereignty waged over its head; or may attempt the fascinating reconstruction of more than one human personality, revealed, fragment by fragment, in the unconscious abandon of familiar and, for the most part, strictly business-like correspondence. From this point of view John Paston's son, Sir John, with his love affairs and his thriftless ways, is perhaps a more attractive study than his father. Yet throughout the book the really dominant figure is neither of these, but a woman, the wife of one of them, the mother of the other. Margaret Paston was—trust John Paston for that—an heiress, the daughter of John Mauteby of Mauteby in Norfolk. She first makes her appearance in a letter from her future mother-in-law to the judge, in which he is bidden to bring her a present:

The parson of Stocton told me, if ye wolde buy her a gowne, her moder wolde give thereto a godely furre. The gowne nedyth for to be had; and of colour it wolde be a godely blew, or else a bryghte sanqueyn.

Margaret Paston proved a notable wife, of a keen intellect and a resolute temper to match her husband's. Business detained him for long periods together in London; and then she became his representative in countless home affairs, acting vigorously where need was, and passing unscathed through some trying experiences. There was a manor of Gresham, which John Paston held, but which was also claimed by a certain Lord Moleyns; and in a day of Paston's absence (we modernise the spelling), the said lord sent to the said mansion a riotous people, to the number of a thousand persons, with blanket bands of a suit as risers against your peace, arrayed in manner of war, with cuirasses, briganders, jacks, sallets, glaives, bows, arrows, pavises, guns, pans with fire and teins burning therein, long cromes to draw down houses, ladders, picks (with which they mined down the walls), and long trees (with which they broke up gates and doors), and so came in to the said mansion, the wife of your beseecher at that time being therein, and xij persons with her; the which persons they drove out of the said mansion, and mined down the wall of the chamber wherein the wife of your said beseecher was, and bare her out at the gates, and cut asunder the posts of the houses and let them fall, and broke up all the chambers and coffers within the said mansion, and rifled, and in manner of robbery bare away all the stuff, array, and money that your said beseecher and his servants had there, to the value of cc^{li}, and part thereof sold, and part thereof gave, and the remnant they departed among them, to the great and outrageous hurt of your said beseecher, saying openly, that if they might have found there your said beseecher and one John Dunmore, which is of council with him, and divers other of the servants of your said beseecher, they should have died.

To such possibilities was a strong-minded woman of the fifteenth century exposed. Domestic details jostle oddly with legal terms and military preparations in Margaret Paston's letters to her husband. One begins with a demand for some cross bows and windacs to bind them with, and quarrels; for your houses here ben so long that there may none man shoot out with no long bow, though we had never so much need.

It ends :

I pray you that ye will vouchsafe to do buy for me j pound of almonds and j pound of sugar, and that ye will do buy some frieze to make of your child his gowns: ye shall have best cheap and best choice of Hay's wife, as it is told me. And that ye would buy a yard of broad cloth of black for an hood for me of xliij^d or iiij^s a yard, for there is neither good cloth nor good frieze in this town.

In another letter the lady shows a charming deference to her husband's opinion in matters of clothes which is quite out of date :

As for cloth for my gown, I can none get in this town better than that is that I send you an example of, which methinketh too simple both of colour and of cloth. Wherefore I pray you that ye will vouchsafe to do buy for me iij yards and j quarter of such as it pleaseth you that I should have, and what colour that pleaseth you, for in good faith I have done sought all the drapers' shops in this town, and there is right feeble choice.

She then asks for sugar and cinnamon, and proceeds to describe the doings of an outlaw, one Harry Inglos, whose men had slain two men of Tunstead during the previous week. The intimate note is rare: these are not "Love-letters of a Fifteenth Century Englishwoman." Only here and there you come on traces of the feminine in Margaret Paston beyond her kirtle. The husband has had an accident in London, and she writes to tell him that his mother has vowed an image of his own weight in wax to Our Lady of Walsingham for his recovery, and she herself to make a pilgrimage to the shrine, and likewise to that of Saint Leonard of Norwich. And she adds :

If I might have had my will, I should have seen you ere this time. I would ye were at home, if it were for your ease (and your sore might be as well looked to here as it is there ye be), now liever than a gown, though it were of scarlet.

Margaret Paston was less in touch with her children, than with the husband whom she long outlived. Her daughter Margery married beneath her with one of the Paston retainers; and the stern mother disowned her. The extravagance of the eldest son was a sore trial, and the whole family got more of advice and reproof than they had a mind to. As she grew elderly, Margaret Paston fell under the influence of a priest, between whom and the young sparks there was no love lost. One of them writes :

Sir James and I be twain. We fell out before my mother with "Thou proud priest," and "Thou proud squire," my mother taking his part; so I have almost beshut the both as for my mother's house.

The story of Margaret Paston ends with her will, a curious and minute document, full of that wistful desire to prolong her vicarious days on earth so characteristic of the mediæval mind. The stone of marble with scutcheons of the Mauteby and Paston arms at the corners, the torches to be held by tenants in white gowns for her exsequies and obit, the "honest secular priest" to sing masses for her soul, the gifts of "legend" and "antiphoner," "chasuble" and "alb" to the churches on her estate, the doles to poor households, to lepers and anchoresses—all are set out with sad ostent. Then come the personal bequests of the cherished household goods and chattels; to her son Edmund "a standing piece white covered, with a white garlic head upon the knop"; to Katherine his wife, "a purple girdle harnessed with silver and gilt"; to her daughter Anne "my green hanging in my parlour at Mauteby" and "my primer, my beads of silver enamelled." A god-daughter is to have another "pair beads of chalcedony gaudied with silver and gilt," a daughter-in-law "my pix of silver with ij silver cruets and my mass book with all mine altar-cloths." It is rather a pitiful roll. Not lightly did Margaret Paston renounce in death the riches she had so loved, had so schemed and struggled for, in life.

Other New Books.

LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE OF BY HIS SON, LIEUT.-COL.
RIGHT HON. HUGH CHILDERS. SPENCER CHILDERS.

The biography of Mr. Childers, interesting enough and even important to the student of political and especially of parliamentary history, is scarcely of enthralling public interest, nor did it need these two bulky volumes to do justice to such a career. Two volumes, unhappily, seem to have become as much de rigueur for a biography as three once were for a novel; while a biography is no less necessary than a tombstone to every man who has had a career, whether in making books or bluebooks, bayoneting savages or baptizing them. Since such is the fashion, we should be delighted if to the shilling shocker succeeded the shilling biography. A shillingsworth of greatness is as much as most men achieve.

This Life is of the regulation pattern, a file of letters skewered on a thin narrative. It is done with diligence and respectable ability, and is of respectable dullness in point of general interest. Mr. Childers was a good statesman of the Gladstone Cabinet type, which he represented on its best side. He was War Minister, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Home Secretary; and in all these offices showed quiet ability and steady common-sense grasp of his duties. No genius, he was no dullard or incompetent; he belonged (say) to the type of Mr. Brodrick rather than of Lord Lansdowne. As War Minister he carried out the territorialisation of the army; and his work was good and sound so far as it went—an undoubted improvement on the existing system. His son gives an interesting letter from Earl Roberts, showing that even in 1882 he advocated the now famous khaki for the army on active service. Perhaps the bit to which present attention will most readily turn is a memorandum of Mr. Childers in 1888 on the vexed question of laying expert military (or naval) opinion before Parliament. He was against it, though he favoured the "one head" idea with regard to expert control, to a certain extent. He thus sums his ideas :

I would suggest that the general Administrative and Executive business of the Army and Navy should be conducted by a military and a naval officer of high rank, under the supreme authority of a Parliamentary Minister; and that these advisers of the Minister should be entitled to require that their recommendations be submitted to the Cabinet, if over-ruled by the Minister.

A book that needs boiling down, and might then be of interest, as it is certainly of some value. (Murray.)

ANOTHER ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE-LETTERS.

BY BARRY PAIN.

Many parodies of the sentimental book of the moment have been attempted; but Mr. Barry Pain's effort is the most elaborate and sustained. It is indeed as long, if not actually longer, than the original—which is, we fancy, almost a confession of failure. Parody should be more concentrated—an ox in a teacup, so to speak. Nor should parody be so contemptuous as this, and run to a whole volume. It seems hardly like playing the game—to ridicule and chastise, a whole volume through—at a shilling a copy. One feels almost that the shillings belong, by right, to the original author. This is, of course, an extreme view to take, nor should we support it seriously; but the mere fact that the idea came to mind as we read argues, we think, a fault in Mr. Pain's method. His hand is unduly heavy, his scorn for sentimentalism too bitter, and the length of his squib has caused his eye to wander from the centre of the matter as the good parodist's never should. Mr. Pain frequently clowns it, loses his best taste, and we are wearied and a little bit repelled. For example, there is no legitimate fun in this: "We leave here on the 46th, or some earlier, or later day, and we shall probably return via Marseilles and Yokohama, changing into the Orient Express at Clapham Junction." This is automatic funny writing; padding; and in a parody there should be no padding. On the other hand, this is to the point: "O rock me in Love's cat's-cradle high above the sweeping tree-tops till the moon-clouds are my nighty, and my star-dreams light you." In fact, the whole chapter in which this passage occurs—describing the interview with "his" mother—is excellent fooling. Mr. Pain's preface has an inspired criticism: the perusal of the original book, he says, gives one "rather the feeling that one has been eating caramels to excess in a moonlit churchyard." If his brain had been kept at that pitch for a dozen concentrated pages, his parody would have been a precious thing. As it is, though amusing, it is not a very satisfactory or worthy performance, and it has the effect—probably the last thing wished by its author—of increasing one's respect for the original book. (Unwin. 1s.)

NOTES ON SPEECH-MAKING. BY BRANDER MATTHEWS.

This unpretentious little volume is a series of practical suggestions on the art of making speeches by a practised master, who is Professor of Dramatic Literature in Columbia University. They are not hints on delivery, voice-production, and so forth, but hints as to the best methods of preparing for a speech, and ensuring that it shall be effective and fluent. It is exceedingly useful and—as it aims to be—suggestive; for to teach speech-making is beyond the power of any book. A chapter is added on after-dinner speaking, in which American advice should be especially valuable, for Lowell seems to have made after-dinner oratory a lineal gift with American ambassadors to England. Three other authorities contribute papers on the subject of the book in an appendix. (Longmans. 1s. 6d. net.)

Fiction.

The Column. By Charles Marriott.
(John Lane. 6s.)

THIS is a first novel by a new writer. But capable, thorough, and well equipped as Mr. Marriott is, he has not the skill to conceal the travail of his art; we are too conscious throughout this story that he is working at the highest pressure. He has not learnt the power of pause, of restraint, of the use of quiet greys in a colour scheme. He is like an actor who strives to put meaning and subtlety into every line he speaks. We long for the relief that a horseman feels when he has persuaded his animal to walk after trotting for miles along a metallic road. All the characters, although clearly enough defined, are intellectually too smart; and there is hardly a chapter but suggests that the author is willing to give points to any Extension Lecturer in botany, medicine, or art. The style, though certainly interesting and never slovenly, lacks the large note of simplicity; and Mr. Marriott is overfond of the startling rather than the fit word. In one paragraph of twenty lines we are confronted by such sentences as "abandons his desipience at the altar," "the mouthpiece of history chuckles vain salacity," "is wholesome cauterly to those cordial tendernesses," &c. We can see the eyes of the ordinary novel-reader rise at such a passage as this: "If one will for a moment follow the delusive paths of analogy, and continue into humanity the classification of the botanist, it must be conceded that men and women fall admirably into the classes Exogens, Endogens, and Acrogens." But The Column is not an ordinary novel. It is the work of a strong brain; and if the style and the method sometimes recall too insistently the style and the method of another, and a greater, novelist (see the "capped verses with the rustic scholar on a thymy down" passage, page 10), it is also evident that Mr. Marriott has thought, felt, observed, and read for himself.

The column, the Cornish sea, and Daphne dominate the story. Edward Hastings, a subtly drawn, philosophic man of letters, author of Subsoil, from which some arresting extracts are given, brought the Doric column, with a few cuttings of laurel, from Greece, and placed it on the brow of the cliff of the Cornish sea-hamlet where he lives. His wife is dead, and he has one child, Daphne. She is fresh and interesting, and as elusive and inhuman as her dateless prototype. "She shared with the East its incalculable age, its incomparable infancy; she knew and had forgotten, was at the same moment innocent and omniscient." The column was "the symbol of her relations with the unseen." Symbolism enticed her. She had mystical dreams, a pagan mind, and deep sympathy for the Earth mother, which "still had her ear." Although in the end Daphne does not change into a laurel, she disappears quite as effectually from those who love her. It was hard upon her husband and her baby; but men who marry young women who are "essentially endogenous" must not expect the marital harmony that obtains within the walls of a little place at Tooting. Cathcart, the sculptor, understood her, but unfortunately they never met. The sympathy between Daphne and Cathcart had been settled for them two generations before. "The yeoman poet [her grandfather] who shook ecstatic before the revelations of flood and field, who in jewelled midnights had tended the throes of lambing ewes, and bowed before the inwelling of sunrise, was one with Cathcart's progenitors by the freemasonry of the earth." We like Cathcart; we like his talks with Johnnie. Speaking of Daphne he said: "It's the pull of the soil—the earth calling—that's what tells; and if you've once heard it, there's no more peace for you." We also like the remark of old Bosankoe. He knew of Daphne's passion for the sea; he had just heard of her placid contentment in her husband's absence from home. "That woman," he said, "ought to have married a merchant skipper."

Basil, her husband, was "uninitiate," and after a year of marriage "always superfluous"; he was also mildly entangled with Gertrude Laffey, a "bewitching" and almost melodramatic femme incomprise, who, "if she had lived in the Middle Ages, would have kept tame dwarfs and other doubtful creatures." Basil meets her in a church, and, after a series of eloquent glances, accosts her as she is leaving the place of worship. The opening sentences of the conversation are an example of Mr. Marriott's frequent inability to come down to "the great sweet mother." Did ever man and woman talk like this at a first meeting?

"I am convinced," said the woman, "that Beethoven should never have written sacred music."

"There is the 'Chorus of Angels,'" said Basil, at random.

The woman shook her head.

"Chorus of Earth Spirits, rather—and his Christ is simply Prometheus."

"Surely," said Basil, "the same from another point of view."

All of the characters are phrase-makers and epigrammatists: the fools even talk wise folly. But when once you have swung into the author's stride he makes an exhilarating companion, and he does not allow you to turn aside. Many of his phrases have a fine quality; for example: "He, a slim Spanish-eyed fisher lad, sounded 'A' with the air of Raleigh doffing his coat"; "Daphne's thoughts returned like grey doves to temple eaves, and looked dovelike from her eyes"; "she [Gertrude] abandoned herself to him with her eyes, and froze him with the touch of her hand"; "Emily, who boiled unexpectedly like milk, flashed out"; "he was the true sentimentalist, whose pleasure is not in conquest, but in the emotional reward"; "nothing goes further than simplicity, and had Daphne been told of the theory of evolution, she would only have remarked upon its timidity"; "the tender trouble of awakening seeds"; "the large patience of trees."

Probably Johnnie gained more than anybody else from Daphne's brief existence on this planet. He was with her before she disappeared—a short walk; and afterwards he would say: "I was with Daphne," as one says, "I was with the night."

The renunciation of the desire to take part in affairs, generally the last step in the education of the artist, came to Johnnie Bargister while he was yet in his teens. This may explain the maturity, the sanity, of even his early work. Whatever his hand has done is touched with the glamour of that night. All women have since been with him the casual phenomena of nature; he has carved and modelled them intensely, it is true, but unhindered by that entanglement with the subject, the curse of plastic art. He achieved detachment before his majority, and without the loss of his illusions. . . . He has never been quite able, even in his most spontaneous work, to break away from the tyranny of her attitude as she watched him out into the night.

Good as The Column is, it is not a great novel. Mr. Marriott does not get near enough to life for that. His glittering characters reflect the facets of his own imagination. They do not act for themselves. The hand that pulls the strings has not yet learnt to conceal itself. But as an example of the Romantic's view of life, churned in the pan of a mobile brain, and expressed vigorously and with conscious artistic wilfulness, The Column is noteworthy.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE WIZARD'S KNOT.

By WILLIAM BARRY.

Dr. Barry, "Catholic priest and theologian," has clearly settled himself to novel-writing. Last year he published Arden Massiter, which is now followed by The Wizard's Knot. It is a Celtic story of half a century ago. The scene is laid in the south-west of Ireland. The story is tragic against a background of racial and religious differences. Here is a note of the style: "As the blast rattled and shook the open doors, a young man, wrapped to the chin in a riding-coat, and wearing heavy boots with spurs, passed hastily through from the weather outside. 'God send I may live, Mr. Edmund, is it you?' said the major-domo." (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

GOOD SOULS OF CIDER LAND.

By WALTER RAYMOND.

"'Come vrom out round Cadbury zumwhere, I'll goo hail.' 'Zo did.' 'Up top o' parish, or I be vool.' 'Did zo.'" Four Somerset stories, exploiting many admirable rustics. A thread of love interest runs through these Cider Land tales. The longest, "Gentleman Upcott's Daughter," is, we imagine, a reprint; but the book is without a notification to that effect. Mr. Raymond published a novel called Gentleman Upcott's Daughter in 1893. (Richards. 6s.)

CASTING OF NETS.

By RICHARD BAGOT.

"Let us see what the Times says," remarked the Rector of Abbotsbury one evening in July. Presently he gave an exclamation of astonishment and dismay, for this had caught the rectorial eye: "A marriage will shortly take place between Lord Redman and Hilda, daughter of Lady Gwendolin and the late Mr. Cawarden, of Cawarden." When Mary, his wife, learned that the Cawardens were Romanists, she, too, was shocked, and said, "Can't it be stopped, James?" Mr. Bagot, the author, has aforetime written about "mixed marriages." Here he dresses his views in the garments of fiction. (Arnold. 6s.)

BELINDA FITZWARREN.

By THE EARL OF IDDESLEIGH.

A story of modern life. John Wolcote, "the chief ambition of whose life was to be out with the hounds every day during some hunting season," lodged in Devonshire-street, Portland-place. John "eschewed feminine society," and he might have gone on eschewing it to this day had not a four-wheeled cab arrived at the door of his lodgings. It contained two ladies seeking apartments, and one of them was Belinda. (Methuen. 6s.)

A DAUGHTER OF PATRICIANS.

By F. C. SMITH.

Illustrated. One of the pictures shows a collection of crutches left by those who are alleged to have been cured at the shrine of Bonne Sainte Anne, "the Canadian Lourdes"; and the story deals incidentally with such matters. The scene is laid in Montreal, time present, and the narrative is concerned with the marriage laws of the province of Quebec, a subject on which Mr. Smith is an authority. See newspapers! The end is: "'Amen,' whispered the priest, his eyes following Severine." (Unwin. 6s.)

THE LONE STAR RUSH.

By E. MITCHELL.

An Australian gold-digging yarn, about men who dress in indigo-coloured flannel shirts, wear leather belts, and spend their years in "the alluring, indomitable, unceasing quest for gold." A yarn is nothing without "love interest," and so Hilda flits into the company; and on page 358 we have a picture of her entreating Jim to "be a man," while the miners listen. (Chatto. 6s.)

THE THIRD FLOOR.

By MRS. DUDENEY.

Mrs. Dudeney's new story opens briskly in a lodging-house in Great Ormonde-street. There we find one Marmaduke Merry, a sensational journalist; Roakes, an unsuccessful playwright; and Gurney, a bookish, refined man. These live together. Below them is a parson who collects old silver, and thinks there has never been any good in the Church since the Reformation. Above, on the third floor, dwells a young woman of piquant charm, who has no relations, and didn't, when she went shopping, "commit the blunder of looking like other girls. She didn't wear a coat and skirt—sure mark of mediocrity." The story is not all Bloomsbury and modernity; the simple life triumphs, and Valencia bakes bread in the country, and thrills when her husband calls her "the missus." (Methuen. 6s.)

A SECRETARY OF LEGATION.

By HOPE DAWLISH.

"Les femmes sont extrêmes: elles sont meilleures ou pires que les hommes," is the motto of this story, which is laid at the British Legation at Zafia, a post "sought after by secretaries of all degrees." The story deals less with politics than with the relations of the members of the Legation, of whom Mrs. George Trehearne, the wife of the first secretary, is a woman with a past—particularly a gambling past. Gambling and love, intrigue and revenge, go to make this story more readable than edifying. The four principal characters are strongly defined. (Methuen. 6s.)

CHILDREN OF HERMES.

By HUME NISBET.

To show that rogues, vagabonds, and thieves have their virtues, prides, and feelings is the author's aim; the difficulty of breaking from criminal habits is his laudable moral; but why does he call his detective Nicodemus Dove Turtle? (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE BLACK WOLF'S BREED.

By HARRIS DICKSON.

A tale of France in the Old World and the New, in the reign of Louis XIV. The soldier-governor of Louisiana, Brenville, is a leading character, and the story is dedicated to his memory. A very readable story of mystery and inherited obligations. (Methuen. 6s.)

We have also received: A Varsity Man, by Inglis Allen (Pearson); Cruel Calumny, by Mrs. Leith-Adams (Digby, Long); The Wings of the Morning, by Helen V. Savile (Sonnenschein); The Sentence of the Court, by Headon Hill (Pearson); and Lest We Forget, by Joseph Hocking (Ward, Lock).

Spring Supplement.

MR. WM. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS.

MOUNT OMI AND BEYOND.

A Record of Travel on the Thibetan Border.

By ARCHIBALD JOHN LITTLE, F.R.G.S.,

Author of "Through the Yangtse Gorges," &c.

With a Map and Illustrations. 1 vol., 10s. net.

Truth.—"Interesting at once in itself and in its suggestions as to the cause and cure of our ever-recurring difficulties with China."

JAPANESE PLAYS AND PLAYFELLOWS.

By OSMAN EDWARDS.

With 12 Full-Page Illustrations in Colour by Japanese Artists. 1 vol., 10s. net.

The Academy.—"This book is a valuable, a fascinating contribution to the popular knowledge of Japan, and its coloured illustrations by Japanese artists lend much distinction to its pages."

A HISTORY OF CHINESE LITERATURE.

By Professor H. A. GILES, LL.D. Crown 8vo, 6s.

["LITERATURES OF THE WORLD."]

The Academy.—"Dr. Giles wears his prodigious learning lightly; his style is bright and easy; he is also a poet. The pages are sprinkled with his translations of Chinese versifiers. He has done for a nation what Fitzgerald did for an individual."

A POLITICAL HISTORY OF CONTEMPORARY EUROPE SINCE 1814.

From the French of CHARLES SEIGNOBOS. 2 vols., demy 8vo, £1 net.

The Standard.—"Students of contemporary history will be grateful for this important work. Nothing could be better than his description of our political progress from the end of the Great War to the present day. The summary of French political history is equally well done; the section on Germany is singularly interesting."

TEN MONTHS IN THE FIELD WITH THE BOERS.

By an EX-LIEUTENANT OF GENERAL DE VILLEBOIS-MAREUIL. With a Portrait and Map. 1 vol., 3s. 6d.

The Globe.—"One of the most notable books that have arisen out of the South African campaign. He writes with vivacity and humour, and his pages should be widely read."

Recent Novels and Stories.

THE MANTLE OF ELIJAH.

By I. ZANGWILL. 6s.

Literature.—"In 'The Mantle of Elijah' we are delighted to recognise the true spirit of the novelist at his best, the skill of the artist, the fine sympathy of the poet, the verbal wit and the constructive humour of the dramatist. It will live."

THE HOSTS OF THE LORD.

By FLORA ANNIE STEEL. 6s.

The Outlook.—"A study of that inexhaustible India; a study of the East and West at close touch with one another; and as a novel of passion, this is Mrs. Steel's best work."

THE QUEEN versus BILLY,

And Other Stories, by LLOYD OSBOURNE. 6s.

The Pall Mall Gazette.—"Not one falls below a notably high level, while three or four of them at least attain what short stories not often do—the certainty that they will be re-read and vividly remembered between re-reading."

THE BLACK TORTOISE:

Being the Strange Story of Old Frick's Diamond.

By FREDERICK VILLER. 3s. 6d.

The Outlook.—"Lively, exciting, and sensational."

The DOLLAR LIBRARY of AMERICAN FICTION

A New Series of American Fiction in monthly volumes price FOUR SHILLINGS each, or TWO GUINEAS, post-free, for a subscription of 12 volumes. Vol. I. is now ready.

The GIRL at the HALFWAY HOUSE

By E. HOUGH.

The Athenæum.—"In Mr. Hough we have a recruit to the ranks of novelists who not only knows how to tell a story in an interesting fashion, but also possesses unusual powers as a writer. If the story which he tells were poor, which it is very far from being, the manner of its telling might suffice to earn those readers who have a liking for that most elusive of literary qualities, style. Characterisation and atmosphere are alike excellent."

HALL CAINE'S NOVELS AND STORIES.

THE CHRISTIAN. Cloth, 6s.; paper covers, 2s. 6d.

THE MANXMAN. 6s.

THE SCAPEGOAT. 6s.

THE BONDMAN. 6s.

CAPTAIN DAVY'S HONEYMOON, and other Stories. 3s. 6d.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

SMITH ELDER & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

IMMEDIATELY.—With a Map and 10 Text Plans, large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE SIEGE OF THE PEKING LEGATIONS.

By the Rev. ROLAND ALLEN,

Chaplain to the Right Rev. C. P. Scott, D.D., Lord Bishop in North China; for five years Acting Chaplain to H.B.M.'s Legation in Peking.

IMMEDIATELY.—With Portrait Frontispiece, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

SOUTH AFRICA A CENTURY AGO.

Letters Written from the Cape of Good Hope, 1797-1801.

By the Lady ANNE BARNARD.

Edited, with a Memoir and brief Notes, by W. H. WILKINS, F.S.A.

NEW WORK BY THE HON. A. S. G. CANNING.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

BRITISH POWER and THOUGHT:

a Historical Enquiry. By the Hon. ALBERT S. G. CANNING, Author of "British Rule and Modern Politics," "History in Fact and Fiction," &c.

Observer.—"A new essay of considerable interest."

Sunday Times.—"Alike historical, analytical, and critical.....The author shows considerable research and a wide acquaintance with British literature."

TWO NOVELS BY NEW WRITERS.

ON MARCH 26th.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

A CARDINAL AND HIS CONSCIENCE.

By GRAHAM HOPE.

LOVE AND HONOUR.

By M. E. CARR. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Outlook.—"Soundly constructed and written movingly."

Spectator.—"Miss Carr has originality and no little literary skill..... Her story is interesting and original."

Speaker.—"The tragic dénouement is developed with vigour and due impressiveness, and many of the characters are sympathetically sketched in..... It is a distinctly readable romance."

NEW NOVEL BY S. R. CROCKETT.

NEARLY READY.—With 12 Full-Page Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

The Silver Skull.

By S. R. CROCKETT,

AUTHOR OF "CLEG KELLY," "THE RED AXE," "LITTLE ANNA MARK," &c.

NEW AND CHEAPER ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF "RODNEY STONE."

ON MARCH 26th.—With 8 Full-Page Illustrations, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

RODNEY STONE. New and Cheaper

Illustrated Edition. By A. CONAN DOYLE, Author of "The White Company," "The Great Boer War," &c.

A HANDBOOK of the ADMINISTRATION

OF GREAT BRITAIN DURING the NINETEENTH CENTURY, 1801-1900. By FRANCIS CULLING CARR-GOMM, late of H.M. Madras Civil Service, and of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. New Edition, crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

Standard.—"Most useful and carefully compiled..... The volume is indispensable to politicians for the purposes of reference."

CAVALIER and PURITAN in the DAYS of the STUARTS. Compiled from the Private Papers and Diary of Sir Richard Newdigate, Second Baronet, with Extracts from MS. Newsletters addressed to him between 1675 and 1689. By LADY ANNE EMILY NEWDIGATE-NEWDIGATE, Author of "The Cheverels of Cheverel Manor," &c. With a Photogravure Portrait of Sir Richard Newdigate. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. Shortly.

NEW 6s NOVELS IN THE PRESS.

PACIFICO. By John Randal.

THE SEAL of SILENCE. By Arthur R. CONDER.

THE ARCHBISHOP and the LADY. By Mrs. SCHUYLER GROUT VINSHIELD.

* * * Messrs. SMITH, ELDER & CO. will be happy to forward a copy of their CATALOGUE, post free on application.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

From OLIPHANT'S LIST.

Beautifully printed and bound, price 3s. 6d. net.

WINSOME WOMANHOOD

Familiar Talks on Life and Conduct. By MARGARET E. SANGSTER. Illustrated by Studies from Life by W. B. Dyer.

FAMOUS SCOTS.—NEW VOLUME.

DAVID LIVINGSTONE.

By T. BANKS MACLAUCHLAN. Price 1s. 6d. net; cloth gilt, 2s. net. [This day.

AN EPOCH-MAKING BOOK.

CHINA'S ONLY HOPE. An Appeal by Her Greatest Viceroy, CHANG CHIH TUNG, Viceroy of Hupeh and Hunan, with Indorsement by the present Emperor. Translated by S. I. Woodbridge. Introduction by Dr. Griffith John. With Frontispiece. 3s. 6d.

DR. MARTIN'S VIEWS AND EXPERIENCES.
THE SIEGE IN PEKING: China against the World. By an Eye-Witness, W. A. P. MARTIN, D.D. LL.D., President of the Chinese Imperial University, Author of "A Cycle of Cathay." With Maps and 16 Illustrations. 3s. 6d.

The First and Second Large Editions being exhausted, a THIRD EDITION is Now Ready of the LIFE OF GENERAL WAUGHOP. By WILLIAM BAIRD, F.S.A. (Scot.). With Portraits and Illustrations. Price 2s. 6d.

New SIXPENNY EDITION (50,000) of
ANNIE S. SWAN'S "ST. VEOA'S; or, the Pearl of Orr's Haven." Also in cloth, well bound, 1s.

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON, AND FERRIER, 21, Paternoster Square, E.C.; and Edinburgh.

WALTER SCOTT'S LIST.

THE CONTEMPORARY SCIENCE SERIES.

Edited by HAVELOCK ELLIS.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s. With Illustrations.

THE CHILD: A Study in the Evolution of Man.

By ALEXANDER FRANCIS CHAMBERLAIN, M.A., Ph.D., Lecturer on Anthropology in Clark University, Worcester, Mass.

"The work contains much curious information, and should be studied by those who have to do with children."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

READY END OF MARCH.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s. With over 100 Illustrations.

THE MEDITERRANEAN RACE.

By Professor SERGI.

In this book, which is almost entirely new, and has been specially prepared by the Author for the "Contemporary Science Series," Professor Sergi has presented the first full statement of the facts and views that—since he first brought them forward five years ago—have done so much to revolutionise the Aryan question. The evidence there contained tends to show that the race inhabiting Southern Europe and Northern Africa formerly occupied, and to some extent still occupies, the greater part of Central and Northern Europe, including the British Isles, and has played the chief part in European civilisation.

NEW EDITION OF IBSEN'S PROSE DRAMAS

Edited by WILLIAM ARCHER.

In the new edition each play will form a volume by itself. The typographical features of the original Norwegian editions will, so far as possible, be reproduced. The names of the characters will be placed above their speeches instead of in the same line, thus giving the page a lighter and more attractive appearance. Each volume will contain a frontispiece, representing, as a rule, one of the leading characters as embodied by a well-known actor or actress.

Royal 16mo, paper cover, 1s. 6d.; cloth, 2s. 6d.

NOW READY.

(1) THE LEAGUE OF YOUTH. | (2) PILLARS OF SOCIETY.

(3) A DOLL'S HOUSE

IN PREPARATION.

(4) GHOSTS.

| (5) AN ENEMY OF THE PEOPLE.

THE SCOTT LIBRARY.

Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, price 1s. 6d. per vol.

NEW VOLUME.

SCOTS ESSAYISTS: From Stirling to Stevenson.

Edited, with an Introduction, by OLIPHANT SMEATON, Author of "Allan Ramsay," "Tobias Smollett," "William Dunbar," "Thomas Guthrie," "English Satires and Satirists," &c., &c.

THE CANTERBURY POETS.

Square 8vo, cut and uncut edges, 1s. per vol.

Also "Gravure" Edition, in rich art linen binding, each volume with Portrait or other Frontispiece in Photogravure, 2s. per vol.

NEW VOLUMES.

POEMS by JAMES THOMSON. With Introduction by WILLIAM BAYNE, Author of "James Thomson" in the "Famous Scots Series."

POEMS by ALEXANDER SMITH. With a Prefatory Note by R. E. D. SKETCHLEY. [Ready end of March.
Complete Lists of any of the above Series post free on application.

London: WALTER SCOTT, LIMITED, Paternoster Square, E.C.

MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' NEW PUBLICATIONS.

A LEADER of LIGHT HORSE: LIFE of HODSON of HODSON'S HORSE. By Captain L. J. TROTTER, Author of "Life of John Nicholson, Soldier and Statesman." With a Portrait. In 1 vol.

MOUNTAINS of NECESSITY. By Hester

WHITE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Ready.

A HISTORY OF CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY CRICKET

OLUS. By W. J. FORD, Author of "A History of Middlesex County Cricket," &c. With Illustrations. In 1 vol., demy 8vo.

BELGIUM and the BELGIANS. By Cyril

SCUDAMORE. With Illustrations. In 1 vol., square crown 8vo.

THE WARDEN of the MARCHES. By

SYDNEY C. GRIER. Author of "Peace with Honour," "The Kings of the East," "Like Another Helen," &c., &c. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.

LIFE OF MAJOR-GENERAL SIR R. MURDOCH SMITH, K.C.M.G., Royal

Engineers. By His Son-in-law, WILLIAM KIRK DICKSON. With Portraits and other Illustrations. In 1 vol., demy 8vo.

HARLAW of SENDLE. From the Papers of THOMAS DENTON, Esquire of Esalby. By JOHN W. GRAHAM, Author of "Nemra." Crown 8vo, 6s.

LIFE, LETTERS, AND DIARIES OF LIEUT.-GEN. SIR GERALD GRAHAM,

V.O., G.O.B., R.E. By Colonel R. H. VETCH, C.B., late Royal Engineers. With Portraits, Map, and his Despatches in full. In 1 vol., demy 8vo.

THE EARLIER RENAISSANCE: being the New Volume of Periods of European Literature. By Professor SAINTSBURY. In 1 vol., crown 8vo.

THE EXTERMINATION OF LOVE. A

Fragmentary Study in Erotics. By E. GERARD (Madame DE LASZOWSKA), Author of "A Foreigner," &c.; Joint-Author of "Renta." In 1 vol., crown 8vo.

Memorial Edition.

WORKS BY G. W. STEEVENS.

In crown 8vo Volumes, price 6s. each.

THINGS SEEN. With Memoirs by W. E. HENLEY, and Portrait.—WITH KITCHENER to KHARTUM.—FROM CAPETOWN to LADYSMITH; EGYPT in 1898.—THE LAND of the DOLLAR.—IN INDIA.—GLIMPSES of THREE NATIONS (In April).

Library Edition.

GEORGE ELIOT'S WORKS.

Demy 8vo Volumes, price 10s. 6d. net each.

Messrs. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS beg to announce a new LIBRARY EDITION of GEORGE ELIOT'S WORKS, in 10 vols., to be issued in Monthly Volumes. A feature of the Edition will be the PHOTOGRAVURE FRONTISPIECES from Drawings by WILLIAM HATHERELL, EDGAR BUNDY, R.L., BYAM SHAW, R.L., A. A. VAN ANKROO, and MAURICE GREIFFENHAGEN.

Vol. 1.—ADAM BEDE.

[Ready in April.

Warwick Edition.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS.

This Edition will give the NOVELS of GEORGE ELIOT in a new and compact form. The Volumes consist of from 400 to 500 pages, and the page measures 4 x 6½ inches. The paper used for the Series is of a special make—as thin as India paper and very opaque. The volumes will be issued monthly in three styles of binding:—

CLOTH, limp, gilt top, 2s. net per volume.

LEATHER, limp, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net per volume.

PERBIAN, gilt top, with bookmark, 3s. net per volume.

Vol. 1.—ADAM BEDE.

[Ready about March 27.

* The Publishers will be pleased to forward on application a Prospectus showing the type and size of page of these editions.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

Spring Announcements Supplement.

SATURDAY: 23 MARCH, 1901.

The Spring Publishing Season.

New Books and Announcements.

WE sometimes think that the lamentations of publishers are a mere habit, inherent in the blood and received from an older day when, perhaps, the School Board was only just getting to work. Their depression is so rarely translated into action; they moan, but they publish. The prospects of the Spring Season were anything but bright, and we had expected a famine of books. That famine fills twenty-seven columns of this week's ACADEMY, and we do not profess to have recorded by any means all the books announced. The classes of books most prominent in the lists are Fiction, Theology, Biography, and History. More than two hundred new novels are announced, and the number of Theological works does not fall far behind. In Biography there are about fifty volumes, in History nearly as many, in Poetry a score. Belles-Lettres is a vague term, and defies a useful analysis; but there are some books under this head that are likely to interest. M. Maeterlinck's "The Life of the Bee" will be issued by Mr. George Allen. Mr. Whibley's monograph on Thackeray will take its place in Messrs. Blackwood's "Modern English Writers" series. Mr. William Archer has long been the champion of our living "minor" poets. He objects to the name "minor," a word which will not be found in his Poets of the Younger Generation, to be issued through Mr. Lane. Mr. A. Stodart-Walker's Robert Buchanan, the Poet of Modern Revolt, will also come from Mr. Lane. We have already reviewed Mr. Beeching's Two Lectures Introductory to the Study of Poetry and Mr. Churton Collins's Ephemeris Critica. Mr. Baildon's study of Robert Louis Stevenson is already published. Amid much that resembles bric-à-brac it is interesting to observe the progress of a work of such thorough and stately scholarship as Mr. G. C. Macaulay's Complete Works of John Gower, of which the second and third volumes will be issued by the Clarendon Press. We observe that Mr. E. A. Baker has in the press a manual called A Descriptive Guide to the Best English Fiction.

In the reprinting of standard works there is great activity. Messrs. Blackwood are issuing two complete editions of George Eliot's works, in anticipation of the exhaustion of copyright. Messrs. Macmillan's reissue of the Border edition of the Waverley novels, Messrs. Chapman & Hall's "Authentic" Dickens, Mr. Murray's Byron, Messrs. Smith, Elder's complete edition of the poems of Mr. Robert Bridges, Messrs. Chatto's "Author's Edition de Luxe" of Mark Twain, all these are in progress.

There is bustle, also, among our younger novelists, "arrived" and arriving. Mr. Eden Phillpotts, Mr. Tom Gallon, Mr. W. J. Locke, Mr. Thomas Cobb, Mr. Edwin Pugh, Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe, Mr. E. F. Benson, Mr. J. A. Steuart, and Mr. Albert Kinross all have novels to offer; and, among women-novelists, we observe the names of Mme. Grand, Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler, Miss Mary A. Dickens, Miss Mary Findlater and Miss J. Helen Findlater, "George Egerton," and "Sidney C. Grier."

Many biographies of Queen Victoria are published or publishing—from the sumptuous Life of Queen Victoria under the auspices of the Times (Sampson Low) to Miss Correlli's Passing of the Great Queen (Methuen). Mr. G. S. Layard's Life of Mrs. Lynn Linton (Methuen) should be full of matter. Prof. Max Müller's Autobiography: a Fragment is just published. The Further Memoirs of Marie Bashkirtseff, recently published in the Gentlewoman, will be issued by Mr. Grant Richards, who also has in his list

The Day-Book of John Stuart Blackie, edited by Mr. A. Stodart-Walker. The Junius controversy may be stimulated by the publication of the edition of the Francis Letters which Messrs. Hutchinson are issuing under the editorship of Beata Francis and Eliza Keary.

History is very solid this Spring, and the chief event will be the issue by the Cambridge University Press of the first volume of The Cambridge Modern History, edited by Lord Acton. Mr. Andrew Lang will be represented by The Mystery of Mary Stuart (Longmans). Books on Alfred the Great are numerous, and are inspired, of course, by the forthcoming commemoration at Winchester. Naval and military histories and narratives are many, and there is little trace of that "slump" in South African war books, of which we heard so much a little while ago. Indeed, look where one will, there is plenty of life. Art books, for instance, have a very healthy look, thanks largely to the efforts of Messrs. Bell & Sons. One is impressed by the volume and vitality of the literary work now being done in all quarters. Everywhere there is industry and eagerness.

Mr. George Allen.

Maeterlinck (Maurice), The Life of the Bee	net 6/0
Morrah (Herbert), The Literary Year-Book, 1901	net 3/6
Murray (Gilbert), Euripides: Hippolytus and Bacchæ , and Aristophanes' Frogs	net 7/6
Whittuck (Rev. Charles), The "Good Man" of the Eighteenth Century	6/0
Webb (E. A.), A Guide to the Churches of Chislehurst net 1/0, cloth net	1/6
Thirlmere (Rowland), A Woman of Emotions, and other Poems	5/0

FICTION.

Cornford (L. Cope), Northborough Cross	6/0
Pryce (Daisy Hugh), The Pasha	6/0
Düring (Stella M.), Malicious Fortune	6/0

Mr. Edward Arnold.

Percy (Earl), Highlands of Asiatic Turkey	net 14/0
Powles (L. D.), The Khaki Alphabet	net 1/0
Hughes (James L.), Dickens as an Educator	6/0
The Journal of Mrs. Fenton in India and the Colonies, 1826-1830	net 8/6
Publications of the Essex House Press:
Gray's Elegy written in a Country Churchyard	net 42/0
Ashbee (C. R.), An Endeavour towards the Teaching of John Ruskin and William Morris
The Psalms of David, according to the text of the Anglican Prayer-Book
Erasmus' Praise of Folly . Sir Thomas Challoner's translation (Elizabethan)

FICTION.

Bagot (Richard), Casting of Nets	6/0
Roberts (Morley), Lord Linlithgow	6/0
Clouston (J. Storer), The Duke	6/0
Russell (W. Clark), Rose Island	6/0
Pickering (Sidney), Verity	6/0
Radford (Mrs. C. H.), Jenny of the Villa	6/0

Mr. J. W. Arrowsmith.

HUMOUR, FICTION, &c.

Jerome (Jerome K.), Observations of Henry	1/0
Hervey (Maurice), Dr. Somerville's Crime	1/0
Phillpotts (Eden), The Good Red Earth	3/6
Kinross (Albert), The Early Stars	6/0
Owen (Rye), Red Headed Gill	6/0
Slater (Theo), A Risky Experiment	3/6
Hamilton (Cosmo), Impertinent Dialogues	3/6
Moore (Arthur), The Eyes of Light	3/6
Howard (Kemble), The Chicot Papers . Illustrated by Tom Browne	1/0

Allen (The late Grant), His Last Chance, and Other Stories	1/0
Russell (Fox), Sporting Sorrows	1/0
Alcock (C. W.), Cricket Stories: Wise and Otherwise	1/0
Dawson (Agnes), The Novice	1/0

Messrs. Bell.

Berenson (Bernhard), The Study and Criticism of Italian Art
Bell (C. F.), A List of the Exhibited Works of J. W. M. Turner, R.A.	21/0
German Book-Plates:
Leiningen-Westerburg (Count Zu), A Handbook of German and Austrian Exlibris	12/6
Crane (Walter), The Decorative Illustration of Books Old and New. Revised Edition	6/0
The Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture:
Cook (Herbert), Giorgione	5/0
Weale (W. H. James), Memlinc	5/0
Waters (W. G.), Piero della Francesca	5/0
Phillips (Evelyn March), Pintoricchio	5/0
Cossio (Manuel B.), El Greco	5/0
Bell's Cathedral Series:
Strange (E. F.), Worcester	1/6
Robson (Philip), St. David's	1/6
Massé (H. J. L. J.), Bristol. With a Chapter on St. Mary Redcliffe	1/6
Hallett (Cecil), Ripon	1/6
Sweeting (Rev. W. D.), Ely	1/6
Corlette (H. C.), Chichester	1/6
Perkins (Rev. T.), An Itinerary of English Cathedrals
Smith-Dampier (Mrs.), Journal of the Lady Beatrix Graham
Colegrove (F. W.), Memory: an Inductive Study
Ready (A. W.), Précis and Précis-Writing
Handbooks of English Literature:
Secombe (Thomas) and Allen (J. W.), The Age of Shakespeare	3/6
Snell (F. J.), The Age of Chaucer	3/6
Handbooks of Great Public Schools:
Warner (R. Townsend), Winchester	3/6
Williams (J. Fischer), Harrow	3/6
Armstrong (G. E.), Torpedoes and Torpedo Vessels	5/0

NEW EDITIONS.

The Letters of Thomas Gray, including the Correspondence of Gray and Mason. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by Duncan C. Tovey	3/6
Shuckburgh (Evelyn S.), The Letters of Cicero: a New and Complete Translation. 4 vols.	5/0
The History of Early Italian Literature to the Death of Dante. Translated from the German of Adolf Gaspari, together with the Author's Additions to the Italian Translation (1887), and with Supplementary Biographical Notes (1887-1899) by Herman Oelander, M.A., Ph.D.	3/6
The Prose Works of Jonathan Swift, D.D. Edited by Temple Scott. Vol. V.: Historical and Political Tracts—English	3/6
The Works of Charles Stuart Calverley. Complete in one volume. With a Memoir by Sir Walter J. Sendall, net	6/0
Browning's Rabbi Ben Ezra. Printed at the Chiswick Press	2/6
Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. Translated by George Long, M.A. With Introduction and Notes. Printed on India paper at the Oxford University Press	2/0

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

Encyclopædia Biblica: a Dictionary of the Bible. Vol I., A. to D, and Vol. II., E. to K.	20/0
Handley (Rev. Hubert), The Fatal Opulence of Bishops: an Essay on a Neglected Ingredient of Church Reform	5/0
Abbott (Edwin A.), Clue: a Guide through Greek to Hebrew Scripture	7/6
Abbott (Edwin A.), The Corrections of Mark: adopted by Matthew and Luke
Harnack (Prof. Adolf), The Apostles' Creed. Translated by Stewart Means, and Edited by Thomas Bailey Saunders	1/6
Harnack (Prof. Adolf), Christianity and History. Translated, with the Author's sanction, by Thomas Bailey Saunders, with an Introductory Note. Second and Revised Edition	1/6

Butler (Rev. D.), Scottish Cathedrals and Abbeys	1/6
Robertson (Rev. Wm.), Studies in the Acts of the Apostles	net 0/6
Menpes (Mortimer), War Impressions	20/0
Pearson (Karl), National Life from the Standpoint of Science	1/6
Sidgwick (Alfred), The Use of Words in Reasoning	7/6
Graham (Rev. Henry Grey), The Social Life of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century. One Volume Edition	12/0
Nicholson (J. Shield), Money and Essays on Present Monetary Problems	7/6
Messrs. Black's list includes, besides the above, many new text-books, "Readers," &c.

Messrs. Blackie & Son.

Rait (R. S.), The Scottish Parliament
Rait (R. S.), An Outline of the Relations between England and Scotland to the Union of the Parliaments
Yorke (Philip C.), Note-Book of French Literature. Vol. I.
Weekley (Prof.), Primer of French Literature	2/6
Sandford (Prof.), Virgil's Æneid. Book II.	1/6
Winbolt (S. E.), Virgil's Georgics. Book II.
Ensor (Ernest E.), Ovid's Metamorphoses. Book I.
Brown (Prof.), Caesar's Gallic War. Book V.	1/6
Liddell (A. C.), Greek Grammar Papers
Smith (J. C.), Much Ado About Nothing
The Warwick Shakespeare Series:
Julius Caesar	1/0
Downie (John), Macaulay's Lives of Johnson and Goldsmith
Wilson (Miss Agnes), Browning's Strafford
Lowe (Miss L. A.), First German Book
Etheridge (W. G.), German Unseens for Middle and Upper Forms

Messrs. Blackwood & Sons.

Saintsbury (George), A History of Criticism and Literary Taste in Europe. From the Earliest Texts to the Present Day. Vol. I.—Classical and Mediæval Criticism	16/0
Craik (Sir Henry), A Century of Scottish History: From the Days before the '45 to those within Living Memory. 2 vols.	30/0
Forrest (G. W.), Sepoy Generals: Wellington to Roberts
Vetch (Colonel R. H.), Life, Letters, and Diaries of Lieut.-General Sir Gerald Graham, V.C.
Dickson (William Kirk), Life of Major-General Sir Murdoch Smith, K.C.M.G., Royal Engineers
Macintosh (William), Rabbi Jesus: Sage and Saviour
Whibley (Charles), Modern English Writers: William Makepeace Thackeray	2/6
Dickson (William Kirk), The County Histories of Scotland: Edinburgh and Linlithgow	7/6
G. W. Stevens's Works (Memorial Edition):
Things Seen. With Memoir by W. E. Henley, and Portrait	6/0
Glimpses of Three Nations	6/0
With Kitchener to Khartum	6/0
From Capetown to Ladysmith; Egypt in 1898	6/0
In India	6/0
The Land of the Dollar	6/0
Hurd (Archibald S.), The British Fleet: Is it Sufficient and Efficient?	1/0
Fulton (T. Wemyss), The Sovereignty of the Sea: an Historical Account of the Claims to the Exclusive Dominion of the British Seas and of the Evolution of the Territorial Waters, with Special Reference to the Rights of Fishing
Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Arthur Freeman: a Memoir
Selections from the Writings of the Honourable Sir Charles Augustus Murray. Collected and Edited by his Wife
Travels in North America During the Years 1834, 1835, and 1836
Hassan; or, The Child of the Pyramid: an Egyptian Tale
A Handy Vocabulary: English-Africander, Africander-English. For the Use of English-speaking People in South Africa

John, Marquess of Bute, K.T., Stevenson (J. H.), and Lonsdale (H. W.), The Arms of the Baronial and Police Burghs of Scotland
The Roman Breviary. Reformed by Order of the Holy Oecumenical Council of Trent; Published by Order of Pope St. Pius V.; and Revised by Clement VIII. and Urban VIII.; together with the Offices since granted. Translated out of Latin into English by John, Marquess of Bute, K.T. New Edition, Revised and Enlarged.....
George Eliot's Works (The Library Edition):
Adam Bede	10/6
The Mill on the Floss	10/6
Romola	10/6
Scenes of Clerical Life	10/6
Silas Marner; Brother Jacob; The Lifted Veil.....	10/6
Felix Holt, the Radical	10/6
Middlemarch	10/6
Daniel Deronda	10/6
Jubal; The Spanish Gypsy	10/6
Essays; Theophrastus Such	10/6
George Eliot's Novels (The Warwick Edition): cloth, limp, gilt top, 2s. net per volume; imitation leather, limp, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net per volume; leather, limp, gilt top, with book-marker, 3s. net per volume—Adam Bede—The Mill on the Floss—Felix Holt, the Radical—Romola—Scenes of Clerical Life.
Philosophical Classics for English Readers (reissue in shilling volumes), edited by William Knight, LL.D.: Mahaffy (Prof.), Descartes—Lucas Collins (Rev. W.), Butler—Campbell Fraser (Prof.), Berkeley—Adamson (Prof.), Fichte—Wallace (Prof.), Kant—Veitch (Prof.), Hamilton—Master of Balliol, Hegel—Merz (John Theodore), Leibniz—Flint (Prof.), Vico—Croom Robertson (Prof.), Hobbes—&c., &c.
Cheap Reissue of Kinglake's Crimea:
Origin of the War.....	3/6
Russia Met and Invaded.....	3/6
Battle of the Alma	3/6
Sebastopol at Bay	3/6
The Battle of Balaklava	3/6
The Battle of Inkerman	3/6
The Winter Troubles	3/6
From Inkerman to the Fall of Canrobert	3/6
Pelissier's Command to the Death of Lord Raglan ...	3/6
Ranjitsinhji (Prince), The Jubilee Book of Cricket . Cheap Edition	6
Fahie (J. J.), A History of Wireless Telegraphy, 1838-1900 . Second Edition, revised.....	6/0
Michie (Alexander), The Englishman in China during the Victorian Era, as Illustrated in the Career of Sir Rutherford Alcock, K.C.B.	38/0
Kinnear (Alfred), Our House of Commons: its Realities and Romance . Second Edition, revised	3/6
Martin (Sir Theodore), Helena Faucit (Lady Martin) . Second Edition	10/6
Kennedy (Admiral Sir William), Hurrah for the Life of a Sailor! Fifty Years in the Royal Navy . Fifth Impression.....	12/6
Magnus (Laurie) and Headlam (Cecil), Flowers of the Cave Seventy Years at Westminster, with other Letters and Notes of the Late Right Hon. Sir John Mowbray, Bart., M.P. Edited by his Daughter.....	7/6
Hueffer (F. Madox), The Cinque Ports: an Historical and Descriptive Record	63/0
Malcolm (Ian), The Calendar of Empire: a Tribute to Lives, Deeds, and Words that have gained Glory for Great and Greater Britain	15/0
Callwell (Major C. E.), Tactics of To-day	2/6
FICTION.
Munro (Neil), Doom Castle: a Romance	6/0
Grier (Sydney C.), The Warden of the Marches	6/0
Graham (John W.), Harlaw of Sandle, from the Papers of Thomas Denton, Esquire of Eselby	6/0
White (Hester), Mountains of Necessity	6/0
Gerard (E.) (Mme. de Laszowska), The Extermination of Love: a Fragmentary Study in Erotics	6/0
Constable (F. C.), Marrables' Magnificent Idea	6/0
Melvyn (Sybylla Penelope), My Brilliant Career	6/0
Sterne (Philip), Mr. Leopold Lugwell: his Birth and Upbringing	6/0
Hutton (Edward), Frederick Uvedale	6/0
Clifford (Hugh), Bushwhacking, and Other Sketches	6/0

Messrs. Burns & Oates.

The Madonna: A History of the Representation of the Blessed Virgin in Art. Translated from the Italian of Adolfo Venturi. With an Introduction by Mrs. Meynell
Vaughan (Right Rev. Monsignor John S.), Faith and Folly
MacLaughlin (Rev. J.), The Divine Plan of the Church: Where Realised, and Where Not
Avis (Whyte), The Catholic Girl in the World . Second Series
Devout Reflections on Various Spiritual Subjects for the profit of Souls who desire to advance in Divine Love. By St. Alphonsus Maria de Liguori, Bishop of Agatha, and Founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. Newly translated from the Italian by Father Edmund Vaughan, of the same Congregation...
The Little Flower of Jesus: an Autobiography. By Sister Thérèse, a Carmelite Nun. Translated from the French by Michael Henry Dziewicki. Illustrated.....

Cambridge University Press.

Taylor (C.), Origen's Hexapla . Part of Psalm 22 (LXX. 21). From a Cairo Palimpsest	15/0
Midrash Haggadol. Edited from several Yemen MSS., with Introduction, Commentary, and Notes, by S. Schechter
Thackeray (H. St. John), Grammar of Septuagint Greek
Wordsworth (Chr.), Salisbury Processions and Ceremonies
The Prayer Book of Aldenald the Bishop, commonly called the Book of Cerne, edited by Dom A. B. Kuypers
The Curetonian Syriac Gospels: Re-edited, together with the Readings of the Sinaitic Codex and a translation into English, by F. C. Burkitt
The Use of Sarum. Vol. II. The Ordinal and the Tonal. The original Texts edited from the MSS., by the Rev. W. H. Frere
Moorsom (Rev. R. M.), Renderings from Eastern and Western Office Books
The Jātaka. Translated from the Pali under the Superintendence of Prof. E. B. Cowell. To be published in Six or Seven Volumes.
Vol. V. Translated by H. T. Francis and R. A. Neil	12/6
Vol. VI. Translated by Prof. E. B. Cowell	12/6
Browne (E. G.), Hand-list of Muhammadan MSS. preserved in the Cambridge University Library, including all those (Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Urdu, Malay, &c.) which are written in the Arabic character	15/0
Wright (W.), Catalogue of Syriac MSS. in the Cambridge University Library
The Didascalia Apostolorum in Syriac, from a MS. in Mesopotamia, with Variants from the Paris MS. and Translation. Edited by Margaret Dunlop Gibson ...
Hinde (Mrs.), The Masai Language, Grammatical Notes, together with a Vocabulary	3/6
Malay Folk Tales. Translated by W. W. Skeat
Roberts (W. Rhys), Dionysius of Halicarnassus: The Three Literary Letters. Greek Text with English Translation, Facsimile, Notes, &c.	9/0
Plato, The Republic . Edited by J. Adam.....
Aristophanes. Equites . With Introduction and Notes by R. A. Neil.....
Aeschylus Choephoroe . Edited by T. G. Tucker
Cambridge Patristic Texts:
Gregory. Oratio Catechetica . Edited by J. H. Srawley
Augustine. De Doctrina Christiana . Edited by H. F. Stewart
Serapion. Edited by F. E. Brightman
The Cambridge Modern History. Edited by Lord Acton. Vol. I.....
The Teaching of History. Edited by Lord Acton. Among the contributors, each of whom will deal with a different aspect of history teaching, will be Prof. Gwatkin, Mr. R. L. Poole, Dr. Cunningham, Mr. Tanner, Mr. Woodward, Mr. Marten, and Prof. Ashley.....
Gooch (G. P.), Annals of Politics and Culture, 1492-1899	7/6

Stevenson (William Henry), The Anglo-Saxon Chancery: A History of the Charters of the Old-English Kings, being the Sanders Lectures delivered in the University of Cambridge, 1898
Kenny (Courtney), Select Cases in Criminal Law
Records of the Borough of Leicester. Being a Series of Extracts from the Archives of the Corporation of Leicester. Edited by Mary Bateson. Vol. II. 1327—1509	25/0
Walker (T. A.), A History of the Law of Nations. Vol. II.
Roby (H. J.), Roman Private Law
Head (F. W.), The Fallen Stuarts
Headlam (J. W.), Germany, 1815—1890. 2 vols.
Payne (E. J.), The Colonisation of South America
The Triumphs of Turlogh. Edited, with Translation, Glossary, and Appendices, by Standish Hayes O'Grady
Wyatt (A. J.), An Elementary Old English Reader
Macgregor (D. H.), Lord Macaulay: Being the Members' Prize Essay for 1900
Sayle (Charles), Early English Printed Books in the University Library, Cambridge (1475—1640) Vol. I. Caxton to F. Kingston	15/0
Clark (J. W.), The Care of Books: An Essay on the Buildings, Fittings, and General Arrangements of Libraries from Roman Times to the End of the Last Century
James (M. R.), The Western Manuscripts in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge. A Descriptive Catalogue Vol. I.	15/0
Beeching (Rev. H. C.), Two Lectures Introductory to the Study of Poetry	2/0
Whittaker (Thomas), The Neo-Platonists: a Study in the History of Hellenism	7/6
Jebb (Sir R. C.), Macaulay: a Lecture Delivered at Cambridge on August 10, 1900, in Connexion with the Summer Meeting of University Extension Students	2/0
Education in the Nineteenth Century: Lectures Delivered in the Education Section of the Cambridge University Extension Summer Meeting in August, 1900. Edited by R. D. Roberts	4/0

Messrs. Cassell & Co.

Royal Academy Pictures, 1901. In Five Parts. Each, 1/0; and one volume	7/6
Queen Victoria: Her Life in Portraits	0/6 & 1/0
Pinhorn (Alfred), Spending and Saving	1/0
Wright (Walter), Pictorial Practical Fruit Growing	1/0
Harrison (Rev. A. J.), An Eventful Life	6/0
Buckley (Arabella), Cassell's "Eyes and No Eyes": Books I. and II.	0/4
Books III., IV., V. and VI.	0/6
Overton (J. H.), A Practical Method of Teaching Geography	0/6
Milton (Viscount), The North-West Passage by Land	2/0
The Century Science Series—Cheap Edition in Monthly Volumes:
Thompson (Prof. Silvanus P.), Michael Faraday: his Life and Work	2/6
Poulton (E. B.), Charles Darwin and the Theory of Natural Selection	2/6
Clerke (Agnes M.), The Herschels and Modern Astronomy	2/6

FICTION.

Jones (Dora M.), A Soldier of the King	6/0
Stockton (Frank R.), Afield and Afloat	6/0
Bloundelle-Burton (John), A Vanished Rival	6/0

NEW EDITIONS AND SERIAL ISSUES.

Cassell's Concise Bible Dictionary, Cheap Edition	5/0
Macwhirter (J.), Landscape Painting in Water-Colours ..	5/0
Oliphant (Mrs.), Queen Victoria: A Personal Sketch	3/6
" " The Life and Times of Queen Victoria.
In about 29 weekly parts	0/6
Cassell's Natural History. In 26 fortnightly parts	0/6
Cassell's History of England. In about 68 weekly parts ..
each	0/6
Griffiths (Major Arthur), Mysteries of Police and Crime.
In monthly parts	0/6

Dixon (Hepworth), Her Majesty's Tower. In monthly parts	0/6
The Queen's London. In 15 weekly parts	0/6
Familiar Wild Birds. In about 20 fortnightly parts	0/6
Sixpenny Editions:
Pemberton (Max), Sea Wolves.
Swan (Annie S.), Adam Hepburn's Vow.
Couch (A. T. Q.), The Splendid Spur.
Meade (L. T.), The Medicine Lady.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus

McCarthy (Justin) and McCarthy (Justin Huntly), A History of the Four Georges and of William the Fourth. Vols. III. and IV.
Stevenson (Robert Louis), In the South Seas	6/0
Baildon (H. Bellys), Robert Louis Stevenson: a Life Study in Criticism	6/0
Pond (Major J. B.), Eccentricities of Genius: Memories of Famous Men and Women of the Platform and the Stage	12/0
Jones (William), Crowns and Coronations: a History of Regalia	3/6
Besant (Walter), Fifty Years Ago	3/6
O'Rell (Max), Her Royal Highness Woman	3/6
Heckethorn (C. W.), London Memories: Social, Historical, and Topographical	6/0
Merivale (Herman), Bar, Stage, and Platform: Autobiographic Memories	12/0
Besant (Walter), East London	18/0
Osborn (E. B.), Greater Canada: The Past, Present, and Future of the Canadian North-West	3/6
Barr (Robert), The Unchanging East	6/0
Academy Notes, 1901	1/0
Montagu (Irving), Things I Have Seen in War	6/0
Lowe (Charles), Our Greatest Living Soldiers	3/6
Walford's County Families of the United Kingdom (1901)	50/0
Herbert Fry's Royal Guide to the London Charities	1/6
Illustrated Catalogue of the Paris Salon, 1901

FICTION.

Whishaw (Fred.), A Forbidden Name: a Story of the Court of Catherine the Great	6/0
Antrobus (C. L.), Quality Corner: a Study of Remorse ..	6/0
Compton (Herbert), The Inimitable Mrs. Massingham ..	6/0
Vizetelly (Ernest A.), A Path of Thorns	6/0
Glanville (Ernest), Max Thornton	6/0
Meade (Mrs. L. T.), The Blue Diamond	6/0
Hardy (Iza Duffus), The Lesser Evil	6/0
McCarthy (Justin), Mononia: a Love Story of "Forty-eight"	6/0
Murray (David Christie), The Church of Humanity	6/0
Mitchell (Edmund), The Lone Star Rush	6/0
Fenn (Geo. Manville), Running Amok	6/0
Westall (William), Her Ladyship's Secret, and As Luck Would Have It	6/0
Barr (Robert), The Adventures of a Merry Monarch	6/0
Russell (Clark), The Pretty Polly: a Voyage of Incident ..	5/0
Stephens (Robert Neilson), Philip Winwood	6/0
Barr (Robert), The Adventures of a Merry Monarch	6/0
"Sundowner," Told by the Taffrail	3/6
Sims (George R.), The Small-Part Lady, &c.	3/6
Speight (T. W.), The Strange Experiences of Mr. Verschoyle	3/6
Donovan (Dick), Deacon Brodie; or, Behind the Mask, and The Adventures of Tyler Tatlock, Private Detective	3/6
Ross (Albert), A Sugar Princess	3/6

Clarendon Press.

Macaulay (G. C.), The Complete Works of John Gower. Vols. II. and III.
Collins (J. Churton), Plays and Poems of Robert Greene ..
Bridges (R. S.), Milton's Prosody. New Edition
Tozer (H. F.), Notes on the Divina Commedia of Dante ..
Madan (F. A.), A Summary Catalogue of Bodleian MSS. Vols. V. and VI.
Toller (T. N.), Bosworth's Anglo-Saxon Dictionary: Supplement
Jenkyns (Sir H.), British Colonies and Protectorates
Bryce (Rt. Hon. James), Studies in History and Jurisprudence

Earle (John), The Alfred Jewel: an Historical Essay
Stevenson (W. H.), Asser's Life of Alfred
Barnard (F. P.), An Antiquarian Companion to English History
Newman (Prof. W. L.), The Politics of Aristotle
Hartsman (Dr. C.), Legenda Angliæ
Boas (F. S.), The Works of Thomas Kyd
Lake (K.), Texts on Mount Athos
Eusebii Chronicorum Liber . Edited, with Facsimiles, by J. K. Fotheringham, M.A.
Rule (U. Z.), Old Testament Lessons
Stokoe (W.), New Testament History for Schools, Part I. Aetna . Edited, with Translation, by Robinson Ellis, M.A.
Elizabethan Critical Essays (1570-1603). Edited by G. Gregory Smith
Goethe's Hermann and Dorothea . Edited by the late C. A. Buchheim, M.A., with Introduction by E. Dowden, Litt. D.
Parry (Sir C. Hubert, M.A., D.Mus.), The Seventeenth Century
George (H. B.), The Relations of History and Geography
Mann (Gustav), Micro-Anatomy
Larmor (Alex.), Geometrical Exercises
Joachim (H. H.), The Ethics of Spinoza

Messrs. T. & T. Clark.

Deissman (Dr. G. Adolf), Bible Studies, Contributions, Chiefly from Papyri and Inscriptions, to the History of the Language, Literature, and Religion of Hellenistic Judaism and Primitive Christianity	9/0
The World's Epoch-Makers:
Herkless (Rev. Prof. J.), Francis and Dominic, the Founders of the Mendicant Orders
McHardy (G.), Savonarola
Welch (Rev. A. C.), Anselm, and Cur Deus Homo ..
The International Critical Commentary:
Bigg (Rev. Charles), The Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude
Salmond (S. D. F.), The Christian Doctrine of Immortality
NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.
Walker (Rev. W. L.), The Spirit and the Incarnation ..

Messrs. Deighton Bell & Co.

Latham (Rev. Henry), The Risen Master: a Sequel to Pastor Pastorum
Johns (Rev. C. H. W.), Assyrian Deeds and Documents: Vol. II.—Cuneiform Texts: Introduction, Officials, Metrology	21/0
Pretor (Alfred), Ronald and I, Second Edition
Whitworth (William Allen), Choice and Chance: an Elementary Treatise on Permutations, Combinations, and Probability, with 640 Exercises
Gwatkin (Henry Melvill), Studies of Arianism. 2nd Edition	10/0
The Psalms in Three Collections. Translated, with Notes by, E. G. King, D.D. Part II.
Basset (A. B.), An Elementary Treatise on Cubic and Quartic Curves

Messrs. J. M. Dent & Co.

Ross (Janet), Florentine Villas	200 0
Do. do. Smaller edition	60 0
Courtney (Right Hon. Leonard H.), The Working Constitution of the United Kingdom	7/6
Villars (L.), Oswald von Wolkenstein	4/6
Beavan (Arthur H.), Imperial London	12 6
Rawnley (Canon H. D.), Ballads of the War	3/6
Beckett (R. A.), Romantic Essex
Hadron Hall Library:
Lyttelton (Hon. H. R.), Cricket and Golf	7/6
Selous (Edmund), Bird-watching	7/6
Medieval Town Series:
Young (Norwood), Rome	4 6
Gilbat-Smith (E.), Bruges	4 6
Dent's County Guides:
Jerrold (Walter), Surrey	4/6
Master Musicians Series:
Williams (C. F. A.), Handel	3 6

Saintly Lives Series:

MacFadyen (Dugald), Alfred the West Saxon, King the English	4/6
The Temple Molière:
Les Précieuses Ridicules, and L'Avare	each 1 6 or 2 0
The Temple Dramatists:
Udall (Nicholas), Ralph Roister Doister	1 0
Newbigging (Thomas), Lancashire Humour	2/6
The Temple Cyclopaedic Primers:
Jose (A. W.), Australasia, the Commonwealth and New Zealand	1 0
Stending (Dr. H.), Greek and Roman Mythology ..	1 0
Drinkwater (Dr. H.), First Aid to the Injured and Ambulance Drill	1/0
Drummond (W. B.), The Child: His Nature and Nurture	1/0
Luce (Moreton), Tennyson
Hoemer (Dr. Moritz), Primitive Man
The Temple Classics: Jeremy Taylor's Holy Dying , edited by A. R. Waller— White's Selbourne—Thackeray's Vanity Fair , 3 vols.— Eliot's Adam Bede , 2 vols.

Messrs. Digby, Long & Co.

Sherard (Robert H.), The Cry of the Poor	3 6
"Honestas," Threads and Patches of Political Economy ...	3/6
Grogan (Maggie), Parodies, and Other Poems	3/6
Robinson (John), Irish Leaves	7/6
Aveling (Henry), Poems and Paragraphs. Second Series	3/6
FICTION.
Cobban (J. McLaren), The Golden Tooth	6/0
Cleeve (Lucas), As the Twig is Bent	6/0
Rodziewicz (Marya), Devaytis. Translated by Count de Soissons	6 0
Laffan (Mrs. De Courcy), Cruel Calumny	6 0
Griffiths (Major Arthur), The Painted Man	6 0
Bagot-Harte (Mrs.), A Daring Spirit	6/0
Heath (Seaton), A Stolen Wooing	6 0
Corbet (Robert St. J.), The Burden of an Honour	6 0
Greenhow (Surgeon-Major H. M.), The Emperor's Design	6 0
Fiddlay (J. S.), A Deal with the King	6/0
Jocelyn (Mrs.), The Sea of Fortune	6 0
Warden (Gertrude), A Syndicate of Sinners	6/0

Messrs. Duckworth & Co.

Owen (J. A.) and Boulger (Prof. G. S.), The Country Month by Month
McCabe (Joseph), Peter Abélard	7/6
Maidment (George), Princes and Poisoners: Translated from the French of Frantz Funck Brentano	6 0
Modern Plays Series:
Adam (Villiers de L'Isle), The Revolt and The Escape: Translated by Theresa Barclay	3/6
The Saints Series:
Bramston (M.), The Banner of St. George: a Picture of Old England	3 6
Julleville (Prof. Le Petit de), Joan of Arc	3 0
Guiraud (Jean), Saint Dominic	3 0
Puech (Aimé), St. Chrysostom	3 0

Messrs. Greening & Co.

Rogers (W. S.), A Book of the Poster	7/6
Bartram (George), Ballads of Ghostly Shires	2/6
Upperton (Rupert), Village Life and Feeling	2 6
Pemberton (T. Edgar), Bret Harte	3 6
Wratislaw (Theodore), Swinburne	3 6
Clelia, Messiahship of Shakespeare	7/6

FICTION.

Leyken (N.), Where the Oranges Grow. Translated from the Russian by Count C. S. de Soissons	6 0
Loughnan (J. Pym), Mad?	2 6
Hewitt (Edgar), The Prettiness of Fools	6 0
Awes (Hugo), Tragedy of a Pedigree	6 0
Gorst (Mrs. Harold E.), And Afterwards?	6/0
Fevez (Coralie), Ira Lorraine	6/0
Asculapius, The Magnetism of Sin	3 6
Reade (Compton), The Aftertaste	6/0
Orzeszko (Madame), The Modern Argonauts. Translated by Count C. S. de Soissons	6 0
Forbes (Edmund), Red Fate	6/0
Pelican Tails. Edited by Frank M. Boyd	1/0

The Gresham Publishing Company.

Lyon (Murray D.), History of the Lodge of Edinburgh. Mary's Chapel, No. 1. (Tercentenary Edition.) Embracing an Account of the Rise and Progress of Freemasonry in Scotland	30/0
Thompson (Robert), The Gardener's Assistant: a Practical and Scientific Exposition of the Art of Gardening in all its Branches. In 6 vols. each, net	8/0
Davidson (H. C.), The Book of the Home: a Practical Guide to General Household Management. 8 parts each	5/0

Mr. William Heinemann.

A Universal History of Mankind, edited by Dr. Helmholt. With an Introductory Essay by the Right Hon. James Bryce: Vol. I., Introductory Prehistory—America and the Pacific Ocean
The Love-Letters of Prince Bismarck, 2 vols., with Portraits.....
Swift (Benjamin), The Eternal Conflict
Graham (R. B. Cunningham), A Vanished Arcadia
Irving (H. B.), Studies of French Criminals
Vivienne (May), Travels in Western Australia
Waters (Mrs. W. G.), The Cook's Decameron.....
Mackinder (H. J.), Britain and the North Atlantic
La Gioconda, translated from the Italian of Gabriele d'Annunzio by Arthur Symons	3/6

FICTION.

Parker (Gilbert), A New Novel.....	6/0
Conrad (Joseph) and Hueffer (Ford Madox), The Inheritors	6/0
Benson (E. F.), The Luck of the Vails.....	6/0
Gerard (Dorothea), Sawdust	6/0
Forbes-Robertson (Frances), The Hidden Model ..	6/0
Wyllarde (Dolf), The Garden of Eden	6/0
Marman (Basil), A Daughter of the Veldt	6/0
Voynich (E. L.), Jack Raymond	6/0
Dudeney (Mrs. Henry), Boylett's Land	6/0
Woodroffe (D.), Tangled Trinities.....	6/0
Prowse (R. O.), Voysey	6/0
Woods (Margaret L.), Sons of the Sword	6/0
Bowles (M.), Gillette's Marriage	6/0
Kirk (James P.), Forest Folk	6/0
Lagerlöf (Selma), In a Swedish Homestead	6/0
Serao (Matilde), The Land of Cockayne	6/0

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

Scott (Rev. C. A.), Evangelical Doctrine: Bible Truth ...	6/0
Smith (Rev. G. A.), Modern Criticism and Preaching	6/0
Paton, D.D. (James), Beautiful Characters	1/6
Gurney (Rev. T. A.), The Living Lord and the Opened Grave	6/0
Pemper (G. H.), The Church, the Churches and the Mysteries; or, Revelation and Corruption.....
Cairnes (Capt. W. E.), Earl Roberts as a Soldier in Peace and War	6/0
Tooley (Sarah A.), The Personal Life of Queen Victoria...
Seton-Thompson (E.), The Biography of a Grizzly	6/0
Margoliouth (Rev. Prof. D. S.), Lines of Defence of the Biblical Revelation	6/0
Jones (Rev. E. G.), The Ascent through Christ	3/6
Parker, D.D. (Rev. Joseph), The City Temple Pulpit. Vol. IV.	3/6
Bullen (Frank T.), With Christ in Sailortown	1/6
The Self Educator Series:
Adams (John), The Self Educator in French	2/6
Adams (John), The Self Educator in German	2/6
Edward (W. A.), The Self Educator in Latin	2/6
Wishart (Robert S.), The Self Educator in Botany ...	2/6
Knight (James), The Self Educator in Chemistry ...	2/6

FICTION.

Fowler (Ellen Thorneycroft), Sirius, and Other Stories ...	6/0
Le Queux (William), Her Majesty's Minister; or, The Shadow of a Throne.....	6/0
Gerard (Morice), Queen's Mate.....	6/0
St. Laurence (A.), My Heart and Lute	6/0
Mason (Caroline A.), A Woman of Yesterday	6/0

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett.

Hopkins (Tighe), The Man in the Iron Mask	7/6
De Satge (Oscar), Pages from the Journal of a Queensland Squatter	10/6
Hayes (Captain M. Horace), Riding and Hunting	16/0
Grogau (Ewart S.) and Sharp (Arthur H.), From the Cape to Cairo, the First Traverse of Africa from South to North.....	21/0
Hayes (Captain M. Horace), Stable Management and Exercise: a Book for Horse Owners and Students.....	12/0

FICTION.

Norris (W. E.), His Own Father	3/6
Le Gallienne (Richard), The Life Romantic, including the Love-Letters of the King	6/0
Marsh (Richard), Amusement Only	6/0
Sergeant (Adeline), This Body of Death	6/0
Nisbet (Hume), Children of Hermes.....	3/6
Edward (M. Betham), A Suffolk Courtship	6/0
New Series of Sixpenny Novels: Watts-Dunton (Theodore), Aylwin—Riddell (Mrs. J. H.), The Footfall of Fate—Hume (Fergus), The Vanishing of Tera—Cleeve (Lucas), What a Woman Will Do—"Rita," Miss Kate.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

The Francis Letters: Being Letters of the late Sir Philip Francis and Members of his Family. Edited by Beata Francis and Eliza Keary, with an Introductory Note on the Junius Controversy by C. F. Keary. 2 vols.	24/0
Gerard (Francis), A Biography of Anna Amalia, Duchess of Saxe-Weimar	16/0
Henry Broadhurst, M.P.: The Story of his Life from a Stonemason's Bench to the Treasury Bench. Told by Himself	16/0
Molloy (Fitzgerald), The Queen's Comrade; or, The Life and Times of Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough. 2 vols.	24/0
The Living Races of Mankind, Vol. I.	7/6
"Thornaby," Kings of the Rod, Rifle, and Gun. 2 vols.	24/0
Richardson (The Late Sir Benjamin), Disciples of Esculapius: Biographies of Leaders of Medicine. 2 vols.	36/0
Thackeray's Stray Papers, Collected and Arranged by Lewis Melville	6/0
Harmer (E. G.), Victoria Birthday Book.....	3/6
The Second French Empire: Napoleon III. at the Height of His Power.....	6/0
The Poets for the People. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. Tennyson's Poems.....	2/0 and 1/0

FICTION.

Grand (Sarah), Babs the Impossible.....	6/0
Moore (Frankfort), According to Plato	6/0
Le Queux (William), The Gamblers	6/0
Sergeant (Adeline), The Treasure of Captain Scarlett	6/0
Lynton (Mrs. Lynn), The Second Youth of Theodora Desanges	6/0
Dickens (Mary Angela), The Wastrel	6/0
Blissett (Nellie K.), The Sea Hath its Pearls	6/0
Pratt (Ambrose), Franks: Duellist	6/0
Everett-Jean (Evelyn), Olivia's Experiment	6/0
Stewart (J. A.), The Eternal Quest	6/0
Gallon (Tom), The Second Dandy Chapter	6/0
Fraser (Mrs. Hugh), A Little Grey Sheep	6/0
Sladen (Douglas), My Son Richard; or, the Great Company	6/0
Slade (A. F.), A Wayside Weed	6/0
Farjeon (B. L.), Pride of Race	6/0
Dawe (Carlton), Claudia Pole	6/0
Haggard (Colonel Andrew), Love Rules the Camp	6/0
Ashton (Mark), The Nana's Talisman	6/0
Henham (Ernest G.), Bonanza	6/0
Maugham (W. S.), The Hero.....	6/0
Also New Novels by Richard Whiteing, Jerome K. Jerome, Percy White, "Iota" (Mrs. Mannington Caffyn), Mrs. Hugh Fraser, Frankfort Moore, A. W. Marchmont, and Tom Gallon.

NEW EDITIONS.

Wilkins (W. H.), The Love of an Uncrowned Queen. Cheap Edition
--	--

Mr. R. Brimley Johnson.

Tarpey (Mrs. Kingsley), Idylls of the Fells	3 6
Rickett (Arthur), Mimes and Rhymes	3 6
Hills (Major.-Gen. Sir John), The Bombay Field Force and the Battle of Maiwand	1 6
Hueffer (Oliver M.), Love's Disguises	10 6
Hueffer (Oliver M.), In Arcady and Out	3 6
Story (Alfred T.), Master and Slave	2 0
Oldershaw (L.), Carpet Plays	0 6

Mr. John Lane.

Architectural Remains of Old Richmond, Peter-ham, Twickenham, Mortlake, and Kew. Dawn in Lithography by T. R. Way. With an Introduction and Notes. by Frederic Chapman	21 0
Archer (William), Poets of the Younger Generation. With Portraits from wood engravings by Robert Bryden	4 0
Fea (Allen), King Monmouth
Paul (Herbert), Men and Letters	5 0
Milne-Holme (Mary Pamela), Stray Leaves from a Border Garden	5 0
The Kubaiyat of Omar Khayyam. Done into English on the French of J. B. Nicolas, by Frederick Baron Corvo and Edward Maugher
Williams (Mrs. Lælie), A Garden in the Suburbs
Thaw (Alexander Blair), Poems
Heinemann (William), War: a Play in Three Acts	3 6
"John Oliver Hobbes" Birthday Book, Selected and arranged by Zoë Procter	3 6
Helps (Sir Arthur), The Spanish Conquest in America. New Edition in 4 vols.	3 6
Lehmann (R. C.), Anni Fugace. A Book of Verse, with Cambridge Interludes	3 6
Gwynn (Stephen), The Queen's Chronicler, and other Verses	3 6
Lounsbury (G. Constant), Poems	3 6
Sackville (Lady Margaret), Poems	3 6
The Lover's Library: Each 2/- net: The Love Poems of Shelley—The Love Poems of Browning—The Silence of Love, by Edmond Holmes—Cupid and Psyche—The Love Poems of Tennyson—The Love Poems of Landor

FICTION.

Bagot (Richard), The Just and the Unjust	6 0
Marriott (Charles), The Column	6 0
Corvo (Frederick Baron), In His Own Image	6 0
Locke (W. J.), The Usurper	6 0
Cobb (Thomas), Severance	6 0
Stephenson (Nathaniel), They That Took the Sword	6 0

Messrs. J. B. Lippincott Co.

Bittinger (L. F.), The Germans in Colonial Times	7 6
Blair (A. A.), The Chemical Analysis of Iron	18 0
Boise (O. B.), Music and its Masters: Its Nature, Origin, and Love of Development
De Roo (P.), History of America before Columbus, according to Documents and approved Authors. 2 vols.	24 0
Frazer (P.), Bibliotics; or, The Study of Documents for the Detection of Fraud and Forgery	12 0
Newport (D.), Eudemon, Spiritual and Rational. The Apology of a Preacher for Preaching	15 0
Packard (F. R.), The History of Medicine in the United States to the Year 1800	18 0
Rogers (Fairman), A Manual of Coaching	24 0
Rotch (T. R.), Pediatrics, the Hygiene and Medical Treatment of Diseases in Children
Sadtler (S. P.), Handbook of Industrial Organic Chemistry, for Manufacturers and Chemists	25 0
Sommerville (M.), The Sands of Sahara	10 6
Thompson (M.), Sweetheart Manette	6 0

Mr. John Long.

Wilkinson (Frank), Australia at the Front: a Colonial View of the Boer War	6 0
Social Life in the British Army. By a British Officer. Third Edition	6 0

FICTION.

Mathew (Frank), The Royal Sisters	6 0
Hume (Fergus), The Golden Wang Ho	6 0
Sandeman (Mina), Veronica Verdant	6 0
Warden (Florence), Once Too Often	6 0
Fletcher (J. S.), The Three Days' Terror	6 0
Cross (Victoria), Anna Lombard	6 0
Carrel (Frederic), Paul Le Maistre	6 0
Stuart (Esme), Nobler Than Revenge	6 0
Cl-eve (Lucas), Plato's Handmaiden	6 0
Burgin (G. B.), A Son of Mammon	6 0
Cromm-lin (May), A Woman-Derelict	6 0
Tyt'ter (Sarah), Women Must Weep	6 0
Walker (William S.), Virgin Gold	6 0
Sergeant (Adeline), The Mission of Margaret	6 0
Cameron (Mrs. Lovett), A New Novel	6 0
Kernahan (Mrs. Coulson), A New Novel	6 0
The Master Sinner. By "A Well-known Author"	3 6
Taylor (Jenner), Mary Bray, X Her Mark	3 6
Marsh (Richard), Mrs. Musgrave and Her Husband	3 6
Sixpenny Library of Copyright Novels: Meade (L. T.), The Wiving of Monica—Cameron (Mrs. Lovett), A Difficult Matter—Le Queux (William), The Eye of Istar—Warden (Florence), The Mystery of Dudley Horne—Hume (Fergus), The Bishop's Secret—Cameron (Mrs. Lovett), The Craze of Christina—Warden (Florence), The Bohemian Girls—Le Queux (William), The Veiled Man—Hume (Fergus), The Crimson Cryptogram.

Messrs. Longmans.

Holmes (Richard R.), Queen Victoria. New Edition, with Portrait and Supplementary Chapter	5 0
The Norwegian North Polar Expedition, 1893-1896: Scientific Results. Edited by Fridtjof Nansen. Vol. II.: Astronomical Observations—Terrestrial Magnetism—Results of the Pendulum—Observations and Some Remarks on the Constitution of the Earth's Crust. With 2 Charts and 17 Plates	30 0
Myers (F. W. H.), Human Personality. 2 vols.
Millais (John Guille), The Wildfowler in Scotland	30 0
Weathers (John), A Practical Guide to Garden Plants	21 0
Sternberg (Count Adalbert), My Experiences of the Boer War	1 0
Notes on Reconnoitring in South Africa, 1899-1900	1 0
Letters from a Subaltern to His Wife (The Boer War)	3 6
Gardiner (S. R.), History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate. Vol. III., 1654-1656	21 0
Müller (Prof. Max), My Autobiography: A Fragment	12 6
Little (W. J.), "Remember": A Sermon preached on the Occasion of the Solemn Requiem for Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, February 2nd, 1901	1 0
Fuller (Morris), In Terra Pax	6 0
Kelly (Rev. H. H.), A History of the Church of Christ	3 6
A Book of Prayer and Daily Texts for English Churchmen	1 0
Mortimer (Rev. Alfred G.), The Eucharistic Sacrifice	10 6
Randolph (B. W.), The Example of the Passion	2 0
Potter (Right Rev. Henry C.), Principles of Religious Education: A Course of Lectures delivered under the Auspices of the Sunday-school Commission of the Diocese of New York	3 6
Fitzmaurice (Lord Edmond), Charles William Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick: An Historical Study, 1735-1806	6 0
Fuller (Frederic Walter), Egypt and the Hinterland	10 6
Rice (Stanley P.), Occasional Essays on Native South Indian Life	10 6
Randolph (Carman F.), The Law and Policy of Annexation, with Special Reference to the Philippines, together with Observations on the Status of Cuba	9 0
Kelly (Edmond), Government, or Human Evolution. Vol. II.
Froude (James A.), English Seamen in the Sixteenth Century. New and Cheaper Issue	3 6

Matthews (Brander), The Philosophy of the Short-Story	1/6
Matthews (Brander), Notes on Speech-Making	1/6
Brown (Abbie Farwell), The Book of Saints and Friendly Beasts	4/6
Baker (James H.), Education and Life: Papers and Addresses	4/6
The Annual Charities Register and Digest (1901)	4/0
Kristeller (Paul), Andrea Mantegna: his Life and Works. English Edition by S. Arthur Strong	70/0
Some Records of the Later Life of Harriet, Countess Granville. By her Granddaughter, the Hon. Mrs. Oldfield	16/0
Russell (Lady Constance), Swallowfield and Its Owners ..
Cross (C. F.), Bevan (E. J.), and Beadle (C.), Researches on Cellulose, 1895-1900
Savage-Armstrong (G. F.), Ballads of Down	7/6
Hamilton (Col. Henry Blackburne), Historical Record of the 14th (King's) Hussars, from A.D. 1715 to A.D. 1900 ..
Eck (Rev. H. V. S.), The Incarnation
Worledge (Rev. Arthur John), Prayer
Waggett (P. N.), The Age of Decision: being Five Sermons to Young Men	2/6
Bright (William), The Age of the Fathers. 2 vols
Stone (Rev. Darwell), Christ and Human Life: being a course of Four Lectures delivered in St. Paul's Cathedral in January, 1901
Bain (Alexander), Dissertations on Leading Philosophical Topics: being Articles reprinted from Mind
Lupton (Arnold), A Practical Treatise on Mine Surveying ..
Mattay (Prof. Tobias), Pianoforte Tone Production
Sutherland (George), Twentieth Century Inventions: a Forecast	4/6

FICTION.

Marchmont (A. W.), In the Name of a Woman	6/0
Ridley (Alice), Anne Mainwaring	6/0
Swan (Myra), Ballast	6/0
Anstey (F.), Voices Populi	3/0
Haggard (Mr.), Lysbeth: a Tale of the Dutch	6/0
Francis (M. E.), Pastorals of Dorset	6/0
Bailey (H. C.), My Lady of Orange: a Romance of the Netherlands in the Days of Alva	6/0
Creed (Sibyl), The Vicar of St. Luke's

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

The Times History of the War in South Africa, 1899-1900. Vol. II. To be completed in 5 (or 6) Volumes.	net. the set 63/0
The Royal Navy from the Earliest Times to the Present. Vol. VI.	25/0
Britain's Austral Empire: Portraits of the Statesmen and Officials concerned in the work of Establishing the Commonwealth of Australia. The Portraits, from Life, drawn by Percy F. S. Spence. The Letter-press by G. Firth Scott.	84/0
Cowan (Samuel), Mary Queen of Scots, and Who Wrote the Casket Letters	28/0
Lydon (F. F.), Ambidextrous and Free-Arm Blackboard Drawing and Design	5/0
Lydon (F. F.), Model and Blackboard Drawing	3/6
Re-issue of William Black's Novels (In New Uniform Binding at Two Shillings): Beautiful Wretch, In Sick Attire, Sunrise, In Far Lochaber.
Taunton (Theo.), Famous Horses	42/0
Mumford (J. K.), Oriental Rugs	42/0
Good Housekeeping: an American Magazine	monthly 6/6

Messrs. Macmillan & Co.

The Scientific Memoirs of Thomas Henry Huxley. Edited by Sir M. Foster and Prof. E. Ray Lankester. 4 vols. Vol. III.	30/0
Cappon (Prof. J.), Britain's Title in South Africa
Gadow (H.), The Cambridge Natural History: Amphibia and Reptiles	17/0

Ostrogorski (M.), Democracy and the Organisation of Political Parties. Translated from the French by Frederick Clarke. 2 vols.	10/6
The Statesman's Year Book, 1901
Odgers (H. Blake), Lectures Illustrating the Changes in the English Law during the Nineteenth Century
Schultz (Robert Weir), and Barn-ley (Sidney Howard), British School at Athens: The Monastery of Saint Luke of Stiris in Phocis and the Dependent Monastery of Saint Nicolas in the Fields near Skripou in Boeotia	63/0
Sturgis (Russell), Dictionary of Architecture and Building. Vol. I. A—E	25/0
Taylor (A. E.), The Problem of Conduct
A Manual of Medicine. Edited by W. H. Allchin, M.D. Vol. III.
Robinson (Canon J. A.), Unity in Christ, and Other Sermons	6/0
Rutherford (W. G.), The Key of Knowledge: Sermons preached in Westminster Abbey
Procter (F.A.), A New History of the Book of Common Prayer. Revised and Rewritten by W. H. Frere	12/6
Courthope (William John), Life in Poetry; Law in Taste: Two Series of Lectures delivered in Oxford

NEW EDITIONS.

Eversley Series:
Green (John Richard), Oxford, 1750-1850	5/0
Library of English Classics:
De Quincey's Confessions of an Opium Eater; Murder as a Fine Art; the English Mail Coach, and other Essays	3/6
Sidgwick (The late Henry), The Methods of Ethics ..
Walker (James), Introduction to Physical Chemistry ..	10/0
Lang (Andrew), The Border Edition of the Waverley Novels	6/0
Vol. V.— Old Mortality
Vol. VI.— The Heart of Midlothian
The Works of Marion Crawford. A new and uniform Edition in fortnightly volumes.	3/6
Mr. Isaacs— Doctor Claudius—A Roman Singer—Zorcaster—A Tale of a Lonely Parish—Marzio's Crucifix—Paul Patoff. To be followed by: With the Immortals—Greifenstein—Sant' Ilario—Cigarette-Maker's Romance, &c., &c.

FICTION.

Boldrewood (Rolf), In Bad Company, and other Stories ..	6/0
Runkle (Bertha), The Helmet of Navarre	6/0

Mr. John Macqueen.

Sykes (Ella C.), Through Persia on a Side-Saddle	7/6
---	-----

FICTION.

Hurry (Alfred), In the City	6/0
Barrett (Alfred), The Golden Lotus	6/0
Farquhar (Anna), The Devil's Plough	6/0
Jane (Fred T.), Ever Mohun	6/0
Douglas (George), The House with the Green Shutters ..	6/0
Grein (J. T.), Premiers of the Year	3/6

NEW EDITIONS.

Thoughts of a Queen. By Carmen Sylva, Queen of Roumania. Authorised translation by H. Sutherland Edwards
Churchill (Lady Randolph Spencer), The Anglo-Saxon Review, Vol. VIII
New Sixpenny Series of Copyright Novels: Barrett (Wilson), The Sign of the Cross—Barrett (Wilson) and Hichens (Robert), The Daughters of Babylon—Griffiths (Major Arthur), Fast and Loose—Le Breton (John), Miss Tudor—Yorke (Curtis), A Flirtation with Truth—Norris (W. E.), Mrs. Fenton—Barrett (Frank), Breaking the Shackles—Hunt (Violet), A Hard Woman—Kaye (Lorin), Her Ladyship's Income—Rita, Sheba—Rita, Joan and Mrs. Carr—Gerard (Dorothea), Orthodox.

Messrs. Horace Marshall & Son.

The Passing of Victoria: the Poets' Tribute. A Selection of the Best Poems on the Queen's Death, by Thomas Hardy, W. E. Henley, Mrs. Flora A. Steel, Sir Lewis Morris, Katharine Tynan, Barry Pain, Lady Currie, Countess of Cork, &c.	3/6
Goodman (Rev. John H.), The Lordship of Christ, and Other Sermons	3/6
Humphry (Mrs.), Madge's Cookery Book	3/6
Gerard (Morice), The Shadow of Gilsland	3/6
Meyer (Rev. F. B.), Workaday Sermons. New Edition ..	1/0
Cities and Citizens: Britain's Next Campaign. By the Author of "A Colony of Mercy"	6/0
Uncle Tom's Cabin	3/6
Story of the Empire Series: Lugard (Brig.-Gen.), A New Volume on "The Story of Uganda"	1/6

Mr. Elkin Mathews.

Farwell (C. J. W.), Poems
Songs of Lucilla
Bridges (Guy), Sea Verse
A Song to David. By Chr. Smart. With an Introduction by R. A. Streatfeild

Messrs. Methuen.

Holdich (Sir T. H.), The Indian Borderland: being a Personal Record of Twenty Years	15/0
Wylde (A. B.), Modern Abyssinia	15/0
Biss (Captain H. C. J.), The Relief of Kumasi	6/0
Holcombe (Chester), The Real Chinese Question	6/0
Norway (A. H.), Naples: Past and Present	6/0
Corelli (Marie), The Passing of the Great Queen: a Tribute to the Noble Life of Victoria Regina	1/0
A History of Egypt, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. Edited by W. M. Flinders Petrie, D.C.L. In Six Volumes. Vol. VI.: Egypt in the Middle Ages. By Stanley Lane-Poole	6/0
Hackett (John), A History of the Church of Cyprus	15/0
Taunton (E. L.), A History of the Jesuits in England	21/0
Lyard (G. S.), The Life of Mrs. Lynn Linton. With Portraits.	12/6
Wetmore (Helen Cody), The Last of the Great Scouts ("Buffalo Bill")	6/0
Strettou (Clement), A History of the Midland Railway ..	12/6
Bache (Constance), Brother Musicians: Reminiscences of Edward and Walter Bache	6/0
Revelations of Divine Love. By the Lady Julian of Norwich. Edited by G. H. Warrack	6/0
Benson (R. M.), The Way of Holiness: a Devotional Commentary on the 119th Psalm	5/0
The Supersensual Life. By Jacob Behmen. Edited by Bernard Holland	3/6
The Imitation of Christ	3/6
The Soul's Pilgrimage: Devotional Readings from the Published and Unpublished Writings of George Bodley, D.D.	2/6
Rackham (R. B.), The Acts of the Apostles. With an Introduction and Notes	10/6
Caldecott (Alfred), The Philosophy of Religion in England and America	10/6
Randolph (B. W.), The Psalms of David	2/0
Holland (Canon Scott), Lyra Apostolica. Notes by H. C. Beeching, M.A.	2/0
Hutton (A. W.), The Inner Way: Selections from the Sermons of F. Tauler	2/0
The Churchman's Bible (General Editor, J. H. Burn, B.D.): Isaiah. Edited by W. E. Barnes, D.D. 2 vols. each, net	2/0
The Epistle of St. James. Edited by H. W. Fulford ..	1/6
The Natural History of Selborne. By Gilbert White. Edited by L. C. Miall, F.R.S., assisted by W. Ward, Fowler, M.A.	6/0
The Journal to Stella. By Jonathan Swift. Edited by G. A. Aitken, M.A.	6/0
Horsburgh (E. L. S.), The Life of Savonarola. With Portraits and Illustrations	3/6

Windle (B. C. A.), The Malvern Country. Illustrated by E. H. New	3/0
The Works of Shakespeare (new volume uniform with Prof. Dowden's Hamlet): King Lear. Edited by W. J. Craig	3/6
The Novels of Charles Dickens (with Introductions by George Gissing, Notes by F. G. Kitton, and Illustrations): Old Curiosity Shop. With Illustrations by G. M. Brimelow. 2 vols. each, net ..	3/0
Barnaby Rudge. With Illustrations by Beatrice Alcock. 2 vols. each, net ..	3/0
The Little Library (with Introductions, Notes, and Photogravure Frontispieces): Selections from Wordsworth. Edited by Nowell C. Smith	1/6
Selections from William Blake. Edited by M. Perugini	1/6
The Purgatorio of Dante. Translated by H. F. Cary. Edited by Paget Toynbee, M.A.	1/6
Pride and Prejudice. By Jane Austen. Edited by E. V. Lucas. 2 vols.	1/6
Pendennis. By W. M. Thackeray. Edited by S. Gwynn. 3 vols.	1/6
Lavengro. By George Borrow. Edited by F. Hindes Groome. 2 vols.	1/6
Lawless (Hon. Emily), A Garden Diary	7/6
Duncan (Sara Jeanette) (Mrs. Cotes), Turned Out	6/0
Williamson (W.), The British Gardener and Amateur	10/6
White (Arnold), Efficiency and Empire	6/0
Hill (Henry), A South African Arithmetic	3/6
A Key to Notanda Quedam	2/0
Peel (Hon. Sidney), Practical Licensing Reform	1/6
Richardson (Charles), The English Turf	15/0
Colbeck (E. H.), Diseases of the Heart	12/0
Seeley (H. G.), Dragons of the Air	6/0
James (Henry), The Sacred Fount	6/0
Sergeant (Adeline), A New Novel	6/0
Baring-Gould (S.), The Frohishers	6/0
Croker (B. M.), A State Secret	3/6
Gerard (Dorothea), The Supreme Crime	6/0
Dawlish (Hope), A Secretary of Legation	6/0
Hyne (C. J. Cutcliffe), Prince Rupert the Buccaneer	6/0
Findlater (Mary), A Narrow Way	6/0
Findlater (J. Helen) and Findlater (Mary), Tales that are Told	6/0
Dudenev (Mrs.), The Third Floor	6/0
Ainslie (Noel), The Salvation Seekers	6/0
Russell (W. Clark), Strange Happenings	6/0
Goss (C. F.), The Redemption of David Corson	6/0
Dickson (Harris), The Black Wolf's Breed	6/6
Iddesleigh (the Earl of), Belinda Fitzwarren	6/6
Glanville (Ernest), The Lost Regiment	3/6
Gleig (Charles), Bunter's Cruise	3/0
Williamson (Mrs. C. N.), The Adventure of Princess Sylvia ..	3/0
The Novelist (a Monthly Series of Novels by Popular Authors at Sixpence): Barr (Robert), In the Midst of Alarms —Norris (W. E.), His Grace —Benson (E. F.), Dodo —Baring Gould (S.), Cheap Jack Zita —Parker (Gilbert), When Valmond Came to Pontiac —Phillpotts (Eden), The Human Boy —Hope (Anthony), The Chronicles of Count Antonio —Balfour (Andrew), By Stroke of Sword —Baring Gould (S.), Kitty Alone. Methuen's Sixpenny Library (New Volumes): Findlater (Jane H.), The Green Graves of Balgowrie —Wells (H. G.), The Stolen Bacillus —Norris (W. E.), Matthew Austin —Gerard (Dorothea), The Conquest of London —Barr (Robert), The Mutable Many —Sidebotham (H.), The War with the Boers.

Mr. John Murray.

The Correspondence of Lady Sarah Lennox, 1745-1826. Daughter of the Second Duke of Richmond, and successively the Wife of Sir Thomas Charles Bunbury, Bart., and of the Honourable George Napier. From Original Documents preserved at Melbury; also a short Political Sketch of the Year 1760 to 1763 by Henry Fox, First Lord Holland; and other MSS. found at Holland House. Edited by the Countess of Ilchester and Lord Stavordale ..
Hertlet (Sir Edward), Recollections of the Old Foreign Office

- Mackinnon (Major-Gen. H.), The Journal of the C.I.V. in South Africa 6/0
- Malet (Right Hon. Sir E.), Shifting Scenes net 10/6
- A Civilian War Hospital, being an Account of the Work of the Portland Hospital, and of Experience of Wounds and Sickness in South Africa, 1900, by the Professional Staff.....
- Parker (E. H.), China: Her History, Diplomacy, and Commerce net 8/0
- Moberly (R. C.), Atonement and Personality 14/0
- Hoare (H. W.), Evolution of the English Bible net 10/6
- Knight (E. F.), Small Boat-Sailing net 5/0
- Townshend (Lieut.-Colonel C. V. F.), The Military Life of Field-Marshal George, First Marquess Townshend, 1724-1807 28/0
- Childers (Lieut.-Colonel Spencer), The Life and Correspondence of the Rt. Hon. Hugh Culling Eardley Childers. 2 vols...... net 12/0
- The Natives of South Africa: Their Economic and Social Condition. By the South African Native Races Committee..... net 12/0
- Khan (Mir Munshi, Sultan Mohammad), The Constitution and Laws of Afghanistan net 2/6
- Munro (Eneas), The Locust Plague and its Suppression, net 24/0
- Law Without Lawyers: An Epitome of the Laws of England for Practical Use. By two Barristers-at-Law 6/0
- Seeborn (The late Henry), The Birds of Siberia net 12/0
- Tylor (Prof. E. B.), The Natural History of Religion 16/0
- The Book of Ser Marco Polo, the Venetian: Concerning the Kingdoms and Marvels of the East. Translated and Edited by the late Colonel Sir Henry Yule, C.B. Revised throughout in the light of Modern Discoveries, with a Memoir of Colonel Yule. By Prof. Henri Cordier. 2 vols......
- The Progressive Science Series:
- Loeb (Prof. Jacques), The Comparative Physiology of the Brain and Comparative Psychology 6/0
- Thompson (J. Arthur), Heredity 6/0
- Inter Amicos: A Correspondence between the late James Martineau, LL.D., and Professor Knight, chiefly on the Doctrines of Unitarianism and the Trinity 5/0
- Holt-White (Rashleigh), The Life of Gilbert White, of Selborne. 2 vols...... 32/0
- The Works of Lord Byron:
- Vol. IV.—Poetry 6/0
- Vols. V. and VI.—Letters each 6/0
- Knight (William), Varia.....
- Cartwright (Julia), The Painters of Florence net 6/0
- Babington (Rev. J. A.), The Reformation: a Religious and Historical Sketch net 12/0
- Jose (A. W.), The Growth of the Empire.....
- Lee (Elizabeth), The Growth of Greater Britain: a Reader for Schools 2/6
- Smith (G. C. Moore), The Autobiography of Lieut.-General Sir Harry Smith, Bart., of Aliwal, G.C.B. 2 vols. ...
- Poore (G. Vivian), A Treatise on Medical Jurisprudence: Based on Lectures Delivered at University College, London net 12/0
- Dangerous Trades: The Historical, Social, and Legal Aspects of Industrial Occupations as Affecting Public Health. By a Number of Experts. Edited by Dr. T. Oliver.....
- Gomperz (Prof. Theodor), The Greek Thinkers. Vol. I. 14/0
- Truths About God. By Father John (Sergieff). Translated by Colonel E. E. Goulaeff..... net 2/6
- Gore (Rev. Charles), The Body of Christ: an Enquiry into the Institution and Doctrine of the Holy Communion net 5/0
- Speeches and Correspondence of Henry, Fourth Earl of Carnarvon, on the Affairs of British North America. Edited by the Hon. Sir Robert G. Herbert, G.C.B. ...
- Henderson (W. J.), The Orchestra and Orchestral Music net 5/0
- Finck (Henry T.), Songs and Song Writers net 5/0
- Krehbiel (Henry Edward), How to Listen to Music. New Impression 6/0
- Carmichael (Montgomery), In Tuscany net 9/0
- Complete Edition of George Borrow's Works:
- Wild Wales. (Illustrated) 6/0
- The Gypsies of Spain. (Illustrated) 6/0
- An Englishwoman's Love-Letters. Eighth Impression. net 5/0
- Whiteing (Richard), The Life of Paris..... 6/0
- The Life of Abdur Rahman, Amir of Afghanistan. Edited by Mir Munshi Sultan Mohammad Khan (Secretary of State of Afghanistan). 2 vols...... 32/0
- Guyot (Yves), Boer Politics: an Answer to some Pro-Boer Statements, Based on Facts and Documents ... 2/0
- Knight (Prof.), Lord Monboddo, and Some of His Contemporaries 16/0
- Holland (Canon H. S.), The Power of a Mother's Prayer.. 1/0
- March-Phillips (Miss E.), The Frescoes of the Sixtine Chapel net 6/0
- The Poetical Works of George Crabbe net 7/6
- Apthorp (William Foster), The Opera, Past and Present net 5/0
- Mees (Arthur), Choirs and Choral Music net 5/0
- FICTION.
- Nevinson (H. W.), The Plea of Pan net 5/0
- "Christina," Mrs. Green net 2/6
- Ropes (A. R. and M. E.), On Peter's Island 6/0
- Hamilton (Lillias), A Vizier's Daughter: a Tale of the Hazara War 6/0
- Wilkins (Mary E.), The Heart's Highway: a Romance of Virginia in the Seventeenth Century. Third Impression 6/0
- Merrick (Leonard), The Worldlings..... 6/0
- Vaebell (Horace Annesley), John Charity: a Tale of the Early part of Her Majesty's Reign 6/0
- Forbes (The Hon. Mrs. Walter), A Gentleman 6/0
- Norway (A. H.), Parson Peter 6/0
- Henry (Arthur), A Princess of Arcady 6/0
- Harris (Joel Chandler), On the Wing of Occasions 6/0
- Macdonald (Ronald), The Sword of the King Second Impression..... 6/0
- Noel (Lady Augusta), The Wise Man of Sterncross 6/0
- Messrs. James Nisbet & Co.
- Hume (Martin), Treason and Plot: Catholics and Protestants in the Last Years of Queen Elizabeth 16/0
- Sichel (Walter), Bolingbroke: A Study and a Vindication..... net 12/6
- King (Bolton), Italy To-day: a Study of her Politics, her Position, her Society, and her Letters..... net 12/0
- Hobson (J. A.), The Social Problem: Work and Life..... net 7/6
- Dormer (Francis J.), Vengeance as a Policy in Afrikanerland: a Plea for a New Departure 6/0
- Tulloch (W. W.), The Story of the Life of Queen Victoria. A new Edition with Postscript 2/6
- Harris (J. Rendel), The Life of F. W. Crossley. New and Cheap Edition 2/6
- Tuck (Rev. R.), Sermon Seed: Fifty-two Sermon Studies... 6/0
- Family Prayers for Four Weeks 2/6
- Murray (Rev. Andrew), Working for God..... net 1/0
- Moule (Rev. H. C. G.), The Evangelical School in the Church of England 2/0
- Goy (Madame), Alone in Africa: a Lady's Experiences ... 1/0
- Messrs. Newnes.
- The Library of Useful Stories:
- Henslow (Rev. Prof.), The Story of Wild Flowers ... 1/0
- Rawlings (G. B.), The Story of Books..... 1/0
- Our Neighbours:
- Palmer (Francis H. E.), Russian Life in Town and Country..... net 3/6
- Newnes' Sixpenny Series of Copyright Works: Macdonald (George), The Marquis of Lossie—Clifford (Mrs.), A Wild Proxy—Doyle (A. Conan), White Company
- The Country Life Library:
- Jekyll (Miss), Wall and Water Gardens net 12/6
- Cook (E. T.), Gardening for Beginners: A Handbook to the Garden net 10/6
- Tit-Bits Drawing-Book, containing Freehand, Freearm, and Ambidextrous Drawing Copies, with Analysis and Instructions 0/6
- Dreyfus (Captain), Five Years of My Life 6/0
- Mr. John C. Nimmo.
- Day (Rev. Edward), The Social Life of the Hebrews..... net 5/0
- NEW EDITIONS.
- Harting (J. E.), A Handbook of British Birds. New and Revised Edition 42/0
- English Historical Memoirs (by John Heneage Jesse): Memoirs of the Court of England during the Reign of the Stuarts, including the Protectorate. 6 vols. —

Memoirs of the Court of England from the Revolution in 1688 to the Death of George the Second. 4 vols.—Memoirs of the Pretenders and their Adherents. 3 vols.—Literary and Historical Memorials of London. 2 vols.—Memoirs of King Richard the Third and some of his Contemporaries. 1 vol.—Memoirs of the Life and Reign of King George the Third. 5 vols.—George Selwyn and his Contemporaries. 4 vols.—London: its Celebrated Characters and Remarkable Places. 3 vols.—Memoirs of Celebrated Etonians, and an Historical Drama on the Battle of Bosworth. 2 vols..... per set net 273 0

Mr. David Nutt.

Tudor Translations (Edited by William Ernest Henley):

The Chronicle of Froissart. Translated by John Bouchier, Lord Berners. With Introduction by Prof. W. P. Ker. Vols. II.-VI. (forming Vols. XXVIII.-XXXII.) of the Tudor Translations ...

The Grimm Library:

Vol. XIII. Studies on the Legend of Sir Lancelot Du Lac. By Jessie L. Weston 6/0

Vol. XIV. The Wife of Bath's Tale. By G. H. Maynardier 6/0

The Hidden Servants, and Other Very Old Stories. Told over again by Francesca Alexander net 6/0

Flint (Martha Bockée), A Garden of Simples 6/0

Legge (A. E. J.), Town and Country Poems net 3/6

Scottish History from Contemporary Writers:

Vol. IV. The Chevalier De St. George and the Jacobite Movements in his Favour, 1701-1720 ...

Heartsease: a Cycle of Song 2/6

Noel (Conrad), The Day of the Sun

Under the title of "The Ancient East" will be issued a series of short, popular, but thoroughly scientific, studies, by the leading scholars of Germany. The following will be issued this year:

Wiedemann (Prof. Alfred), The Realms of the Dead in Ancient Egypt 1/0 & 1/6

Niebuhr (Dr. C.), The Tell-el-Amarna Tablets ... 1/0 & 1/6

Zimmern (Prof. H.), The Babylonian and Hebrew Genesis 1/0 & 1/6

Jeremias (Dr. Alfred), The Babylonian Conception of Heaven and Hell 1/0 & 1/6

Winckler (Prof. H.), The Political Development of Babylonia and Assyria 1/0 & 1/6

Popular Studies in Mythology, Romance, and Folk-lore:

No. 10. The Romance Cycle of Charlemagne and His Peers. By J. L. Weston

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

Sangster (Margaret E.), Winsome Womanhood: Familiar Talks on Life and Conduct net 3/6

Philip (Rev. A.), Songs and Sayings of Gowrie net 5/0

Smith (Rev. John), Short Studies: The Gospels 3/6

Warneck (G.), Outline of a History of Protestant Missions from the Reformation to the Present Time 7/6

China's Only Hope: an Appeal by her greatest Viceroy, Chang Chin Tung, Viceroy of Liang Hu, with Indorsement by the present Emperor. Translated by the Rev. S. I. Woodbridge 3/6

Martin (W. A. P.), The Siege in Peking 3/6

Famous Scots Series:

MacLachlan (T. B.), David Livingstone net 1/6

Stewart (Agnes G.), The Academic Gregories net 1/6

Morrison (Rev. W.), Johnston of Warriston net 1/6

Blackwood (Isabella C.), The Church the Children Built /6

Stewart (Rev. A. M.), The Origin of the United Free Church of Scotland net 1/6

Messrs. S. W. Partridge & Co.

Watkins (Owen Spencer), Chaplains at the Front 2/6

Chappell (Jennie), Too Dearly Bought 2/0

Ramsayer (Rev. F.), Dark Days in Kumase

Murray (Charlotte), Through Grey to Gold 2/6

Clark (Francis E.), A New Way Around an Old World ... 2/6

Mitchell (Rev. John), How to Gain the Eye of the Young 1/6

Page (Rev. I. E.), Another Pentecost 1/0

Page (Jesse), God Save the People! /6

Mee (Arthur), King and Emperor: the Life-History of Edward VII. 1/6

Aitken (W. Francis), Victoria: the Well-Beloved (1819-1901) 1/0

Knigh't (Alfred E.), Victoria: her Life and Reign (1819-1901) 2/6

New Century Leaders Series:

Hammerton (J. A.), Lord Rosebery: Imperialist ... net 1/6

Mee (Arthur), Joseph Chamberlain: a Romance of Modern Politics net 1/6

Aitken (W. Francis), Frederick Temple, Archbishop of Canterbury net 1/6

Dawson (Albert), Joseph Parker, D.D.: his Life and Ministry net 1/6

Page (Jesse), General Booth: the Man and his Work ... net 1/6

Mantle (Rev. J. Gregory), Hugh Price Hughes net 1/6

Messrs. Kegan Paul.

Ellis (W. Ashton), The Life of Richard Wagner. Translated and Edited from the German of C. F. Glasenapp.

4 vols. each 16/0

Gruggen (Rev. G.) and Keating (Rev. J.), A History of Stonyhurst

Wilmot (Hon. Alexander), A Manual of South African History 5/0

Pollard (A. F.), England under Protector Somerset ... net 6/0

The Little Flowers of St. Benet 5/0

Wanklyn (Prof. J. A.), Arsenic 2/6

Ripley (W. Z.), The Races of Europe net 18/0

Nickerson (Rev. D.), The Origin of Thought

Harris (Hon. W. T.), The Spiritual Sense of Dante's Divina Commedia 5/0

Janssen (Johannes), The History of the German People at the Close of the Middle Ages. Vols. I. to IV.

per two volumes 25/0

NEW EDITION.

Dowden (Prof. Edward), Puritan and Anglican 7/6

Messrs. C. A. Pearson.

Hodgson (Lady), The Siege of Kumassi 21/0

Vivian (Herbert), Abyssinia 15/0

Vizetelly (Edward), Cyprus to Zanzibar by the Egyptian Delta 15/0

Ralph (Julian), At Pretoria 6/0

Bullen (Frank T.), A Sack of Shakings: Essays from the Spectator, &c. 6/0

Hume (Martin A. S.), The Spanish People 6/0

Roberts (John), The Game of Billiards and How to Play It 6/0

Ralph (Julian), War's Brighter Side 6/0

Scott-Gatty (A. S.), Domestic Ditties 3/6

Grosor (Horace G.), The Life of Lord Kitchener 2/6

Holland (Clive), How to Take and Fake Photographs 1/0

Biddle (Violet), Small Gardens, and How to Make the Most of Them 1/0

Tips for Housekeepers: Including an illustrated section on the folding of Serviettes 1/0

O'Dell (Stackpool E.), Heads, and How to Read Them ... 1/0

FICTION.

Sutcliffe (Halliwell), Willowdene Will 6/0

Mathers (Helen), Cinders 6/0

Marsh (Richard), The Strange Wooing of Mary Bowler ... 6/0

Hatton (Bessie), Her Master Passion 6/0

Griffith (George), A Honeymoon in Space 6/0

Allen (Inglis), A 'Varsity Man 6/0

Cooper (E. H.), The Eternal Choice 6/0

Tracy (Louis), The Invaders 6/0

Westall (William), Don or Devil 6/0

Warden (Florence), A Patched-up Affair 6/0

Harte (Bret), Under the Redwoods 6/0

Williamson (Mrs. C. N.), 'Twixt Devil and Deep Sea ... 6/0

Hill (Headon), The Sentence of the Court 6/0

Becke (Louis) and Jeffery (Walter), The Tapu of Banderah, and Other Stories	6 0
Connell (J.), The Confessions of a Poacher	3 6
Ridge (W. Pett), Mord Em'ly. New Edition	3 6
Golsworthy (Arnold), The New Master	3 6

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Gilman (Charlotte Perkins [Stetson]), Concerning Children Heroes of the Nations Series :	6 0
Perry (Frederick), Saint Louis (Louis IX. of France)	5 0
Green (Walford Davis, M.P.), William Pitt (Earl of Chatham (1708-1778); or, the Growth and Division of the British Empire	5 0
Winans (Walter), The Art of Revolver Shooting	21 0
Dellenbaugh (Frederick S.), North Americans of Yesterday: a Comparative Study of North American Indian Life, Customs, and Products, on the Theory of the Ethnic Unity of the Race	21 0
Melville (Herman), Moby Dick; or, the White Whale. With an Introduction by Louis Becke	6 0
Melville (Herman), White Jacket; or, the World in a Man-of-War	6 0
Conn (H. W.), The Method of Evolution	7 6
Foulke (William Dudley), Maya: a Story of Yucatan	5 0
Rayner (Emma), Visiting the Sin: a Tale of Mountain Life in Kentucky and Tennessee	6 0
Roosevelt (Theodore), Episodes from the "Winning of the West," 1769-1807	3 6
Madison (James), The Writings of. Edited by Gaillard Hunt. To be complete in six or seven volumes	21 0
Per vol., net	12 6
Blok (Petrus Johannes), A History of the People of the Netherlands. Part III.: The War of Independence, 1568-1621	12 6
Scripture (E. W.), Thinking, Feeling, Doing	6 0
Hopkins (James H.), A History of Political Parties in the United States	10 6
Litchfield (Grace Denio), The Moving Finger Writes	18 0
Nippold (Friedrich), The Papacy in the Nineteenth Century	5 0
Benham (William G.), The Laws of Scientific Hand-Reading	5 0
Ragozin (Zinaïde A.), Salammbô the Maid of Carthage. Retold from the French of Gustave Flaubert	5 0
Lincoln (David F.), Sanity of Mind	5 0
Hanna (Charles A.), History of the Scotch-Irish Families in America	5 0
Gardiner (Charles Fox), Care of the Consumptive	5 0
Mitchell (P. Chalmers), Thomas Henry Huxley: a Sketch of His Life and Work	5 0

Mr. Grant Richards.

Allison (W.), The British Thoroughbred Horse: His History and Breeding; together with an Exposition of the Figure System	42 0
Stillman (W. J.), The Autobiography of a Journalist. 2 vols.	24 0
net	21 0
Sixty Years on the Turf: The Life and Times of George Hodgman, 1840-1900. Arranged by Charles R. Warren	21 0
Hollander (Bernard), The Mental Functions of the Brain	21 0
Dixon (Sydenham), From Gladiator to Persimmon: Turf Memories for Thirty Years	18 0
Hutton (Captain Alfred), The Sword and the Centuries; or, Old Sword Days and Old Sword Ways	12 0
Liberty (Arthur Lazenby), Springtime in the Basque Mountains	12 0
Strylenski (Casimir), Memoirs of the Countess Potocka ..	12 0
Farmer (J. S.), The Regimental Records of the British Army	10 6
Paston (George), Little Memoirs of the Eighteenth Century	10 6
Miles (Eustace H.), A History of Rome. Arranged for Use in the Higher Forms of Schools, or the Universities, and for the Civil Service Examinations	8 6
Nietzsche as Critic, Philosopher, Poet and Prophet: Selections from his Works. Compiled by Thomas Common	7 6
Belloc-Lowndes (Marie), His Gracious Majesty King Edward VII.	7 6

Stodart-Walker (A.), Robert Buchanan: the Poet of Modern Revolt. An Introduction to His Poetry	6 0
net	6 0
Macrosty (Henry), Trusts and the State	6 0
Allen (Grant), County and Town in England: With a Chronicle of Churnside	6 0
The Day Book of John Stuart Blackie. Edited by A. Stodart-Walker	6 0
Shaw (Bernard), Three Plays for Puritans	6 0
Raymond (Walter), Good Souls of Cider-Land	6 0
Shiel (M. P.), The Lord of the Sea	6 0
Prescott (E. Livingston), His Familiar Foe	6 0
Warren-Bell (R. S.), Love the Laggard	6 0
Begbie (Harold), The Fall of the Curtain: a Novel	6 0
Egerton (George), Rosa Amorosa: The Love-Letters of a Woman	6 0
Cobb (Thomas), The Bishop's Gambit	6 0
Shee (George F.), The Briton's First Duty: The Case for Conscription	6 0
Aflalo (F. G.), Sea and Coast Fishing	6 0
Blake (John), How Sailors Fight: An Account of the Organisation of the British Fleet in Peace and War	6 0
Maude (Aylmer), Tolstoy and His Problems: Essays	6 0
Duguid (Charles), The Story of the Stock Exchange: Its History and Position	6 0
Owen (Harold), The Staffordshire Potter	6 0
Connor (Marie) and Leighton (Robert), In the Shadow of Guilt	6 0
Wynne (Charles Whitworth), Songs and Lyrics. Revised Edition	5 0
net	5 0
Badcock (Nellie B.), By Grey Old Gardens: Verses	5 0
Davidson (John), Self's the Man: a Tragi-Comedy	5 0
Robertson (J. M.), Wrecking the Empire	5 0
The Further Memoirs of Marie Bashkirtseff	5 0
Thorpe (J. H.), How to Invest and How to Speculate ..	5 0
Godard (J. G.), Patriotism and Ethics	5 0
Williamson (G. C.), The Cities of Northern Italy	3 6
Cruikshank (Mr. and Mrs. J. W.), The Umbrian Towns	3 6
net	3 6
Hendry (Hamish), Burns from Heaven; with some other Poems	3 6
Wood (Walter), The Rifle Brigade: A History	3 6
Wood (Walter), The Northumberland Fusiliers: a History	3 6
Bachelor (Irving), Eben Holden	3 6

NEW EDITIONS.

Allen (Grant), The Evolution of the Idea of God: An Inquiry into the Origins of Religion	7 6
Shaw (Bernard), Cashel Byron's Profession. A New Edition with a new Introduction ..	6 0
Le Gallienne (Richard), The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam: a Paraphrase. New, Revised, and Enlarged Edition	5 0
net	3 6
Davis (Lt.-Col. Newnham), Dinners and Dinners: Where and how to Dine in London	3 6
Rook (Clarence), The Hooligan Nights	3 6
Willson (Beckles), The Truth About Newfoundland	3 6
Peacock (Wadham), The Story of the Inter-University Boat Race. New and Revised Edition	2 0
Ames (Mr. and Mrs. Ernest), The Maid's Progress. Illustrated in Colours	3 6
Gould (F. Carruthers) and Begbie (Harold), Great Men. Illustrated in Colours	3 6
How to Write a Novel: A Practical Guide to the Art of Fiction. ("How To" Series, V.)	3 6
MacMunn (Norman), The Companion Dictionary of Quotations (Companion Books of Reference, Series I.)	2 6
Reith (G. M.), The Chinese Crises from Within	2 6
Drifting	2 6
Hobson (J. A.), The Psychology of Jingoism	2 6

Messrs. Rivington.

Simpson (Rev. W. J. Sparrow), The Minor Festivals of the Anglican Calendar	6 0
Pullan (Rev. Leighton), The Books of the New Testament	4 6
Lacey (Rev. J. A.), Elements of Christian Doctrine	4 6
Greek Manuals of Church Doctrine. Published for the Eastern Church Association	4 6
Crawford (Rev. W. L.), Synesis the Hellenic	4 6

The London Diocese Book	2 6
Oxford Church Text Books : General Editor, the Rev. Leighton Pullan:—
Field (Rev. T.), A Manual for Confirmation	1/0
Hobson (The Rev. J. F.), Old Testament History	1 0
Pullan (Rev. Leighton), An Introduction to the New Testament	1 0
De la Hay (Rev. E. W. M. O.), The Teaching of St. Paul	1/0
Ragg (Rev. L.), Evidences of Christianity	1/0
Periods of European History : General Editor, Arthur Hassall:—
Lodge (R.), The Close of the Middle Ages, A.D. 1272-1494	7 6
Phillips (W. Alison), Modern Europe, from A.D. 1815	7/6

Messrs. Sands & Co.

Stone (J. M.), Mary I., Queen of England	10 6
Humphery (G.), The Land of the Amazons. Translated from the French of Baron de Santa-Anna Nery	16 0
Bryden (H. A.), The Animals of Africa	6/0
The Army from Within. By the Author of "An Absent-minded War"	3/6
Davis (Lieut.-Col. N. Newnham), Military Dialogues on Active Service	3 6
Eagar (Alexander), Songs of the Sword and the Soldier: a Selection of Soldiers' Songs of all Nations	3/6
Montanaro (Lieut.-Col. A. F.) and Armitage (Capt.), The Siege and Relief of Kumasi	7 6
Binstead (A. M.), "Pitcher" , More Gals' Gossip	3 6
Marks (Isabel), Fancy Cycling for Amateurs	3 6
The Pa Papers. By his Son	1 0

FICTION.

Roberts (Mr. rley), Taken by Assault	6 0
Pugh (Edwin) and Burchett (Godfrey), The Heritage	6/0
Fawcett (Edgar), New York	6 0
"Rita," Prince Charming	3 6
Barry (Dr. William), The Place of Dreams	3 6
Gordon (Miss), The Case and the Cure	3 6

Mr. Walter Scott.

Chamberlain (A. F.), Contemporary Science Series: The Child, A Study in the Evolution of Man	6 0
Sergi (Prof.), Contemporary Science Series: The Mediterranean Race	6/0
Osborn (Christabel), Manuals of Employment for Educated Women: Medicine	1/0 and 1 6

NEW EDITIONS, REPRINTS, &C.

Moll (Dr. Albert), Hypnotism	3/6
Hobson (John A.), The Evolution of Modern Capitalism	3 6
Ellis (Havelock), The Criminal	6 0
Geddes (Prof. Patrick) and Thomson (Prof. J. Arthur), The Evolution of Sex	6 0
Starbuck (Prof.), The Psychology of Religion	6/0
The Scott Library : Scots Essayists: From Stirling to Stevenson. Edited, with an Introduction, by Oliphant Smeaton	1/6
The Canterbury Poets : Poems by James Thomson	2 0
Poems by Alexander Smith	2/0
New Edition of Ibsen's Prose Dramas ; edited by William Archer: The League of Youth	1 6
Pillars of Society	1/6
A Doll's House	1 6
Ghosts	1/6
An Enemy of the People	1 6
The Life and Times of Queen Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, &c. By the Authors of "General Gordon," "Grace Darling," &c.	2 6
The World's Great Novels : Dumas (Alex.), Marguerite De Valois	3/6
Dumas (Alex.), Chicot, The Jester (La Dame de Monsoreau)	3/6
The Forty-five Guardsmen	3 6

Messrs. Seeley & Co.

NEW EDITIONS.

Marshall (Beatrice), Emma Marshall: a Biographical Sketch	6/0
Shand (Alexander Iunes), General John Jacob, Commandant of the Sind Irregular Horse and Founder of Jacobabad	6/0
Moriarty (Gerald P.), Dean Swift: His Life and Writings	3 6
Phillips (Claude), Sir Joshua Reynolds	3 6
Cheap Editions of Mrs. Marshall's Stories : Life's Aftermath: a Story of Quiet People	3 6
Dame Alicia Chamberlayne: Memories of Troublous Times	3/6

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

Allen (Rev. Ronald), The Siege of the Peking Legations	7/6
Barnard (Lady Anne), South Africa a Century Ago: Letters Written from the Cape of Good Hope, 1797-1801. Edited, with a Memoir and Brief Notes, by W. H. Wilkins	7 6
Rolleston (Lancelot), Yeomanry Cavalry: or Mounted Infantry?	1 6
Long (Prof. James), Small Farming
Canning (Hon. Albert S. G.), British Power and Thought: a Historical Enquiry	6/0
Newdigate-Newdegate (Lady Anne Emily), Cavalier and Puritan in the Days of the Stuarts. Compiled from the Private Papers and Diary of Sir Richard Newdegate, Second Baronet, with Extracts from MS Newsletters addressed to him between 1675 and 1689	7 6
The Poetical Works of Robert Bridges. Vol. III.	6/0
A Treasury of Irish Poetry in the English Tongue. Edited by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke and T. W. Rolleston	7/6
Conferences on Books and Men. By the Author of "Pages from a Private Diary"	6/0
Lord Lilford (Thomas Littleton, Fourth Baron), F.Z.S. A Memoir by his Sister	10/6
Bullen (Frank T.), The Men of the Merchant Service	7 6
Lucas (E. V.), Domesticities: a Little Book of Household Impressions	5/0
Cannon (J. G.), Clearing Houses: Their History, Methods, and Administration	10/6
Purves (George T.), Christianity in the Apostolic Age	6 0

NEW EDITIONS.

Doyle (A. Conan), The Great Boer War	7 6
Doyle (A. Conan), The White Company	3 6
Doyle (A. Conan), Rodney Stone	3 6
Lee (Sydney), Shakespeare's Life and Work: being an Abridgment Chiefly for the Use of Students of "A Life of William Shakespeare"	2/6

FICTION.

Crockett (S. R.), The Silver Skull	6/0
Carr (M. E.), Love and Honour	6 0
Hope (Graham), A Cardinal and his Conscience	6 0
Randal (John), Pacifico	6 0
Conder (Arthur R.), The Seal of Silence	6/0
Crowninshield (Mrs. Schuyler), The Archbishop and the Lady	6/0

Messrs. Skeffington & Co.

Knox Little (Rev. Canon), Confirmation and Holy Communion	1 0
Burton (Rev. H. J.), Bread in the Wilderness	2/6
Meyrick (Rev. F.), Scriptural and Catholic Truth; or, The Faith and Worship of the Primitive, the Mediaeval, and the Reformed Anglican Churches	5/0
Oesterley (Rev. W. O. E.), St. Francis of Assisi	2/0
Tee (Eleanor), The Soul in Light	2/6
Conybeare (Frederick C.), Roman Catholicism as a Factor in European Politics	3/6
Jordan (Rev. Thomas), Christ the Life: with Other Sermons and Addresses	2 6
Hoskier (Mme.), Thoughts, Memories, and Meditations. From the French, by Constance White	3/6
Hammond (Rev. Canon J.), A New Plain Sermon on the Census of 1901	1 0

Wilkinson (F. H.), The Book of Job: Translated and Annotated	3/6
Forbes (Athol), Odd Fish	3/6
Stone (the late Rev. S. J.), Parochial Sermons	4/0
Myrc (John), Catholic Usages, So-Called	2/6
Lucas (F. Lancaster), The Fish Crown in Dispute	3/6
Natorp (G.), Cookery: Sound, Simple, Dainty	2/6

Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

Meakin (Budgett), The Land of the Moors: a Comprehensive Description, National, Political, and Experimental	15/0
Maulde la Claviere (R. de), The Art of Life
Tschudi (Clara), The Empress Elizabeth of Austria
Minchin (J. G. Cotton), Our Public Schools: their Influence on English History
Gosset (Major E. A. G.), The Campaigns of the Derbyshire Regiment (95th). Vol. III. Egypt, 1882.....
Social England Series (Edited by Kenelm Cotes):
Cornish (F. W.), Chivalry
Brown (Prof. G. Baldwin), History of the Fine Arts...
Vinogradoff (Prof.), The English Manor.....
Balfour (Henry), The Evolution of Household Implements
Smith (Lucy Toulmin), Mysteries and Miracle Plays...
Smith (C. Fell), The Social Position of Women.....
Clowes (W. Laird), The Navy
Narorji (Dadabhai), British Rule in India
Albee (Prof. E.), A History of Utilitarianism
Hegel (G. W. F.), Phenomenology of the Spirit
Heinze (Dr. Max), History of Contemporary Philosophy...
Wundt (Prof. W.), Ethics. Vol. III.
Wundt (Prof. W.), Physiological Psychology. 2 vols.....
Schopenhauer (Arthur), An Essay on Morality
Newbiggin (M.), The Life of the Sea Shore
Sedgwick (Adam), The Student's Text-Book of Zoology. Vol. II.
Groom (Theodore T.), Text-Book of Paleontology for Zoological Students.....
Webb (Wilfred Mark), Biological Types in the Vegetable Kingdom
How to Make and How to Mend, by an Amateur Mechanic
Dadson (A. J.), Evolution and its Bearing on Religions...
Bickerton (A. W.), The Romance of the Heavens
Bickerton (A. W.), A System of Map Drawing
Macpherson (Rev. H. A.), Mammalia
Butterfield (W. C. J. Ruskin), Birds' Eggs and Nests.....
Wale (William), What Great Men have said about Great Men: a Dictionary of Quotations.....
Dalbiac, M.P. (Col. P. H.), and Harbottle (T. B.), Dictionary of Foreign Quotations (Spanish and German)
Herbert (Col. A. R. Kenny), ("Wyvern"), Cookery Books
Baker (E. A.), Descriptive Guide to the Best English Fiction
Marshall (W.), Herbert: a Dramatised Epic Poem, supplementary to The Pilgrim's Progress Savile (Helen), The Wings of the Morning.....
Cardella (G.), For the Life of Others

Mr. T. F. Unwin.

Yeats (W. B.), Poems. New Edition	7/6
Villari (Prof. Pasquale), The Barbarian Invasion of Italy. 2 vols	32/0
Deasy (Capt. H. H. P.), In Tibet and Chinese Turkestan	21 0
FitzGerald (Percy), Fifty Years of Catholic Life and Progress under the Rule of Cardinals Wiseman, Newman, Manning, and Vaughan. 2 Vols.	21/0
"Story of the Nations" Series:
Barry (Dr. William), The Papal Monarchy: From Gregory the Great to Boniface VIII.	5/0
Shuckburgh (Prof. E. S.), The Story of Greece from Earliest Times to A.D. 1453. 2 vols.	5 0
McLaughlin (Prof. A. C.), The United States of America (1783-1900). 2 vols.	5 0
Lilly (W. S.), Renaissance Types	16 0
Jessopp (Rev. Dr.), Before the Great Pillage, and other Essays

Tuin (W. J.) and Nieuwenkamp (W. O. T.), Old Dutch Towns and Villages of the Zuider Zee.....	21/0
Taylor (Dr. C. L.), Masters of Medicine: Andreas Vesalius	3/6
Evans (W. S.), The Canadian Contingents and Canadian Imperialism	6/0
Selby (Rev. T. G.), As the Chinese See Us	6/0
Humphry (Mrs.), Beauty Adorned, and Manners for Girls	1 0

FICTION.

Sutcliffe (Halliwell), Mistress Barbara Cunliffe.....	6/0
Pryce (G.), John Jones, Curate: a Welsh Story	6 0
Hobbes (John Oliver), Love and the Soul Hunters	6 0
Outhwaite (R. M.) and Chomley (C. H.), The Wisdom of Esau: an Australian Story	6 0
Becke (Louis), Yorke the Adventurer, and Other Tales ...	6 0
Barr (Amelia E.), The Lion's Whelp: a tale of Cromwell and his Times	6 0
Alexander (Mrs.), The Yellow Fiend	6 0
McAulay (Allan), Black Mary	6 0
Moore (George), Sister Theresa	6/0
Mann (Mrs. Mary E.), Among the Syringas	6 0
Kiesow (Mrs.), Margaret Hetherington.....	6 0
Lambe (J. L.), By Command of the Prince	6 0
Nesbit (Mrs.), The Wouldbegoods.....	6 0
Arnold (S. G.), Two Busybodies	6 0
"Rita," A Jilt's Journal.....	6 0
Wylwynne (Kythe), The Dream Woman	6 0
Barr (Amelia E.), Souls of Passage and the Maid of Maiden Lane	each 6/0
Smith (F. Clifford), A Daughter of Patricians	6 0
Turnbull (A. R. B.), Tales from Natal.....	3 6
"Waldo Gray," The Young Squire's Resolve	6 0
McMahon (M. T.), Four Ounces to the Dish	6 0
Pain (Barry), Another Englishwoman's Love Letters	1 0
Molesworth (Mrs.), The Blue Baby, and other Children's Stories.....	2 6

Messrs. H. Virtue & Co.

Macmillan (Hugh), The Highland Tay. Illustrated by the Drawings of A. Scott Rankin	15 0
Shoemaker (Michael Myers), Palaces, Prisons, and Resting Places of Mary, Queen of Scots	net 42 0 and 105 0
Monkhouse (Cosmo), The Art Annual, 1901: The Life and Work of Sir John Tenniel	2 6
Art Journal Academy Pictures, 1901	1 0
Sandeman (Ernest Albert), Notes on the Manufacture of Earthenware	net 7/6
The Paris Exhibition, 1900.....	21/0
Foster (Albert J.), Bunyan's Country: Studies in the Bedfordshire Topography of the Pilgrim's Progress	6/0

Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.

Laity in Council: a Volume of Essays by Prominent Lay-Members of the Anglican Communion, dealing with matters intimately connected with the English Church	10 6
Winnington-Ingram (Right Rev. A. F.), The Afterglow of a Great Reign: Four Readings on the Life of Queen Victoria	1 6
Our Reasonable Service: Helpful Readings selected from the Writings of the Rev. W. J. Knox-Little, Canon of Worcester	2 6
Vernon (Rev. J. R.), Old and New Century Bells: Six Addresses	net 2 6
Verse Memories. By the author of "For Ever With the Lord"
A Memoir of the Rev. H. Twells, Canon of Peterborough
Reminiscences of Jean Ingelow. By a Life-long Friend .
Play and Politics in Malaya: Reminiscences of an Old Resident.....	3/6
Edward VII., King and Emperor	leather, 2/6; cloth 1 0

NEW EDITIONS.

How (Right Rev. W. Walsham), Plain Words to Children	2 0
Davidson (Arthur F.), Spiritual Letters of the Rev. J. P. F. Davidson.....	6 0

DAVID NUTT, 57-59, Long Acre.

THE ANCIENT EAST.

Under this title will be issued a series of short, popular, but thoroughly scientific studies, by the leading scholars of Germany, setting forth the recent discoveries and investigations in Babylonian, Assyrian, and Egyptian History, Religion and Archaeology, especially as they bear upon the traditional views of early Eastern History. The German originals have been appearing during the last eighteen months. The English translations made by Miss Jane Hutchison have been submitted in each case to the Authors, and will embody their latest views. Short, helpful bibliographies are added. Each study will consist of some 64 to 80 pages, crown 8vo, and will cost 1s. sewed, or 1s. 6d. cloth.

The following will be issued in 1901:

THE REALMS of the EGYPTIAN DEAD.

By Professor ALFRED WIEDEMANN.

[Ready.

THE TEL-EL-AMARNA PERIOD.

By Dr. C. NIEBUHR.

[Ready Immediately.

THE BABYLONIAN and the HEBREW GENESIS.

By Professor H. ZIMMERN.

THE BABYLONIAN CONCEPTION of HEAVEN and HELL.

By Dr. ALFRED JEREMIAS.

THE POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT of BABYLONIA and ASSYRIA.

By Professor H. WINCKLER.

LATEST PUBLICATIONS.

THE HIDDEN SERVANTS, and other Very Old Stories. Told over again by FRANCESCA ALEXANDER, Author of "The Story of Ida," "Roadside Songs of Tuscany," &c. Crown 8vo, 231 pages, printed on Hand-made paper, Title in red and black, etched Frontispiece, cloth gilt, gilt top, edges trimmed, 6s. net.

A GARDEN of SIMPLES. By Martha Bockée Flint. Crown 8vo, 307 pages, Title in red and black, art linen and boards, top gilt, edges trimmed, 6s. net.

TOWN and COUNTRY POEMS. By A. E. J. Legge, Author of "Sunshine and Smoke," "Wind on the Harpstrings," &c. Crown 8vo, 101 pages, cloth, top gilt, uncut, 3s. 6d. net.

HEARTSEASE: a Cycle of Song. Crown 8vo. Printed at the Constable Press. Parchment, uncut, 2s. 6d. net; also 12 copies on Japanese vellum and bound in fine vellum, of which 8 are for sale at 10s. 6d. net.

THE LAWS and PRINCIPLES of VINT STATED and EXPLAINED and its PRACTICE ILLUSTRATED. By E. HOFFMAN and A. VON RENNENKAMPFF. Edited by F. W. HADDAM. Square 16mo, 160 pages with numerous Diagrams, cloth, 2s. 6d. * Vint is the Russian national card game, and is held by many competent judges to be superior to either Whist or Bridge.

"THE ONLY EFFECTUAL MEANS OF COMBATING HOOLIGANISM."

THE BOYS' CLUB in THEORY and PRACTICE. A Manual of Suggestions for Workers. By P. PAUL NEUMAN. With Supplementary Chapters by A. F. JENKIN, President of the Amateur Gymnastic and Fencing Association; E. M. S. PILKINGTON, Manager of the St. Andrew's Boys' Club, Westminster; and T. E. GRAY, Instructor to the St. John's Gymnasium, Holloway. Crown 8vo, 180 pages, cloth, 2s. 6d.

* Contents:—Existing Organisations (Continuation Schools, Boys' Brigades, &c.); The Theory of the Boys' Club (Membership, Government, &c.); The Cost of the Boys' Club (Maintenance, Premises, &c.); How to Secure Workers; How to Start a Club.

A WOMAN TENDERFOOT. By Grace Gallatin Seton-Thompson. Square crown 8vo, 355 pages, 7 Full-Page Plates, and over 150 Marginal Illustrations by Ernest Seton-Thompson, G. Wright, E. M. Ashe, and S. N. Abbott. In art linen cover, specially designed by Author, top gilt, edges trimmed, net 6s. (6s. 1d. post free).

* Of the above work, issued in the United States a month ago, a First Edition of 5,000 Copies has already been sold out. Mrs. Thompson has accompanied her husband, the Author of "Wild Animals I Have Known," in his explorations of the wildest districts of North America.

TO BE PUBLISHED IMMEDIATELY.

THE DAY of the SUN. By Conrad Noel, Curate of St. Mary's, Paddington. Crown 8vo, sewed, 1s. (1s. 1d. post free). * A demonstration that the extreme Sabbatarian view of Sunday observance is warranted neither by Scripture nor by Church tradition.

POPULAR STUDIES in MYTHOLOGY, ROMANCE, and FOLK-LORE. No. 10. THE ROMANCE CYCLE of CHARLEMAGNE and HIS PEERS. By JESSIE L. WESTON. 6d. net (7d. post free).

* A full prospectus of the "Popular Studies" Series will be sent on application.

STUDIES on the LEGEND of SIR LANCELOT du LAC. By JESSIE L. WESTON, Translator of Wolfram von Eschenbach's "Parzival," of Gottfried von Strassburg's "Tristan," Author of "Legend of the Wagner Drama," &c.

* The above will form Vol. XIII. of the Grimm Library. A full prospectus, with order form at Subscription price before publication, will be sent on application. [Ready in May.

T. & T. CLARK'S LIST.

A NEW WORK OF SPECIAL IMPORTANCE.

Just published, in One Large Volume, 8vo, price 16s.

THE HISTORICAL NEW TESTAMENT: Being the Literature of the New Testament, arranged in the Order of its Literary Growth and according to the Dates of the Documents. A new Translation, Edited, with Prolegomena, Historical Tables, Critical Notes, and an Appendix, by JAMES MOFFATT, B.D.

"The most important book on the credentials of Christianity that has appeared in this country for a long time....A work of extraordinary learning, labour and ability."—Prof. DENNEY in the British Weekly.

IS CHRIST INFALLIBLE AND THE BIBLE TRUE? (Giving the Teaching of Jesus on the Holy Scriptures.) By Rev. HUGH MINTOSH, M.A., Brockley. Post 8vo, 9s.

BIBLE STUDIES. Contributions chiefly from Papyri and Inscriptions to the History of the Language, the Literature, and the Religion of Hellenistic Judaism and Primitive Christianity. By Dr. G. ADOLF DEISSMANN. Authorised Translation (incorporating Dr. Deissmann's most recent changes and additions), by Rev. A. GRIEVE, M.A., D.Phil. 8vo, 9s.

A STUDY of SOCIAL MORALITY. By W. A. WATT, M.A. Post 8vo, 6s.

JUSTIFICATION AND RECONCILIATION. By ALBRECHT RITSCHL. Edited by H. R. MACKINTOSH, D.Phil., and A. B. MACAULAY, M.A. 8vo, 14s.

"Dr. Mackintosh and his coadjutors have earned the gratitude of all theological students in this country....The present translation meets one of the most urgent wants of the hour. Now the great systematic work of Ritschl is open to all."—Prof. J. DENNEY, D.D.

THE MIRACLES of UNBELIEF. By Rev. FRANK BALLARD, M.A., B.Sc. (Lond.). Post 8vo, 6s.

"We very heartily recommend Mr. Ballard's work, not only for its extremely well-reasoned arguments, but for its admirable notes and its useful list of books upon various branches of the subject....It is Mr. Ballard's crowning merit that he proves this with triumphant logic to the uttermost." Church Quarterly Review.

TRUTH and REALITY, with Special Reference to Religion; or, A Plea for the Unity of the Spirit and the Unity of Life in all its Manifestations. By JOHN SMYTH, M.A., D.Phil. (Edin.). With Introductory Note by Prof. R. FLINT, D.D. Crown 8vo, 4s.

"It seems to me admirably adapted both as regards contents and form—thought and style—to interest and profit not only all philosophical readers, but thoughtful and educated men in general....I am deeply convinced of the value of its central thought, and rejoice to see it set forth so comprehensively and effectively."—Prof. FLINT.

THE RITSCHLIAN THEOLOGY. Critical and Constructive: an Exposition and an Estimate. By Rev. A. E. GARVIE, M.A. (Oxon.). 8vo, 9s.

"The weightiest, warmest, and fairest work in English on its subject."

The Speaker.

THE RELATION OF THE APOSTOLIC TEACHING TO THE TEACHING OF CHRIST. By R. J. DRUMMOND, D.D. Second Edition. 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"A strong book, the book of a scholar and thinker, fearless yet reverent, new and yet built on a solid foundation of faith and experience."

Expository Times.

"THE WORLD'S EPOCH MAKERS."

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON.

In crown 8vo, 3s. each Volume.

"We advise our readers to keep a watch on this most able series. It promises to be a distinct success. The volume before us (Cranmer) is one of the most satisfactory books of the sort we have ever read."—Methodist Times.

BUDDHA and BUDDHISM. By ARTHUR LILLIE, M.A.

LUTHER and the GERMAN REFORMATION. By Prof. T. M. LINDSAY, D.D.

WESLEY and METHODISM. By F. J. SNELL, M.A.

CRANMER and the ENGLISH REFORMATION. By A. D. INNES, M.A.

WILLIAM HERSCHEL and HIS WORK. By JAMES SIME, M.A.

FRANCIS and DOMINIC. By Prof. JOHN HERKLESS, D.D. [Nearly Ready.

DR. HASTINGS' DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

"It is hardly possible to over-estimate the value of the vast and varied amount of well-digested information contained in these volumes....We are struck with the fair-mindedness and width of learning displayed almost everywhere in this important work....The present dictionary is endowed with the utmost freedom that the human intellect has a right to claim."—Athenæum.

Vols. I, II, and III, now ready. Vol. IV, in the press. Price per Vol. in Cloth, 28s.; in Half-morocco, 34s. (from which Prices the usual Discount is given for Cash).

Full Prospectus, with Specimen Page, free on application.

Detailed Catalogue of Publications free on application.

Edinburgh: T. & T. CLARK, 38, George Street.

TO BE HAD FROM ALL BOOKSELLERS.

GEORGE ALLEN'S LIST.

JUST OUT.

THE LITERARY YEAR-BOOK, 1901.An Indispensable Book of Reference for all those concerned in Literature.

FIFTH YEAR OF ISSUE.

Edited by HERBERT MORRAH, with Articles by Messrs. ANTHONY HOPE, EDEN PHILLPOTTS, and other well-known Writers.

Crown 8vo, cloth limp, 3s. 6d. net.

THE "GOOD MAN" of the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

A Monograph on its Didactic Literature. By CHARLES WHITTUCK. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Just out.]

The SPECTATOR—"Of all this volume it may be said that it is just and sensible ... always sane and instructive."

The ACADEMY—"This book stands very much by itself. Not often nowadays do we find an original idea worked out with such intellectual zest ... No student of the eighteenth century ought to be a stranger to it."

THE REIGN of WOMAN UNDER QUEEN VICTORIA.

Dealing with the ART, FASHIONS, LITERATURE, MUSIC, and PHILANTHROPY of the Reign. Fully Illustrated. Price 1s. LITERATURE—"The issue is a great artistic success." The GUARDIAN—"Well written and well got up." The CHRISTIAN WORLD—"A superbly produced memorial."

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.THE BELIEVING BISHOP. By HAVERGALL BATES.

LITERATURE—"For sense and sanity and sincerity we should not hesitate to say that Mr. Havergall Bates's 'The Believing Bishop' beats them all."

The OUTLOOK—"There is a certain charm and freshness in 'The Believing Bishop.'"

The BIRMINGHAM DAILY GAZETTE—"One of the cleverest and most entertaining novels we have read for some time."

NORTHBOROUGH CROSS. By L. COPE CORNFORD, Author of "Captain Jacobus." [Next week.]

GEORGE ALLEN, 156, Charing Cross Road, London.

*New Volumes Now Ready.WHYTE-MELVILLE'S WORKS.

An Edition de Luxe.

Edited by the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., M.P.

Printed from new type on hand-made paper, specially manufactured for this edition, and handsomely bound in buckram, with gilt tops. Demy 8vo. Coloured Frontispiece on Japanese Vellum, and Full-Page Illustrations by well-known Artists.

Vol. XIV., DIGBY GRAND. Illustrated by H. M. BROCK. [Ready.]

Vol. XV., SARCHEDON. Illustrated by HARRINGTON BIRD. [Ready.]

TO BE FOLLOWED BY

ROSINE and SISTER LOUISE. CERISE.

QUEENS MARIES. HORNBY HOUSE.

GENERAL BOUNCE. GLADIATORS.

GOOD for NOTHING. THE INTERPRETER.

Vols. I.-XV., £7 17s. 6d. net. Complete Sets, 24 Vols., £12 12s. net.

MODERN HINDUISM: The RELIGION and LIFE of the HINDUS in NORTHERN INDIA. By

W. J. WILKINS, Author of "Hindu Mythology, Vedic and Puranic." Second Edition, revised and partly rewritten.

Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Ready.]

CLOWES' NAVAL POCKET-BOOK, 1901.

Edited by L. G. CARR LAUGHTON.

The most valuable Work of Reference now available, containing a full List of Battleships, Ironclads, Gunboats, Cruisers, Torpedo Boats, a List of Dry Docks, and other valuable information concerning all the Navies of the World. Sixth Year of Issue. Cloth, 16mo, 5s. net. [Shortly.]

W. THACKER & CO., 2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.CELTIC FOLK-LORE: Welsh and Manx

By JOHN RHŶS, M.A., Principal of Jesus College, Oxford. 2 vols., 8vo, cloth, 21s.

BAGHDAD DURING the ABBASID

CALIPHATE. From Contemporary Arabic and Persian Sources. By G. LE STRANGE. 8vo, gilt top, buckram, with 8 Plans (and Keys), 10s. net.

SEVENTEEN LECTURES on the STUDY of MEDIAEVAL and MODERN HISTORY and KINDRED SUBJECTS. With Two Addresses given at Oxford and Reading. By WILLIAM STUBBS, D.D., Bishop of Oxford, &c. Crown 8vo, half-roan, 8s. 6d.

AN ENGLISH MISCELLANY PRE-

SENTED TO DR. FURNIVALL in honour of his Seventy-fifth Birthday. Containing Contributions from Fifty Scholars. With Portrait of Dr. Furnivall and 10 Plates. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, 21s.

MARLOWE'S TRAGICAL HISTORY of

DR. FAUSTUS, and GREENE'S HONOURABLE HISTORY of FRIAR BACON and FRIAR BUNGAY. Edited by A. W. WARD, Litt.D. Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. 6d.

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS, GRACE

ABOUNDING. Relation of the Imprisonment of Mr. J. H. BUNYAN. Edited, with Biographical Introduction and Notes, by E. VENABLES, M.A. Second Edition, Revised by MABEL PEACOCK. Crown 8vo, cloth with Portrait, 3s. 6d.

A CONCISE FRENCH GRAMMAR. including Phonology, Accidence, and Syntax, with Historical Notes for Use in Upper and Middle Forms. By ARTHUR H. WALL, M.A., Assistant Master in Marlborough College. Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d.

HISTORICAL PRIMER of FRENCH

PHONETICS and INFLECTION. By MARGARET S. BRITTAIN, M.A. With Introductory Note by PAGET TOYNBEE, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE STUDENT'S HANDBOOK to the UNIVERSITY and COLLEGES of OXFORD. Fifteenth Edition. Revised to January, 1901. Crown 8vo, stiff boards, 2s. 6d. net.

A NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY on

Historical Principles, founded mainly on the materials collected by the Philological Society. Imperial 4to. Edited by J. A. H. MURRAY, LL.D., and HENRY BRADLEY, M.A.

Single Section, L-Lap (commencing Volume VI.), 2s. 6d. By Mr. HENRY BRADLEY. [Ready on April 1st.]

*ALSO PUBLISHED BY HENRY FROWDE.AT THE GATES of SONG: Sonnets. By

LLOYD MIFFLIN. With a Portrait. Small 4to, cloth, 6s.

ANTHOLOGY of FRENCH POETRY, 10th to 19th Centuries. Translated by HENRY CARRINGTON, M.A., Dean of Bocking. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

SPEECHES of OLIVER CROMWELL,

1641-1658. Collected and Edited by C. L. STAINER, M.A., Christ Church, Oxford. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

STUDIES in JOHN the SCOT (ERIGENA), a Philosopher of the Dark Ages. By A. GARDNER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

Complete Catalogue Post Free on application.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press Warehouse, Amen Corner, E.C.

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)..... 17/6
 „ Quarterly 5/0
 „ Price for one issue /5

Mr. Swinburne.

